' offered us a Licence, and demanded a reſignation of ' the Patent, which I preſumed as abſolutely to refuſe; ' this refuſal I made in writing, and petitioned the ' King for his protection in the Grant, which he had ' given me: this matter reſted thus for many months, ' and the next moleſtation we received, was by an ' Order, ſigned by your Grace, to diſmiſs Mr Cibber. ' The Actors obeyed, but I preſumed to write to your ' Grace againſt it, and expreſſed my ſorrow, that you ' would give me no better occaſion of ſhewing my duty ' but by bearing Oppreſſion from you; this freedom ' produced a meſſage by your Kinſman and Secretary, ' whom I treated with as much deference and reſpect, ' as any man living could do the Duke of Newcaſtle ' coming from the King. This meſſage was in your ' Grace's name, to forbid me ever to write, ſpeak, or ' viſit you more. The Gentleman, I dare ſay, has ' told you, and will tell you, that I anſwered him al- ' moſt in theſe very words:

' Sir, I beg of you to take notice of my Manner, ' my Voice, and my Geſture, when I anſwer to this ' ſevere Meſſage; and let the Duke of Newcaſtle know, ' that with the moſt profound ſubmiſſion and humility ' I received it, and proteſted to you, that I could have ' no meſſage from any Family, except the Royal one, ' that could give me half this mortification. If I have ' not fallen into phraſes, that ſpeak me truly ſorrowful ' and humble, uſe any you yourſelf can think of, which ' are more ſo, and you will then beſt expreſs my mean- ' ing. At the ſame time you may very truly ſay, that ' if any other man were Chamberlain, and ſhould ſend ' me ſuch a meſſage, my reply ſhould be as haughty ' as it is now humble.

' He left me with a farther declaration, that my ' Patent ſhould be proſecuted according to Law. I ' reſted as well ſatisfied as one who had loſt ſo powerful ' a friend could, from a ſecurity in a ſtill greater Power, ' that of the Laws of the Land; but I was ſoon after ' awakened out of this ſlumber, which was far from ' being an eaſy one, by hearing that your Grace had ' ſent for Mr Booth, and threatened a ſigned Manual, ' which muſt neceſſarily diſable me, as to my defence, ' before you would proceed againſt me according to ' Law. I did your Grace the Juſtice to think it im- ' poſſible for you to be prevailed upon to do that. ' I aſſure your Grace, the great name on the Top of ' the Paper, did not give me more Terror, than the ' name at the bottom did Sorrow. The Miniſter who ' ſubſcribes, is anſwerable for what the King writes. ' Our Laws make our Prince Author of nothing but ' favour to his ſubjects. My Patent cannot be hurt, ' except it can be proved, it was obtained per decep- ' tionem, as according to my duty, I am to believe ' this Order, for it does, by an artificial method in its ' effect, deſtroy by his ſigned Manual, what is granted ' by his Great Seal, which had been impoſſible to ' have been brought about, had the matter been fairly ' repreſented. All I could do, was to repreſent it by ' Petition, which I delivered in your Grace's preſence ' on Friday Night, the Prayer of which was: Votre ' Suppliant donc prie très humblement vôtre Majeſté, qu'il ' ne recoive aucune Moleſtation, que par la Loye en juſte ' forme de Proces; Your Petitioner therefore moſt hum- ' bly prays, he may not be any way moleſted but by ' due courſe of Law. I know not by what Accident ' it happened, that my Petition was never read, but ' the next news I heard was the Order of Revocation. ' But I muſt take the liberty to ſay, that his Majeſty ' muſt grant the Ruffians, mentioned in the laſt Pro- ' clamation, which is denied unhappy me, a Trial by ' due courſe of Law. The Revocation came on the ' Saturday, your Grace was ſo good as not to break ' the Sabbath upon me; but the ſufficient evil of this ' day, being Monday, is an Order of Silence. Your ' Grace will pleaſe to read them both over again, which ' are to this effect:

' Whereas by our Royal Licence, bearing date the ' 18th day of October, 1714, We did give and grant ' unto Richard Steele Eſq; now Sir Richard Steele Knt. ' Mr Robert Wilks, Mr Colley Cibber, Mr Thomas ' Dogget, and Mr Barton Booth, full power, licence, ' and authority, to form, conſtitute, and eſtabliſh a ' Company of Comedians. And having received In- ' formation of great miſbehaviours committed by our ' Company of Comedians now acting at the Theatre in ' Drury-Lane: Therefore for reforming the Come- ' dians, and for eſtabliſhing the juſt and ancient Autho- ' rity of the Officers of our Houſhold, and more eſ- ' pecially of our Chamberlain, We have thought fit ' to revoke the abovementioned Licence. And we do ' further (as much as in us lies, and as by Law we may) ' revoke and make void all other Licences, Powers, ' and Authorities whatſoever, and at any time hereto- ' fore given by us to the ſaid Sir Richard Steele, Robert ' Wilks, Colley Cibber, Thomas Dogget, and Barton Booth, ' or to any of them ſeverally. In purſuance of this ' your Grace proceeds thus:

' Whereas his Majeſty has thought fit, by his Letters ' of Revocation, bearing date the 23d day of January, ' 1719, (for divers weighty reaſons therein contained) ' to revoke his Royal Licence: For the effectual pre- ' vention of any future miſbehaviour, in obedience to ' his Majeſty's commands, I do, by virtue of my Office ' of Chamberlain of his Majeſty's Houſhold, hereby ' diſcharge you the ſaid Managers and Comedians at ' the ſaid Theatre in Drury-Lane in Covent-Garden, ' from farther acting. Given under my hand and ſeal ' this 25th day of January, 1719.

' To the Gentlemen managing the Company of ' Comedians, at the Theatre in Drury-Lane in ' Covent-Garden, and to all the Comedians and ' Actors there.

' 'Tis obſervable, that though his Majeſty took ' great care to expreſs himſelf according to his gra- ' cious inclination, with much reſerve and care that ' nothing but the Law ſhould hurt his poor ſubject, in ' the words as much as in us lies, and as by Law we may, ' your Grace has been prevailed upon to ſupply the ' defective hardſhip. I ſhall not ſay more, or make ' ſtronger obſervations upon what you have ſigned; ' for my Love to you, will not let me call this an act of ' yours, as my duty to my Prince will not let me call ' it an act of his: I wiſh your Grace had been as care- ' ful as he in leaving me to the Law. But if you will ' allow me to aſk you one favour, before you have quite ' broke my heart and ſpirit; give me but the name of ' your Adviſer, that is to ſay, your Lawyer on this ' occaſion, and you ſhall ſee, that it is not for want of ' ſkill in life, that I am ſubjected to all the pains and ' puniſhments, to which thoſe wicked ones are expoſed, ' who are deſcribed by the monoſyllable, Poor. When ' I know who has made your Grace thus injure the beſt ' Maſter and beſt Servant that ever man had, I will ' teach him the difference between Law and Juſtice: ' he ſhall ſoon underſtand, that he who adviſes how to ' eſcape the Law, and do Injuſtice to his Fellow-ſubject, ' is an Agent of Hell; ſuch a man for a larger fee, ' would ſend a Dark-lanthorn to a Murderer, which ' would be but the ſame iniquity practiſed in a higher ' degree, that would be more cruel, but not more ' unjuſt. When I am ſure who he is, I ſhall with ' juſtice uſe him, as he does with injuſtice uſe me: I ' ſhall ſo far imitate him as to be within the Law, ' when I am endeavouring to ſtarve him; I hope he is ' Poor, by ſelling Poyſon to get himſelf food (58). ' But I fear I grow tranſported beyond the reſpect that ' is due to your Grace's preſence, and proteſt to you, ' in the moſt ſolemn manner, that rather than never to ' be well with you more, were myſelf and family only ' concerned in it, I would this moment reſign my Pa- ' tent, for any employment of leſs profit, that you would ' procure me: but my obligations to your Grace will ' not diſcharge thoſe, which I am under to the reſt of ' the world. I would not hurt any man now in India, ' for the favour of the greateſt man in England, or give ' up a Door-keeper of the Play-houſe to make myſelf: ' therefore your Grace I hope will forgive me, that to ' gratify you, I do not conſign to diſtreſs and poverty, ' above ſixty families, who all live comfortably, many ' of them plentifully, under my preſent Juriſdiction. ' When I reſign them, they may be governed by your ' Grace's Succeſſor in your office, as they have been by ' your Predeceſſor, according to humour and caprice, ' and not reaſon and juſtice. In their defence and my ' own, I deny all Allegations of voluntary neglect im- ' puted to me or them; or undue demands made upon ' the

that his complaints would reach the Ear of his Sovereign, though in an indirect courſe, by that canal. In this ſpirit he formed the plan of a periodical Paper, to be publiſhed twice a week under the title of The Theatre; the firſt number of which came out on the 2d of January, 1719-20. In the mean time, the misfortune of being out of favour at Court, like other misfortunes, drew after it a train of more. During the courſe of this Paper, in which he had aſſumed the feigned name of Sir John Edgar, he was outraged by Mr John Dennis, the noted Critic, in a very abuſive pamphlet, entituled The Character and Conduct of Sir John Edgar, called by himſelf Sole Monarch of the Stage in Drury-Lane; and his Three Deputy Governors, in two Letters to Sir John Edgar. To this inſult, our Author made a proper reply in The Theatre [DD]. While he was ſtruggling with all his might to ſave himſelf from ruin, he found time to turn the ſame Engine, his Pen, againſt the miſchievous South-ſea Scheme [EE], which had nearly brought the nation to ruin in 1720. But this application proving ineffectual, he publiſhed ſoon after The State of the Caſe between the Lord Chamberlain of his Majeſty's Houſhold, and the Governor of the Royal Company of Comedians. With the opinions of Pemberton, Northy and Parker concerning the Theatre. In this pamphlet he ſtates the account of his loſs by this proceeding, as follows:

Six hundred pounds a year for life, moderately valued, amounts to	6000	0	0
Three years after my life	1800	0	0
My ſhare in the ſcenes, ſtock, &c.	1000	0	0

He then declares he never did one act to provoke this attempt, nor, ſays he, does the Chamberlain pretend to aſſign any direct reaſon of forfeiture, but openly and wittingly declares he will ruin Steele; 'which, in a 'man in his circumſtances againſt one in mine, is as 'great as the humour of Malagene, in the Comedy, 'who valued himſelf upon his activity in tripping up 'Cripples. All this is done againſt a man to whom 'Whig, Tory, Roman Catholic, Diſſenter, Native, 'Foreigner, owe zeal and good-will for good offices 'endeavoured towards every one of them in their Civil 'Rights, and their kind wiſhes for him are but a juſt 'return. But what ought to weigh moſt with his 'Lordſhip the Chamberlain, is my zeal for his Ma'ſter; of which I ſhall at preſent ſay no more than 'that his Lordſhip and many others may perhaps have 'done more for the Houſe of Hanover, than I have; 'but I am the only man in his Majeſty's Dominions, 'who did all he could (60).'

It is obſervable, that our Author's friend, Mr Walpole, was at this time in diſfavour at Court, having reſigned his Poſt of Firſt Commiſſioner of the Treaſury on the 10th of April, 1717 (61), and was not replaced till April 2, 1721, preſently after which, viz. on the 18th of May following, Sir Richard was alſo reſtored to his Office of Comptroller of the Theatre (62).

[DD] He made a proper reply in the Theatre.] The impotence of the critic's attack was a ſubject juſtly provocative of mirth, a provocative which was very ſeaſonable to our Author, then groaning under ſuch a perſecution from the hand of real power, as had almoſt ſunk his native gaiety: but here he appears perfectly reſtored. 'The Defamer, ſays he of himſelf in the cha'racter of Sir John Edgar, has this phraſe in his firſt 'page: Your black peruke and your duſky countenance— 'This treatment of a viſage ſo well known is an im'pudence that tranſcends all example; and I have 'ordered new editions of his face after Kneller, Thorn'hill, and Richardſon, to diſabuſe mankind in this 'particular. He is painted by the firſt reſolute, by the 'ſecond thoughtful, and by the third indolent. Sir God'frey bewailed that Caracchio was not living when he 'ſat to him; and, when he took pencil in hand, re'peated this ſentence out of Mr Steele's epiſtle to the 'Bayliff of Stockbridge: He is gone but a little way in 'the courſe of virtue, who cannot bear reproach for her 'ſake. You may obſerve a roughneſs in the portraiture 'from the rigor of that thought, which has occaſioned 'that moſt ladies chuſe Mr Richardſon's work rather 'than Sir Godfrey's (63).' In the ſame perfectly good humour he publiſhed afterwards the following adverteſment. An eminent Turky-merchant and an ingenious Foreigner do hereby give notice, that if any perſon will diſcover the libeller or libellers, who has and have falſly and maliciouſly inſinuated in their writings, that Sir R——d S—le is ugly, ſo as he or they may be proſecuted by law, ſhall have all fitting encouragements; the ſaid gentlemen having loſt conſiderable matches by reaſon of the ſimilitude of their perſons to the ſaid injured Knight (64).

[EE] He employed his pen againſt the South-ſea ſcheme.] Upon this ſubject he wrote The Criſis of Property; an argument proving, that the annuities for ninety-nine years, as ſuch, are not in the condition of other ſubjects of Great-Britain; but, by compact with the legiſlature, are exempt from any direction relating to the ſaid eſtates; which was ſoon followed by A Nation a Family; being the Sequel of the Criſis of Property; or a Plan for the Improvement of the South-ſea propoſals; both publiſhed in Feb. 1720. He entered alſo into this ſubject in The Theatre for Tueſday February 16, the ſame year, where having, in defence of his ſtruggle to preſerve his patent according to the firſt plan of this paper, deſcanted upon the neceſſity of guarding againſt poverty by all warrantable means, by diſplaying the many calamities that were its attendants, he paſſes, by way of no very unnatural tranſition, to the unjuſtifiable means of doing it by the South-ſea ſcheme. This is the ſubject of a feigned viſit from himſelf, Sir John Edgar, to the injured Knight, Sir Richard Steele. In the concluſion of which, 'Sir 'John Edgar, ſays he, turned off the diſcourſe, by aſk'ing what thoſe papers were upon the table, which 'he told me, with a very grave face, were a calcu'lation he had made of the difference between a ſcheme 'of his for paying the debts of the nation, which he is 'printing in all haſte, and ſays will be for the advantage 'of the whole kingdom, and is built upon what he 'calls his firſt rule of politics, to wit, A Nation a 'Family. I told him, ſays Sir John Edgar with ex'quiſite humour, people would expect great things 'of him indeed upon that foundation, he had ſuch 'a reputation for œconomy. He pertly anſwered, 'I would provide for my family as it belongs to the 'nation, and not for the nation as if it belonged to my 'family. Let others ſerve the nation by taking care 'only of themſelves, I will ſerve it with contempt of 'any thing for myſelf, but what I will enjoy in com'mon with others. I ſuppoſe we ſhall ſee this, and 'a great deal more, too old-faſhioned even for me, 'in print within a few hours. I left him very much 'out of humour with him; and, in ridicule of his paying the public debts, before he had recovered his eſtate 'to pay his own, I placed the extemporary diſtich at the 'head of this preſent writing. This is-

(65) The Theatre, No. XIV.

As the South-ſea ſcheme was not obtained without a proper conſideration given to the miniſtry, our Author's engine was apparently directed againſt it by the ſpirit of oppoſing the miniſtry which then oppreſſed him. The Criſis of Property was attacked in a pamphlet printed the ſame year under the title of The Criſis of Honeſty, being an Anſwer to the Criſis of Property; in a Letter to Sir Richard Steele. He took no notice in print of this antayear he was reſtored to his office and authority in the Play-houſe in Drury-Lane (r). Of this it was not long before he made an additional advantage, by bringing his celebrated Comedy, called The Conſcious Lovers, upon that Stage, where it was acted with prodigious ſucceſs in 1722. So that the receipt there muſt have been very conſiderable, beſides the profits accruing by the Sale of the Copy, and a Purſe of five hundred pounds given to him by the King (s), to whom he dedicated it. Yet notwithſtanding theſe ample recruits, about the year following, being reduced to the utmoſt extremity, he ſold his ſhare in the Play-houſe, and ſoon after commenced a Law-ſuit with the Managers, which in 1726 was determined to his diſadvantage [FF]. Having now again, for the laſt time, brought his fortune, by the moſt heedleſs profuſion, into a deſperate condition, he was rendered altogether incapable of retrieving the loſs, by being ſeized with a paralytic diſorder, which greatly impaired his underſtanding. In theſe unhappy circumſtances, he retired to his ſeat at Languanor near Caermarthen in Wales; where he paid the laſt debt to nature on the 21ſt of September, 1729, and was privately interred, according to his own deſire, in the Church of Caermarthen. Among his papers were found, the MSS. of two plays; one called The Gentleman, founded upon The Eunuch of Terence; and the other intituled The School of Action; both nearly finiſhed.

Sir Richard's firſt Wife was a Gentlewoman of Barbadoes, with whom he had a valuable Plantation there, on the death of her brother, who was taken by the French, at ſea, as he was coming to England, and died in France. After the death of this wife, without Iſſue, he married Mary the daughter of Jonathan Scurlock of Languanor in Caermarthenſhire, Eſq; by whom he had three children, a ſon named Eugene, and two daughters, Elizabeth and Mary (t). His ſon was ſome years under the care of Mr Solomon Lowe, of Blythe-Houſe in Hammerſmith, who gave him the character of a ſprightly lad, of fine parts; but not long after he was taken home to his Father's houſe in York-Buildings, being indulged (as his genius lay that way) in acting plays in the Cenſorium (u), his conſtitution was broke by frequent heats and colds, and the child loſt (w). His daughter Elizabeth, being the only one then living (*), was married young, in the end of May 1731, to the honourable John Trevor, then one of the Welſh Judges, and now Baron Trevor of Bromham, who hath Iſſue by her one daughter, named Diana (x). As Sir Richard was beloved when living, his loſs was ſincerely regretted at his death. He was a man of undiſſembled, and extenſive benevolence; a friend to the friendleſs, and, as far as his circumſtances would permit, the Father of every Orphan. His works are chaſt and manly; he himſelf admired Virtue, and he drew her as lovely as ſhe is. He celebrates a generous action, with a warmth that is only peculiar to a good heart. He was a ſtranger to the moſt diſtant appearance of Envy or Malevolence, never jealous of any man's growing reputation, and ſo far from arrogating any praiſe to himſelf from his conjunction with Mr Addiſon, that he was the firſt who deſired him to diſtinguiſh his Papers in the Spectator; and after the death of that Friend, was a faithful Guardian of his Fame, notwithſtanding an aſperſion which Mr Tickel was ſo unjuſt to throw upon him [GG]: Sir Richard's greateſt Error antagoniſt, being prevented probably by the ſudden cataſtrophe of the project, the iniquity of which became a parliamentary enquiry before the end of the year (66). Upon the whole, it was very lucky for Sir Richard's character, that he was thrown into the oppoſition both againſt the Peerage bill and the South-ſea ſcheme. The reputation he gained thereby as a patriot may be deemed a ſufficient ballance for whatever loſs he ſuſtained as a patentee.

[FF] The ſuit ended to his diſadvantage.] Mr Cibber is here again our authority, who begins his account thus. 'In all the tranſactions of life there cannot be a more 'painful circumſtance than a diſpute in law with a man 'with whom we have long lived in an agreeable amity. 'But when Sir Richard, proceeds he to get himſelf 'out of difficulties, was obliged to throw his affairs 'into the hands of lawyers and truſtees, upon that 'conſideration the friend and the gentleman had no 'more to do in the matter. Thus, whilſt Sir Richard 'no longer acted from himſelf, it can be no wonder 'if a flaw was found in our conduct for the law to make 'work with. About three years before the law-ſuit 'commenced, upon Sir Richard's total abſenting him-'ſelf from all care and management of the ſtage, which 'by our articles he was equally and jointly with us 'obliged to attend, we let him know that we could not 'go on at that rate; but that, if he expected to make 'the buſineſs a ſinecure, we muſt be paid for our extra-'ordinary care of it: we therefore intended to charge 'for it a ſalary of 11. 13s. 4d. every acting day for 'our management. To which in his compoſed man-'ner he anſwered, that to be ſure we knew what was 'fitteſt to be done better than he did; that he had 'always taken a delight in making us eaſy, and had 'no reaſon to doubt of our doing him juſtice; and he 'never once objected to, or complained of, this for near 'three years together. But, though no man alive can 'write better of œconomy, yet perhaps no man is more 'above the drudgery of practiſing it. He was often in 'want of money; and, while we were in friendſhip with 'him, we aſſiſted his occaſions: but this compliance had 'ſo unfortunate an effect, that it only heightened his im-'portunity of borrowing more; and the more we lent, 'the leſs he minded us, or ſhewed any concern for our 'welfare. Upon this we ſtopt our hands at once, and 'peremptorily refuſed to advance another ſhilling, till, 'by the ballance of our accounts, it became due to him. 'This treatment, though we hope not in the leaſt un-'juſtifiable, we have reaſon to believe ſo ruffled his 'temper, that he at once was as ſhort with us as we had 'been with him; for from that day he never came near 'us: nay, he not only continued to neglect what he 'ſhould have done, but did what he ought not to have 'done; he made an aſſignment of his ſhare without 'our conſent, in manifeſt breach of our agreement. 'Our part ſuffered by this neglect, ſince his rank and 'figure in the world were of extraordinary ſervice to us. 'The cauſe was heard before Sir Joſeph Jekyl; and 'the iſſue was, that, Sir Richard not having made any 'objection to what we had charged for management 'for three years together, as our proceedings had been 'all tranſacted in open day, without any clandeſtine 'intention of fraud, we were allowed the ſums in diſ-'pute abovementioned, and Sir Richard not being 'adviſed to apply to the Lord Chancellor, both parties 'paid their own coſts, and determined this ſhould be 'the laſt law-ſuit between them (67).'

[GG] He ſhewed himſelf a guardian of Addiſon's fame againſt Tickel.] Inſtances of this friendſhip to the memory of Mr Addiſon have been already mentioned, and ſufficiently enlarged upon in this work, to which places we muſt refer the reader (68), who, it is hoped, will excuſe ſome inaccuracies there too haſtily dropt, to the prejudice of Sir Richard's account of this friend's reaſons for quitting his deſign to enter into the prieſthood, which our Author aſcribes to the perſuaſions of Lord Halifax (69), and proves it againſt Mr Tickel, who had imputed this change to Mr Addiſon's ſerioufneſs and and modeſty, which repreſented the duties of the prieſtly office as too weighty for him, without taking notice of any other reaſon, and thereby manifeſtly inſinuating, that this, at leaſt, was the principal if not the ſole cauſe of the change. But this is utterly inconſiſtent with Sir Richard's account of it, which as plainly implies, that the principal if not the ſole cauſe of it came from Lord Halifax. Whence it is evident, that both the accounts cannot be true (70) in the full ſenſe and meaning of their reſpective Authors. In juſtice therefore to Sir Richard let it be allowed, as candour requires it ſhould, that his remark is not ill-grounded; and then we hope the charge of ill-nature in it may not be turned upon the critic, by reflecting too ſeverely, that the ſeriouſneſs of the viſage may fairly be underſtood to imply the ſeriouſneſs of the temper from which the viſage naturally takes its air.

STILLINGFLEET [Edward], the late very learned Biſhop of Worceſter, was the ſeventh ſon of Samuel Stillingfleet Gent. deſcended from an ancient family [A], by Suſanna his wife, the daughter of Edward Norris of Petworth in Suſſex Gent. who was his godfather as well as grandfather, and from whom he received his name. He was born April the 17th 1635, at Cranbourn in Dorſetſhire; and educated from his tender years, in the grammar-ſchool of that place by Mr Thomas Garden, a man of eminence and character in his profeſſion: Under whom he made ſo conſiderable a progreſs, that he continued there till the time drew on, that it would be proper to ſettle him in the univerſity. In order whereunto, he was removed for a while to Ringwood in Hampſhire, with the view of an exhibition, given for ſuch Scholars as ſhould be elected thence to either of the Univerſities, by William Lynne Eſq; founder of that ſchool. From hence he was choſen at Midſummer 1648, and admitted the Michaelmaſs following into St John's college in Cambridge: and about ſix weeks after, on November the 8th, was admitted a Scholar of the houſe, at the nomination of the Earl of Saliſbury. In this ſtation he acquitted himſelf with ſuch applauſe, and was taken ſo much notice of for his ſingular ingenuity, and conſtant improvement of it by a diligent application to his ſtudies (a); that no ſooner had he commenced Batchelor of Arts, which was in 1652 (b) [B], but the very next election, he was choſen Fellow of the college, and admitted as ſuch March the 31ſt 1653. About the year 1654, he withdrew a while from the univerſity to live at Wroxhall in Warwickſhire with Sir Roger Bourgoine, or Burgoigne, Bart. [C], a perſon of great piety, prudence, and learning, to whom he had been recommended by Dr Paman, one of the Fellows of his college. But, the year following, he removed to Nottingham, to be tutor to Francis, eldeſt ſon of the honorable Francis Pierrepont Eſq; brother to the Marquis of Dorcheſter. Here he began his Irenicum (c), which was publiſhed in 1659 [D]. Mean time,

[C] To live at Wroxhall in Warwickſhire with Sir Roger Burgoigne Bart.] In what ſtation Mr Stillingfleet was there, whether as a Companion or Chaplain, we are not informed. However, he behaved himſelf extremely well, as appeared not only from Sir Roger's kindneſs to him whilſt in his family, but always by his unuſual reſpects to him when he made him viſits, and afterwards eſpecially by his preſenting him to the conſiderable Living of Sutton [3].

[D] Here he began his Irenicum, which was publiſhed in 1659.] The whole title of this Book, is, 'Irenicum. 'A Weapon-Salve for the Churches Wounds, or the 'Divine Right of particular Forms of Church-Government diſcuſſed and examined according to the Princi- 'ples of the law of Nature, the poſitive Laws of God, 'the practice of the Apoſtles, and the Primitive Church, 'and the judgment of reformed Divines. Whereby 'a Foundation is laid for the Churches peace, and the 'accommodation of our preſent differences. Humbly 'tendered to conſideration.' In 1662 he put out a ſecond Edition, 'with an Appendix concerning the 'power of Excommunication in a Chriſtian Church.' 4to. The running title is, 'The divine Right of Forms 'of Church-Government, examined.' He hath divided it into two books. And, after having enquired, in the firſt, How far Church-Government is founded upon the Law of Nature; He proceeds in the ſecond to lay down theſe poſitions; That, of divine right, there muſt be ſome form of Government in the Church; and, That Church-government muſt be adminiſtered by officers of divine appointment. And then he ſhews, That Chriſt did not determine the Form of the Government of his Church by any poſitive Laws; That the Apoſtles, in ſettling the government of it, copied the Model of the Jewiſh Synagogue; That Epiſcopacy is owned as a human Inſtitution by the ſenſe of the Church; That, in all probability, the Apoſtles did not obſerve any one fixed courſe of ſettling Church-government; but ſettled it according to the ſeveral circumſtances of time, places, and perſons; That there is no foundation for Lay-Elders, either in Scripture or Antiquity; That Epiſcopacy is lawful; That no certain unalterable Form of Church-Government was obſerved in the primitive Church, as delivered down to them either by a law of Chriſt, or an univerſal Conſtitution of the Apoſtles; That the moſt eminent Divines of the Reformation did never conceive any one form neceſſary; Thoſe who look upon equality as the primitive Form, yet judge Epiſcopacy lawful; Thoſe who judge Epiſcopacy to be the primitive Form, yet look not on it as neceſſary .... 'The book 'is written with a great deal of Learning, Moderation, 'and wit in ſome parts, eſpecially the preface. It was 'eſteemed a maſter-piece (4):' and well it might be ſo, when it is conſidered that the Author was only twenty-four years of age at the time of its publication (5). Biſhop Burnet tells us, that it 'took with many; but 'was cried out upon by others as an attempt againſt 'the Church. Yet the argument was managed with 'ſo much learning and ſkill, that none of either ſide 'ever undertook to anſwer it ..... The writing of it 'was a great ſnare to the Author: For, to avoid the 'imputations which that brought upon him, he not 'only retracted the book, but he went into the humours 'of a high ſort of people, beyond what became him, 'perhaps beyond his own ſenſe of things.'——— He was obliged more than once to make a kind of Apology for it. Thus, in one place (6), he 'profeſſes 'to have publiſhed it, hoping by it to bring over thoſe 'to a compliance with the Church of England (then 'like to be re-eſtabliſhed) who ſtood off upon the ſup- 'poſition that Chriſt had appointed a Preſbyterian 'Government to be always continued in his Church, 'and therefore thought Prelacy was to be deteſted as 'an time, he took his Maſter of Arts degree in 1656 (d), as ſoon as he was of proper ſtanding; and was incorporated in the ſame at Oxford, June 14, 1677 (e). He had not been above two years at Nottingham, when he was called back from thence by his worthy patron Sir Roger Burgoigne, who preſented him, in 1657, to the Rectory of Sutton in Bedfordſhire [E]. Before he was inſtituted to it he received epiſcopal orders from Dr Brounrig, the then ejected Biſhop of Exeter. In this cure he performed all the duties of a moſt diligent and faithful Paſtor; and there he compoſed his very learned book intituled Origines Sacræ, printed in 1662 (f) [F]: Which ſo recommended him to the favour of his dioceſan, Biſhop Sanderſon, that he granted him, October the 16th 1662, the ſingular privilege of a Licenſe to preach the word of God throughout his dioceſe of Lincoln (g). It alſo procured him ſuch eſteem amongſt the reſt of the learned world, that Dr Henchman Biſhop of London employed him to write a Vindication of Archbiſhop Laud's conference with Fiſher the Jeſuit [G]. The reputation of theſe excellent performances was the occaſion of his being choſen by Sir Harbottle Grimſton Preacher at the Rolls-Chapel; which obliging him to be in London in Term-time, was a fair introduction to his ſettlement in that noble city (h). And it followed ſoon after; for in January 1664-5, he was preſented by Thomas Earl of Southampton to the great living of St Andrew's Holbourn; to which he was inſtituted the 21ſt of March (i). He kept notwithſtanding his office of Preacher at the Rolls: And was choſen Lecturer at the Temple, where for ſeveral years he preached in the afternoon before thoſe learned and venerable Societies; which procured him the acquaintance and friendſhip of the moſt eminent men in the law (k). On the 9th of February, 1666-7, he was collated by Biſhop Henchman to the Prebend of Iſledon, or Iſlington, in the church of St Paul's (l). Having taken in 1663 the degree of Batchelor of Divinity, he commenced in 1668 Doctor in that faculty (m); at which time he was perſuaded to keep the public Act [H]. And having been for ſome time Chaplain to King Charles II, his

' an unlawful Uſurpation: . . . and it did not want ' ſucceſs that way both here and in a neighbour king- ' dom.' . . . In another place (7), he ſpeaks of it thus, in the perſon of P. D. . . ' I believe there are many ' things in it, which if Dr Stillingfleet were to write ' now, he would not have ſaid: For there are ſome ' which ſhew his Youth and want of due conſideration; ' others which he yielded too far, in hopes of gaining ' the Diſſenting Parties to the Church of England; ' but upon the whole matter, I am fully ſatisfied the ' Book was written with a deſign to ſerve the Church ' of England. . . . . He ſays further, I dare challenge ' any man to produce one paſſage in the whole Book ' that tendeth to encourage Faction or Schiſm, or op- ' poſition to the Church of England, but on the con- ' trary, I endeavoured to recommend the Epiſcopal ' Government, as having the advantage of all others, ' and coming neareſt to Apoſtolical practice.' Upon the whole, it muſt be acknowledged by all, to contain a maſs of Learning abundantly beyond what could have been expected at his years, and which few, if any, of his contemporaries, could pretend to equal (8).

[E] Who preſented him, in 1657, to the Rectory of Sutton in Bedfordſhire.] One of the Seats of Sir Roger's family being here, might make him the more ſollicitous to place a ſerious, ingenious, pious, and prudent perſon there, to be both a good neighbour, and ſuitable companion for himſelf, as well as a watchful and ſkilful guide of ſouls. And of whom could he more fitly make choice upon ſuch an occaſion, than of Mr Stillingfleet, whom he had ſo thoroughly known, and of whoſe character and abilities he was ſo fully ſatisfied, by his own converſation with, and experience of him, at Wroxhall (9)?

[F] Origines Sacræ, &c.] The whole title of it is, ' Origines Sacræ: Or a rational Account of the Chriſtian ' Faith, as to the Truth and Divine Authority of the ' Scriptures, and the matters therein contained.' Lond. 1662. 4to. The compiler of his life juſtly obſerves (10), that this was ' a work of great extent, and variety ' of admirable learning, and written with ſuch perſpi- ' cuity of expreſſion, ſuch ſolidity of judgment and ' ſtrength of argument, that it would have been de- ' ſervedly eſteemed a moſt compleat performance for ' one of more than twice his age: And ſo it was thought ' by a moſt excellent judge; for when he appeared at a ' Viſitation before his dioceſan, Biſhop Sanderſon, the ' Biſhop ſeeing ſo young a man, could hardly believe ' it was Mr Stillingfleet, whom as yet he only knew ' by his Books; and afterwards, when he had embraced ' him, ſaid, " He much rather expected to have ſeen one " as conſiderable for his age, as he had already ſhewn " himſelf for his learning;" It having always been ' juſtly eſteemed one of the beſt Defences of revealed ' Religion that ever was extant in our own or any other ' Language. And it ſhewed the early ripeneſs of his ' Underſtanding, and that he had attained to the Know- ' lege of the Aged, when himſelf was yet but very ' young, he being but about twenty-eight years old ' at the time of its publication. An excellent work in ' its kind! but which would have been ſtill much ' improved, had God granted him a longer life: A large ' ſpecimen whereof is to be ſeen in the Folio editions of ' that work, printed ſince his deceaſe, which was to ' have made part of the Firſt Volume; for he deſigned ' to have publiſhed it in ſeveral parts in 8vo, and had ' ſo well conſidered it, as to have gone on writing and ' printing as faſt as ever health and buſineſs would have ' permitted him.' The Specimen here referred to, is printed at the end of the folio Editions of Origines Sacræ; and bears this further title. " Or, a Rational Account " of the Grounds of Natural and Revealed Religion: " wherein the Foundations of Religion, and the Au- " thority of the Scriptures, are aſſerted and cleared. " With an Anſwer to the modern Objections of Atheiſts " and Deiſts. In five Books." But it contains only Two Chapters of Book I. of the intended work; and pages 116.

[G] A Vindication of Archbiſhop Laud's Conference with Fiſher the Jeſuit.] The book written againſt Archbiſhop Laud's Conference was intituled, ' Labyrinthus Cantua- ' rienſis, or Dr Laud's Labyrinth.' By T. C. It was ſaid to be printed at Paris, 1658, but did not appear abroad till 1663.——Mr Stillingfleet's Anſwer was named, I. ' A Rational Account of the Grounds of the ' Proteſtant Religion; being a Vindication of the Lord ' Archbiſhop of Canterbury's Relation of a Conference ' between him and John Fiſher, from the pretended ' Anſwer of T. C.' Lond. 1664. fol. In this book, he ſo evidently manifeſted what are the true Grounds of Faith, and where, and on which ſide, the Schiſm between us and the Church of Rome lies; and what Corruptions have been introduced by, and are conſtantly maintained among thoſe of that Communion; as effectually ſilenced the Adverſary, and did not a little advance Mr Stillingfleet's reputation. He wrote his Anſwer at Sutton, and made ſuch diſpatch, that, beſides conſtant attendance on the duties of the place, he ſent up of that elaborate work ſix or ſeven ſheets a week to the preſs (11). Dr Tillotſon gives this juſt and true character of it, that he found it in every part anſwerable to its title, viz. A Rational Account, &c. (12).

[H] At which time he was perſuaded to keep the public Act.] And he did it with univerſal applauſe, on account of his fluency in the Latin tongue, his quickneſs of reply, and his powerful vindication of the poſitions he undertook to maintain: which were theſe, 1. Ratio ſecundi Præcepti in Decalogo eſt immutabilis, i. e. his Majesty constituted him, in 1670, Canon Residentiary of St Paul's [I]. On the 11th of October 1672, he exchanged his Prebend of Islington for that of Newington in the same church (n). And, to bring some of his other preferments together, May the 4th 1677, he was made by King Charles Archdeacon of London, upon the promotion of Dr Lamplugh to the See of Exeter: Moreover, being nominated Dean of St Paul's, he was elected January 16, 1677-8 (o). But to return to his learned writings; he published in 1669 some Sermons: one of which being 'concerning the Reason of Christ's suffering for us,' engaged him in a controversy with the Socinians [K]. He was also engaged soon after in a controversy with the Papists [L]. And he moreover exerted himself in writing against them in King James the Second's reign [M]; which he did with such an exactness and liveliness, that no

It begins thus. 'Cha. R. Trusty and 'well-beloved, we greet you well. Our well-deserving 'and well-beloved subject and chaplain Edward Stilling-'fleet, Doctor in Divinity, hath by his learned writings 'done such eminent service for the Church of England 'in particular, and the defence of the Christian Truth 'in general, that we think ourselves bound to give 'him all fitting encouragement, and therefore we are 'graciously pleased to recommend [him] unto you in 'very especial manner, and further to will and require 'that you elect and admit Him the said &c. [K] Engaged him in a controversy with the Socinians.] One of them having reflected upon the doctrine of this sermon, and made at the same time unworthy reflections upon the rulers of our Church, as if they had countenanced and encouraged the Socinian doctrine; our learned Author published, II. 'A Discourse concerning 'the true Reason of the Sufferings of Christ, in con-'futation of Crellius's Answer to Grotius.' Wherein he justly exposes the Socinian method of interpreting Scripture, particularly by a witty parallel between the first chapter of Genesis, and the first of St John's gospel. He also seriously considers the nature and end of our Saviour's sufferings, and removes the Socinian objections against their merit, and the reason we have to expect Salvation by them. After his death there was published, III. A second part to this book of Satisfaction; occasioned by an Appeal from the Dissenting Ministers to him, touching some Differences among themselves about that point. There are in this several of their Letters, with his Answers, and then a fuller examination of the grounds of the controversy (but not quite finished) wherein he judiciously states and explains the points between them, and as strenuously vindicates that necessary doctrine of satisfaction from the Antinomian notion and consequences of it, as he had before done from the Socinian (15).——The first of these Discourses was reprinted in 1696, with this title, 'A Discourse 'concerning the Doctrine of Christ's Satisfaction; or 'the true Reasons of his Sufferings; with an Answer 'to the Socinian objections. To which is added a 'Sermon concerning the Mysteries of the Christian 'Faith; preached April 7, 1691. With a Preface 'concerning the True State of the Controversie about 'Christ's Satisfaction.' Lond. 1696. 8vo. The Sermon was preached at the Tuesday Lecture at St Lawrence Jewry, upon 1 Tim. i. 15.——He published also a Defence of it, or IV. 'A Discourse in Vindication of 'the Trinity: with an Answer to the late Objections 'against it from Scripture, Antiquity, and Reason. 'And a Preface concerning the different Explications 'of the Trinity, and the tendency of the present Soci-'nian Controversie.' The Preface is dated Worcester, Sept. 30. 1696 (16).... And some Reflections being made on this last Treatise, he wrote an Answer to them (17).

'A Second Letter to 'Mr G. in Answer to two Letters lately published con-'cerning the Conference at the D. of P's.' He also published at the end of Dr Tillotson's Rule of Faith, XIII. 'A Reply to Mr J. S. [Serjeant] his Third Ap-'pendix, containing some Animadversions on our 'learned Author's Rational Account &c.' . . . XV. And, in another Postscript, he examined a Treatise called Diaphanta, said to have been written by the Author of Fiat Lux. . . . Likewise he republished, with a learned Preface, XVI. 'The Jesuits Loyalty manifested in three 'several Treatises, lately written by them (19) against 'the Oath of Allegiance.' From which it appears, that the Government can have no real security from them, so long as they refuse to renounce the Pope's power of deposing Princes, and absolving subjects from their Allegiance. To which are subjoined three other Tracts, viz. 1. The Execution of Justice in England, not for Religion, but for Treason. Dated Dec. 17, 1583, and penned by the Lord Treasurer Burleigh. 2. Important Considerations; tending to prove, that Queen Elisabeth's proceedings against the Catholicks, since the beginning of her reign, were both mild and merciful. 3. The Jesuits Reasons unreasonable: or Doubts proposed to the Jesuits upon their Paper presented to divers Persons of Honour for Non-exception from the common Favour voted to Catholicks. This last had been printed at London in 1662. 4to.——— One of the chief Pieces written by the Catholicks against Dr Stillingfleet, was printed at Paris, with this title, 'A just Discharge to Dr Stillingfleet's unjust Charge of 'Idolatry against the Church of Rome. [N] A Letter to a Deist, in answer to several Objections against the Truth and Authority of the Scriptures.] He styles it otherwise, 'A Letter of Resolution to a 'Person unsatisfied about the Truth and Authority of 'the Scriptures.' And he says in the Preface, that it 'was written for the satisfaction of a particular Person, 'who owned the Being and Providence of God, but 'expressed a mean Esteem of the Scriptures, and the 'Christian Religion.' 'Tis dated at the end, June 11, 1675, but was not published till 1677. Lond. 8vo. without the Author's name.

[O] The Dissenters having attack'd a Sermon of his, preached in 1680, it occasioned his publishing The Unreasonableness of Separation.] That Sermon was preached at Guildhall-Chapel, before the Lord Mayor &c. the first Sunday of Easter-term, on Phil. iii. 16. And the occasion of it, as he tells us himself (21), was this. The Dissenters growing loud in their groundless clamours against the Church of England, as Popishly affected; and one of the principal leaders of them (Mr Baxter) having published two pernicious books, the one called A Plea for Peace, but which far better deserved the title of a Plea for Disorder and Separation; the other, The true and only way of Concord of all Christian Churches, but fraught with such impracticable notions, and dividing principles, as though his whole design had been to prove, that there is no true way of concord among Christians: .... 'Since by the means 'of such books, (adds he) the Zeal of so many people 'was turned off from the Papists against our Church, 'I saw a plain necessity, that either we must be run 'down by the impetuous Violence of an enraged, but 'unprovoked Company of Men; or we must venture 'ourselves to try whether we could stem that Tide, 'which we saw coming upon us.' ..... He thought it therefore neither improper nor unseasonable to perswade Protestants to Peace and Union at any time, especially at such a time as that when things were in such a dangerous fermentation (22): And the whole drift of his Sermon was, to dissuade the Dissenters from the established Church to quit their needless and destructive Separation; shewing, that according to the judgment of divers even amongst themselves, a Conformity to our Church's worship was not unlawful, and by consequence their Separation must be sinful and dangerous, and what they ought therefore all to desist from, as they would consult the honour of God and Religion, the Peace and Tranquillity of the Church, and would prevent the great Designs of our other Enemies, and leave the Protestant Religion established here to posterity. But several of the Dissenters, especially those three of principal note among their leaders, Dr Owen, Mr Baxter, and Mr Alsop, instead of a thankful acknowledgment for his intended kindness, set themselves to write against him (23), and some of them in a very indecent manner. Which unsuitable return of theirs had only this effect, that it produced his excellent Vindication of our Church, intituled, XXVIII. 'The unreasonableness of Separation: or an 'impartial Account of the History, Nature, and Pleas 'of the present Separation from the Communion of 'the Church of England. To which several late 'Letters are annexed of eminent Protestant Divines 'abroad, concerning the Nature of our Differences, 'and the way to compose them.' Lond. 1681 and 1683. 4to.

[P] And, about the same time, upon the contest that arose in the House of Lords, about the Bishops Right of voting in capital cases, he wrote his treatise of The Jurisdiction of the Bishops &c.] That contest was occasioned by the prosecution of Thomas Osborne, Earl of Danby, as is abundantly manifest from our Historians, to whom the reader is referred (24). Many books were then written on both sides, concerning the point, whether the Bishops ought to be permitted to attend at that trial; and whether they can vote in the preliminaries in trials of treason. Denzil Lord Holles, in particular, wrote 'A Letter, ... shewing that the Bishops are not to be 'Judges in Parliament in Cases capital.' Printed in 1679. 4to. In opposition to whom Dr Stillingfleet published, XXIX. 'The grand Question concerning 'the Bishops Right to vote in Parliament in Cases 'capital, stated and argued from the Parliament-Rolls 'and the History of former Times; with an Enquiry 'into their Peerage, and the Three Estates in Parlia- 'ment.' 8vo. (25)... Bishop Burnet rightly observes, that 'Dr Stillingfleet gave upon this occasion a great 'proof of his being able to make himself the master 'of any argument which he undertook: For after 'the lawyers, and others conversant in parliament- 'records, in particular the Lord Hollis, who undertook 'the argument with great vehemence, had writ many 'Books about it, he published a treatise that discovered 'more skill and exactness in judging those matters than 'all that had gone before him. And indeed he put an end 'to the controversy in the opinion of all impartial men. 'He proved the right that the Bishops had to vote in 'those preliminaries beyond contradiction in my opi- 'nion, both from our records, and from our consti- 'tution (26).'... The writer of our Author's Life also observes, that this 'Anonymous Answer much sur- 'prized the world upon a double account. For first, 'it was not expected that a Divine, and one who, 'besides the business of a great parish, had been long 'engaged in Controversies of Divinity, and had his 'time thereby taken up in writing many excellent Books 'in his own profession, should have been so perfectly 'well versed in the ancient Constitution and Usages of 'Parliament, as well as the common and statute Laws 'of the land, as he here shewed himself to be. As 'neither in the second place, was it to be thought, 'he could have so dextrously changed his style, which 'is

Having been ſummoned to appear before King James's Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion, he drew up a Diſcourſe concerning the Illegality of that Commiſſion [R]; which however he did not publiſh till 1689 (s). Beſides his other preferments, he was Canon of the twelfth ſtall in the church of Canterbury (t); and Prolocutor of the lower Houſe of Convocation, for a long time together, in the reigns of King Charles and King James the Second (u). At the Revolution, due regard was paid to his merit: For he was advanced to the Biſhopric of Worceſter, vacant by the death of Dr William Thomas; to which he was conſecrated October 13, 1689 (w). In this eminent ſtation he behaved in the moſt worthy and exemplary manner; and endeavoured to reform and inſtruct his whole Dioceſe by his learned Charges [S], and to correct all Abuſes in his Courts, wherein he often preſided (x). As a member of the Upper Houſe of Parliament, he appeared to great advantage in ſeveral Debates there [T]. Soon after his promotion to his Biſhopric, he was appointed one of the Commiſſioners for reviewing the Liturgy; and he examined every word in the new Collects, then compoſed with the exacteſt judgment (y). In 1694, there was an intention of advancing him to the Archbiſhopric of Canterbury, vacant by the death of Archbiſhop Tillotſon [V]. [Q] Origines Britannicæ &c.] The whole title is, XXX. ' Origines Britannicæ, or, The Antiquities of the ' Britiſh Churches. With a Preface concerning ſome ' pretended Antiquities relating to Britain, in Vindi- ' cation of the Biſhop of St Aſaph.' Lond. 1685. fol. The deſign of that book is to give as clear and diſtinct a view of the ſtate and condition of the Britiſh churches, from their firſt plantation to the converſion of the Saxons, as could be had at ſo great a diſtance, and by ſuch a degree of light as is left us concerning them (28). He hath divided the whole into Five Chapters. And in the firſt he treats of the firſt planting a Chriſtian Church in Britain by St Paul. Wherein he obſerves, that there was no Chriſtian Church planted in Britain during the reign of Tiberius; and that Gildas's words, which have been brought to prove it, are miſunderſtood. Next he examines and confutes the Tradition, concerning Joſeph of Arimathea and his brethren coming to Glaſtonbury, to plant Chriſtianity. And, after having proved, that there was a Chriſtian Church planted here in the Apoſtles time; he ſhews the great probability of St Paul's having been its founder. At the ſame time, he intermixes a great many curious obſervations, about the Antiquity of Seals in England; the Saxon Charters, which he affirms to be all ſuſpicious till the end of the ſeventh century, &c. In Chap. II. he treats of the ſucceſſion of the Britiſh Churches to the firſt Council of Nice. And, among other things, proves that the national converſion of the Scots under King Donald is fabulous, and that Proſper ſpeaks not of the Scots in Britain, but in Ireland. That Lucius was King of the Regni, part of Surrey and Suſſex. Of Dioclefian's perſecution in Britain; the ſtopping of it by means of Conſtantius; and the flouriſhing of the Britiſh Churches under Conſtantine. The reaſon of three Biſhops of Britain only being preſent at the Council of Arles; and of the great Antiquity of epiſcopal government here. Chap. III. is of the ſucceſſion of the Britiſh Churches, from the Council of Nice to the Council of Ariminum. Wherein he clears, the teſtimonies of Conſtantine's being born in Britain; and alſo the juſt Rights of the Britiſh Churches: There being no evidence that they were under the Roman Patriarchate. In Chap. IV. he enquires into the Faith of the Britiſh Churches; and clears them from the charge of Arianiſm and Pelagianiſm: Giving at the ſame time ſome account of Pelagius, Fauſtus, Germanus and Lupus, Banchor-monaſtery, the Liturgy of the Britiſh Churches &c. Chap. V. treats of the Declenſion of the Britiſh Churches; of the Picts and Scots; of the fabulous Antiquities of theſe; of the Roman Walls, King Arthur &c. . . . . To the whole is prefixed a long and learned Preface, wherein he rebukes the confidence of Sir George Mackenzie; for charging Biſhop Lloyd, with ' a degree of Leſe Ma- ' jeſty, in injuring and ſhortening the Royal Line of ' the Scotiſh Kings:' becauſe his Lordſhip had rejected the long fabulous bead-roll, or ſucceſſion of the Kings of Scotland, from Fergus I. till the fourth century (29).

[R] He drew up a Diſcourſe concerning the Illegality of that Commiſſion.] The whole title of it was, XXXI. ' A Diſcourſe concerning the Illegality of the Eccle- ' ſiaſtical Commiſſion, in Anſwer to the Vindication ' and Defence of it: wherein the true notion of the ' Supremacy is cleared; and an Account is given of ' the Nature, Original and Miſchief of the Diſpenſing ' Power.' In an advertiſement prefixed to it, he ſays, that ' this Diſcourſe concerning the Illegality of the ' late Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion, was written when the ' Author of it was ſummoned to appear before it; and ' was in continual expectation of undergoing its cen- ' ſure, for not complying with the orders of it.'

[S] By his learned Charges.] They are printed in the Firſt Part of his Eccleſiaſtical Caſes, and divided into XXXII.—Five Diſcourſes; wherein he treats of the duties and Rights of the Parochial Clergy; of the nature of the Truſt committed to them; of their particular duties; of their maintenance by Law; and of the Obligation to obſerve the Eccleſiaſtical Canons and Conſtitutions. To them is annexed, in the ſame volume, XXXIII. ' A Diſcourſe concerning Bonds of Reſignation of Be- ' nefices, in point of Law and Conſcience.' The Preface to which is dated Weſtminſter, July 10, 1695. This laſt Diſcourſe was for the moſt part the ſubſtance of his Charges at his Triennial Viſitation in the year 1693 (30).

(30) See his Life, p. 95.

[T] He appeared to great advantage in ſeveral Debates there.] But there are in print, only two of his ſpeeches made in the Houſe of Lords: namely, XXXIV. ' The ' Caſe of Viſitation of Colleges:' occaſioned by the proceeding of Dr Jonathan Trelawney, Biſhop of Exeter, as Viſitor of Exeter college; in the affair of Dr Arthur Bury Rector of that college, which by Appeal, or writ of Error was brought from the King's Bench before the Houſe of Peers. The other is, XXXV. ' The Caſe of Com- ' mendams, A. D. 1694-5.' relating to a Grant ad retinendum, made to Dr Thomas Teniſon, Biſhop of Lincoln, for holding the Vicarage of St Martin's in the fields together with his Biſhopric, only for a certain term. Upon the expiration of which, it was debated, whether the right of preſentation was in the Crown, or in the proper patron the Biſhop of London. Theſe two are printed in the Second Part of his Eccleſiaſtical Caſes (31): And in the ſame Volume are inſerted alſo XXXVI. ' A Diſcourſe of the Nature of ' our Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, and the Law on which ' it ſtands.' And XXXVII. ' A Diſcourſe of the true ' Antiquity of London, and its State in the Roman ' Times.'

[V] In 1694 there was an intention of advancing him to the Archbiſhopric of Canterbury.] ' Many, ſays Biſhop ' Burnet (32), wiſhed that Stillingfleet might have ' ſucceeded, he being not only ſo eminently learned, ' but judged a man in all reſpects fit for the poſt. ' The Queen was inclined to him; ſhe ſpoke with ſome ' earneſtneſs, oftener than once, to the Duke of Shrewſ- ' bury on that ſubject: She thought he would fill that ' poſt with great dignity: She alſo preſſed the King ' earneſtly for him: But as his ill health made him not ' capable of the fatigue that belonged to the Province; ' ſo the Whigs did generally apprehend, that both his ' notions and his temper were too high.'

[W] The Socinians ſpreading about their pernicious Pamphlets.] They were commonly printed in Quarto, upon indifferent paper, and with a ſmall and cloſe letter; and were publiſhed from the year 1691 to 1606, or later. The firſt of them are ſome tracts of John Bidle. Uſually they are bound in three ſmall quarto volumes. . . . . What made the Socinians renew their attacks againſt duty to caution the world againſt the dangerous tendency of their doctrine (z): But having, in one of his Diſcourſes againſt them, reflected upon ſome paſſages in Mr Locke's Eſſay concerning Human Underſtanding, it occaſioned a Controverſy between him and that great man, of which ſome Account is given below [X]. Beſides his Works already mentioned, he publiſhed a great many occaſional Sermons, preached before the King, the Houſe of Commons, the Lord Mayor, &c. [Y]. And likewiſe other ſmall pieces [Z]; ſome without his name [AA]. He was naturally of a ſtrong conſtitution, and in all probability might have enjoyed his health much longer, had he not impaired it by conſtant hard ſtudy; which at length brought the gout upon him, the common diſeaſe of a ſtudious ſedentary courſe of life; and, after above twenty years ſtruggle, fixing in his ſtomach, it proved fatal. He died at his houſe in Park-Street, Weſtminſter, March the 27th 1699, and his body being carried to Worceſter, was interred among his predeceſſors behind the Choir in that Cathedral: where a handſome monument is erected to his memory (aa) [BB]. againſt our learned Prelate, was his reprinting, in 1696, his Diſcourſe concerning the true Reaſon of the Sufferings of Chriſt; with a Sermon on 1 Tim. i. 15. Whereupon they publiſhed, Conſiderations and Explications of the Doctrine of the Trinity, &c. in which they aſſert, That the Biſhop was utterly miſtaken, in thinking, that they deny the Articles of the new Creed, or Athanaſian Religion, becauſe they are Myſteries, or 'becauſe (ſay 'they) we do not comprehend them: We deny them, 'becauſe we do comprehend them. We have a clear 'and diſtinct perception that they are not Myſteries, 'but Contradictions, Impoſſibilities, and pure Non-'ſenſe.' . . . They attacked afterwards his Vindication of the Trinity, in a Tract of theirs, intituled, 'The 'Agreement of the Unitarians with the Catholick 'Church.' Wherein, they ſay, that 'He has heartily 'chode with the Socinians, for the Terms: and has en-'tirely yielded the things, in queſtion to the Unita-'rians (33).'

[X] But having, in one of his Diſcourſes againſt them, reflected upon ſome paſſages in Mr Locke's Eſſay concerning Human Underſtanding, it occaſioned a Controverſy between him and that great man &c.] The Diſcourſe wherein Biſhop Stillingfleet attacked Mr Locke, was that in Vindication of the Trinity. And the faults he found in his Eſſay, were, his definition of Subſtance, and his notion of Ideas; thinking that they were prejudicial to the doctrine of the Trinity. Whereupon Mr Locke, who was impatient of oppoſition, and uneaſy at having his favourite Eſſay cenſured, publiſhed, in a ſort of heat, A Letter to the right Reverend Edward Lord Biſhop of Worceſter, concerning ſome Paſſages relating to Mr Locke's Eſſay of Human Underſtanding: in a late Diſcourſe of his Lordſhip's, in Vindication of the Trinity. Soon after, our Prelate publiſhed, XXXVIII. 'The 'Biſhop of Worceſter's Anſwer to Mr Locke's Letter, 'concerning ſome Paſſages relating to his Eſſay of 'Human Underſtanding, mentioned in a late Diſcourſe 'in Vindication of the Trinity. . . . With a Poſtſcript 'in anſwer to ſome Reflections made on that Treatiſe 'in a late Socinian Pamphlet.' The Letter is dated, at the end, Worceſter, March 27, 1697, and the Poſt-ſcript, April 27, 1697.——Next Mr Locke came out with a Reply to the Right Reverend the Lord Biſhop of Worceſter's Anſwer to his Letter, concerning ſome Paſſages relating to Mr Locke's Eſſay of Human Underſtanding: in a late Diſcourſe of his Lordſhip's, in Vindication of the Trinity. Dated at the end, June 29, 1697. His Lordſhip rejoined, in XXXIX. 'The Biſhop of Worceſter's 'Anſwer to Mr Locke's Second Letter; wherein his 'Notion of Ideas is proved to be inconſiſtent with it-'ſelf, and with the Articles of the Chriſtian Faith.' This is dated at the end, Sept. 22, 1697. Mr Locke had the laſt word, in his long Reply to the Right Reverend the Lord Biſhop of Worceſter's Anſwer to his Second Letter: Wherein, beſides other incident matters, what his Lordſhip has ſaid concerning Certainty by Reaſon, Certainty by Ideas, and Certainty of Faith; the Reſurrection of the ſame Body; the Immateriality of the ſoul; the Inconſiſtency of Mr Locke's Notions with the Articles of the Chriſtian Faith, and their Tendency to Scepticiſm; is examined.

[Y] He publiſhed a great many occaſional Sermons &c.] XL. One of the firſt he publiſhed, was a moſt excellent and eloquent Sermon, preached before the Houſe of Commons, at St Margaret's Weſtminſter, Oct. 10, 1666, being the Faſt-day appointed for the late dreadfull Fire in the city of London; upon Amos iv. 11. . . In 1673, what he had publiſhed to that time, were collected into one Volume folio. After that, he printed about Twenty more, which were alſo collected into volumes; ſo that they made four volumes 8vo in 1696. An edition of Fifty of his Sermons came out in 1707, fol.

[Z] And likewiſe other ſmall pieces.] Among theſe we muſt reckon, XLI. A Preface to a Sermon of Dr Ford, Rector of Old Swinford, intituled, 'The Reſtor-'ing of Fallen Brethren &c.' preached on Mid-Lent-Sunday, 1696, at the publick Cenſure of ſome Offend-ers (34).

H. S. E.

Of his great and extenſive Learning he hath left ſuch evident and laſting Proofs, that it need not be further mentioned. And as to his other qualifications, he was tall, graceful, and well-proportioned; his countenance comely, freſh, and awful; in his converſation chearful and diſcreet, obliging and very inſtructive, always procuring eſteem and reſpect from thoſe who converſed with him. His Apprehenſion was quick and ſagacious; his Judgment exact and profound; his Memory very tenacious; no man ſooner diſcerning the ſtrength of a cauſe, or determining truer as to the merits of it: Nor was his inſight into perſons leſs quick and juſt, he ſoon perceiving their capacities and abilities, as well as their deſigns and intereſts (bb) [CC]. He had a noble Library, collected at a vaſt expence of time, pains and money: After his deceaſe, it was purchaſed by Dr Narciſſus Marſh, Archbiſhop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland, to make a public Library in Dublin; and he built a handſome Edifice for that purpoſe. But a conſiderable number of MSS. relating chiefly to our own Nation and Conſtitution, in the Biſhop's poſſeſſion, were bought by the late Earl of Oxford, and are now part of the moſt valuable Harleian Collection (cc). Whilſt our Prelate was Rector of Sutton he married Andrea, eldeſt daughter of William Dobyns of Wormington in Glouceſterſhire Eſq; by whom he had two daughters, which both dyed in their infancy, and a ſon named Edward [DD]. After her deceaſe, (for ſhe lived but a little while) he married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Nicholas Pedley of Huntington, Serjeant at law, by whom he had ſeven children, of which two only ſurvived him, namely James Rector of Hartlebury and Canon of Worceſter, and Anne married afterwards to Humphrey Tyſhe of Gray's Inn Eſq; (dd).

Nov. 30, 1688, he was elected Fellow of the Royal Society, and on the 21ſt of June, 1692, he was created Doctor of Phyſic at Cambridge, and practiſed for ſome time at King's Lynne. But marrying in 1692, he loſt both Fellowſhip and Profeſſorſhip; and, what was worſe, his Father's favour. However, going into orders, he obtained from him the Rectory of Newington-Butts, which he exchanged for the Rectories of Wood-Norton and Swanton in Norfolk, in 1698. He dyed in 1708, leaving a ſon named Benjamin, who was afterwards of Trinity college in Cambridge; and three daughters, of whom the eldeſt is married to John Lockcr, Eſq; Barriſter at law. In his perſon he was crooked, but had a lively and ingenious countenance, and an eaſy temper, free from ambition: though he wanted not abilities either of parts, or of learning, to have made a more conſpicuous figure But the misfortune of loſing his father's favour, hindered his advancement (39).

STOW [JOHN], this induſtrious man, who hath preſerved ſo many things from oblivion, muſt not be forgotten in a work of ſuch a nature as this. He was the ſon of Thomas Stow, of St Michael's Cornhill in London [A], merchant-taylor, and born there about the year 1525 (a). We have no account of the place of his education, nor of the manner in which he ſpent the younger part of his life; only find that he was brought up to his father's buſineſs of a taylor (b). In 1544, he came into great danger, from an unjuſt accuſation given againſt him by a prieſt: but the falſehood of it was happily diſcovered, and the accuſer deſervedly puniſhed. He probably lived at firſt in Cornhill: but in 1549, we find him dwelling within Aldgate, where now ſtands a pump, between Leadenhall-Street and Fanchurch-Street (c) [B]. They had four ſons, our John the eldeſt, another John, Thomas, and William; and three daughters, Joban, Margaret, and Alice (1).——Our Author's grandfather, named alſo Thomas, was a citizen and tallow-chandler of London; who dying about 1526, was buried in the little green Churchyard of St Michael aforeſaid, by his father and mother, ſiſters and brothers, and alſo his own children; as mentioned in his will (2). [B] Between Leadenhall-Street and Fanchurch-Street.] This we learn from the following ſtory, which be pleaſed to take in his own words. . . . In the reign of King Edward VI, there was 'a Commotion of the Commons in Norfolk, Suffolk, Eſſex, and other ſhires. 'By means whereof ſtreight orders being taken for the 'ſuppreſſion of rumours, divers perſons were appre-

in Lime-Street Ward: and, by his knowledge in the hiſtory and antiquities of that city, was very ſerviceable to his own Ward, in ſettling the bounds of it, when they had been encroached upon by that of Biſhops-Gate (d) [C]. Very early he applied himſelf to his moſt beloved ſtudy of the Hiſtory of England; and ſo wholly devoted himſelf to it, neglecting his buſineſs and the care of his family, that at laſt he brought himſelf into ſome ſtraights. About the year 1560, he formed the deſign of compoſing his Annals (e) [D]; and forſaking his trade (f), employed himſelf intirely in collecting materials for that work. He therefore diligently peruſed all writers fit for his purpoſe, whether printed or manuſcript; and became an unwearied ſearcher into records, regiſters, charters, and other original inſtruments: travelling on foot to ſeveral cathedral churches, and other chief places in the kingdom, to ſearch and examine records (g). Not contented with having the peruſal of ſuch things, he was greedy of making himſelf poſſeſſor of them, as of a great treaſure. So that, by the year 1568, he had amaſſed together a great quantity of old Books, and Manuſcripts, of all ſorts; eſpecially Chronicles, and Hiſtories, both on parchment and paper (h). And, what added much to the value of his library, it was not only ſtored with antient Authors, but original charters, regiſters, and chronicles of particular places (i) [E]. Such books as were neceſſary for his purpoſe, and that he could not purchaſe, or otherwiſe obtain, he took the pains of tranſcribing himſelf; particularly Leland's Collections, whoſe Deſcription of Britain, or Itinerary, he appears alſo to have been poſſeſſed of (k). He lived indeed in a ſeaſon, when he had the beſt opportunity of making ſuch collections; namely, upon the diſperſion of the Libraries of Religious Houſes, when valuable Books could be plentifully picked up, and at a cheap rate. But after he had eagerly proſecuted for ſome time the ſtudy of our Engliſh Hiſtory and Antiquities; finding, how little preſent advantage it was like to bring him, and urged by the neceſſity of procuring a maintenance and proviſion for his family, he began to return to his trade, and laid aſide his books. He had now much leſſened his paternal eſtate, neglected his buſineſs; and, inſtead of meeting with applauſe and rewards, found himſelf only expoſed to the cenſures of critics, and other evil-diſpoſed perſons (l). His caſe being made known to Dr. Matthew Parker, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was not only a great-lover and judge, but alſo a generous patron, of all Antiquarian ſtudies, he perſuaded our Author to continue them, and encouraged him by ſeveral benefactions [F]. In the unſettled times he lived in, when great dangers were perpetually apprehended from Papiſts; he, being looked upon as no great friend to the Reformation, but an admirer of Antiquity in Religion as well as in Hiſtory, came into ſome trouble, in 1568. For, an information being given againſt him to the Council, as if he was a ſuſpicious perſon, and had many dangerous Books of Superſtition in his cuſtody; Dr Grindal, Biſhop of London, his dioceſan, was ordered to cauſe his ſtudy to be ſearched. There were found in it, great collections of his own for the Engliſh

[C] Was very ſerviceable to his own Ward, in ſettling the bounds of it, &c.] Biſhopſgate-ward had encroached upon it, by taking in three houſes, and ſome land near London-wall, that lay weſt of the chapel of St Auguſtines Papey. But Mr Stow proved, that they were neither in the Ward of Biſhopſgate, nor Aldgate, but in that of Limeſtreet: And that he did, by old Leaſes, and Grants; and eſpecially by the Regiſter-book of the Fraternity of St Auguſtine de Papey (4), from whence it appeared, That the Maior and Aldermen of London, 6 Ed. VI. had granted to that Fraternity, ' certain ' grounds, both Eaſt and Weſt, of a brick wall that the ' Maſter and Wardens of the ſame had made, to cloſe ' in the chapel of St Auguſtines, called Papey Chapel, ' ſituate in the pariſh of All-ſaints in the Wall, in the ' Ward of Limeſtreet; for which they were to yield to ' the city 4d. ſterling every Michaelmas.' ——And again, when once Aldgate-ward had claimed this plot of ground, Mr Stow ſhewed them a fair Ledger-book, ſome time belonging to the Priory of the Holy Trinity within Aldgate, wherein that ground was not ſet down as belonging to Aldgate, but to Limeſtreet ward (5).

[D] He formed the deſign of compoſing his Annals.] The reaſon he aſſigns, for falling upon the ſtudy and pains of examining and collecting of his Engliſh Hiſtory, was the confuſedneſs of our late Engliſh Chronicles (6), and the ignorant handling of antient Affairs; which made him leave his own peculiar gaines, and conſecrate himſelf to the ſearch of our famous Engliſh Antiquities (7).

[E] It was not only ſtored with antient Authors, but original Charters, Regiſters, and Chronicles &c.] He was poſſeſſed of the Regiſters of Bermondſey, St Edmundsbury, of the New Abbey near the Tower, of St Bartholomew Smithfield, of the Friers Minors of London; in Latin. And he had, in Engliſh, a Regiſter of the Knights of the Garter, a Regiſter of the Maiors of London. He had alſo old Records of London, Records of St Aſaph, Chronicles of St Albans, Arnold's Chronicles, Annals of the Monaſtery of Hyde. . . . . Beſides the following Chronicles, and old Engliſh Hiſtorians, Gildas, Nennius, Henry of Huntindon, William of Malmeſbury, Marianus Scotus, Ralph of Coggſhall, John Everſden, Nicolas Trivet, Florence of Worceſter, Simeon of Durham, Roger de Houeden, and others; which all then remained in manuſcript (8).

[F] And encouraged him by ſeveral benefactions.] This he acknowledges, in the following paſſage of the dedication of his Annales, to Archbiſhop Whitgift. . . . . ' Neither doe I doubt but they may have free paſſage ' in the world, if they be countenanced under your ' honourable name and protection. Unto whom I offer, ' and with all dutifull affection I dedicate both myſelfe ' and them: being hereunto induced, both for that your ' worthy predeceſſor, and my eſpeciall benefactor Archbiſhop PARKER animated me in the courſe of theſe ' ſtudies, which otherwiſe I had long ſince diſcontinued; ' and alſo that your great love and entire affection to ' all good letters in generall, and to the Antiquities in ' particular hath been ſo ſingular, that all which like ' and love good ſtudies, doe juſtly eſteem you their ' principall and gratious patrone.'

Chronicles;

Chronicles; 'wherein he ſeemed to have beſtowed much travel.' There were alſo found in it, many MS. Chronicles; a great quantity of curious Miſcellaneous Tracts; old printed Popiſh Books; and others more modern (m). What was done to him, we do not find. But, being looked upon with a jealous eye, he was very near being entirely ruined, in 1570. For his younger brother Thomas, who had been his ſervant; and, after having defrauded him of his goods, ſought alſo to deprive him of his life, preferred above a hundred and forty articles againſt him, before the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion. A far leſs number would have ſerved to have diſpatched a man out of the world, if they could have been proved. But the witneſſes againſt him could not prove any of them; and, withal, they were perſons of a moſt infamous character, ſome having been detected of perjury, others burnt in the hand for felony, and the like: ſo that he was acquitted (n) [G]. His troubles did not abate his ardor for his beloved ſtudies; wherein he was aſſiſted and encouraged not only by the Archbiſhop abovementioned, but alſo by the greateſt men of his time in that way: Particularly William Lambarde Eſq; Robert Bowyer Eſq; Keeper of the Records in the Tower, and the firſt digeſter of them into ſome order; the learned Camden, who allowed him an annuity of 8 l. a year during life, for a copy of Leland's Collections; and others, the moſt eminent perſons in his time (o). In 1565, he firſt put out his 'Summary of the Chronicles 'of England [H], from the coming in of Brute unto his own time;' which, with additions and improvements, was reprinted ſeveral times ſince [I]. In 1575, he loſt his beſt patron Archbiſhop Parker; notwithſtanding which he proſecuted his ſtudies; and among other things, aſſiſted Dr David Powell in his Hiſtory of Wales, publiſhed in 1584, as the learned Doctor acknowledges in his preface. About the ſame time he was engaged in another laborious work, his Survey of London, of which we ſhall give an account below. He was, in 1585, one of the two collectors for a great muſter in Lime-Street Ward; which, as our Author obſerves (p), ſhews him to have been a man of good eſteem in the place. But he was then beginning to be poor: For, we find him the ſame year preſenting a petition to the Mayor and Court of Aldermen, wherein he ſet forth, 'That he had for the ſpace of 'twenty-five years paſt (beſides his Chronicle, dedicated to the Earl of Leiceſter,) ſet forth 'divers Summaries, dedicated to the Lord Maior, Aldermen and Commoners of that 'city: In all which he had eſpecially noted the memorable acts of famous citizens, by 'them done, to the great benefit of the commonwealth, and honour of the ſame city. . . . 'That he minded ſhortly to ſet forth a far larger Summary, or Chronicle of that city and 'citizens thereof, than before had been publiſhed. And foraſmuch as the ſearch of Records 'could not but be chargeable to him; as heretofore for many years it had been altogether 'of his own charges; beſides his other travails and ſtudy; he now humbly craved their aid, 'in conſideration of the premiſes, to beſtow on him the benefit of two Freemen, ſuch as 'they ſhould like, to be admitted into the Freedom of the city. Whereby he might be 'helped ſomewhat towards his charges.' Undoubtedly, this requeſt of his was complied with. Such another petition he preſented to them, in 1589, wherein he ſaid, that he was of the age of threeſcore years and four; and had for the ſpace of almoſt thirty years laſt paſt, beſides his Chronicles, ſet forth divers Summaries, dedicated to them &c. He therefore petitioned them to beſtow on him ſome yearly Penſion, or otherwiſe; whereby he might reap ſomewhat towards his great charges (q). Whether he had a penſion granted him, we do not find; unleſs it was in conſideration of his being the City's Chronicler, a place which he appears to have enjoyed (r). But to proceed to the reſt of his learned labours: He had a great hand in the improvements made to the ſecond edition of the large Chronicles, publiſhed by Raphael Holinſhed in 1587 [K]. Our moſt famous poet, Geffrey Chaucer, was alſo

[G] So that he was acquitted.] At this juncture, malecontents, perſons diſaffected to the Proteſtant religion, and great numbers of Popiſh emiſſaries, ſwarmed in this kingdom; being ſent over from Rome, to cauſe diſturbances here; and had actually raiſed a dangerous rebellion in the north. This is the reaſon, why ſo many innocent perſons, ſuſpected to be of the Romiſh religion, were brought into trouble; and among the reſt Mr Stow: it behoving the government to ſtand upon their guard, and to take all proper meaſures to ſecure themſelves.

[H] He put out his Summary of the Chronicles of England.] The title of it was, 'Summarie of Engliſhe 'Chronicles, conteyning the true Accompt of Years, 'wherein every Kyng of this Realme of England began 'theyre Reigne, how long they reigned, and what 'notable Thynges hath been doone durynge their 'Reynes, wyth alſo the Names and Yeares of all the 'Baylyffes, Cuſtos, Maiors, and Sheriffes of the Citie 'of London ſens the Conqueſte,' 8vo. He undertook it, at the inſtance of Robert Dudley Earl of Leiceſter; and how he came to be firſt known to him, he informs us in the following words . . . 'Edmond Dudley, in the 'time of his impriſonment in the Tower, compiled one 'notable booke, which he intituled The Tree of the 'Commonwealth, dedicated unto King Henry VIII. 'but never came to his hand. A copie whereof faire 'written (reſerving the original to myſelfe) I gave 'unto the honourable Lord Robert Earle of Leiceſter, 'about the yeare 1562. At whoſe requeſt and earneſt 'perſwaſion I then firſt collected my Summary of the 'Chronicles of England, and dedicated the ſame, with 'the continuation and encreaſe thereof, from time to 'time, to my great charges to his honor, in reward 'whereof I alwaies received his harty thanks, with 'commendations (9).' His inducement for dedicating it to that Earl, was, as he tells him in the Dedication, 'becauſe of his uſual generous acceptation of many 'Works preſented unto him by others as well as him-'ſelf; and becauſe of his Lordſhip's goodly Inclination 'to all ſorts of Knowledge, and eſpecially the great 'Love he bore to old Records of Deeds done by famous 'and noble Worthies.'

His curious and valuable Survey of London, after having cost him many years of close application, was first published in 1598, and reprinted in his life-time in 1603 [L]. He had much set his heart on the publication of his large Chronicle or History of England, which he had been above forty years collecting out of some hundreds of ancient Authors, Registers, Chronicles, Lives, and Accounts of particular Cities and Towns. But he lived only to publish an Abstract of it (u), under the title of Flores Historiarum, or Annals of England [M], besides his Summaries above-mentioned. [L] His Survey of London . . . . was first published in 1598, and reprinted in 1603.] He intituled it, 'A Sur-'vay of London, contayning the originall, antiquity, 'increase, moderne estate, and description of that 'citie, written in the yeare 1598 by John Stow citizen 'of London. Also an Apologie (or Defence) against 'the opinion of some men concerning that citie, the 'greatnesse thereof. With an Appendix containing in 'Latine Libellum de situ & nobilitate Londini, written 'by William Fitz-Stephen in the raigne of Henry II.' 4to. He says, in the Dedication, that He 'had 'attempted the Discovery of London, his native Soil 'and Country, at the desire and persuasion of some 'of his good Friends; as well because he had seen 'sundry Antiquities himself touching that place, as 'also for that, through search of Records to other pur-'poses, divers written helps were come to his hands, 'which few others had fortuned to meet withal (17).' ——The second edition, also in quarto, came out in 1603. In the dedication to which, he confesses, that, in the former edition, he 'lacked his desire to the 'Accomplishment of some special parts, which some 'others of better ability promised to perform:' [viz. James Dalton Esq;] but he dying before he could accomplish his promise, our Author 'out of his own old 'Storehouse added to this work many rare notes of 'Antiquity;' chiefly about the Politick government of the city. He intended to have made greater improvements, but complains of his being then visited with much sickness; so that his feet, which had been wont to bear him many a mile, refused once in four or five months to convey him from his bed to his study. ——After his decease, one A. M. i. e. Antony Monday, some time the Pope's scholar at Rome, but who had turned Protestant; undertook to make additions to the Survey, from Mr Stow's papers and best Collections, which he pretended He had delivered to him in his life-time; and used importunate persuasions with him to correct what he found amiss, and to proceed in perfecting so worthy a work. Having been twelve years about it, he put out a new edition in 1618, 4to. But his additions were chiefly of some epitaphs, a continuation of the lists, and little more, except transcripts out of our Author's Summary and Annals.—— In 1633, a fourth edition came out, in folio, 'com-'pletely finished by the study and labour of A. M. 'H. D. (18) and others. Whereunto, besides many 'additions, were annexed divers alphabeticall tables.' ——This was much outdone by the Edition published by the most industrious Mr Strype, in 1720, in two very large volumes folio; and reprinted in 1756, with very great improvements.——On this Survey were founded the subsequent Accounts of London, by Edward Hatton, R. Seymour, and W. Maitland.

[M] He lived only to publish an Abstract of it, under the title of Flores Historiarum, or Annales of England.] It was first published in 1600, in a thick quarto in black letter (*), being nothing else but his Summary greatly enlarged: and dedicated to Archbishop Whitgift. The dedication is dated the 24th of November, 1600; and remains in the subsequent edition of 1605, though the Archbishop was then dead.——His earnest Desire of seeing his large Chronicle in print, before his death, he could not forbear expressing, at the conclusion of the last mentioned edition, in these words (19) . . . 'I desire 'thee to take these and other my labours past in good 'part, like as I have painfully (to my great costs and 'charges) out of old hidden histories, and records of 'Antiquitie, brought the same to light, and for thy 'great commoditie bestowed them upon thee: so shalt 'thou encourage me (if God permit me life) to publish 'or leave to posteritie, a farre larger Volume, long since 'by me laboured, at the request and commandment 'of the reverend Father Matthew Parker, Archbishop 'of Canterbury; but he then deceasing, my worke was 'prevented, by printing and reprinting (without war-'rant, or well-liking) of Raigne Wolfes collection, 'and other late commers, by the name of Raphael 'Hollingshead his Chronicles.' By which it appears, that he was forestalled by Holinshed's Chronicles, and did not a little resent it.——Mr Strype informs us (20), that if Mr Stow "had lived but one year longer, he intended to have published his long labours: But after his death, there was not a man to be found, to take the small pains to review his papers, and fit them for the press: Many indeed were talked of to do it, both persons of Quality among the laity and clergy, (for the world had great and earnest expectation to see Stow in print) but when they were spoke to, to take the good work in hand, some of them said, That they thought the giving out of their Names was rather done by secret enemies, on purpose to draw them into capital displeasure, and to bring their names and lives into a general question. Others said, That they who did such a work, must flatter, which they could not, neither wilfully would they leave a scandal unto their posterity. Another said, he could not see, how in any civil action a man should spend his travel, time, and money worse, than in that which acquires no regard or reward, except backbiting and detraction. And one amongst the rest swore an oath, and said, He thanked God that he was not yet mad, to waste his time, spend two hundred pounds a year, (which it seems Stow had done) trouble himself and all his friends, only to gain assurance of endless reproach, loss of liberty, and bring all his days in question. Yet at last one Edward (21) Howes undertook it, and effected it: But it happened just so to him, having been intolerably abused and scandalized for his labour."

[N] From his papers, Edmond Howes published afterwards that folio Volume, which goes under the name of Stow's Chronicle.] He published it first in 1615; and put out another edition in 1631; both in black letter, and the latter especially upon very bad paper. Who first set him about it he thus mentions in his Dedication of the last edition to King Charles I. . . 'May it there-'fore please your Majesty to pardon my defect, and 'graciously accept into your most royall Patronage, these 'my thirty years labours of impartiall Truth, which 'with all faithfulness I have composed, according to 'my oath and promise made to the late most reverend 'Prelate, Dr Whitgift, Lord Archbishop of Canter-'bury; by whose especial instruction and encourage-'ment I undertooke this general Worke, in honor of 'my Prince and Country.'——In his Preface, he hath one particular relating to the dissolution of the Abbeys, which we shall lay here before the Reader, because it is very little known.——'The generall plausible project, '(says he) which caused the Parliament consent unto 'the Reformation or alteration of the Monasteries, was 'that the King's Exchequer should for ever be enriched, 'the kingdome and Nobility strengthened and encreased, not contain all that 'farre larger work' which Mr Stow mentions (w), and intended to have publiſhed; leaving it in his ſtudy, orderly written, ready for the preſs (x). It came into the hands of Sir Symonds Dewes (y), and afterwards (as one might ſuppoſe) into the poſſeſſion of the late Earl of Oxford; but it is not in the Britiſh Muſæum, with others of our Author's manuſcripts [O]. Having ſpent his patrimony, and the beſt part of his eſtate in theſe ſtudies and labours; he was forced, in the latter part of his life, to have a collection made for his relief. And, for that purpoſe, King James I. granted him a license, or brief, dated the 8th of May 1603, which was renewed the 26th of November 1604, authoriſing him, or his deputy, to repair to churches, or other places, to receive the gratuities and charitable benevolence of well-diſpoſed people [P]; in recompence of his painful labours, and for encouragement to the like (z). Together with his poverty, he was very much afflicted with pain in his feet, probably the gout, and alſo the ſtone. At length having arrived to eighty years of age, he departed this life April 5, 1605, and was buried the 8th in his pariſh church of St Andrew's-Underſhaft, where his widow erected a decent monument to his memory (aa). Mr Stow's Perſon and Temper are thus deſcribed by Mr Edmond Howes (bb), who perfectly knew him. 'He was tall of ſtature, leane of body and 'face, his eyes ſmall and chriſtaline, of a pleaſant and cheerefull countenance, his ſight 'very good, his memory excellent; very ſober, mild, and courteous to any that required 'his inſtructions; and retained the true uſe of all his ſenſes unto the day of his death. He 'always proteſted, never to have written any thing, either for malice, feare, or favor, nor 'to ſeek his own particular gaine, or vaineglory, and that his only pains and care was to 'write Truth.' As he was a great Lover of Truth, ſo he was very inquiſitive to find it out: And his good Judgment, Learning, and Skill in Hiſtory and Antiquities, qualified and enabled him not to be put off with Frauds and ſuperſtitious Fables, commonly believed and related by men of leſs accuracy; as is plain from many inſtances in his writings (cc). On all occaſions he expreſſed a great diſlike for immorality of every kind, injuſtice, wrongs, frauds, unfaithfulneſs, falſhood, and treachery; which ſhewed an honeſt and good mind. And he ſpared not to expoſe the more ſcandalous ſorts of men that fell in his way; as lewd and unclean Prieſts, unfaithful Executors, abuſers of charitable Donations, falſe Jurymen, counterfeit Phyſicians, and other Cheats, and Impoſtors, Extortioners and cruel Oppreſſors, violators of the Monuments of the dead, and exalters of themſelves above their neighbours (dd). As to his Religion, he was undoubtedly at firſt, a favorer, as well as a profeſſor of Popery: but theſe words of his, under the reign of Queen Elizabeth, 'That 'Doctrine is more pure, now, than it was in the Monkiſh world,' imply that he had then altered his mind. Perhaps being a lover of Antiquity, and an admirer of the old Religious buildings and monuments, he was prejudiced againſt the Reformed Religion, becauſe of the horrible havock and deſtruction thoſe that pretended to it, made of them in his days. And indeed it might render him the leſs affected to the Religion in his time reformed, while he took notice how ignorantly, nay ridiculouſly, ſome that profeſſed and preached it, ſhewed their zeal (ee) [Q]. Upon the whole, he appears throughout to have been an honeſt and well meaning man; and his Chronicle, or Annales, as far as they go, are ſtill the beſt and exacteſt we have extant.

[P] To receive the gratuities and charitable benevolence of people.] But even upon this there was but little gathered, if we may judge by the collection made in the one pariſh of St Mary Woolnoth, which amounted only to 7*s.* 6*d.* Beſides, that he hardly lived long enough to have the collection compleated. It is ſtrange, as Mr Strype obſerves (24), that the city of London, to which he had done ſuch ſervice and honour, in writing ſuch an elaborate and accurate Survey thereof; nor the wealthy Company of Merchant-Taylors, of which he was a worthy and creditable member; nor laſtly the State, in grateful remembrance of his diligent and faithful pains, in compoſing an excellent Hiſtory of the Kingdom; neither of them had allotted him ſome honorary penſion during his life.

[Q] How ignorantly, nay ridiculouſly, ſome that profeſſed and preached it, ſhewed their zeal.] He gives us ſome inſtances of it, in Sir Stephen, already mentioned (25), Curate of St Katharine Cree-church pariſh, where Mr Stow then lived. That Curate, in a Sermon at St Paul's, inveighed ſeverely againſt a long Maypole, called a Shaft, in the next pariſh to his, named thence St Andrew Underſhaft, calling it an Idol. Which ſo inflamed the zeal of many of the hearers, becauſe all Idols were ordered by publick authority to be taken away; that a great number of the neighbours went, the ſame afternoon, and violently pulled it down from the place where it hung upon hooks, and then ſawed it into divers pieces, each houſekeeper taking a piece, as much as hung over his door or ſtall, and afterwards caſting the pieces into one common heap, burnt them. Mr Stow heard this Sermon, and ſaw the effect of it. ——The ſame preacher, taking occaſion from that Church's name, Underſhaft, as ſuperſtitiouſly given to it, declared it as his judgment, that the names of Churches ſhould be altered; nay and that the names of days in the week might be changed, the fiſh-days to be kept on any days except Fridays and Saturdays. And further, that Lent ſhould be obſerved at any other time, than between Shrovetide and Eaſter.——Another practice of this Sir Stephen was, oftentimes to forſake the pulpit, and getting up into a high elm that grew in the middle of the church-yard, to preach from thence to the people; and returning into the church, he would ſay or ſing the Engliſh ſervice, not at the altar as was uſual, but upon a tomb on the north ſide of the church (26). Such were the irregular practices of the Methodiſts, or Zealots, of thoſe times, which ſerved only to expoſe the Reformation.

STRYPE [JOHN], Author of ſeveral Volumes relating chiefly to the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of England: a moſt faithful and induſtrious Writer; was of German extraction, but born in Stepney-pariſh near Spital-Fields in London (a) November 1, 1643 (b). After having had his Education in Grammar learning for near ſix years, in St Paul's School (c), he was admitted, in 1661, in Jeſus-college, but removed ſoon after to Catharine-hall, in Cambridge, where he took the degree of Batchelor of Arts in 1665, and that of Maſter in 1669 (d). His firſt preferment, was the Donative, or perpetual Curacy, of Theydon-Boys in the county of Eſſex; conferred upon him the 14th of July 1669: But he quitted it a few months after, upon his being appointed Miniſter of Low-Leyton in the ſame county, where he made ſeveral improvements [A], and which he kept as long as he lived (e) By his being ſeated here, he came to have an opportunity of procuring the valuable Manuſcripts of Sir Michael Hickes Knight, once of Rokholt's in this pariſh, and Secretary to William Lord Burleigh; which were afterwards the foundation of moſt of his Books (f). They are very numerous; he having publiſhed no leſs than Thirteen Volumes in folio; full of deep and laborious reſearches: beſides three Volumes in octavo &c. And as he rendered himſelf chiefly conſiderable as a Writer, therefore we ſhall view him almoſt entirely in that light. His works relate more eſpecially to the Hiſtory of the Reformation of the Church of England; as will appear by the following particular account of them, in which we ſhall have more regard to the order of time they belong to, than the order in which they were publiſhed. The firſt, in that reſpect, were his 'Eccleſiaſtical Memorials; relating chiefly 'to Religion, and the Reformation of it, and the Emergencies of the Church of England, 'under King Henry VIII, King Edward VI, and Queen Mary the Firſt [B].' [A] Upon his being appointed Miniſter of Low-Leyton, ... where he made ſeveral Improvements.] There was ſomething very ſingular in this caſe, which we ſhall preſent the Reader with, from original Papers, that have been kindly communicated to us by a friend. Though he enjoyed this preferment above ſixty-eight years; and, what is very remarkable, adminiſtered the ſacrament in this church ſixty-ſix Chriſtmaſs-days ſucceſſively; yet he was never inſtituted nor inducted thereto. For the living being very ſmall, the three patrons complimented the Pariſh with the choice of a Miniſter. Accordingly, by the direction of the Inhabitants, Mr Strype preached to them, in order for their approbation to be choſen their Lecturer, Preacher, or Curate; and being approved of by the majority of the Pariſhioners, was, in 1669, elected to be their Lecturer or Curate: as his predeceſſors from time immemorial had been: ſo it is expreſſed in thoſe Papers. Soon after Mr Strype's election, the Pariſhioners entered into a ſubſcription for his maintenance, which was found among his books, and began thus. 'Dec. 9, 1669. 'We the Inhabitants of the Parriſh of Lowe-Leyton, 'haveing made Choice of Mr John Strype to be our 'Miniſter to ſucceed Mr Cox, doe hereby promiſſe to 'pay him yearely and every yeare (dureing our tyme 'heere as pariſhioners belonging to the ſaid parriſh) 'the following ſomes ſubſcribed to our names to be 'paid him quarterly, or other wayes as he ſhall thinke 'more convenient to demand it, provided he continues 'the uſſual Cuſtom of his Prediceſſor in preaching 'twiſſe every Sonday. I William Hickes doe promiſſe 'to pay eight pounds.' Then follow ſixty-one others, who promiſed to pay, ſome 3l. ſome 2l. ſome 1l. and others leſſer ſums; to the amount in all of 69l. 0s. 10d.——The 11th of November, 1674, he was licenſed by Dr Henchman, biſhop of London, to preach and expound the word of God in the pariſh church of Low-Layton, and to perform the full office of Prieſt and Curate there, during the Vacancy of the Vicarage: which Licenſe, and no other Inſtrument, was exhibited at the Epiſcopal Viſitations, Sept. 11, 1677, Oct. 12, 1715, and Aug. 11, 1720.——It is ſomewhat unaccountable, that Mr Strype could eſcape the Sagacity of the Officers, and enjoy a Living ſo many years as he did, ſo near London, without diſturbance or moleſtation; eſpecially at a time when a Compliance with the Rules, Orders, and Diſcipline of the Church was ſo ſtrictly enjoined, and ſo carefully enquired into, as it was during the reign of King Charles II. Indeed, in his latter days, his uncommon Merit might be his Protection with the Biſhops of London, if he could remain unnoticed by the Lord Chancellor's officers, or ſome hungry Clergyman; which he luckily did to the laſt.

As to the great Repairs and Improvements made by him. The Houſe belonging to this Living was in the moſt ruinous condition, and inhabited only by the meaneſt of people. Wherefore, at Eaſter 1677, Mr Strype applied to the general Veſtry of the Pariſh, and acquainted them with a Promiſe they had made him at his firſt coming among them, which was, to rebuild the Preacher's houſe at the Charge of the Inhabitants: Whereupon the Veſtry appointed Matthias Goodfellow and Thomas Harvey, Gentlemen, to take a view of the old Houſe, and to conſider the charge of rebuilding it; which being done, the view was at the next veſtry preſented to them, with a plan for erecting the intended new houſe. Upon which a voluntary ſubſcription was agreed on, and made by ſeveral of the Inhabitants towards the rebuilding of the Houſe, which amounted to the ſum of 79l. 19s. beſides the timber and utenſils that belonged to the old Houſe, and new materials preſented and ſent in by the Inhabitants, and a licenſe granted from the Crown for cutting Timber in Walwood in the ſame pariſh for the uſe of the houſe and buildings, obtained at the requeſt of the Inhabitants. Thus furniſhed with materials, Mr Strype undertook to rebuild the Houſe; the charges of which, with the out-houſes and fencing the ground belonging to the ſame, amounted in the whole to 216l. 9s. 3d. That is, he expended, out of his own pocket, 140l. 10s. 3d. beſides the contributions aforeſaid; as appears by an account entered by himſelf in one of this Pariſh's Regiſters. The Houſe is of Brick, containing thirty feet in front, and twenty-four in depth; with an additional building on the Eaſt ſide for Offices, being twenty feet in front, and twelve in depth. And in the yard a ſtable and ſtraw-houſe, containing ſixteen feet in front, and twelve in depth; with a wood-houſe and loft over it, ſeventeen feet in length, and thirteen feet and a half in depth. ——Alſo in 1679, Mr Strype, by a collection in the pariſh, and his own expence, did repair the roof of the upper Chancel of the Church, which was ready to fall down, the two arches that then were there being very defective: They being taken down, the raiſing piece was alſo found to be rotten; whereupon two new pillars were erected, on which reſted a new raiſing piece. For theſe pillars and raiſing piece, were obtained three ſtrong oaks out of Walwood, in this pariſh. The charge of theſe repairs, beſides the timber, amounted to about 70l. In conſideration of which, he was allowed what advantage could be made by the Pews and Burials in the Chancel; and enjoyed the ſame till ſome diſpute aroſe between him and the lord of the manor, touching the nominating a Pariſh-Clerk. Mr Strype alſo repaired the Chancel-porch at his own charge (1). . . . . Notwithſtanding which, his Executors were ſued by his Succeſſor for Dilapidations: But very little or nothing could be recovered, the Plea being, That he had never been Inſtituted, nor Inducted; and that the Houſe was built, and ought to be repaired by the Pariſh.

[B] Eccleſiaſtical Memorials, &c.] The reſt of the title of Vol. I. is as follows. . . . 'All which being new, 'and ſuch as have hitherto eſcaped our Writers and 'Hiſtorians, will communicate much more light to 'thoſe great Tranſactions in this Kingdom: And moreover diſcover further the Inclinations and Influences 'of the reſpective Princes: The Embaſſies and Correſpondencies with foreign Potentates and States, 'chiefly with reſpect to Religion: The Oppoſitions 'made

Books of his we ſhall mention, according to our method, are the Lives of the four firſt Proteſtant Archbiſhops; Archbiſhop Cranmer [C]; Archbiſhop Parker [D]; Archbiſhop Grindal [E]; and Archbiſhop Whitgift [F]. We have placed theſe four Lives together, as

'made to it: The Troubles and Perſecutions of the 'Profeſſors of it: The Tempers, Practices, and Events 'of the Two Cardinals, Wolſey and Pole, and other 'Prelates and Great Men of both Parties, in the re'ſpective reigns: Beſides, Accounts of Convocations, 'Royal and Epiſcopal Viſitations, Eccleſiaſtical Con'ſtitutions, Books from time to time ſet forth; with 'various other Matters worthy of Note and Obſerva'tion. In Three Volumes. With a large Appendix 'to each Volume, containing Original Papers, Records, '&c.' The Title of Vol. II. is, 'Hiſtorical Memorials, 'chiefly Eccleſiaſtical, and ſuch as concern Religion 'and the Reformation of it, and the Progreſs made 'therein, under the Reign and Influence of King Ed'ward VI. containing alſo many new Diſcoveries of 'the Life, Acts, and Government of that Prince.' With a Repoſitory of Originals. And the Title of Vol. III. is, 'Hiſtorical Memorials, Eccleſiaſtical and 'Civil, of Events under the reign of Queen Mary I. 'Wherein are brought to light various Things concern'ing the management of Affairs, during the Five Years 'of her Government. And, more particularly, The 'Reſtoring of the Pope's Authority, and the Popiſh 'Religion in this Kingdom: And the rigorous Methods 'of Burning, and other Severities, for the Replanting 'of it, uſed towards ſuch as adhered to the Religion 'Reformed under King Edward VI.' With a Catalogue of Originals. Lond. 1721. fol.——Mr Strype informs us, in his Preface, that 'Theſe Memorials, 'reſpecting chiefly Religion, and the Reformation of it 'in this kingdom, had been compoſed by him and fitted 'for the preſs divers years before. But he thought fit 'to lay them aſide for a time; and to begin rather with 'what he had writ of the Lives and Acts of the Four 'Firſt Proteſtant Archbiſhops of Canterbury; as ſhew'ing therein, the beginning, progreſs, oppoſition, and 'eſtabliſhment of the ſaid happy Reformation in a con'tinued Hiſtory, under the influence of thoſe moſt 'worthy Prelates. Nor did he think it convenient to 'burden thoſe Books, which were large enough of 'themſelves, by inſerting thoſe Memorials into them, 'which would have rendered them too bulky: But 'rather to compile them into other Volumes by them'ſelves, in due time to follow the reſt. This gave 'occaſion to their being ſuppreſſed till then. But they 'being a faithful Collection of many important matters 'which went before, accompanied, or immediately 'related to, that great work, [the Reformation] and 'well worthy to be known, He was willing and de'ſirous, that they might now be recommended to the 'world; and that they might be the more correctly 'ſet forth by himſelf, and have his review, before his 'death, which his great Age ſuggeſted could not be 'far off..... He did not intend, when he took this 'work in hand, to write a compleat Eccleſiaſtical 'Hiſtory under thoſe Three of our Kings, and of all 'the occurrences and events of Religion and the Church 'in their reigns. For that had been done, or endea'voured, by ſome Hiſtoriographers already. His were 'only Eccleſiaſtical Memorials; and intended but to ſup'ply what had been omitted by them, or to rectify ſome 'Miſtakes, or Miſrepreſentations of Perſons and Things: 'Or to fill up and enlarge matters, more briefly or 'imperfectly related in our publiſhed hiſtories. His 'deſign was only to communicate to the world what 'he had of this ſort of Hiſtory, out of his ſtore, and 'to digeſt theſe notices in their proper places chrono'logically from year to year, as they occurred. And 'chiefly to bring to light ſuch further particulars, as 'he had found in State-papers, and Letters, and Re'cords, and many original MSS of the beſt ſort, after 'long and diligent converſe with them.' They were compiled from Tranſcripts by him taken, out of the Cotton, Bennet-college, and Biſhop More's Libraries; out of the Paper-houſe at Weſtminſter; out of the Earl of Oxford's Library, and that of the Inner-Temple; the Heralds Office; numerous MSS of Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, ſome time belonging to the famous Martyrologiſt, John Fox; divers notable State-letters, or of more private correſpondence between perſons of the higheſt rank and quality in Church and Court, preſerved in the houſe of Sir William Hicks, Bart..... Our Author gives the following Account of his Exactneſs and Induſtry (2). ... 'My Diligence will in part appear, in that I have 'made no uſe of Tranſcribers and Amanuenſes: or, that 'I ſaw not the Originals myſelf, but left it to the Care 'of others to take out thence: who oftentimes make 'Miſtakes, Omiſſions, and falſe Writing of Letters and 'Words, to the ſpoiling and corrupting of the true 'Senſe, ſometimes by Negligence or too much Haſte, 'and ſometimes for want of ſkill, and not knowing well 'the Manner of old Writing in the Shape of the Letters, 'or the Abbreviations commonly uſed in times paſt. 'For the prevention of which Inconveniences, I writ all 'from the MSS with mine own pen, and with as much 'care as I could; that whatſoever I tranſcribed might 'be exactly taken, both as to the Letter and Spelling.' He alſo declares, that he had avoided partiality and prejudice, and ſet down things as he found them.

(2) Preface, p. 8.

[C] The Life of Archbiſhop Cranmer.] This was publiſhed at London, in 1694. fol. with this title, 'Memorials of the moſt Renowned Father in God, Thomas Cranmer, ſome time Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Wherein the Hiſtory of the Church, and the 'Reformation of it, during the Primacy of the ſaid 'Archbiſhop, are greatly illuſtrated; and many ſingular 'Matters relating thereunto, now firſt publiſhed. In 'three Books. Collected chiefly from Records, Regiſters, authentick Letters, and other Original Manu'ſcripts.' At the end, is an Appendix of original Papers; and Obſervations of Mr Henry Wharton on the Memorials.

[D] The Life of Archbiſhop Parker.] This came out in 1711. fol. and was intituled, 'The Life and Acts 'of Matthew Parker, the firſt Archbiſhop of Canterbury 'in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Under whoſe pri'macy and influence the Reformation of Religion was 'happily effected; and the Church of England reſtored, 'and eſtabliſhed upon the Principles whereon it ſtands 'to this day. Wherein are related the ſaid Arch'biſhop's Actions in eccleſiaſtical Commiſſions and 'Synods: His Viſitations of the Dioceſes, Colleges, 'and Hoſpitals within his Province, with his Injunc'tions and Regulations: Characters and Accounts of 'Biſhops by him conſecrated: His Endeavours for 'Uniformity: His diligence in retrieving and publiſh'ing many Saxon, and other ancient hiſtorical MSS 'of this Nation: His procuring a more correct Tranſ'lation of the holy Bible: His Government of his own 'Dioceſs of Canterbury: His ſober thoughts, counſels 'and cares for Religion and this Church: And many 'particulars of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of thoſe Times, 'hitherto unknown, or very obſcure, are diſcovered 'and brought to light. Compiled faithfully from Re'cords, Regiſters, State-papers, Orders of Council, 'Authentic Letters, and ſundry other original MSS. 'In four Books. To which is added, An Appendix, 'containing various Tranſcripts of Records, Letters, 'Inſtruments, Ordinances, Commiſſions, Diſcourſes, 'Relations, Intelligences, and other ſecret Papers, 'above an hundred in number; for the aſſerting or 'illuſtrating the foregoing Hiſtory. Among which 'will be found the Latin Life of this Archbiſhop, en'tituled Matthæus, ſo much and ſo long wanted in the 'Editions of the Britiſh Antiquities.'

[E] Archbiſhop Grindal.] The title of this Archbiſhop's Life, is, 'The Hiſtory of the Life and Acts 'of the moſt Reverend Father in God Edmund Grindal, 'the firſt Biſhop of London, and the ſecond Arch'biſhop of York and Canterbury ſucceſſively, in the 'reign of Queen Elizabeth. Wherein is ſhewed, that 'moſt Reverend Prelate's pious and uſeful Labours, 'both in the Reformation and Government of the 'Church of England, while he preſided over it, and 'how well he merited of it &c. To which is added 'an Appendix of original MSS.' Lond. 1710. fol.

[F] The Life of Archbiſhop Whitgift.] This was publiſhed in 1718. fol. and bears this title. 'The Life 'and Acts of the moſt Reverend Father in God, John 'Whitgift D. D. the third and laſt Lord Archbiſhop 'of Canterbury, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; 'who, under her Majeſty, in that Station, governed 'the Church of England for the ſpace of twenty years. 'Wherein is interwoven much of the Hiſtory of the 'Affairs of this Church; viz. Nominations and Con'ſecrations of Biſhops; Bills and Petitions in Parlia'ment about Religion, and for Reformation of cor'ruptions and abuſes in the Church; Tranſactions in 'Convocaas naturally following one another. But, to return to ſome other works of our Author, which are partly anterior in point of time to the two laſt mentioned Primates: His 'Annals of the Reformation of the Church of England,' are in four Volumes folio: The firſt of which was publiſhed in 1709, and reprinted in 1725, with large Additions both in the History and Appendix [G]. The ſecond came out in 1725 [H], the third in 1728 [I], and the fourth in 1731 [K]. Another very large and laborious work of our moſt induſtrious Author, was a new edition of J. Stow's Survey of London, in two Volumes in folio [L]. The three Volumes in octavo publiſhed by him, as abovementioned, were, The Lives of Sir John Cheke [M], Sir Thomas Smith [N], and Dr John Ælmer, Biſhop of London [O]. He alſo publiſhed, A Sermon preached at the Aſſizes at Hertford, July 8, 1689, 'Convocations, and eccleſiaſtical Commiſſions; the 'Diligence of Popiſh Prieſts and Jeſuits; Methods for 'the reſtraint of them; the endeavours of thoſe they 'called Puritans, to ſet up a new Church-diſcipline; 'and the proſecution of ſome of them; Notices of 'the firſt Separatiſts; Viſitations of Dioceſes, and the 'ſtate of them; Matters of the civil and eccleſiaſtical 'Courts; Occurrences in the Univerſities, and obſervations upon divers Heads and Members thereof; 'Accounts of Prelates, and other learned Clergymen 'and Writers in thoſe times; Books and Writings of 'note; ſome further diſcovery and account (beſides 'what hath been printed) of that memorable Conference 'at Hampton-Court before King James the Firſt, with 'the iſſue thereof, and the effects it produced. The 'whole digeſted, compiled, and atteſted from Records, 'Regiſters, original Letters, and other authentick MSS, 'taken from the choiceſt Libraries and Collections of the 'kingdom. In four Books. Together with a large Appendix of the ſaid Papers, to the number of CXXIX.'

[G] His Annals of the Reformation of the Church of England are in four Volumes folio: The firſt of which was publiſhed in 1709, and reprinted in 1725.] The title will inform the Reader of the contents of this Volume; being as follows. 'Annals of the Reformation and 'Eſtabliſhment of Religion, and other various Occurrences in the Church of England; during the firſt 'twelve years of Queen Elizabeth's happy reign. 'Wherein account is given of the reſtoring of Religion from its Corruptions introduced under Queen 'Mary; of filling the Sees with Proteſtant Biſhops; 'of the famous Synod aſſembled in the year MDLXII; 'of the workings and endeavours of the Papiſts; and 'of the firſt appearances of the Diſſenſion from the 'Church eſtabliſhed. Compiled faithfully out of Papers of State, authentick Records, publick Regiſters, 'private Letters, and other original Manuſcripts. Together with an Appendix or Repoſitory, containing 'the moſt important of them.'

[H] The Second came out in 1725.] This Volume 'commences at the thirteenth year of Queen Elizabeth's reign: And endeth at the concluſion of the year 'of our Lord MDLXXX. Beſides an account of the 'Reformation, it comprehends other matters, relating 'to the ſtate of Learning, and civil Affairs of remark, 'happening in this kingdom within that period: 'Tending to the rectifying Miſtakes, and ſupplying 'Defects in our Hiſtory of thoſe times. All taken 'from original Letters and Papers of State &c. With 'an Appendix of original Papers &c.'

[I] The third in 1728.] It reaches from the year 1581 to 1588, and 'contains Accounts of the Government and Inſpection of the Biſhops in their reſpective 'Dioceſſes; as matters requiring their care, fell out 'each year: Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſions: The buſy 'actings of Papiſts and Puritans: The Difficulties and 'Dangers the State as well as the Church met with 'from time to time: occaſioned chiefly from the endeavours to overthrow both, by the power and practices of ſuch as favoured Mary Queen of Scots: Of 'whom many ſpecial tranſactions; and chiefly of her 'ſentence and death; and the conſequences thereof, 'are ſhewn: And the Spaniſh Invaſion in 1588. Both 'ſerving to enlighten thoſe two great Criſes of Queen 'Elizabeth's reign. Together with divers other political Affairs of note interſperſed. The Hiſtory is 'alſo improved by notices given concerning the ſtate 'and events of the Church of Ireland; Occurrences 'and Differences that fell out in our Univerſities; Remarks of many perſons of rank and quality in Church 'and State: Books of learning and note, Libels, Pamphlets &c. publiſhed yearly. Collected diligently 'and faithfully from Records, Papers of State, Original Letters of Privy Counſillors, Ambaſſadors, Biſhops, learned men in the Univerſities, as elſewhere: 'And from other choice MSS. reſerved in our publick 'Libraries, or more private Archives. Together with 'an Appendix: Containing many choice Records, and 'Papers of value; tranſcribed from originals: Referred to in the work; in order to the vindication, 'proof, and illuſtration of the Hiſtory.'

[K] And the fourth in 1731.] At the concluſion of the Preface to his Third Volume, he had ſaid, that he 'muſt call that Volume his laſt (though indeed it 'reached not by divers years to the end of Queen Elizabeth's reign) becauſe it was the laſt Concluſion of 'his Labour therein; his great Age and frequent Infirmities diſabling him from going further in that 'work.' . . . . However, he lived to publiſh the Fourth Volume, in 1731; but being then arrived to the Eighty-eighth year of his age, his Weakneſs and Infirmities hindered him from digeſting it even in the ſame manner as the former Volumes. So that it is only a Collection of Original Papers.

[L] A new Edition of J. Stow's Survey of London, in two Volumes in folio.] It was publiſhed in 1720, and what improvements our Author made in it, we may learn from the Title, which is as follows. 'A Survey 'of the Cities of London and Weſtminſter: Containing the Original, Antiquity, Increaſe, modern Eſtate 'and Government of thoſe Cities. Written at firſt 'in the year MDXCVIII. By John Stow, citizen and 'native of London. Since reprinted and augmented 'by the Author; and afterwards by A. M. H. D. 'and others. Now laſtly, corrected, improved, and 'very much enlarged: And the Survey and Hiſtory 'brought down from the year 1633, (being near Fourſcore years ſince it was laſt printed) to the preſent 'time; by John Strype, M. A. a native alſo of the 'ſaid City. Illuſtrated with exact Maps of the City 'and Suburbs, and of all the Wards; and likewiſe of 'the Out-pariſhes of London and Weſtminſter: Together with many other fair Draughts of the more 'eminent and publick Edifices and Monuments. In 'Six Books. To which is prefixed, the Life of the 'Author, writ by the Editor. At the end is added, 'An Appendix of certain Tracts, Diſcourſes and Remarks concerning the State of the City of London. 'Together with a Perambulation, or Circuit-walk four 'or five miles round about London, to the Pariſh 'Churches: Deſcribing the Monuments of the Dead 'there interred: With other Antiquities obſervable in 'thoſe places. And concluding with a Second Appendix, as a ſupply and review.'

[M] The Life of Sir John Cheke.] It has this title, 'The Life of the learned Sir John Cheke, Knight, 'firſt Inſtructor, afterwards Secretary of State to King 'Edward VI, one of the great Reſtorers of good Learning and true Religion in this Kingdom. A Work 'wherein many remarkable points of Hiſtory, relating to the State of Learning and Religion in the 'times of King Henry VIII, King Edward VI, and 'Q. Mary I, are brought to light. To which is added, 'A Treatiſe of Superſtition writ by the ſaid learned 'Knight, and now firſt publiſhed.' Lond. 1705. 8vo.

[N] Sir Thomas Smith.] And this has the following title. 'The Life of the learned Sir Thomas Smith 'Knight, Doctor of the Civil Law; Principal Secretary of State to King Edward the Sixth, and Queen 'Elizabeth. Wherein are diſcovered many ſingular 'Matters relating to the State of Learning, the Reformation of Religion, and the Tranſactions of the 'Kingdom, during his time. In all which he had a 'great and happy Influence. With an Appendix, 'wherein are contained ſome Works of his, never before publiſhed.' Lond. 1698. 8vo.

[O] And Dr John Ælmer, biſhop of London.] This he intitled, 'Hiſtorical Collections, relating to the 'Life and Acts of Biſhop Aylmer.' Lond. 1701. 8vo. It contains a particular account, of the Puritans book,

Beſides his preferments already mentioned, he had the Sine-Cure of Terring in Suſſex, given him by Archbiſhop Tenniſon; and was Lecturer of Hackney till about the year 1724, when he reſigned that Lecture. In the latter and infirm part of his life, he lived with Mr Harris an Apothecary at Hackney, who had married his grand-daughter; where he died December 13, 1737, at the uncommon age of ninety-four. So that his intenſe application to his ſtudies did not ſhorten his days! His Faithfulneſs was equal to his induſtry [Q], and the world is greatly indebted to him for preſerving ſeveral valuable Materials, which would otherwiſe have been loſt. He kept a literary correſpondence with the moſt learned and eminent perſons in his time; particularly with Archbiſhops Tenniſon, and Wake; the Biſhops Atterbury, Burnet, Nicolſon &c. as appeared by an exact Diary he had made of his own life, and which was in the hands of Mr Harris. [Q] His Faithfulneſs was equal to his Induſtry.] We may judge of his Faithfulneſs, by the following Account he gives (in the Preface to Vol. I. of his Annals) of the Method he had purſued in that work.—'I have 'choſen, ſays he, commonly to ſet down Things in 'the very words of the Records and Originals, and of 'the Authors themſelves, rather than in my own, 'without framing and dreſſing them into more modern 'language. Whereby the Senſe is ſure to remain entire 'as the Writers meant it. Whereas, by affecting too 'curiouſly to change and model Words and Sentences, 'the Senſe itſelf, I have obſerved, often to be marred 'and diſguiſed.' And he further declares, That 'in 'this Work he had purſued Truth with all Faithfulneſs 'and Sincerity (4).'——Thus alſo, in the Preface to Vol. II. he ſays, ... 'In this whole Undertaking 'I have uſed all Faithfulneſs and Impartiality: and ſet 'down things according as I found them in the Originals, whether Letters, Records, Regiſters, Papers of 'State, or other MSS, being the imports of them, and 'often the ſame words. So that the Reader may the 'readier depend upon the Truth of what I offer (5).'——And to the ſame purpoſe in the Preface to Vol. III. ... 'What I have entred in my Copies, and prepared 'Writings for the preſs, were always reviewed by me, 'and carefully compared with the Records and Originals by me tranſcribed. And moreover I have ever 'been very careful and punctual in all my Collections 'thence. Whereof I have many Volumes (now bound 'up) taken by my own pen, and with mine own eyes, 'and made uſe of no other Tranſcribers or Amanuenſes. 'Unleſs what ſome learned Friends abroad, and in the 'Univerſities, had communicated to me.' ... He adds, 'I have for many long years together, converſed with 'Hiſtorical MSS (falling within the Sæculum Reformatum) whether Records, Regiſters, Inſtruments, Letters 'of Stateſmen, as well as other private Letters of the 'Court and Nobility, together with very many antient 'printed Books of thoſe Times (having met with ſome 'ſpecial Advantages that way) more than many men 'alive have done. And when afterwards I was purpoſed, for the publick Good, to digeſt and publiſh 'ſome of theſe Pains of mine, I ever made it my 'Reſolution to be juſt, faithful and impartial in what 'I ſhould deliver, and recommend unto the World 'from thence.'——See alſo the Prefaces to his Lives of the four firſt Proteſtant Archbiſhops.——Upon the whole, as Dr Birch rightly obſerves (6), 'His Fidelity and Induſtry will always give a value to his numerous Writings, however deſtitute of the graces, and 'even uniformity of ſtyle, and the art of connecting 'facts.'

SUTTON [THOMAS], Eſq; Founder of Charter-houſe Hoſpital near London, was deſcended of an ancient and genteel family (a) of his name in Lincolnſhire; in which County he was born at a place called Knaith, in the year 1532. He received the firſt part of his education at Eton School (b), whence he was probably ſent to Cambridge, and matriculated as a member of St John's College on the 27th of November 1551 [A]. However, without taking any degree (c), he removed thence to Lincoln's-Inn with a view, as it ſhould ſeem, of ſtudying the law (d). But finding a ſedentary way of life not agreeable to his active genius, he reſolved to form the compleat gentleman, by travelling abroad. In the execution of this deſign, he ſpent the whole time of Queen Mary's reign in foreign parts, and making the tour of Holland, France, Spain, and Italy, he became a maſter of the languages of thoſe ſeveral countries. Returning home in 1562, he entered into the poſſeſſion of a handſome fortune, which had been left to him by his Father [B], who died during his abſence.

[A] He was matriculated of St John's college, Cambridge.] That he was ſome time at one of the Univerſities appears from the teſtimony of Percival Burrel, Preacher at Charter-houſe in 1629 (1). Mr Wood's ſilence upon the Article is a ſtrong preſumptive proof Mr Sutton was not of Oxford; and that worthy Antiquarian, the late Mr Thomas Baker, of St John's college in Cambridge, being applied to by Dr Philip Bearcroft (2), returned the following anſwer, 'I have turned 'our matriculation book very carefully from the year '1544, where it firſt begins, to the year 1551, and 'cannot meet with your Founder, Thomas Sutton, 'either at Magdalene or Jeſus college, or indeed at 'any college except St John's, where I find Thomas 'Sutton matriculated, Nov. 27, 1551, thus; Thomas 'Sutton coll. Joh. Quadrantarius (cenſus) Nov. 27, 1551. 'The time agrees pretty nearly with his age, for he 'might have been admitted a year or two ſooner; 'they are not always matriculated the firſt year. But 'Quadrantarius is a greater objection, which ſuits not 'well with his birth and quality; and yet we have had 'Gentlemen admitted Sizars.' After theſe objections, Mr Baker proceeds to ſhew, that, if he were not of this college, he was not of that Univerſity, being neither of Magdalene nor Jeſus, notwithſtanding he was a benefactor to both. This being confirmed by expreſs informations from thoſe colleges, induced Dr Bearcroft (3) to aſſign him to St John's college, wherein we have followed him.

Though his death happened July 27, 1558, yet his will, wherein he left his wife and ſon joint executors, was not proved till the 22d of February, 1562. The will abſence. He was now about thirty years of age, and being in all reſpects an accompliſhed gentleman, he was firſt retained by the Duke of Norfolk [C], and after ſome time became Secretary to the Earl of Warwick [D], and occaſionally alſo to his brother the Earl of Leiceſter. In 1569, the former of theſe Noblemen being Maſter-General of the Ordnance, appointed his Secretary Maſter of the Ordnance at Berwick [E], in which poſt he diſtinguiſhed himſelf greatly upon the breaking out of the Rebellion in the North by the Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, ſo that by the recommendation of his two juſt-mentioned noble Patrons, he obtained a Patent the ſame year for the office of Maſter-General of the Ordnance in the North for life; and in 1573 he commanded one of the five Batteries, which obliged the ſtrong caſtle of Edinburgh to ſurrender to the Engliſh [F]. While he was thus acquiring that glory which is the peculiar purchaſe of military exploits, he grew not leſs diſtinguiſhed by an extraordinary acceſs of wealth: ſoon after his arrival in the North, he had purchaſed of the Biſhop of Durham the manors of Gateſhead and Wickham, famous for coal-mines in that biſhopric; and in 1570 obtaining a leaſe from the Crown for the term of ſeventy-nine years, theſe proſpered ſo faſt, that on his coming up to London in 1580, he brought with him the quantity of two horſe-loads of money, and was reputed to be worth fifty-thouſand pounds (e). About the middle of the year 1582 he married Elizabeth daughter of John Gardiner Eſq; of Grove-place in the pariſh of Chalfont-St Gyles in Buckinghamſhire, and widow of John Dudley of Stoke-Newington in Middleſex Eſq; a near relation of the Earl of Warwick; this Lady brought him a very conſiderable eſtate, and among the reſt a moiety of the manor of Stoke-Newington (f), which being near London, he made that houſe his country ſeat, and purchaſing in the city a large houſe near Broken Wharf, in the pariſh of St Mary Somerſet [G], he took up the buſineſs of a merchant, which his ready caſh enabled him to follow with ſuch great credit, and ſo much to his advantage, that he ſoon became one of the chief merchants of London, and is ſaid to have had no leſs than thirty agents abroad, and his riches flowing in with every tide (g). Mr Sutton was likewiſe one of the chief victuallers of the Navy (h), and ſeems to have been maſter of the Barque called Sutton, of ſeventy tons and thirty men, in the liſt of volunteers attending the Engliſh fleet againſt the Spaniſh Armada (i) in 1588 [H]. He is likewiſe ſaid will was nuncupative, and thus reduced for the probate to writing: 'Be it known to all men by theſe preſents, 'that Richard Sutton, of the pariſh of St Swithin within 'the city of Lincoln, gentleman, the 27th day of July 'in the year of our Lord God 1558, being of perfect 'remembrance, made his laſt will and teſtament nuncupative, in manner and form following: Firſt he 'bequeathed his ſoul to Almighty God his Maker and 'Redeemer, and willed his body to be buried in the 'pariſh-church of St Swithin aforeſaid. Item, he bequeathed to Thomas Sutton, his ſon, his leaſe of 'Cockrington, and all the years which were then to 'come and undetermined in the ſame. Item, the reſidue of his goods, not bequeathed, he gave to Elizabeth Sutton, his wife, and Thomas Sutton, his ſaid 'ſon, whom he made his executors, theſe being witneſſes, John Hall, William Wilſon, Joan Cook, and 'Joan Ryall, with others. Probatum fuit apud Lincoln (5).' By the probate it appears, that the execution was granted to Mr Sutton alone, the whole being truſted to his management by his good mother. She was a daughter of the honourable family of the Stapletons in Yorkſhire, whoſe lineal Anceſtor was Sir Bryan Stapleton of Carleton, Knight of the Garter in the time of King Richard II. Alſo Sir Miles Stapleton, created at the foundation of that order, was of this family (6). The leaſe of Cockrington, which was held of the biſhopric of Lincoln, was of very conſiderable value, and beſides this, Mr Sutton, we ſee, had a moiety of the perſonal eſtate.

Beſides which, he bequeathed his manors of Littlebury and Hadſtock in Eſſex to his Grace's ſon, the Earl of Suffolk, on the payment of 10000l. (7). Theſe manors lie contiguous to that of the Lord Audley, whoſe daughter and heir the Earl of Suffolk married, and built that remarkably magnificent houſe, called Audley Inn (8).

[D] He was ſecretary to the Earl of Warwick.] Among the papers in the Charter-houſe evidence-houſe, there appears a grant, on the 12th of November, 1569, of an annuity of 31l. 6s. 8d. out of the manor of Walkington in Yorkſhire, from Ambroſe Earl of Warwick, and dame Anne, his wife, to their well-beloved ſervant, Thomas Sutton, for life; and they afterwards leaſed the whole manor to him for twenty-one years, at the rent of 26l. per annum.

[E] Maſter of the ordnance at Berwick.] This was a poſt of particularly great truſt at this time, Berwick being a frontier-garriſon to Scotland, then in confuſion through inteſtine broils, on account of Mary Queen of Scots and the Romiſh religion (9). How well Mr Sutton filled his poſt Mr Camden will inform us; whoſe account of Berwick from his own ſurvey, during Mr Sutton's maſter-generalſhip of the ordnance in the North, is this; 'The Kings of England, ſays he, have ſeveral 'times fortified it with new works; but eſpecially Queen 'Elizabeth, who lately, to the terror of the enemy, 'and the ſecurity of the burghers, hath drawn it into 'a leſs compaſs than before, and ſurrounded it with a 'firm wall of Aſler work; which is again ſtrengthened 'with a deep ditch, baſtions, and counterſcarp; ſo 'that its fortifications are ſo ſtrong and regular, that 'no beſiegers can hope to carry it hereafter, not to 'mention the valour of the inhabitants, and the ſur-'prizing plenty of all warlike ſtores (10).' Wherever Mr Sutton's eye and purſe were concerned, there was plenty; and they were of ſervice to his Sovereign, in furniſhing the Northern garriſons; and to himſelf, in the concluſion, by an ample recompence from the Crown (11).

[F] Edinburgh caſtle ſurrenders to the Engliſh.] It is probable, that, as Maſter-General of the Ordnance, he attended the Earl of Suſſex, Preſident of the North, into Scotland, with an army in 1570, though he is not expreſsly named in Camden's Annals for that year. But in the year 1573 he is named (12) as one of the chief of thoſe fifteen hundred men, who marched into Scotland to the aſſiſtance of the Regent, the Earl of Morton, by order of Queen Elizabeth, and laid ſiege to Edinburgh caſtle.

[H] He attended the Engliſh fleet againſt the Spaniſh Armada.] It is very probable that he was the principal inſtrument in the defeat of that Armada. For Sir Francis Walſingham having, by the help of a Popiſh Prieſt, his ſpy, procured a copy of the King of Spain's letter, giving an account of his mighty preparations to the Pope; the Invaſion was hindered for a whole year by our merchants, who, at the inſtance of Sir Francis, gathered up the chief bills of the Bank of Genoa; and drawing their money out of it juſt as King Philip had ordered bills upon that bank to ſet his fleet out to ſea; thoſe bills were through neceſſity proteſted, ſo that patience became the only remedy; his Majeſty was obliged to wait the arrival of his Plate-Fleet from the Indies for the neceſſary ſupplies; and

In 1590 having married his wife's daughter, by Mr Dudley, to Francis Popham Eſq; ſon and heir to the Lord Chief Juſtice of that name (l), being himſelf without iſſue, and paſt all hopes of children by Mrs Sutton, he contracted his great dealings into ſo narrow a compaſs as permitted him to quit London [I], and to reſide at one or other of his country ſeats, for he had purchaſed ſeveral good eſtates. On the 27th of May, 1594, he ſurrendered his Patent of Maſter of the Ordnance in the North (m), and on the 20th of June following he conveyed in truſt all his eſtates in Eſſex to found an Hoſpital at Hallingbury-Bouchers in that county, but with a power of revocation during his life. On the 17th of December the ſame year he alſo made his Will [K], wherein, among other diſpoſitions, he bequeathed to Queen Elizabeth two thouſand pounds, 'in recompence of 'his overſights, careleſs dealings, and forgetfulneſs in her Majeſty's ſervice;' and there is a remarkable inſtance of his charity to his poor neighbours the following year [L]. On the 17th of June, 1602, he buried his Lady, who died at Balſham in Cambridgeſhire [M]. Hitherto he had lived in a munificent open hoſpitality [N], but this loſs depriving him of that England had thence time to prepare for the reception of the Invincible Armada (14). Mr Sutton was at this time the chief and richeſt merchant in London, and, conſidering his obligations to the Crown, together with his known loyalty, no doubt can be made but he was alſo the chief of thoſe merchants who drained the bank of Genoa, according to a ſtrong tradition which prevails at Charter-houſe. The truth of this ſtory has indeed been called in queſtion (15), as being inconſiſtent with the account that the ſtoreſhips provided for this expedition by the Spaniards were burnt on their coaſts by a fleet ſent for that purpoſe under the command of Sir Francis Drake. But this is far from being irreconcileable to the former account; and it is hoped the Reader will excuſe a cenſure, which he muſt needs ſee has been too haſtily paſſed, though certainly not with any thought of heightening the juſt renown of the Founder of the Royal Exchange, by an inſinuation that he had not a rival in the Founder of the Charter-houſe, in making his wealth ſerviceable to the Crown and Kingdom by draining the foreign banks.

(15) In this Work, under Sir Tho. Greſham's article, Vol. IV. p. 2385, in remark [G].

[I] He quitted London] Though the leaſe of his large houſe at Broken Wharf did not expire till 1599 (16), yet it is certain he had quitted it in 1594. For Stow thus continues the deſcription of it; 'Within the gate 'of this houſe (now belonging to the city of London) 'lately, to wit in the years 1594 and 1595, is builded 'one large houſe, of great height, called an engine, 'made by Bevis Bullmar, gentleman, for the convey-'ing and forcing of Thames-water, to ſerve in the 'middle and weſt parts of the city (17).'

[K] He made his will.] In this will he gave 3000l. to build his intended hoſpital and free-ſchool, as alſo twenty ſcholarſhips to Peter-houſe, and twenty ſcholar-ſhips to Jeſus-college in Cambridge, of 50s. per annum each, and ten fellowſhips to each of them, of 5l. per annum each, and as to the reſt, much the ſame legacies as in his laſt will. The reaſon of Mr Sutton's favour to Peter-houſe in this will was his friendſhip with Dr Perne, Maſter of that college, who was alſo Rector of Balſham, the manor of which Mr Sutton at that time held by a leaſe from his friend, Biſhop Cox. And though this benefaction never took place, yet from theſe words of Dr Perne's Will, dated Feb. 25, 1588, 'Item, I give 20l. towards building the Eaſt end of 'Peter-houſe, with a fair gate in the middle, like unto 'St John's gate-houſe, with the help of my Lord of Can-'terbury (Dr Whitgift), Mr Smith, Mr Sutton of Aſheton, 'Sir Walter Dixie, and Sir Thomas Ramſaye.' Mr Sutton, I ſay, by this paſſage, appears to have been a benefactor to Peterhouſe, ſince we find him in deeds about this time ſtiling himſelf of Aſheton, as he did afterwards of Bal-ſham, and laſtly of Caſtle-camps, after the purchaſe of that noble manor (18), which was the ancient ſeat of the Veres, Earls of Oxford, held by Hugh Vere (ſays the old Inquiſition record) that he might be Chamberlain to the King. However it is moſt certain, that Henry I. granted this office to Aubrey de Vere in theſe words, 'Chief Chamberlain of England in fee, and hereditary, 'with all the powers, privileges, and honours belong-'ing thereto, with as much freedom and worſhip as 'Robert Mallet had it (19).'

[L] A remarkable inſtance of his charity.] This year, 1595, our Hiſtorians obſerve, that grain was ſold at ſuch an exceſſively dear rate, as occaſioned ſeveral commotions among the people. In this exigency, Mr Sutton took order to have ſuch of his poor neighbours as were induſtrious ſupplied with corn for their families, very much under the market price. As a proof of this, his hiſtorian has given us the following note of his own hand-writing to his ſteward.

Corn to be ſold to the labouring poor of Balſam, now barley is at 2s. 8d. per buſhel, for thirty weeks.

John Symonds, by the Week, half a buſhel, 6d.

And thus did he proceed through all his poor neigh-bours, to the number of forty-nine, allotting to each their portion according to their family wants (20).

(20) Hiſtorical Account, p. 16.

[M] He loſt his lady.] In a letter to Mr Sutton from Balſham, May 30, this year, ſhe complained of a violent cold, and that ſhe was never worſe in her life (21). Her bowels were buried at Balſham, and the corpſe, embalmed, brought to their houſe at Stoke-Newington, and thence carried in a handſome funeral proceſſion to the pariſh-church, attended by her relations, and forty poor women, houſekeepers in Newington and Hackney, and ſixteen ſervants, all in mourning (22). It was de-poſited with her firſt huſband, Mr Dudley, in a vault near which, againſt the South wall of the church, ſhe had raiſed a noble marble monument, with the figure of Mr Dudley in armour, and of herſelf, and, behind her, of her daughter, all on their knees, with Latin epitaphs, to be ſeen in Stow (23). As there are ſeveral evidences in Charter-houſe of her good-nature, charity, and diſcretion, ſo Mr Sutton appears to have had a great value for her. In his firſt will, executed in her life-time, he made a very large and ample proviſion for her, and addreſſes himſelf to Queen Elizabeth, 'humbly 'beſeeching her to ſtand a good and gracious Lady to 'his poor wife.' She had the honour, in the time of Mr Dudley, to be well known to, and even to have received viſits from the Queen: in one of which her Majeſty, taking a jewel of great value from her hair, made a preſent of it to their daughter, Miſs Anne Dudley (24). Mr Sutton alſo, in his laſt will, bequeathed to this daughter's huſband, Sir Francis Popham, Knt. the ſum of two thouſand marks. As alſo to Frances, Mary, Elizabeth, Jane, and Anne, daughters of the Lady Anne Popham, 100l. a-piece, to be paid at the day of their marriage, or when they ſhould accompliſh the age of eighteen years. He alſo left to the wife and children of John Gardiner, his late wife's nephew, 100 marks, to be equally divided amongſt them.

[O] He reſolved upon ſome important charity.] To this purpoſe it is atteſted by Dr Fuller, as what he could confidently affirm from the mouth of one that heard it of a credible witneſs, who heard it himſelf, and told it the Doctor; 'That Mr Sutton uſed often to repair into 'a private garden, where he poured forth his prayers 'to God, and was frequently overheard to uſe this 'expreſſion; Lord, thou haſt given me a large and liberal 'eſtate, give me alſo a heart to make uſe thereof (26).' We have already mentioned his reſolution to be bountiful before the death of his wife: and from the year 1504 to the act of parliament for an hoſpital in 1610, there was a deed of gift always ſubſiſting for one, but with a power of revocation: and his conſtant reply to them that aſked him, how he would diſpoſe of his great eſtate, was, that his bread muſt be caſt upon the waters (27), but he could not eaſily determine when or how; he had various projects of his own and of his friends to ruminate on (28).

[P] He immediately put a ſtop to it.] The project was laid before King James by Sir John Harriſon, who had propoſed it to Mr Sutton; but as ſoon as he heard what was doing at court, he diſpatched the following letter to the Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, and the Lord Treaſurer Saliſbury, both feoffees for his intended hoſpital.

'May it pleaſe your Lordſhips,
'I underſtand that his Majeſty is poſſeſſed by Sir 'John Harrington, or by ſome other by his means, 'that I intend to make his Highneſs's ſon, the Duke 'of Yorke, my heir; whereupon, as it is reported, his 'Highneſs propoſeth to beſtow the honour of a Baron 'on me; whereof as I am moſt unworthy, ſo I vow to 'God and your Lordſhips, I never harboured the leaſt 'thought or proud deſire of any ſuch matter. My 'mynde, in my younger times, hath been ever free 'from ambition; and, now I am going to my Grave, 'to gape for ſuch a thing were meer dotage in me, ſo 'unworthie alſo, as I confeſs unto your Lordſhips. 'That this Knight hath been often tampering with me 'to that purpoſe, to entertayne honour, and to make 'the noble Duke my heire, is true; to whom I made 'that anſwer, as, had he either wit or honeſtie, (with 'reverence to your Lordſhips be it ſpoken) he never 'would have engaged himſelf in this buſineſs, ſo egregiouſly to delude his Majeſty, and wrong me. My 'humble ſuite unto your Lordſhips is, that, conſidering 'this occaſion hath brought me into queſtion, and in 'hazard of his Highneſs's diſpleaſure, having never 'given Sir John Harrington, or any man lyvinge, either 'promiſe or ſemblance to do any ſuch act, but upon his 'motions grew into utter diſlike with him for ſuch idle 'ſpeeches, your Lordſhips will vouchſafe me this favour, 'to informe his Highneſs aright, how things have proceeded directly without my privitie; and withall, that 'my truſt is in his gracious diſpoſition, not to conceit 'the worſe of me for other men's follies; but that 'I may have free liberty, with his Princely leave, 'wherein I reſt moſt aſſured, to diſpoſe of my own, 'as other his Majeſty's loyal ſubjects. And ſo, moſt 'humbly recommending my dutye and ſervice to your 'Lordſhips, for the increaſe of whoſe honours and 'happineſs I ſhall ever pray, I reſt,

'Your Lordſhip's
'Poor Beadeſman,
'Thomas Sutton.'

Dr Bearcroft has likewiſe given a tranſcript of the following letter to Mr Sutton from Sir John Harrington, which both fixes the time of the affair, and throws full light into it. It is dated June 13, 1608, and runs thus:

'Sir,
'Your ſtrange meſſage, firſt by my Man, after by 'my Son, now ſeconded with your ſpeech to myſelf, did 'greatlie trouble me, That I have undone you, overthrown your eſtate, diſturbed your deſignes; that no 'man dare buy any land of you, be your Feoffee, nor 'take any truſt from you, ſo as that which you had 'ordained to good uſes, and to redeem your ſins, was 'now ſo incombered, as you were ſkant maſter of 'your own; and all by means of a bruit among your 'friends, raiſed, as you ſuppoſe, by me, that you 'have made Duke Charles your Heir, and the King 'your Executor.
'Far be it from me to abuſe or miſreport either ſo 'princelie and pious an intention, as I know his Ma'jeſtie hath to further all good works, or ſo godlie a 'purpoſe, as you pretend to do ſome; but God cannot 'be mocked, though we may diſſemble with men.
'The letter is ſtill extant, which was my warrant. 'I have ſpoken nothing but within compaſs of that, 'and that very ſparinglie to your private friends. In 'which letter, ſeeing you yourſelf would needs in your 'ſenſe read a Caveat, to refuſe honour becauſe of age, 'which, in my conſtruction, was an incouragement to 'take the honour due to your abilities and years; I 'have been ſince, and will be ſilent about it. For the 'ſuite you would make to his Majeſtie, which I ſhall 'not ſo much as gueſs at, I will ſay what I thinke: 'you will make no ſuite but ſuch as will find favour 'and expedition; and, ſeeing you ſuppoſe I wronged 'you before, I would be glad to make you any amends 'now, by any endeavour of mine. Onlie my old ſuite 'you may not forget, to be a Benefactor to Bath (*) 'Church in your life time; for Almes in one's life 'time is like a light borne before one, whereas Almes 'after death is like a candle carried behind one. Do 'ſomewhat for this church; you promiſed to have ſeen 'it e're this: Whenſoever you will go to bathe, my 'lodgings ſhall be at your commandment. The Baths 'would ſtrengthen your ſinews; the Alms would comfort your ſoule.
'The Tower, the Quyre, and two Iſles are already 'finiſht by Mr Billet, Executor to the worthie Lord 'Treaſurer Burleigh. The walls are up ready for co'vering.
'The leade is promiſed by our bountiful Biſhop, 'Dr Montagu. Timber is promiſed by the Earl of 'Shrewſbury, the Earl of Hartford, the Lord Say, Mr 'Robert Hopton, and others.
'There lacks but monie for workmanſhip, which if 'you would give, you ſhould have many good prayers 'in the Church now in your life time, when they may 'indeed do you good, and when the time is to make 'friends of the mammon of iniquity, as Chriſt told us, 'that we may be received into everlaſting tabernacles, 'to which God ſend us; to whoſe protection I leave 'you, &c.

(*) Sir John Harrington's eſtate lay near this city, and continues ſtill in the ſame name.

'From Greenwich this
'15th day of June,

I don't find that Mr Sutton complied with this laſt requeſt; which indeed could not be expected by Sir John Harrington, who had given him ſo much offence by his impertinently forward application to the King.

[Q] A Letter from Biſhop Hall, &c.] This letter is penned with ſuch admirable force, and maſterly ſpirit, as will amply reward the Reader's patience for the length of it, as follows:

'Sir,
'I trouble you not with reaſons of my writing, or 'with excuſes; if I do ill, no plea can warrant me; if 'well,

(p) Historical Account &c. p. 34, in the Appendix to which the Act is inſerted, p. 215 to 228.

he ſoon after, on the 10th of March 1609, petitioned the King in Parliament for an Act to empower him to erect an Hoſpital at the aforementioned Hallingbury-Bouchers (p) in Eſſex.

' well, I cannot be diſcouraged with any cenſures. I ' crave not your pardon, but your acceptation: it is no ' preſumption to give good counſel, and preſents of ' love fear not to be ill taken of ſtrangers: my pen ' and your ſubſtance are both given us for one end, to ' do good: theſe are our talents, how happy are we if ' we can improve them well! ſuffer me to do you good ' with the one, with the other you may do good to ' many, and moſt to yourſelf. You cannot but know, ' that your full hand, and worthy purpoſes, have filled ' the world with much expectation: what ſpeak I of ' the world, whoſe honeſt and reaſonable claims yet ' cannot be contemned with honour, nor diſap- ' pointed without diſhonour! The God of Hea- ' ven, who hath lent you this abundance, and given ' you theſe gracious thoughts of charity, of piety, looks ' for the iſſue of both; and will eaſily complain of too ' little, or too late. Your wealth and your will are ' both good; but the firſt is only made good by the ſe- ' cond; for if your hand were full and your heart ' empty, we who now applaud you, ſhould juſtly pity ' you; you might have riches, not goods, not bleſſings; ' your burthen ſhould be greater than your eſtate, and ' you ſhould be richer in ſorrow, than in metals. For ' (if we look to no other world) what gain is it to be ' keeper of the beſt earth? that which is the common ' Coffer of all the rich Mines, we do but tread upon, ' and account it vile, becauſe it doth but hold and hide ' thoſe treaſures; whereas the ſkilfulleſt metalliſt, that ' findeth and refineth thoſe precious veins for public ' uſe, is rewarded, is honoured: the very baſeſt ele- ' ment yields gold. The ſavage Indian gets it; the ' ſervile Apprentice works it; the very Midianitiſh ' Camel may wear it; the miſerable Worldling ad- ' mires it; the covetous Jew ſwallows it; the un- ' thrifty Ruffian ſpends it; what are all theſe the better ' for it? Only good uſe gives praiſe to earthly poſ- ' ſeſſions: herein therefore you owe more to God, ' that He hath given you a heart to do good; a will ' to be as rich in good works as great in riches; to be ' a friend to this mammon is to be an enemy to God; ' but to make friends with it is Royal and Chriſtian: ' His enemies may be wealthy, none but his friends ' can either be good, or do good: Do et Accipe, ſaith ' the Wiſe Man.

' The Chriſtian, who muſt imitate that high pattern ' of his Creator, knows his beſt riches to be bounty. ' God who hath all, gives all; and reſerves nothing: ' and for himſelf, he well conſiders, that God hath ' not made him an Owner, but a Servant; and a Ser- ' vant of Servants, not of his Goods, but of the Giver: ' not a Treaſurer, but a Steward, whoſe praiſe is more ' to have laid out well, than to have received much. ' The greateſt gain therefore that he affects, is an even ' reckoning, a clear diſcharge: which ſince it is ob- ' tained by diſpoſing, not by keeping, he counts re- ' ſervation loſs, and juſt expence his trade and joy. ' He knows that Well done faithful ſervant is a thouſand ' times more ſweet a note, than Soul take thine eaſe; ' for that is the voice of the Maſter recompencing, this ' of the Servant preſuming; and what follows to the ' one but his Maſter's joy? and what to the other but ' the loſs of his ſoul? Bleſſed be that God who hath ' given you a heart to forethink this, and in this dry ' and dead age, a will to honour him with his own, ' and to credit his Goſpel with your beneficence. Lo! ' we are upbraided with barenneſs: your name hath ' been publickly oppoſed to theſe challenges, as in whom ' it ſhall be ſeen, that the truth hath friends that can ' give. I neither diſtruſt nor perſuade you, whoſe re- ' ſolutions are happily fixed on purpoſes of good; ' only give me leave to haſten your pace a little, and to ' excite your Chriſtian forwardneſs to begin ſpeedily, ' what you have long and conſtantly vowed. You ' would not but do good, why not now? I ſpeak ' boldly, the more ſpeed the more comfort; neither ' are the times in our diſpoſal, nor our ſelves.

' If God had ſet us a day, and made our wealth ' inſeparable, there were no danger in delaying; now ' our uncertainty either muſt quicken us, or may de- ' ceive us. How many have meant well, and done ' nothing, and loſt the Crown with lingering? whoſe ' deſtinies have prevented their deſires, and have made ' their good motions the Wards of their Executors, ' not without miſerable ſucceſs: to whom that they ' would have done good is not ſo great a praiſe, as it is ' diſhonour, that they might have done it: their wrecks ' are our warnings; we are equally mortal, equally ' fickle. Why have you this reſpite of living, but to ' prevent the imperious neceſſity of death? It is a ſoful ' and remedileſs complaint, the end of our days hath ' overrun the beginning of our good works. Early be- ' neficence hath no danger; many joys: for the con- ' ſcience of good done, the prayers and bleſſings of the ' relieved, and the gratulations of ſaints, are ſo many ' perpetual Comforters, which can make our life plea- ' ſant, and our death happy; our evil days good, or ' good better: all theſe are but loſs with delay; few ' and cold are the prayers for him that may give, and ' in lieu our good purpoſes foreſolved, are become our ' Tormentors. Upon our death-bed, little difference ' is betwixt good deferred, and evil done: good was ' meant, who hindered it? will our conſcience ſay; ' there was time enough, means enough, need enough, ' what hindered? Did fear of envy, diſtruſt of want? ' alaſs! what bugs are theſe to frighten men from ' heaven; as if the envy of keeping were leſs than be- ' ſtowing; as if God were not as good a Debtor, as a ' Giver. He that gives to the Poor lends to the Lord, ſays ' Solomon. If he freely gives us what we may lend, ' and grace to give, will he not much more pay us ' what we have lent? and give us becauſe we have ' given? That is his bounty, this is his juſtice. O! ' happy is the man that may be a Creditor to his ' Maſter! Heaven and Earth ſhall empty, before he ' want a royal payment. If we dare not truſt God ' while we live, how dare we truſt men when we are ' dead? Men that are ſtill deceitful, light upon the ' balance, light of truth, and heavy of ſelf-love: how ' many Executors have proved the Executioners of ho- ' neſt Wills? how many have our eyes ſeen, that after ' moſt careful choice of truſty Guardians, have had ' their children and goods ſo diſpoſed, as if the parent's ' ſoul could return to ſee it, I doubt whether it would ' be happy? how rare is that man, who prefers not ' himſelf to his dead friend, profit to truth? who will ' take no advantage of the impoſſibility of the account? ' Whatever therefore men either ſhew, or promiſe, ' happy is that man, that may be his own Auditor, ' Surveyor, Executor: as you love God and yourſelf, ' be not afraid of being happy too ſoon.

' I am not worthy to give ſo bold advice, let the ' Wiſe Man of Sirach ſpeak for me; do good before ' thou die, and according to thine ability ſtretch out ' thine hand, and give: defraud not thyſelf of thy ' good day; and let not the portion of thy good deſires ' paſs over thee. Shalt thou not leave thy travels to ' another, and thy labours to them that will divide ' thy heritage? Or let a Wiſer than he ſpeak, viz. ' Solomon: Say not to morrow I will give, if thou now ' have it: for thou knoweſt not what a day will bring ' forth. It hath been an old rule of liberality, he ' gives twice, who gives quickly; whereas ſlow bene- ' fits argue unchearfulneſs, and loſe their worth, who ' lingers his receipts, is condemned as unthrifty; he ' who knoweth both ſaith, It is better to give than to ' receive. If we are of the ſame ſpirit, why are we ' haſty in the worſt, and ſlack in the better? Suffer ' yourſelf, good Sir, for God's ſake, for the Goſpel's ' ſake, for the Church's ſake, for your Soul's ſake, to ' be ſtirred up by theſe poor lines to a reſolute and ' ſpeedy performing of your worthy intentions: and ' take this as a loving invitation ſent from Heaven ' by an unworthy meſſenger. You cannot deliberate ' long of fit objects for your beneficence, except it be ' more for multitude than want: the ſtreets, yea the ' world is full. How doth Lazarus lie at every door? ' How many ſons of the Prophets in their meanly ' provided colleges, may ſay not mors in olla, but ' fames? How many Churches may juſtly plead that ' which our Saviour bad his diſciples, The Lord hath ' need? And if this infinite ſtore hath made your choice ' doubtful, how eaſy were it to ſhew you, wherein you ' might oblige the whole Church of God to you, and ' make your memorial both eternal and bleſſed, or if ' you had rather, the whole commonwealth.

' But now I find myſelf too bold, and too buſy, in ' thus looking to particularities. God ſhall direct you, ' and if you follow him, ſhall crown you. Howſoever, ' if good be done, and that betimes, he hath what ' he deſired, and your ſoul ſhall have more than you ' can deſire. The ſucceſs of my weak, yet hearty

' counſel,

Essex [R]. The Petition was accordingly granted, but in a little time changing his mind as to the situation, he purchased of the Earl of Suffolk Howard-house, or the late dissolved Charter-house near Smithfield [S], for the sum of thirteen thousand pounds, where he founded the present Hospital of Charter-house in 1611 (q). He designed to be himself the first Master of it; but soon after the grant, being seized with a slow fever, and perceiving his end to approach, he hastened, and by a deed, dated on the 30th of October that year, nominated the Reverend John Hutton, Master of Arts, and Vicar of Littlebury in Essex, to

Dr Bearcroft observes (30) that Mr Sutton received this truly Christian letter most kindly, and when he had well considered it, thinking he perceived the finger of Heaven in it, he blessed God for the return of his prayer, in the garden, and determined to quicken his pace; and soon after, viz. on the 10th day of March, 1609, petitioned the King, as is mentioned above, which date is certainly right; but the Doctor did not sufficiently advert, that Mr Hall's letter, which preceded it, could not therefore be written, as he had said before, when that worthy Divine was of Waltham in Essex, who was not presented to that living till the year 1612 (31).

[R] Hallingbury-Bouchers, in Essex.] It is sometimes called Little Hallingbury, and is now part of Charter-house possessions. It is twenty-five miles from London, and three from Bishop-Stortford, on the borders of Hertfordshire, from which it is divided by the Lesser Stower, a very pleasant and healthy situation. Dr Fisher, who was presented by Mr Sutton to the Rectory in 1610 (32), lived to have it put under sequestration for malignancy, by the House of Commons, in 1644, and to enjoy it again on the Restoration, and died possessed of it, in 1669, in a good old age.

(32) With these memorable words: What I desire in return is your prayers, and the due performance of your office. Hist. Account &c. p. 35.

[S] The late dissolved Charter-house near Smithfield.] The first foundation of this house may be said to have had its rise from Dr Ralph Stratford, Bishop of London, who, upon the breaking out of the plague in the year 1347, purchased three acres of land, lying without the walls of London on the North part, between the lands of the Abbot of Westminster and of the Prior of St John of Jerusalem, and inclosed them with a brick wall, and consecrated the ground for a burial-place for the poor and needy. Whereupon, as the plague raged with greater violence in 1349, Sir Walter de Manny, in imitation of the Bishop's pious example, purchased, of the Master and Brethren of St Bartholomew Spittle, a piece of ground called Spittle-croft, containing thirteen acres and a rod, contiguous to those three acres lately dedicated for a burial-ground by the Bishop of London, and caused it to be consecrated by that Prelate to the same use; and there were buried in that year more than fifty thousand corpses in these thirteen acres and a rod of ground (33). Sir Walter built a chapel soon after, called New Church Haw, for masses for their souls, intending to add a college, with a Superior and twelve Chaplains, and obtained a bull of Pope Clement VI. for the uniting of three ecclesiastical benefices, not exceeding the value of 100l. sterling in the book of tenths, for the more ample endowment thereof. But, going abroad soon after to the wars, these thirteen acres and a rod, together with the chapel, were purchased of him by Dr Stratford's successor in the see of London, Michael de Northburgh, who also at his death bequeathed 2000l. for the founding, building, and finishing a convent of Carthusians there, and all his leases whatsoever, for the space of four years, and all his rents and tenements within the city of London, some few excepted, and all his reversions there whatsoever for ever, for the better endowment thereof; and to the Convent, when finished, his two best silver basons for the service of the altar, and a silver pyx enamelled for the host, as also a silver vessel for holy water, and a silver bell, together with his two best vestments to officiate in, and all his divinity books. In the mean time Sir Walter de Manny advancing in years, the hero reassumed the saint, and, with the consent of the Bishop of London, to whom Michael de Northburg bequeathed the patronage and care of his foundation, took on him the care of erecting and endowing a double monastery of Carthusians in New Church Hawe in 1371, to be called The House of the salutation of the mother of God (34). He likewise gives the three acres adjoining, consecrated by Bishop Stratford, for the burial-ground, of which it seems he had obtained a grant. The donation was confirmed by a bull of Pope Urban VI. on the 12th of December, 1378 (35). The words of the bull are, Bonæ memoriæ Michael Episcopus Londinensis & idem miles [Walter de Manny] convexitum duplicem monachorum ordinis Carthusiensis fundaverunt. The Reader may see an account in Froissard of Sir Walter de Manny, who was a native and Lord of the town of Manny in the province of Hainault, and attended Philippa of Hainault into England, on her marriage with King Edward III; who in the fifth year of his reign knighted him, granting him robes out of the great wardrobe as a Banneret, and afterwards made him a Peer of the realm, and a Privy Counsellor, and Knight of the Garter (36). He died in the latter end of the year 1371: King Edward and his royal family of heroes, with the nobility, honoured the funeral with their presence, attending the corpse to the chapel of the new erected Carthusian monastery (37), where it was solemnly interred in the midst of the choir, and an alabaster tomb, like that of Sir John Beauchamp's at St Paul's, by his own appointment erected for him: by his will, bearing date Nov. 30, 1371, he bequeathed an old debt of 1000l. due to him from the King, and the moiety of 100l. per annum, due to him for many years past from the Prince of Wales, as Governor of Hardelagh-castle, for the better endowment of the monastery. The co-founder of which, Michael de Northburgh, was originally a Dominican Fryar, and became Chaplain and Confessor to King Edward III, as also one of his Council, and attended on his Majesty at the taking of the city of Caen, the famous battle of Cressy, and the taking of Calais (38). On the death of Dr Stratford in 1354, he was advanced to the see of London, which he enjoyed till the ninth of September, 1361, when he died of the plague at Coptford in Essex (39); and in his will, bearing date May 23d preceding, besides his legacy already mentioned for the foundation of the monastery, he bequeathed a thousand marks, to be put into a chest standing in the Treasury of St Paul's, London, out of which any poor man might, for a sufficient pledge, borrow 10l. the Dean and principal Canons 20l. or as far as forty marks, the Bishop of London 40l. a nobleman or citizen 20l. for one year: but if the money was not then returned, the preacher at St Paul's cross was to give notice, that the pledge for it would be sold within fourteen days, if not redeemed in the mean time, and the surplusage, if any, to be returned to the owner (40). Mr Sutton's gift of 1000l. to the chamber of London (41) seems to be done in imitation of this bequest of his predecessor in the first foundation of Charter-house; which being dissolved by Henry VIII, the scite was granted on the 12th of June, 1542, unto John Bridges and Thomas Hall for their joint lives, in consideration of the safe keeping of the King's tents and pavilions, &c. which had been then for some time there; but on the 4th of April, 1545, it was given to Sir Edward North, Chancellor of the court of Augmentations in perpituity, and valued in the grant at 50l. per annum (42). Sir Edward was made a Baron by Queen Mary in the first year of her reign, and Queen Elizabeth, on her accession to the throne, did his Lordship the honour to reside for some days at Charter-house, where his Lordship died Dec. 31, 1564; whereupon his son Roger, Lord North, sold Charter-house to the Duke of Norfolk for 2500l. on the 31st of May following, except that part on the East side of the chapel, which was then the mansion-house of Lord North, and is now Rutland-court, and the houses adjoining on to Goswel-street. The Duke of Norfolk made Charter-house his residence in town, till his commitment to the Tower in 1569 (43), whence being enlarged in 1570, he was remitted to Charter-house, but under custody; and being sent again to the Tower in 1571, was tried, condemned, and beheaded in 1572, for high-treason (44); but, his family being restored in blood and to the estate, Charter-house came again to the share of Lord Thomas Howard, the Duke's second son, but eldest by his second Dutchess, Margaret, daughter of Lord Audley. On the accession of King James II, this Lord Thomas Howard was created Earl of Suffolk; and of him Mr Sutton bought Charter-house.

(33) This appeared from a Stone Cross, some time standing in Charter-house yard, with this inscription, A. D. MCCCXLIX. Regnante magna pestilentia consecratum fuit hoc Cœmeterium in quo & infra septa præsentis Monasterii sepulta fuerunt mortuorum corpora plusquam quinquaginta millia; præter alia multa abhinc usque ad præsens, Quorum animabus propitietur Deus. Amen.

(45) In the Preface to the Tenth Volume of his Reports.

[U] His laſt Will.] It is very long, occaſioned by the prodigious number of legacies bequeathed in it. The firſt of which is 10 l. to each of Biſhop Cox's children, then living, manifeſtly in gratitude for the kindneſs of that Biſhop, who, as is obſerved above, was the worthy Patron of his youth. And this was apparently the true reaſon of another, of 500 marks to Jeſus College in Cambridge, which bears a particular relation to the Biſhopric of Ely. Beſides that, Dr Duport, ſon-in-law to Biſhop Cox, was then Maſter thereof. The College purchaſed with this legacy the impropriate Rectory, with the perpetual advowſon of the Vicaridge of Elmſtead (46) near Colcheſter in Eſſex. Mr Sutton left another legacy of 500 l. for the promotion of learning, to Magdalen-College, in the ſame Univerſity. This being a Lincolnſhire College, the county in which he was born, the benefaction is thus entered in the College-regiſter, "A. D. 1615. Thomas Sutton Eſquire, Founder of Sutton's Hoſpital in London, gave the College 500 l. towards the purchaſing an Inn in Cambridge, which, with the addition of 160 l. from the College, was laid out in the purchaſe of the White Bull Inn, then valued at 40 l. per ann." He likewiſe bequeathed 1000 l. to the Treaſury, or chamber of the City of London, to be lent yearly to ten young merchant men, not having any great ſtock of their own; that is, to each 100 l. without paying any thing for the ſame, to be choſen by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and the Dean of St Paul's, for the time being; ſo that none have, or continue the ſaid 100 l. above one year. There is another legacy of 100 l. to the poor Fiſhermen of Oſtend. The motive to which would have been very puzzling, had not Dr Bearcroft cleared it up from a paſſage in Mr Sutton's former Will, made in 1695, in which are theſe words: Alſo I give to the Fiſhermen of the town of Oſtend in the Low Countries, in recompence of two prizes, viz. fly-boats loaden with barrelled cod, ſalt, and other things, which I bought at Newcaſtle upon Tyne about the ſixteenth year of the Queen's Majeſty's (Elizabeth's) reign, of the Prince of Orange's Captains, two hundred pounds. I deſire the ſame men, or their children, to have the ſame, if the true Owners may be found out, if not, then I will the ſame two hundred pounds to be given among the pooreſt Fiſhermen of that town. Mr Sutton, it is plain from this account, came fairly by theſe prizes, having bought them of the men that had taken them in open war; but however, he was now willing the poor ſufferers, if it might be, ſhould taſte of his bounty, and have ſome amends for their loſs: The Doctor alſo obſerves, that the ſum is leſſened to 100 l. in his laſt Will, by reaſon that Oſtend had then been lately reduced to almoſt an heap of rubbiſh and ſand in the famous three years ſiege thereof, and ſo many of the inhabitants deſtroyed, that Mr Sutton doubted, that there were but a very few of the poor Fiſhermen left, and therefore ordered, that if there ſhould not be found a competent number of them to receive the 100 l. ſome other of the poorer ſort of inhabitants ſhould come in for ſhares. We muſt not omit another legacy of 20000 l. which was bequeathed to his Truſtees to be diſpoſed of according to their diſcretion. Whereupon theſe Truſtees (Abbot Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Andrews Biſhop of Ely) by a letter (47) dated at Lambeth, June 26, 1613 (48), directed his Executors (Richard Sutton of London Eſq; and John Law a Proctor in the Arches) to pay 10000 l. into the receipt of the King's Exchequer, towards repairing Berwick bridge, by the help of which, that bridge, then intirely decayed, was rebuilt. Mr Sutton alſo bequeathed 100 marks to the town of Berwick, to be diſtributed among the poor there, by the diſcretion of the chief Governor and Preacher for the time being, to be paid within one year after his deceaſe. Theſe, with the reſt of the legacies to the number of upwards of threeſcore, amount at leaſt to the ſum of forty thouſand pounds.

(46) It is recorded by Dr Sherman thus: Thomas Sutton (Craſſus ille Armiger) Fundator Domus Hoſpitalis vocate, The Charter-houſe, London, Rectoriam impropriatam de Elmeſtead (Olim Portionem Monaſterii S. Ogithæ) juxta Colcheſtriam Collegio dono dedit una cum perpetua advocatione Vicarii. Latin Hiſtory of Jeſus College, MS.

(47) The letter is in Charter-houſe Aſſembly-book, A. p. 347.

(48) That is, two years after his deceaſe, he having deſired in his Will, that every thing in it ſhould be performed within that time.

[W] A ſolemn proceſſion, &c.] The ceremonial was as follows. The Governors of the hoſpital; the Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury, George Abbot; the Lord Elleſmere, Lord Chancellor; the Biſhop of London, Dr John King; Biſhop of Ely, Dr Launcelot Andrews; the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke; Sir Henry Hobart, Attorney-General; Dr John Overal, Dean of St Paul's; Dr George Montaigne, Dean of Weſtminſter; Henry Thoreſby, Jeffery Nightingale, Richard Sutton, Eſqrs; John Law, Thomas Browne, Gent. the Rev. Mr John Hutton, Maſter of the hoſpital; being met at the houſe in Hackney, where the corpſe lay, elected Henry Howard, Earl of Northampton, Lord Privy Seal, and Sir George Altham, one of the Barons of the Exchequer, Governors of the hoſpital, in the place of Robert Cecil, Earl of Saliſbury, Lord High Treaſurer, and Sir Thomas Forſter, one of the Juſtices of the Common Pleas, deceaſed; and Mr Thomas Heyward, a gentleman much employed by Mr Sutton in law matters, and whoſe wife is a legatee in his will, the Regiſter of the hoſpital; and then, joining the Earl of Northampton, the Earl of Suffolk, Sir James Altham, Sir John Crooke, Sir Francis Popham, and many other knights and gentlemen aſſembled there, after a handſome collation, they honoured the funeral with their preſence. The proceſſion was under the direction of Mr Camden, Clarencieux King at Arms (49). A hundred old men in black cloaks preceded the corpſe; Mr Simon Baxter, Mr Sutton's only ſiſter's eldeſt ſon, was chief Mourner; and then followed the Lords and Gentlemen, with their Attendance, all in mourning, through a vaſt croud of ſpectators, to Chriſt-Church, adjoining to Chriſt's hoſpital, in London, where the corpſe was depoſited, with the funeral ſervice, to be removed to Charter-houſe when the chapel ſhould be finiſhed, and a vault and tomb prepared for it. The whole funeral expences, as appears from the executors accompts, amounted to 2218 l. 10 s. 3 d. of which the mourning cloth coſt 1355 l. 2 s. 4 d. and the tomb 514 l. 19 s. 10 d. and 30 l. was given at the burial to the poor (50).

there interred in a vault on the north ſide, under a magnificent tomb, with an inſcription [X], which is inſerted below. In regard to his character: as to his perſon, he was ſtrong-built and compact, of a middle ſtature, with a good complexion and agreeable mien; neither nice nor negligent in his apparel, but modeſt and clean, enjoying a good ſtate of health till the decays of old age broke in upon it. His public character is ſeen in the courſe of this memoir. In his private character he was a very affectionate tender huſband, an exact but kind maſter, a good natured honeſt man, ſober and religious both at home and abroad, very compaſſionate and very grateful (t).

(t) Hiſtor. Account, p. 207.

After his death his heir at law, Simon Baxter, Eſq; [Y], attempted, by a forcible entry, to take poſſeſſion of Charter-houſe, and laying claim to the whole Eſtate ſettled upon the Hoſpital, endeavoured to ſet aſide the Donation: but after many proceedings at law, it was at length, by the verdict of the Grand Jury of the Judges of England, in 1613, found that the Foundation, Incorporation, and Endowment of the Hoſpital, was ſufficient, good and effectual in law (u). The odium of this ſuit fell heavily upon Sir Francis, afterwards Lord Bacon [Z], who was then Sollicitor-General, and the chief promoter of it (w): notwithſtanding which, he was elected a Governor not many years afterwards (x).

(u) The caſe is in the tenth Vol. of Reports by Lord Coke.

(w) Perhaps in oppoſition to his Rival Lord Coke, who exerted himſelf greatly in favour of the Donation.

[X] With an inſcription.] In theſe terms:

Sacred to the glory of God,
In grateful memory of
THOMAS SUTTON, Eſq;

Here lieth buried the body of Thomas Sutton, late of Caſtle-Camps in the county of Cambridge, Eſq; at whoſe only coſts and charges this hoſpital was founded, and endowed with large poſſeſſions, for the relief of poor men and children: he was a gentleman born at Knayth in the county of Lincoln, of worthy and honeſt parentage; he lived to the age of ſeventy-nine years, and deceaſed the 12th of December, 1611.

The 12th of December is now, by order of the Governors, the commemoration-day, when, after morning ſervice and a ſermon in the chapel, there is a Latin oration in the hall, by one of the ſcholars, in praiſe of the founder.

(51) The manor of Tarbocke, on which was a fair ancient houſe, and large demeſnes, plentifully ſtored with timber, and the impropriate rectory of Huyton, in the ſame county.

(52) He is the ſecond Baronet created by King James, May 22, 1611. Sir Richard Bacon, of Redgrave in Suffolk, being the firſt. Salmon's Chron. Hiſtory under that year.

[Y] Simon Baxter, Eſq;] He was Mr Sutton's nephew, being the eldeſt ſon of his only ſiſter Dorothy, and therefore attended his funeral as chief Mourner. Mr Sutton by his will had left him an eſtate in Lancaſhire, which coſt him 9300l. (51), beſides a legacy of 300l. in money: but being ſoon reduced, partly by the expences of the law-ſuit, he ſold the land eſtate to Sir Richard Molyneux, Bart. (52) of Sefton in Lancaſhire, for 15000l. on the 20th of July, 1615, having received his legacy of 300l. before, viz. on the 16th of February, 1614.

[Z] Falls heavily upon my Lord Bacon.] Mr Baxter, in a petition to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to procure him the payment of his legacy, declares, That, being ſeduced by wicked counſel, he yielded his conſent to have his name uſed to bring an action againſt the hoſpital; by means whereof he had ſpent a great part of his eſtate, and was likely to pay great ſums of money, for his ſeducers, in a manner to his undoing. And that Sir Francis Bacon was chief counſellor of Mr Baxter, is gathered from his being a profeſt enemy to this deſign of Mr Sutton, as is evident from a letter of advice which that great Lawyer wrote to King James on the breaking out of the diſpute in law, which is very artfully calculated to intereſt his Majeſty on his client Mr Baxter's ſide, by inſinuating, that if he ſucceeded in his ſuit, all would be referred to his Majeſty's good pleaſure in theſe words: But if there be right and birthright planted in the heir, and not remediable by the courts of equity, and that right be ſubmitted to your Majeſty, whereby it is in your pleaſure and grace what to do: then do I wiſh, that this rude maſs, and chaos of a good ſeed, were directed rather to a ſolid merit and durable charity, than to a blaze of glory, that will but crack a little in talk, and quickly extinguiſh. Dr Teniſon indeed remarks (53), that, as his Lordſhip did not manifeſt himſelf in this advice againſt the charity, but the manner of diſpoſing it, ſo it was not well done of thoſe who have publickly defamed him, by declaring their jealouſies of bribery by the Heir. But, in anſwer to this, it is obvious, that in this addreſs common prudence made ſuch a conduct abſolutely neceſſary, ſince otherwiſe it would have been too plain a diſcovery of his own mal-practice, and an expoſing of himſelf to his Majeſty. The Doctor obſerves, that the event ſhewed that his Lordſhip was miſtaken, when he called it a ſacrifice without ſalt: and it has been further vindicated againſt every particular article of the charge by Dr Bearcroft, who juſtly anſwers the concluſion of this advice, which is couched in theſe words: 'Thus 'have I briefly given my opinion touching the employ-'ment of this charity; whereby that maſs of wealth, 'which was in the owner's hands little better than a 'ſtack or heap of muck (*), may be ſpread over 'your kingdom to many fruitful purpoſes, your Majeſty 'planting and watering, and God giving the increaſe. 'If Mr Sutton's maſs of wealth, ſays Dr Bearcroft, 'was a heap of muck (which by the way is but a coarſe 'unſavoury expreſſion to his Majeſty, and very juſtly 'found fault with by an eminent critic) (54), how 'much more decent, and to what great advantage, 'does the thought appear in theſe beautiful lines of 'Mr Pope (55),

'In heaps, like ambergris, a ſtink it lies;
'But, well diſpoſed, is incenſe to the ſkies.

'It produced very good corn in that moſt judicious chá-'rity of furniſhing all his poor neighbours at leſs than 'half price (56).' However, no doubt Mr Sutton, as a man, had his failings, of which the inſinuation, in the cloſe of this advice, of his being ſomewhat of a miſer, may perhaps be thought not altogether without grounds, from his great privacy of life after the death of his Lady; which is not ſufficiently palliated by ſaying he practiſed ſelf-denial to give the more nobly away (57); ſince it may as well be retorted, that the ſelf-denial proceeded from no ſuch principle; it being evident that he was always much diſpoſed to a ſparing frugality; appointing his ordinary expences at firſt to the half of his income, and, when that was much increaſed, to a third, and giving about an eighth in charity (58).

SWIFT [Dr JONATHAN], a polite writer of exquiſite humour, in the preſent century, was deſcended from a younger branch of an ancient family of the name in Yorkſhire [A], the laſt heir of which, Bernam Swift, Eſq; was created, by King Charles I, a Peer of Ireland, with the title of Viſcount Carlingford (a), on the 20th of March 1627; but dying without male iſſue, the title became extinct, and the family inheritance deſcending to his daughters [B], was thereby divided from the name of Swift for ever. Some of the younger branches,

(a) The Doctor takes notice, that his family was not undiſtinguiſhed in its time. Letter to Lord Bolingbroke, dated Dublin, Oct. 31, 1729, in the ſeventh Vol. of his Works, printed at Dublin in 1733, in eight Volumes, 8vo.

[A] Deſcended from an ancient family in Yorkſhire.] We have this account of the family in Guillim (1). 'Godwin Swift, of Goodridge in the county of Here-'ford, Eſq; of the ſociety of Gray's-Inn, deſcended of 'the family of the Swifts in Yorkſhire. The arms are, 'Or, a chevron nebule, argent and azure, between 'three bucks in full courſe, vert.' This bearing puts me in mind of the hiſtory of the family of the Greenhats in the Tatler (2), where the Dean's particular turn of wit and humour is ſo exactly hit off. One is the more apt to think that Mr Obadiah Greenhat had the three bucks vert in his eye, when Lord Orrery (3) is found obſerving, that our Dean had been himſelf the herald to blazon the dignity of his coat.

[B] By his daughter.] There were two of theſe; one of whom married Robert Fielding, Eſq; common-branches, from the ſame ſtem, diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their loyalty in the grand rebellion of 1641 (b), among whom was our Author's grandfather, the Reverend Mr Thomas Swift [C], who was poſſeſſed of a paternal eſtate near Roſs at Goodrich in Hereford-ſhire, of which place he was Vicar (c), and held alſo another Church-benefice (d). He married Mrs Elizabeth Dryden, aunt to John Dryden the Poet, and by her had ten ſons and ſix daughters. Of the ſons ſix ſurvived him, Godwin, Thomas, Dryden, William, Jonathan, and Adam, who were all, except Thomas, bred to the law. Godwin, who was a Barriſter of Gray's Inn, having married a relation of the old Marchioneſs of Ormond, was made Attorney-General to the old Duke in the Palatinate of Tiperary in Ireland. That kingdom was then ne[ar]ly without Lawyers, by reaſon of the rebellion which had forced almoſt every man, of what-ever condition, to take up arms, and made him a ſoldier. Godwin therefore reſolved to attempt the acquiſition of a fortune there, and the ſame motive induced his four brothers, who were Attorneys, to go with him. Godwin ſoon became wealthy, and the reſt obtained ſomewhat more than a genteel competence, though Dryden and Jonathan (e), who died ſoon after their arrival, had little to bequeath. This laſt, at the age of about three and twenty, and before he went to Ireland, had married Mrs Abigail Erick of Leiceſterſhire (f), who, about two years after, was left a widow, with one child, a daughter, and pregnant with another. She had brought her huſband but a ſmall fortune, and now her whole ſubſiſtence was an annuity of twenty pounds, which he had purchaſed for her in England, immediately after his marriage (g). In this diſtreſs, ſhe was taken, with her daughter, into the family of Godwin, her huſband's eldeſt brother; and on the 30th of November, 1667, about the ſeventh month of her widowhood, ſhe was delivered at Dublin of a ſon (h), whom ſhe called Jonathan, in memory of his Father (i); and who became afterwards the celebrated Dean of St Patrick's, the ſubject of the preſent memoir. It happened, by whatever accident, that he was not ſuckled by his mother, but put to a nurſe, who took ſo ſtrong an affection for him, that when he was about a year old, finding it neceſſary to viſit a relation, from whom ſhe expected a legacy, and who lay dangerouſly ſick at Whitehaven in Cumberland, ſhe croſſed the ſea to that place of her nativity; and having contrived a way of conveying the child on ſhipboard unknown to his mother and his uncle, ſhe carried him with her. Here he continued three years (k): for when the matter was diſcovered, his mother ſent orders not to hazard a ſecond voyage till he ſhould be better able to bear it (l). And the woman gave other teſtimonies of her affection to her nurſling, having taught him to ſpell before her return [D], ſo that at five years of age he was able to read any chapter in the Bible (m). In the mean time, Mrs Swift, about two years after her huſband's death, had quitted Ireland, and retired to Leiceſter, leaving her children to the care of their uncle aforementioned [E], who kindly undertook the charge, and ſent his nephew, ly called handſome Fielding, and the other the Earl of Eglington in Scotland. Fielding ſoon diſſipated his wife's patrimony; and that of her ſiſter being transferred to the family of Lord Eglington (4), the principal eſtate of the Swifts was finally ſeparated from the name, as is mentioned above.

(4) Hawkeſworth's account of the life of Jonathan Swift.

[C] His grandfather Mr Thomas Swift.] This gentleman's father, William Swift, was rector of St. Andrews in Canterbury, and married the heireſs of Philpot, who contrived to keep her eſtate, which was very conſiderable, in her own hands. She is ſaid to be extremely capricious and ill-natured, and to have diſinherited her ſon Thomas, an only child, merely for robbing an orchard when he was a boy. However this be, it is certain, that, except a church or chapter leaſe which was not renewed, Thomas never poſſeſſed more than a hundred pounds a year. This little eſtate, which lay at Goodrich, he mortgaged for three hundred broad pieces of gold, and, having quilted them into his waiſtcoat, he ſet out for Ragland Caſtle, whither his Majeſty King Charles I. had retired after the fatal battle of Naſeby. The governor, who knew him well, aſked what was his errand: I am come, ſays Swift, to give his Majeſty my coat, at the ſame time pulling it off and preſenting it: The governor told him his coat was worth little; why then, ſaid Swift, take my waiſtcoat (5); this was ſoon found to be an uſeful garment by its weight; and it is remarked by Lord Clarendon, that the King received no ſupply more ſeaſonable or acceptable than theſe three hundred broad pieces during the whole war, his diſtreſs being then very great, and his reſources cut off (6). The zeal and activity of this gentleman for the royal cauſe expoſed him to much danger and many ſufferings; he was plundered more than thirty times by the parliament's army, he was ejected from his church livings, his eſtate was ſequeſtred, and himſelf thrown into priſon (*). His eſtate however was afterwards recovered, and part of it ſold to pay the money due upon the mortgage, and ſome other debts; the remainder, being about one half, deſcended to his heir, and is now poſſeſſed by his great grandſon, Deane (7) Swift, Eſq; eldeſt grandſon of Godwin, eldeſt ſurviving ſon and heir of Thomas, whoſe ſecond ſon, named alſo Thomas, was bred at Oxford, and took orders. He married the eldeſt daughter of Sir William Davenant, but died young, and left only one ſon, whoſe name alſo was Thomas, and who died in 1752, rector of Puttenham in Surry, a benefice which he had poſſeſſed threeſcore years (8).

[D] Taught him to ſpell before her return.] The incident of his being carried into England ſoon after his birth gave riſe to a general opinion that he was born there, a miſtake to which ſome other incidents have contributed. He had been frequently heard to ſay, when the people of Ireland diſpleaſed him, 'I am not 'of this vile country, I am an Engliſhman.' Mr Pope (*) alſo, in one of his letters to him, mentions England as his native country: but the account here given of his birth is taken from that which he left behind him in his own hand-writing; and, while he lived, he was ſo far from ſeriouſly denying or concealing his being a native of Ireland, that he often mentioned, and even pointed out the houſe in which he was born (9).

(*) Letter LXXXVIII. to Swift, dated March 23, 1736-7.

(9) Lord Orrery and Hawkeſworth.

Another miſtake too has been grafted upon this, that he was a natural ſon of Sir William Temple. In anſwer to which Lord Orrery obſerves (10), that ſuch a relation appears to be impoſſible, ſince that ſtateſman was reſident abroad in a public character from the year 1665 to 1670, as may be proved by his letters to the Earl of Arlington and the reſt of the miniſtry. The Dean was born in November, 1667, and his mother was never out of the Britiſh dominions. His Lordſhip is herein followed by Mr Hawkeſworth (11); and the remark indeed is enough of it true for the purpoſe to which it is made, though it is not altogether true; for Sir William appears to have been five days in England in the year 1668 (12).

[E] To the care of their uncle Godwin.] It is ſaid, that, of all the brothers of Mrs Swift's huſband, Godwin only had ſons (13); which muſt be underſtood only of thoſe brothers who went to Ireland; otherwiſe the remark will be but ill defended by uſing the word ſons in the plural number, ſince, as has been ſhewn from the Dean's own account (14), his uncle Thomas had one ſon. However this ſlip ought not to impeach the truth of Mr Deane Swift's account (15), that our Author's mo-nephew, at six years of age, to school at Kilkenny. He must have been one of those geniuses which don't begin to flower early, since he passed eight years at this school without giving any proofs of extraordinary talents (n). However, he was thought fit for the University at the age of fourteen, and was accordingly removed to Trinity-college in Dublin, under the tuition of that learned and ingenious gentleman, Mr George St Ashe, in 1681 [F]. Here he behaved with strict regularity and order, but discovered the utmost dislike of the academical exercises, which were frequently made the subject of his ridicule. History and Poetry were the studies that suited his taste: to these he bent his whole application, and made great progress in them; but all other branches of science, especially Logic and Metaphysics, were so much disregarded by him, that when he stood a candidate for his first degree in arts, in 1685, he was set aside on account of insufficiency. At the same time, the austerity of his temper made him a disagreeable companion, so that he was little regarded, and less beloved (o). He did not obtain the favour of his degree till he had been at the college seven years, nor then neither without a special mark of disgrace, signified in the words specialí gratia. This seems the more extraordinary, as we are assured, that for three years past he had been so far from an idler, that he spent eight hours a day at study (p); but the wonder vanishes as soon as we know which way the bent of his application is turned. During this time he drew the first sketch of his Tale of a Tub (q). In 1688, his guardian uncle fell unhappily into a lethargic disorder, which totally depriving him of his speech and memory, unavoidably put a stop to the current of his kindness to his nephew, who, till this time, had been supported by him. In this exigence, Swift, who was now twenty-one years of age, took a journey to Leicester [H], to consult with his mother what course of life to pursue. At this time Sir William Temple was in high reputation, and honoured with the confidence and familiarity of King William. His Father, Sir John Temple, had been Master of the Rolls in Ireland, and contracted an intimate friendship with Godwin Swift, which continued till his death; and Sir William, who inherited his title and estate, having married a Lady, to whom Mrs Swift was related, she therefore advised her son to apply to him. This advice, which perhaps only confirmed a resolution that Swift had secretly taken before he left Ireland (r), he immediately resolved to pursue. Sir William received him with great kindness, and our genius had been perhaps lost to the world, had it not been for this lucky step. This great Statesman and Scholar was then at Moor-Park near Farnham in Surry, a seat which he had purchased a few years before, in the view of retiring from business, and living to himself and his studies (s). Swift, who had led a studious life for some years, and must have acquired a good stock of knowledge in history, was therefore a welcome guest to him, and accompanied him to Sheene, whither he returned upon the approach of the Revolution, Moor-Park lying in the way of both armies (t). Sir William had been well known, and treated with confidence by the Prince of Orange abroad, before his accession to the crown of England, who afterwards frequently visited him at Sheene, and took his advice in affairs of the utmost importance. In these visits, Sir William being lame with the gout, Swift used to attend his Majesty in his walks about the garden, who admitted him to such a familiarity, that he shewed him how to cut asparagus after the Dutch manner. Thus agreeably did he pass the time, not less to his improvement, than his satisfaction, in the company of a beneficent Patron, who was both an elegant author, and a polite gentleman, who likewise extended his friendship to the care of his fortune; and obtained for him an offer from the King to make him a Captain of Horse; and when this offer was declined by our Author, who appears to have fixed his mind very early upon the Church, the same Patron obtained a promise of preferment in that way of life (u). In the latter end of the year 1689, Sir William went back to Moor-Park (w), with his companion. Soon after this, a bill was brought into Parliament for triennial elections, against which the King was very averse, by the advice, as is said, of some people who had persuaded the Earl of Portland, that King Charles I. lost his Crown and Life by consenting to such a bill. Upon this occasion, the Earl was dispatched to Moor-Park by his Majesty, for Sir William's advice, who said ther was subsisted by the sons of Godwin in her old age, as she had been before by their father and their uncles with such liberality, that she declared herself not only happy, but rich.

[F] Mr George St Ashe.] It happened a little unluckily for our young student, who had no turn to philosophical studies, that he was put under a tutor whose particular talents lay that way. Mr St Ashe, not unacquainted with polite letters, yet was particularly fond of the mathematics, and a great promoter of that science, the study of which he not only introduced and encouraged in the college or university, being professor of it there, but he had likewise a considerable share in erecting a philosophical society in the city whilst Swift was his pupil (16).

[G] Logic and metaphysics were much disregarded by him.] Lord Orrery (17) says, that he was little acquainted with the mathematics, and never considered the science but as an object of ridicule. But the Author of the Observations (18) affirms, that he had acquired considerable mathematical knowledge, and that he had seen him more than once undertake to solve an algebraic problem by arithmetic. It is very possible, that the same degree of mathematical knowledge might be meant by the words little and considerable, according to the different conceptions of these two writers of that knowledge or science in general, of which neither of them perhaps knew more, if so much as the Dean himself did.

[H] He took a journey to Leicester.] He constantly made a visit to his mother almost every year as long as she lived. His manner of travelling was very singular. He always went on foot, except the weather was very bad, and then he would sometimes take shelter in a waggon; he chose to dine at obscure alehouses, among pedlars and ostlers, and to lie where he saw written over the door, lodgings for a penny; but he used to bribe the maid with a tester for a single bed and clean sheets (19). The dialect he met with in low life was not only a fund of humour for him, but he seems to have considered himself now as serving his necessary apprenticeship to the obtaining an independent fortune (20). It appears, from all the accounts of his temper, that he was fearful of expences, and undeviatingly observed that rule himself which he prescribed for his friend Gay, to look upon a shilling as a serious thing (21).

much to ſhew him his miſtake, but without effect; and therefore he ſoon after diſpatched Swift to Kenſington with the whole account in writing, to convince the King and the Earl how ill they were informed. Swift, young as he was, yet was well acquainted with the Engliſh hiſtory, and gave the King a compendious account of the matter, which he amplified to the Earl, but the meaſure was at laſt rejected; and thus ended Swift's firſt embaſſy to court ſo much to his diſſatisfaction, that he then declared it was the firſt incident that helped to cure him of his vanity (x). Soon after this, he was ſeized with the return of a diſorder, which he had contracted in Ireland by a ſurfeit upon fruit. This drew him back thither, by the advice of his phyſicians, who hoped that his native air would contribute to the recovery of his health; but he received no benefit from the journey, and therefore in a ſhort time returned to Sir William (y), being ever afterwards ſubject to that giddineſs, which gradually encreaſed, though with irregular intermiſſions, till it terminated in total debility of body and mind. But he was ſtill indefatigable in his ſtudies [I], and by way of exerciſe for his health's ſake, it was his conſtant practice to run up a hill, that was near the houſe, and down again, every two hours (z). About a year after his return from Ireland, he thought it expedient to take his degree of Maſter of Arts at Oxford. With this view, he appears to have written to his uncle, William Swift, to procure and ſend him the teſtimonium of his Batchelor's Degree in the Univerſity of Dublin. With this teſtimonium, which is dated May 3, 1692, he went to Oxford, entered himſelf of Hart-hall, now Hertford-college, and having received many civilities, was admitted ad Eandem on the 14th of June, and took his Maſter's Degree on the 5th of July following [K]. From Oxford he returned again to Moor-Park, where he aſſiſted Sir William Temple to reviſe his works, corrected and improved his Tale of a Tub, and added the digreſſions (aa). From the converſation of Sir William, who was minutely acquainted with all the intricacies of Party, and the ſecrets of State, during the reigns of King Charles and King James the Second, Swift greatly encreaſed his political knowledge. But having long ſuſpected his Patron of neglecting to provide for him, merely that he might keep him in his family, he at length reſented it ſo warmly, that in the year 1694 a quarrel enſued, and they parted. Sir William having offered to make him his Deputy, as Maſter of the Rolls in Ireland, which he refuſed with this reply, that ſince he had now an opportunity of living without being driven into the Church for a ſupport, a ſcruple which had hitherto kept him out of it, he was determined to go into Ireland and take orders (bb). Accordingly, upon Lord Capel's appointment to be Lord Deputy of that Kingdom, in 1695, Sir William gave him a recommendation to his Lordſhip (cc), who collated him to the Prebend of Kilroot, in the dioceſe of Conner, a northern diſtrict, worth about a hundred pounds a year. But Sir William, who had been uſed to the converſation of Swift, ſoon found that he could not be content to live without it, he therefore urged him to reſign his Prebend in favour of a friend, and promiſed to obtain

[I] He was indefatigable in his ſtudies.] By what books theſe ſtudies were principally directed, is not certainly known; but ſeveral copious extracts from Cyprian, Irenæus, Sleidan's commentaries, and Padre Paulo's hiſtory of the council of Trent, were found among his papers, which appear by memorandums in his own hand writing to have been made while he lived with Sir William Temple (22).

[K] He proceeded A. M. in 1692.] To prepare for this degree, he firſt wrote to his uncle, William Swift, then at Dublin, to procure and ſend him a teſtimonium of his batchelor's degree from that college (23). Nothing but the abſolute neceſſity of it could have forced him to take this ſtep. The diſgrace couched in the words ſpeciali gratia ſtuck ſtill in his ſtomach, nor did he digeſt it well ever after. In a letter, dated November 26, 1725, he writes to Mr Pope: 'I deſire you and all my 'friends would take eſpecial care that my diſaffection 'to the world may not be imputed to my age; for I 'have credible witneſſes ready to depoſe, that it has 'never varied from the twenty-firſt to the forty-eighth 'year of my life (24). Hercules (ſays Lord Orrery 'upon the occaſion) found himſelf ſet aſide for want 'of ſtrength; or, if admitted among the wreſtlers, admitted only by favour and indulgence; yet ſtill he 'muſt be conſcious that he was Hercules (25).' Our Author was ſtrongly affected with any diſappointments, and retained a laſting ſenſibility of them. 'I remember, (ſays he to Lord Bolingbroke in the year 1729) 'when I was a little boy, I felt a great fiſh at the end 'of my line, which I drew up almoſt on the ground, 'but it dropt in, and the diſappointment vexes me to 'this very day; and I believe it was the type of all 'my future diſappointments (26).' However, pungent and laſting as was his reſentment of the rebukes he met with at Dublin, it ſeems to be ſuſpended for a while by the contrary treatment he found at Oxford. In a letter to his uncle William, dated at Moor-Park, Nov. 29, 1692, he writes thus:

'Sir,

'My ſiſter told me you was pleaſed, when ſhe came 'here, to wonder I did ſo ſeldom write to you, I '(*) been ſo kind to impute it neither to ill 'mann reſpect. I always 'thought that ſufficient from me, who have always been but too troubleſome to you: beſides your 'averſion to impertinence, and, God knows, ſo very 'private a life as mine, can furniſh a letter with little 'elſe; for I often am two or three months without 'ſeeing any body beſides the family, and now my ſiſter 'is gone, I am likely to be more ſolitary than before. 'I am ſtill to thank you for your care in my TESTIMONIUM, and it was to very good purpoſe, for I never 'was more ſatisfied than in the behaviour of the Univerſity of Oxford to me. I had all the civilities I could 'wiſh for, and ſo many favours, that I am 'aſhamed to have been more obliged in a few weeks 'to ſtrangers, than ever I was in ſeven years to Dublin 'College. I am not to take orders till the King gives 'me a Prebendary: and Sir William Temple, though 'he promiſes me the certainty of it, yet is leſs forward than I could wiſh; becauſe, I ſuppoſe, he believes I ſhall leave him, and upon ſome accounts he 'thinks me a little neceſſary to him 'If I were entertainment, or of doing 'you any ſatisfaction by my letters, I ſhould be very 'glad to perform it that way, as I am bound to do it 'by all others. I am ſorry my fortune ſhould fling me 'ſo far from the beſt of my Relations; but I hope I 'ſhall have the happineſs to ſee you ſome time or other. 'Pray my humble ſervice to my good Aunt, and the 'reſt of my Relations, if you pleaſe (27).'

Both Lord Orrery and Mr Deane Swift are of opinion, that the civilities which he received at Oxford proceeded from a miſunderſtanding of the phraſe ſpeciali gratia, which was there ſuppoſed to be a compliment paid to uncommon merit (28); and the ſame is confirmed by our Author himſelf; yet all this evidence does not ſatisfy Mr Hawkeſworth, who obſerves that theſe words are not inſerted in the congregation-book at Oxford (29), and not to have inſerted them there, when they were thought a compliment, would have been an affront: it is therefore probable, continues this writer, that by the influence of Swift's tain preferment for him in England, if he would return [L]. Swift, without any difficulty, consented; and Sir William was so much pleased with this act of kindness, that during the remainder of his life, which was about four years, his behaviour was such, as produced the utmost harmony between them: Swift, as a testimony of his friendship and esteem, wrote The Battle of the Books, of which Sir William is the Hero (dd); and Sir William, when he died, left him a pecuniary legacy, and his posthumous works [M].

Having

Swift's uncle, they were omitted in the copy, which he procured and sent, especially as some such favour seems to be intimated in the words put into Italics of Swift's letter to him, above cited (30). But these words will by no means warrant such a construction against the express testimony of Swift himself, which is but poorly evaded by saying, that though the civilities which he received at Oxford might indeed, according to the remark of Lord Orrery, proceed from his known connexion with Sir William Temple; yet Swift might reasonably impute them, also, to the suppression of a reproach, against which there was good reason to fear this connexion would not have supported him; that it is not strange that Swift, after his reputation was established, should, while he was sporting with this incident in the gaiety of his heart, pretend a mistake, which never happened; or that what he meant as a jest upon the University, should be seriously remembered as an event of his life. However, in justice to this Vindicator, let it be recorded, that he has pointed out a manifest slip in Lord Orrery (31), in saying, that Swift, upon his disgrace at Dublin, resolved to pursue his studies at Oxford, where he almost constantly resided during three years, and was avowedly supported by Sir William Temple; whereas, the contrary is incontestably true, since there are not quite two months between the date of his testimonium and his taking his Master's Degree, not to mention that passage in the letter to his uncle, where he says, I am ashamed to be more obliged in a few weeks to strangers, than in seven years to Dublin College. This remark is farther supported, by observing that Swift went to that College at the age of fourteen, in 1681; continued there seven years as appears by his letter, so that he did not leave Ireland till 1688: he was some months with his mother before he went to Sir William, and two years with him before he went to Ireland for his health, which must therefore be in 1691; he returned from Ireland, and continued sometime longer with Sir William before he went to Oxford, which must therefore be in 1692, and in that year he took his Degree. The fact therefore (continues this Vindicator) which, Lord Orrery says, was immediately construed, to favour an opinion that Swift was Sir William's natural son, appears never to have happened (32).

(32) Hawkesworth, p. 6, and note *.

[L] If he would return to Ireland.] This appears by a letter from Swift's sister, then in Ireland, to her cousin Deane in Portugal. 'Sir William Temple, says she, was 'so fond of him, that he made him give up his living 'in this country, and promised to get him one in Eng- 'land (33).'

(33) Deane Swift's Account, p. 66.

[M] He left a pecuniary legacy, and his posthumous works.] One of the reasons produced in support of the opinion, that he was a natural son of Sir William, was, that this supposed Father had given him such marks of his bounty, as it is not likely he should bestow upon a person to whom he was not so related. How far this bounty extended, and what were the favours bestowed by Sir William, cannot certainly be known; that pretended one of his supporting Swift three years at Oxford, has been shewn to be a great mistake. And it is certain, Swift never acknowledged any besides those which have given occasion for the present remark; and we need not say, that the acknowledged relation between Swift's mother and Sir William's Lady, is sufficient to account for even much greater than those. In short, we have a letter from our Author to Lord Palmerston, nephew and heir to Sir William Temple's family and estate, which is decisive in the point. It is wrote with great spirit, and will well reward the reader's attention in perusing it; we shall therefore present him with a transcript.

The original is endorsed, 'An Answer to Lord Pal- 'merston's civil polite letter,' and runs thus:

'My Lord, Jan. 31, 1735-6.

'I desire you will give yourself the last trouble I 'shall ever put you to. I do entirely acquit you of any 'injury or injustice done to Mr Curtis (34), and if you 'had read that passage in my letter a second time, you 'could not possibly have so ill understood me. The 'injury and injustice the young man received, were 'from those, who, claiming a title to his chambers, 'took away his key; and reviled and threatened to 'beat him, with a great deal of the like monstrous 'conduct: whereupon, at his request, I laid the case 'before you (35), as it appeared to me. And it would 'have been very strange, if on account of a trifle, and 'a person for whom I have no concern further than as 'he was once employed by me on the character he 'bears of piety and learning, I should charge you with 'injury and injustice to him, when I know from himself 'and Mr Reading, that you were not answerable for 'either.

(34) A resident Master in Trinity-college, Dublin, whom the Author made one of the Posts of minor canons of St Patrick's Cathedral.

(35) This Lord, who was nephew to Sir W. Temple, had a right to bestow two handsome chambers in the College of Dublin, upon such students as he and his heirs should think proper, on account of the benefactions of the family towards the College buildings.

'As you state the case of tenant at will, I fully 'agree, that no law can compel you; but law was not 'at all in my thoughts.

'Now, my Lord, if what I writ of injury and injustice 'were wholly applied, in plain terms, to one or two of 'the College here, whose names were below my re- 'membrance, you will consider how I could deserve 'an answer in every line full of foul insinuations, open 'reproaches, jesting flirts and contumelious terms; and 'what title you claim to give me such treatment. I 'own my obligation to Sir William Temple for re- 'commending me to the late King, although without 'success; and for his choice of me to take care of his 'posthumous writings [illegible] will not charge 'my being in his family [illegible] obligation. For I was 'educated to little purpose, if I had chosen his 'house on any other motives, than the benefit of his 'conversation and advice, and the opportunity of pur- 'suing my studies. For being born to no fortune, I 'was at his death as much to seek it as ever, and per- 'haps you will allow that I was of some use to him. 'This I will venture to say, that in the time when I 'had some little credit, I did fifty times more for fifty 'people, from whom I never received the least service 'or assistance; yet I should not be pleased to hear a 'relation of mine reproaching them with ingratitude, 'though many of them well deserve it. For, thanks 'to party, I have met in both Kingdoms with ingrati- 'tude enough.

'If I have been ill informed, you have not been 'much better, that I declared no great regard to your 'family; for so you express yourself: I never had oc- 'casion or opportunity to make use of any such words. 'The last time I saw you in London, was the last in- 'tercourse that I remember to have had with your fa- 'mily. But having always trusted to my own inno- 'cence, I was never inquisitive to know my accusers. 'When I mentioned my loss of interest with you, I did 'it with concern: and I had no resentment; because 'I supposed it only to arise from different sentiments in 'public matters.

'My Lord, if my letter were polite, it was against 'my intention, and I intreat your pardon for it. If I 'have wit, I will keep it to shew when I am angry; 'which at present I am not, because although nothing 'can excuse those intemperate words your pen hath let 'fall, yet I shall give allowance to a hasty person, hur- 'ried on by mistake beyond all rules of decency. If 'a first Minister of State had used me as you have 'done, he should have heard from me in another style; 'because, in that case, retaliating would be thought a 'mark of courage. But as your Lordship is not in a 'situation to do me good, nor, I am sure, of a dispo- 'sition to do me mischief; so I should lose the merit of 'being bold, because I incurred no danger. In this 'point alone we are exactly equal, but in wit and 'politeness I am as ready to yield to you, as in titles 'and estate.

'I have found out one secret, that although you 'call me a great wit, you don't think me so, other- 'wise you would have been cautious to have writ me 'such a letter.

'You conclude with saying, you are ready to ask 'pardon, where you have offended. Of this I acquit 'you, because I have not taken the offence; but whe- 'ther you will acquit yourself, must be left to your 'conscience and honour.

'I have formerly, upon occasions, been your hum- 'ble servant in Ireland, and should not refuse to be so 'still; but you have so useful and excellent a friend in Having paid the laſt duties to his Patron, he removed to London, where he took the firſt opportunity of preſenting a petition to the King for the firſt vacant Prebend of Canterbury or Weſtminſter, for which the Royal Promiſe had been obtained by his late Benefactor; and to facilitate the ſucceſs of this application, he dedicated two Volumes of Sir William's letters to his Majeſty, which were publiſhed by him not long after. But both theſe addreſſes were intirely neglected; nor did the King take any the leaſt notice of him after Sir William Temple's death. Under this diſappointment, he accepted of an invitation from the Earl of Berkley (appointed one of the Lord's Juſtices in Ireland) (ee) to attend him in the character of his Chaplain, to which his Lordſhip alſo added the poſt of his private Secretary; but he was diveſted of this laſt office ſoon after their arrival at Dublin, by the inſinuations of one Buſh (ff), another of his Lordſhip's attendants, who ſucceeded him. This diſappointment was ſoon followed by another: It happened that the Deanery of Derry became vacant; it was the Earl of Berkley's turn to diſpoſe of it, and he intended it for his Chaplain; but, upon an application from the Biſhop of the Dioceſe, his Lordſhip was diverted from that deſign, and inſtead thereof, gave him the two Livings of Laracor and Rathbeggin, in the Dioceſe of Meath, which, though worth about two hundred and ſixty pounds per ann. [N] The two Livings of Laracor and Rathbeggin, not half the value of the Deanery.] As Swift had refuſed a commiſſion under King William, and a ſecular employment under Sir William Temple (37), it appears that his attachment to an eccleſiaſtical life, however early, and however ſtrong, was not the effect of temporary views, but of zeal for the ſucceſs of the great work, in which he was about to engage; and a conſciouſneſs of his own ability to acquit himſelf with advantage. That religious purpoſes were at this time predominant in his mind, he uſed frequently to declare; he hoped, he ſaid, that by diligent and conſtant application, he ſhould ſo far excel, that the Sexton might ſometimes be aſked on a Sunday morning, 'Pray does the Doctor 'preach to day?' And when he went to reſide at Laracor, he gave public notice that he would read prayers on Wedneſdays, and Fridays; a labour which he would not have brought upon himſelf, if he had been principally concerned about the value of his dues, which had been long before cuſtomarily paid for much leſs ſervice (38). The duties of the Church, which he thus rendered more frequent, he performed with the utmoſt punctuality, and the moſt rational devotion; he was indeed devout not only in his public and ſolemn addreſſes to God, but in that tranſient act of adoration, which is called ſaying grace, and which often conſiſts only in a mutter and a bow, in which the ſpeaker appears to compliment the company, and the company each other: Swift always uſed the feweſt words that could be uttered on the occaſion, but he pronounced them with an emphaſis and fervour, which every one around him ſaw and felt, and with his hands claſped in each other and lifted to his breaſt (39). An example worthy to be followed by other wits, in this act of religious decorum.

(39) Hawkeſworth, p. 8, 9.

Yet Swift, with all this piety in his heart, could not reſiſt the temptations to indulge the peculiarity of his humour, when an opportunity offered, whatever might be the impropriety of time and place. On the firſt Wedneſday after he had ſummoned his congregation at Laracor, he aſcended his deſk, and, having ſat ſome time with no other auditor than his clerk Roger, he roſe up, and, with a compoſure and gravity that upon this occaſion was irreſiſtibly ridiculous, he began with one of the introductory ſentences from Scripture, and proceeded with the like compoſure, 'Dearly beloved 'Roger, The Scripture moveth you and me in ſundry 'places,' and ſo went regularly through the whole ſervice (40). This inſtance of his levity, it muſt be owned, is ſufficient to clear Dr King, then Biſhop of Derry, from any particular ill-will to him, in trying to prevent his promotion to that deanery. His Lordſhip indeed intreated the Lords Juſtices with great earneſtneſs, that the deanery might be given to ſome grave elderly divine, rather than to ſo young a man; but it was becauſe the ſituation of Derry being in the midſt of Preſbyterians, 'I ſhould be glad, ſays the Biſhop, of a clergyman who 'could be of aſſiſtance to me. I have no objection to 'Mr Swift: I know him to be a ſprightly ingenious 'young man; but, inſtead of reſiding, I dare ſay he will 'be eternally flying backwards and forwards to London; 'and therefore I intreat that he may be provided for in 'ſome other place.' Swift was accordingly ſet aſide for youth: but, as if his ſtars had deſtined him to a parallel revenge, he lived to ſee the Biſhop of Derry afterwards ſet aſide on account of age. That prelate had been Archbiſhop of Dublin many years, and been long celebrated for his wit and learning, when Dr Lindſay, the primate of Ireland, died. Upon his death, Archbiſhop King immediately made claim to the primacy, as a preferment to which he had a right from his ſtation in the ſee of Dublin, and from his acknowledged character in the church: neither of theſe pretenſions were prevalent; he was looked upon as too far advanced in years to be removed: the reaſon alledged was as mortifying as the refuſal itſelf: but the Archbiſhop had no opportunity of ſhewing his reſentment, except to the new primate, Dr Bolton, whom he received at his own houſe, and in his dining parlour, without riſing from his chair, and to whom he made an apology, by ſaying in his uſual ſtrain of wit, and his uſual ſneering countenance, 'My 'Lord, I am certain your Grace will forgive me, be-'cauſe you know I am too old to riſe (41).' Our regard to impartiality will not ſuffer this remark to conclude, without taking notice of another mortification which our divine met with this year in the marriage of his ſiſter. She happened to yoke herſelf with a man in trade, 'an unpardonable offence, ſays Lord Orrery (42), in 'his eye.' He ſaw in it a ſtumbling-block in the very way of his ambition: his own experience had already furniſhed ſome; and he muſt have obſerved more inſtances, where very fair promiſing hopes had been nipped in the bud by very weak pretences. All the faculties of his ſoul were extremely quick of apprehenſion: he therefore grew even outrageous at the thoughts of being brother-in-law to a tradeſman. It availed nothing that his fortune, character, and ſituation, were eſteemed by all her other friends ſuitable in every reſpect, and that the match was concluded with the conſent and approbation of her uncles, and all the reſt of her relations. It was done utterly againſt his will, and he refuſed all reconciliation with her. In theſe circumſtances recourſe was had to his mother, who, from a tender regard for the happineſs of her children, came over to Ireland under the ſtrongeſt hopes of pacifying his anger, having, in every other inſtance, found him a dutiful and an obedient ſon. But in this he was not to be conquered. He was deaf even to the intreaties of a parent whom he ſo much honoured; and ſhe returned to Leiceſter, leaving him in this point abſolutely inflexible. While this incident was freſh in my mind, I took up the ſecond volume of the Tatler, and, turning over the hiſtory of Jenny Diſtaff, felt the delight thoſe papers had formerly given me greatly heightened: I had conſidered them before as prodigious efforts of a moſt ſurprizing wit and humour, brats of a moſt uncommonly turned brain; but now they ſeemed to be the dictates of the author's heart (*). Mr Pope ſomewhere tells him (43), that he had a deſperate hand at daſhing out a character by great ſtrokes. Here we diſcover the true ſource of that peculiar talent, ſi vis me flere dolendum eſt primum tibi. Swift's real dolor on this ſubject we ſee was as much ſtronger than that of ordinary men, as his deſcriptions are more ſtriking than thoſe of any other genius. He wrote many perſonal ſatires, which Lord Orrery thinks were drawn from him by particular provocations; and inſtances in Dryden, who, he imagines, had ſome way or other offended our Author; otherwiſe he did not amount to half the value of the Deanery. However, upon this preferment, he went to England and took his degree of Doctor of Divinity (gg). He alſo made uſe of this opportunity of ſhewing his talents to the public, by commencing Author in print [O]. The ſubject was political, and though his firſt production, was univerſally allowed to be a maſter-piece, and he laid thereby the firſt ſtone of his ſubſequent promotion. This done, reſerving for the preſent to return to his Living at Laracor, he invited to Ireland a Lady, whom he has celebrated by the name of Stella. With this Lady he became acquainted while he lived with Sir William Temple; ſhe was the daughter of his Steward, whoſe name was Johnſon; and Sir William, by his Will, left her a thouſand pounds, in conſideration of her father's faithful ſervices. At the death of Sir William, which happened in 1699, ſhe was in the ſixteenth year of her age, and it was about two years afterwards, that at Swift's invitation, ſhe left England, accompanied by Mrs Dingley, a Lady who was fifteen years older, and whoſe whole fortune, though ſhe was related to Sir William, was no more than an annuity of twenty ſeven pounds (*). Whether the Doctor at this time deſired the company of Stella as a wife, or a friend, is not certain (†); but whatever was his attachment, every poſſible precaution was taken by him to prevent ſcandal; they never lived in the ſame houſe; when he was abſent, Mrs Johnſon and her friend reſided at the parſonage; when he returned, they removed either to the houſe of Dr Raymond, Vicar of Trim, a gentleman of great hoſpitality, and Swift's intimate friend, or to a lodging provided for them in the neighbourhood; nor were they ever known to meet but in the preſence of a third perſon. However, this beloved companion, dear as ſhe was to him, had not power to charm him into a conſtant reſidence upon his cures. He made frequent excurſions both to Dublin and London, while Mrs Johnſon was buried in ſolitude and obſcurity. She was known only to a few of Swift's moſt intimate acquaintance, and had no female companion except Mrs Dingley (hh). In the mean time, theſe long abſences from his cures, during which he ſeldom, if ever, appeared in the pulpit, were manifeſtly inconſiſtent with his former declared purpoſe to excel as a Preacher. But he could not bear the thoughts of being buried alive in the North of Ireland, and was ſollicitous to be near the Court (where he was well received by the principal perſons of all parties) in the view of obtaining a more deſirable ſituation in the Church of England, and had certainly ſucceeded to the height of his wiſhes, had not he unluckily barred himſelf out by publiſhing his Tale of a Tub in 1705 [P]. The drift of this unparalleled

(†) The reaſon given by the ladies for their removal, was the high rate of intereſt, and the cheapneſs of proviſions in Ireland; but other reaſon's were ſuſpected by Mr Thomas Swift, Rector of Puttenham, who, in a letter wrote a few years afterwards, enquires whether Jonathan was married, and whether he had been able to reſiſt the charms of both thoſe gentlewomen, who marched from Moor-Park to Dublin with a reſolution to engage him. he would have eſcaped his laſh in The Tale of a Tub and The Battle of the Books (44).

[O] He commenced Author.] The piece is intituled, A diſcourſe upon the conteſts and diſſentions between the nobles and commons in Athens and Rome. The cauſa προλαμβλικη, as the ſchools term it, of Swift's becoming an author, he has himſelf given in the following words: 'I will tell you [Pope] that all my endeavours from a 'boy to diſtinguiſh myſelf were only for want of a 'great title and fortune, that I might be uſed like a 'Lord, by thoſe who have an opinion of my parts, whe-'ther right or wrong, it is no great matter; and ſo the 'reputation of great learning does the office of a blue 'ribbon, or of a coach and ſix horſes (45).' The company and converſation of Sir William Temple turned his thoughts upon politics, and he was pleaſed with the ſubject. His reading had always lain that way, he had a capacity equal to any undertaking, and was determined in his choice by the particular juncture of affairs at that time, and would not ſlip the opportunity of puſhing his fortune by an artful addreſs to ſome of the moſt conſiderable perſonages then upon the ſtage of the public, who had been lately impeached of high crimes and miſdemeanours. Portland, Somers, Orford, and Halifax, were all great men, and the three laſt of remarkable abilities and experience; and we are aſſured by Lord Orrery, that Lord Somers was the particular friend of our Doctor (46); and he himſelf has informed us, that he uſed to meet Mr Addiſon at Lord Halifax's (47). The characters of theſe four great Lords are deſcribed under Athenian names: Phocion is Portland, Ariſtides Lord Somers, Themiſtocles the Earl of Orford, and Pericles Lord Halifax. Its general purport is to damp the warmth of the Commons, by ſhewing, that the meaſures they purſued had a direct tendency to bring on that tyranny which they profeſſed to oppoſe. I believe Lord Orrery's remark will hardly be queſtioned, that, in parallels of this ſort, it is not poſſible for every circumſtance to tally with the utmoſt exactneſs; but the whole treatiſe is full of hiſtorical knowledge and excellent reflections. It is not mixed with any improper ſallies of wit, or any light airs of humour; and, in point of ſtyle and learning, is equal, if not ſuperior, to any of his political works. Thus he did not, as is the ordinary way, creep ſlowly into fame, but burſt out at once into perfection; and from this time he continued, in various branches of writing, to ſurprize and raviſh all hearts, from the prince to the beggar, with ſtrokes of initimable wit and humour, delivered in an unexampled perſpicuity of ſtyle.

(47) Letter IV. in Swift's letters, Dublin edition.

[P] A Tale of a Tub in 1704.] Scarce any book ever made ſo much noiſe in the world as this. It was never abſolutely owned by the Dean; yet aut Eraſmus eſt aut Diaboli (48). Thus writes Lord Orrery, who ſeems to have known nothing of that copy of the edition in 1710, which was reviſed by the Dean a ſhort time before his underſtanding was impaired. This corrected copy was lately in the hands of Mr Deane Swift, and the corrections are inſerted in the edition of his works in 1750 (49). His Lordſhip however very juſtly obſerves, that, though the Tale of a Tub be one of Swift's earlieſt performances, yet it has never been excelled in wit and ſpirit by his own or any other pen. Several cenſures were paſſed upon it; and he himſelf has told us, that he loſt an Engliſh biſhopric thereby; and relates the ſtory of Archbiſhop Sharp and the Dutcheſs of Marlborough objecting his want of Chriſtianity, as abovementioned. However that be, it is certain he had other powerful enemies on that account. In the debates in the Houſe of Lords upon the ſchiſm bill in 1714, the Earl of Nottingham (‡), ſpeaking againſt that part of the bill which enacted that any perſon, who ſhould keep any public or private ſchool, or inſtruct any youth as Tutor, ſhould have a licence of the reſpective Archbiſhop or Biſhop of the place, &c. expreſſed himſelf in theſe terms: 'My Lords, I have 'many children; I know not whether God Almighty 'will vouchſafe to let me live to give them the educa-'tion I could wiſh they had; therefore, my Lords, I own 'I tremble when I think, that a certain Divine [mean-'ing Dr Swift] is in a fair way of being a Biſhop, and 'may one day give licenſes to thoſe who ſhall be in-'truſted with the education of youth (50).' Lord Orrery imputes this diſappointment to his own untractable ſpirit, which made even his friends with him promoted at a diſtance: and though he allows the moſt material cenſures that paſſed upon his book, were thoſe which reflected upon the Author in the character of a clergyman and a Chriſtian, yet he is very hearty in his vindication, and imputes theſe aſperſions to the melancholy temper of his accuſers. 'Can we wonder then, ſays 'he, if a book, compoſed with all the force of wit 'and humour, in deriſion of ſacerdotal tyranny, in ridi-'cule of grave hypocriſy, and in contempt of phlegma-'tic ſtiffneſs, ſhould be wilfully miſconſtrued by ſome 'perſons, and ignorantly miſtaken by others as a farceſm 'and reflection upon the whole Chriſtian church (51).' He allows that Swift's ungovernable ſpirit of irony has ſometimes carried him into very unwarrantable flights of wit. 'I have, continues he, remarked ſuch paſſages 'with a moſt unwilling eye; but, let my affections of 'friendunparalleled piece of humour was miſtaken, and when a Biſhopric was intended for [illegible] the Queen, her Majeſty was prevailed upon to give it to another by the perſuaſions [illegible] Dutcheſs of Marlborough, backed by Dr John Sharp, Archbiſhop of York, in wh[illegible] Tale of a Tub had cauſed a ſuſpicion of the Author's Chriſtianity. The Doctor ha[illegible] yet engaged particularly with either party, Whig or Tory. He was equally acq[illegible] and indifferently conſorted, with Pope and Addiſon, Somers and St John. But th[illegible] dent determined the future colour of his politics. A perſecution from the former, una[illegible] bly threw him into the hands of the latter; and as he never did any thing by halv[illegible] public was preſently made ſenſible of his change by The Sentiments of a Church of E[illegible] Man, with reſpect to Religion and Government, which came out upon the change of the Miniſtry in 1708, and ſome other pieces of the ſame ſpirit in defence of his religious principles [Q]. All theſe were eagerly bought up, and much admired; and he became the Idol of the people in general, by his Predictions for the Year 1708, publiſhed under the name of Iſaac Bickerſtaff, Eſq; inſomuch that Mr (afterwards Sir Richard) Steele aſſumed the ſame feigned name, and the real aſſiſtance of the ſame perſon, as the beſt expedient to recommend his Tatlers to the world (ii). But our Author had not been long engaged in the ſupport of this univerſally admired Paper, before a new ſcene opened to him. In 1710, being then in England, he was empowered by his Grace the Lord Primate of Ireland to ſollicit the Queen for an exonoration of the Clergy of Ireland from paying the twentieth parts, and firſt fruits [R]. Upon this occaſion, his acquaintance commenced with Mr Harley,

(ii) See Sir Richard's Article.

' friendſhip be ever ſo great, my paternal affection is ' ſtill greater; and I will purſue candor even with an ' aking heart, when the purſuit of it may tend to your ' advantage or inſtruction. In the ſtile of truth therefore, ' I muſt ſtill look upon the Tale of a Tub as no intended ' inſult againſt Chriſtianity, but as a ſatire againſt the ' wild errors of the church of Rome, the ſlow and in- ' complete reformation of the Lutherans, and the abſurd ' and affected zeal of the Preſbyterians.' He then proceeds to give particular inſtances of this aſſertion; and, having blamed the keenneſs of his ſatire againſt Mr Dryden, whom he calls the greateſt, though the leaſt proſperous, of our Engliſh poets, he concludes thus. ' But although our ſatirical author now and then ' may have indulged himſelf in ſome perſonal animoſi- ' ties, or may have taken freedoms not ſo perfectly ' conſiſtent with that ſolemn decency which is required ' from a clergyman; yet, throughout the whole piece, ' there is a vein of ridicule and good humour that ' laughs pedantry and affectation into the loweſt degree ' of contempt, and expoſes the characters of Peter and ' Jack in ſuch a manner as never will be forgiven, and ' never can be anſwered.' The freedoms here mentioned allude to that Apology for the Author, which is the beſt, and was written by himſelf. It is dated Jan. 3, 1709, from which time it has been conſtantly prefixed to the work. In this apology the Doctor ingenuouſly acknowledges, that there are ſeveral youthful ſallies in it, which from the grave and the wiſe may deſerve a rebuke; but adds, that he will forfeit his life, if any one opinion can be fairly deduced from it, which is contrary to religion or morality.

[Q] He publiſhed ſeveral other pieces in defence of his religious principles.] The titles of theſe are; (1.) An Argument to prove that the aboliſhing of Chriſtianity in England may, as things now ſtand, be attended with ſome inconveniencies, and perhaps not produce thoſe many good effects propoſed thereby, in 1708. (2.) A Project for the advancement of religion and the reformation of manners. By a perſon of quality. Addreſſed to the Counteſs of Berkley in 1709. This moſt excellent Lady was Elizabeth, the daughter of Baptiſt Noel, Viſcount Campden, and ſiſter to Edward Earl of Gainſborough. (3.) A Letter from a member of the Houſe of Commons in Ireland to a member of the Houſe of Commons in England concerning the ſacramental teſt in 1708. This was reprinted in Ireland in 1735, when the attempt to repeal the ſacramental teſt was revived. There was an explanatory advertiſement prefixed, which is ſaid by Lord Orrery (52) to have been dictated or ſtrictly reviſed by the Dean himſelf; but Mr Hawkeſworth obſerves, there are in it ſome inaccuracies which may well be thought ſufficient to deſtroy its authenticity: that which in the firſt paragraph is called the following treatiſe, is afterwards ſaid to be an extract of a diſcourſe; and it is immediately added, that this extract is the whole, except ſome paſſages of no conſequence (53). Whether theſe inſtances are ſufficient to prove his point againſt his Lordſhip's remark, will be eaſily determined by the reader.

[R] He was empowered to ſollicit a diſcharge, &c.] It would be an injury to Dr Swift's juſt fame to conceal from the reader the following letters, which paſſed between him and the Archbiſhop of Dublin on this occaſion. The firſt is from him to that Archbiſhop, dated at London, Oct. 10, 1710, and runs thus:

' My Lord,

' I had the honour of your Grace's letter of Sept. 16, ' but I was in no pain to acknowledge it, nor ſhall be ' at any other time, unleſs I have ſomething that I think ' worth troubling you with; becauſe I know how much ' an inſignificant letter is worſe than none at all. I had ' likewiſe your memorial (54), &c. in another packet. ' I ſhould have been glad the Biſhops had been here; ' although I take Biſhops to be the worſt ſollicitors in ' the world, except for themſelves. They cannot give ' themſelves the little trouble of attendance that other ' men are content to ſwallow: elſe I am ſure their two ' Lordſhips (55) might have ſucceeded eaſier than men ' of my level are likely to do.

' As ſoon as I received the packets from your Grace, ' I went to wait upon Mr Harley. I had prepared him ' before by another hand, where he was very intimate; ' and got myſelf repreſented (which I might juſtly do) ' as one extremely ill uſed by the laſt Miniſtry after ' ſome obligations, becauſe I refuſed to go certain ' lengths they would have me. This happened to be ' in ſome ſort Mr Harley's own caſe. He had heard ' very often of me, and received me with the greateſt ' marks of kindneſs and eſteem, as I was whiſpered he ' would; and the more, upon the ill uſage I had met ' with. I ſat with him two hours among company, ' and two hours we were alone; where I told him my ' buſineſs, and gave him the hiſtory of it: which he ' heard as I could wiſh, and declared he would do his ' utmoſt to effect it. I told him the difficulties we met ' with by Lord-Lieutenants and their ſecretaries, who ' would not ſuffer others to ſollicit, and neglected it ' themſelves. He fell in with me intirely, and ſaid ' neither they nor himſelf ſhould have the merit of it, ' but the Queen, to whom he would ſhew my memorial ' with the firſt opportunity, in order, if poſſible, to have ' it done in this interregnum (56). I ſaid the honour ' and merit next to the Queen would be his; that it ' was a great encouragement to the Biſhops that he was ' in the Treaſury, whom they knew to be the chief ad- ' viſer of the Queen to grant the ſame favour in Eng- ' land; that conſequently the honour and merit were ' nothing to him who had done ſo much greater things: ' and that for my part I thought he was obliged to the ' clergy of Ireland for giving him an opportunity of ' gratifying the pleaſure he took in doing good to the ' Church. He took my compliment extremely well, ' and renewed his promiſes. Your Grace will pleaſe to ' know, that, beſides the firſt-fruits, I told him of the ' crown-rents, and ſhewed the nature and value of ' them; but ſaid my opinion was, that the convocation ' had not mentioned them in their petition to the Queen ' delivered to the Lord Wharton (57), with the addreſs, ' becauſe they thought the times would not then bear it; ' but that I looked on myſelf to have a diſcretionary ' power to ſollicit it in ſo favourable a juncture.

' I had two memorials ready, of my own drawing ' up, as ſhort as poſſible, ſhewing the nature of the ' thing, and how long it had been depending, &c. ' One of theſe memorials had a paragraph at the end, ' relating

(56) This did not laſt long after the date of this letter; for the Duke of Ormond was appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in the room of the Lord Wharton on the 19th of October this year. Salmon's Chron. Hiſtory.

Harley, afterwards Earl of Oxford. As ſoon as he had received the Biſhop's letters, inſtructions, and authority, he reſolved to apply to Mr Harley, not only becauſe he was a principal perſon in the Queen's Miniſtry, but becauſe by his intereſt the ſame favour had been granted to the Clergy of England. That he might not wait upon this Miniſter, to whom his name was well known, wholly without recommendation, he got himſelf repreſented as a perſon who had been extremely ill uſed by the laſt Miniſtry, becauſe he would not go certain lengths, which they would have had him; this being in ſome ſort Mr Harley's own caſe. And he received him with the utmoſt kindneſs and reſpect; he ſat with him two

' relating to the crown-rents. I would have given him ' the laſt; but I gave him the other, which he imme- ' diately read, and promiſed to ſecond both with his ' beſt offices to the Queen. As I have placed that ' paragraph in my memorial, it can do no harm, and ' may poſſibly do good. However, I beg your Grace ' to ſay nothing of it; but, if it dieth, let it die in ' ſilence: we muſt take up with what we can get.

' I forget to tell your Grace, that when I ſaid I was ' empowered, &c. he deſired to ſee my powers; and ' then I heartily wiſhed them more ample than they ' were; and I have ſince wondered what ſcruple a num- ' ber of Biſhops could have to empower a clergyman ' to do the church and them a ſervice, without any ' imagination of intereſt for himſelf.

' Mr Harley has invited me to dine with him to day; ' but I ſhall not put him upon this diſcourſe ſo ſoon. ' If he begins it himſelf, I ſhall add it at the bottom ' of this. He ſays Mr Secretary St John deſires to be ' acquainted with me, and that he will bring us to- ' gether. That may be a further help, although I told ' him I had no thoughts of applying to any body but ' himſelf; wherein he differed from me, and deſired I ' would ſpeak to others, if it were but for form; and ' ſeemed to mean as if he would avoid the envy of being ' thought to do ſuch a thing alone. But an old cour- ' tier (an intimate friend) adviſed me ſtill to let him ' know I relied wholly upon his good inclinations and ' credit with the Queen, &c.

' I find I am forced to ſay all this very confuſedly, ' juſt as it lieth in my memory; but perhaps it may ' give your Grace a truer idea how matters are, than ' if I had writ in more order.

' I am, &c.

' Jonathan Swift.'

The Archbiſhop's Anſwer is dated Dublin, Oct. 24, 1710, and is in theſe terms:

' Reverend Sir,

' I thank you for yours of the 10th inſtant, and ſend ' you incloſed a farther power by my Lord Primate (58) ' and me. My Lord is not able to come to town, ' which obliged me to wait on him at Johnſton, and ' hindred the joining of two or three Biſhops in it, ' who are yet in town; but I ſuppoſe our ſigning is ' ſufficient. I went in the morning to wait on his ' Grace, and intended, when he had ſigned it, to have ' applied to other Biſhops: but he was abroad taking ' the air, and I could not get it till it was late, and ' thought it better to ſign and ſend it as it is, than wait ' for another poſt. You may expect, by the next, a ' letter to his Grace of Canterbury, and another to ' the Archbiſhop of York. I apprized them both of ' the buſineſs. The latter, if I remember right, ſpoke ' to her Majeſty about it; I am not ſure that her Ma- ' jeſty remembers what I ſaid on that ſubject; but am ' ſure that ſhe was pleaſed to ſeem ſatisfied with it, and ' to ſcruple only the time; I ſuppoſe not thinking it fit ' to confer the favour ſhe deſigned the Clergy of Ireland ' by the hands it muſt then have paſſed through, but ' ſaid that in the interval of a change, or abſence of a ' chief Governor, it ſhould be done. I hope now is ' the proper time, and that her Majeſty will rather ' follow the dictates of her own bountiful inclinations, ' than the intrigues of cunning covetous Counſellors.

' I thought to have troubled you with a great many ' things; but ſuch a crowd of viſitors have broken in ' upon me before I could lock my gates, that I am ' forced to break off abruptly, recommending you to ' God's care.

' I am, &c.

' William Dublin.'

(58) Dr Narciſſus Marſh.

The incloſed letter, here mentioned, was as follows:

' Sir,

' We directed a letter to the Biſhops of Offory and ' Killaloe laſt Auguſt, deſiring and empowering them ' to ſolicit the affair of our firſt fruits and twentieth ' parts, with her Majeſty; which has depended ſo ' long, notwithſtanding her Majeſty's good intentions, ' and ſeveral promiſes of our chief Governors here, to ' lay our addreſſes before her Majeſty in the beſt man- ' ner. We were then apprehenſive, that thoſe Biſhops ' might return from England before the buſineſs could ' be effected, and therefore we deſired them to concern ' you in it; having ſo good aſſurance of your ability, ' prudence, and fitneſs to proſecute ſuch a matter. ' We find the Biſhops returned before you came to ' London, for which we are very much concerned; ' and judging this the moſt proper time to proſecute it ' with ſucceſs, we intreat you to take the full ma- ' nagement of it into your hands, and do commit the ' care of ſoliciting it to your diligence and prudence; ' deſiring you to let us know from time to time what ' progreſs is made in it. And if any thing farther be ' neceſſary on our part, on your intimations we ſhall ' be ready to do what is reaſonable.

' This, with our prayers for the good ſucceſs of your ' endeavours, is all from

' Yours, &c.

' Narciſſus Armagh,

' William Dublin.'

Upon the Doctor's ſending word, that the Grant was obtained, the Archbiſhop wrote the following letter to him, dated at Dublin, December 16, 1710.

' Sir,

' This is to acknowledge the receipt of yours of the ' 20th paſt, which came not to my hands till Thurſday ' laſt, by reaſon of winds that kept the packets on the ' other ſide.

' I find the matter of our firſt fruits, &c. is talked ' of now. I reckon on nothing certain till her Ma- ' jeſty's letter comes in form: and quære, why ſhould ' not you come, and bring it with you? It would make ' you a very welcome Clergyman to Ireland, and be ' the beſt means to ſatisfy mankind how it was ob- ' tained, although I think that will be out of diſpute. ' I am very well apprized of the diſpatch you gave ' this affair, and well pleaſed that I judged better of ' the perſon fit to be employed, than ſome of my bre- ' thren. But now it is done, as I hope it is effectually, ' they will aſſume as much as their neighbours; which ' I ſhall never contradict.

' Things are taking a new turn here as well as with ' you, and, I am of opinion, by the time you come ' here, few will profeſs themſelves Whigs. The ' greateſt danger I apprehend, and which terrifies me ' more, than perhaps you will be able to imagine, is ' the fury and indiſcretion of ſome of our own people, ' who never had any merit; but by embroiling things, ' they did, and I am afraid will yet do miſchief.

' I heartily recommend you to God's favour,

' And am, &c.

' William Dublin.'

The Grant for exonerating the Clergy of Ireland from paying the twentieth parts, was dated Feb. 7, 1710, as was alſo the other Grant to Narciſſus, Archbiſhop of Armagh; Sir Conſtantine Phipps, Lord High Chancellor of Ireland (59); William, Lord Archbiſhop of Dublin; John, Archbiſhop of Tuam, and others; of the firſt fruits payable out of all eccleſiaſtical benefices in truſt, to be for ever applied towards purchaſing glebes, and building reſidentiary-houſes for poor-endowed vicars. The ſucceſs of which charitable fund hitherto, may be ſeen in a printed pamphlet, containing an account of the firſt fruits of Ireland.

hours in company, and two hours he was with him alone; he not only engaged in the Doctor's immediate buſineſs with the utmoſt zeal, and ſoon after accompliſhed it; but told him he muſt bring him acquainted with Mr St John, invited him to ſtay dinner, charged him to come often, and when the Doctor propoſed attending at his Levee, told him that was no place for friends (kk). The Doctor became acquainted ſoon after with the reſt of the Miniſters, who appear to have courted and careſſed him with an uncommon aſſiduity [S]. And, on his ſide, he ſupported from this time the intereſt of his new friends with all his power in pamphlets, poems, and periodical papers; his intimacy with them was ſo remarkable, that he was thought not only to defend, but in ſome degree to direct their meaſures; and ſuch was his importance in the opinion of the oppoſite party, that many ſpeeches were made againſt him in both Houſes of Parliament; a reward was alſo offered for diſcovering the Author of The Public Spirit of the Whigs [T]. Whatever excellence we poſſeſs, or whatever honours we obtain, the pleaſure which they produce is all relative to ſome particular favourite, with whom we are tenderly connected, either by friendſhip or by love; or, at moſt, it terminates like rays collected by a burning-glaſs in a very ſmall circle, which is ſcarce more than a point, and, like light, becomes ſenſible only by reflexion. Thus Swift, while he was courted and careſſed by thoſe whom others were making intereſt to approach, ſeems to have enjoyed his diſtinction only in proportion as it was participated by Stella; amidſt all the buſineſs, and all the honours that crowded upon him, he wrote every day an account of whatever occurred, (kk) Deane Swift, p. 227. 317.

[S] Courted and careſſed with uncommon aſſiduity.] He dined every Saturday at Mr Harley's, with the Lord Keeper [ſir Simon, afterwards Lord Harcourt], Mr Secretary St John, and Lord Rivers; on that day no other perſon was, for ſome time, admitted; but this ſelect company was at length enlarged to ſixteen, all men of the firſt claſs, Swift included. They dined once a week at the houſes of each other, by rotation, and went under the general denomination of Brothers. This, and many other particulars, which could have been known no other way, are found in his letters to Stella; which, if they may be credited, inconteſtably prove, that he was not only employed, but truſted; and that the myſterious Harley, impenetrably reſerved to all others, was to Swift open and explicit in affairs of the utmoſt moment (60). The reſult of one of their conferences, ſo early as the year 1710, was to this effect: that the Kingdom was as certainly ruined, as a bankrupt merchant; that a peace, whether bad or good, was abſolutely neceſſary; that the confederacy muſt ſoon break, and factions increaſe; and that the Miniſtry was upon too narrow a bottom, and ſtood like an Iſthmus, between the Whigs on one ſide, and the violent Tories on the other; a ſituation in which they could not ſubſiſt. Theſe violent Tories were formed into a Society, called the October Club, of whom Swift ſays, they are about a hundred Parliament Men of the country, who drink October beer at home, and meet every evening at a tavern near the Parliament-Houſe, to drive things on to extremes againſt the Whigs (61). But if Swift thought this party too precipitant, it is certain he thought Lord Oxford too ſlow, and he once told him ſo, in a manner that ſhews both his integrity, and the freedom of his converſation with thoſe who have a preſcriptive right to ſervile flattery: he had received a preſent of a fine tortoiſe-ſhell ſnuff-box, lined with gold, and painted on the inſide of the lid with a view of Venice. This preſent he ſhewed one day to the Treaſurer, who having admired the painting and the workmanſhip, at laſt eſpied a figure ſtudded on the outſide of the bottom, which he thought reſembled a gooſe; whereupon, turning to the Doctor, Jonathan, ſays he, I think they have made a gooſe of thee. Yes, my Lord, anſwers the Doctor, but if your Lordſhip will look a little farther, you will ſee that I am driving a ſnail before me; which indeed happened to be the device. To this the Earl cooly replied, that is ſevere enough, Jonathan; but I deſerve it (62).

(60) This is levelled at Lord Orrery, who maintains that Swift was employed, but not truſted, which indeed is acknowledged by himſelf in his Imitation of Horace's Epiſt. Book I. addreſſed to this myſterious Miniſter; inſerted in Swift's Works, Vol. III. Part I. p. 41. et ſeqq. edit. 1755. 4to.

[T] The public Spirit of the Whigs.] The whole title runs thus: The public Spirit of the Whigs ſet forth in their generous Encouragement of the Author of the CRISIS, with ſome Obſervations on the Seaſonableneſs, Candour, Erudition, and Stile of that Treatiſe, printed for John Morphew, near Stationers Hall, 1714. Of all the pieces wrote by our Author in defence of that Miniſtry, Lord Orrery (63) ſingles out this to ſhew of what importance he was then thought to be. The Scotch members in the preceding ſeſſion, highly incenſed at the malt-tax, which was laid equally that year upon both nations, had remonſtrated againſt it to the Queen (64), and, receiving no ſatisfactory anſwer, carried their complaint before the Houſe of Lords this ſeſſions, and, in the debates upon it, even propoſed to diſſolve the Union. Our Author handles this proceeding with great boldneſs, and no leſs ſeverity, and having laid open the hiſtory of the Union, 'compares the conduct of England 'therein to a perſon of quality that had been prevailed 'upon to marry a woman much his inferior, and without a groat to her fortune. He likewiſe obſerves, 'that the penſions and employments poſſeſſed by the 'natives of that country, then among us, amounted to 'more than the whole body of their nobility ſpent at 'home; and that all the money that was raiſed there 'among the public, was hardly ſufficient to defray their 'civil and military liſts. He alſo ſaid, he could point 'out ſome with great titles, who affected to appear 'very vigorous for diſſolving the Union; though their 'whole revenues before that period would have ill 'maintained a Welſh Juſtice of Peace; and had ſince 'gathered more money than ever any Scotchman 'who had not travelled could form an idea of.' Provoked by this keen ſatire, all the Scotch Lords then in London went in a body, and complained to the Queen of the affront: and, upon the meeting of the next parliament, March 2, 1713, her Majeſty, in her ſpeech, having expreſſed her wiſhes that effectual care had been taken to ſuppreſs ſeditious papers (65), immediately after the Lords had voted an addreſs of thanks for that ſpeech, Lord Wharton, backed by Lord Halifax, in purſuance of that part of it, made a complaint to the Houſe againſt this ſcandalous (ſo he called it) pamphlet; an enquiry into the author, printer, and publiſher, was carried on with uncommon vigour; and when the printer and publiſher, Barber and Morphew, inſiſted upon their not anſwering any queſtion, the anſwer to which might tend to accuſe themſelves, or corroborate the accuſation againſt them, Lord Halifax roſe up, and ſaid, 'They 'had nothing to do either with the printer or publiſher, 'and that it highly concerned the honour of that auguſt 'aſſembly to find out the villain, who was the author 'of that falſe and ſcandalous libel, in order to do the 'Scottiſh nation juſtice.' He further added, 'that there 'were not wanting perſons, who had the honour to ſit 'in that houſe, that were too well acquainted with a 'certain great man's veracity, not to ſuſpect any thing 'in him rather than want of knowledge, ſince it was 'whiſpered about, that he, who wrote the ſame pamphlet had ſaid Grace more than once, and fouled 'many a plate at a nobleman's table not a mile from 'York buildings (66).' Hereupon Lord Oxford proteſted, that he knew nothing of him directly or indirectly. However, in order to conceal him, her Majeſty was prevailed on to take the cognizance of the affair into her own hands in one of her courts at Weſtminſter: and, on the 6th of March following, the Earl of Mar, principal Secretary of State for Scotland, had it in command to acquaint the Lords, that orders had been already given for the proſecution of John Barber, &c. Three days after which, the ſaid Barber and Morphew were, on their petition, enlarged from their confinement. The Lords reſolving at the ſame time on an addreſs to her Majeſty to iſſue out her royal proclamation, with a reward for the diſcovery of the author of the ſaid libel. Accordingly a proclamation was publiſhed the ſame day on which the addreſs was preſented, promiſing a reward of 300l. for ſuch diſcovery, payable by the Lord Treaſurer: notwithſtanding which no diſcovery was made (67).

and ſent her a journal regularly, dated every fortnight, during the whole time of his connexion with Queen Anne's Miniſtry. In the ſummer of 1711, he foreſaw the ruin of this Miniſtry by thoſe miſunderſtandings among themſelves, which at laſt effected it; and it was not only his opinion, but their own, that if they could not carry a peace, they would not be able to keep themſelves out of the Tower, even though they ſhould agree. In order therefore to facilitate this great event, Swift wrote The Conduct of the Allies, a piece which he confeſſes coſt him much pains, and which ſucceeded even beyond his expectation [U]. He continued to exert himſelf with unwearied diligence in the ſervice of the Miniſtry [W], without receiving any gratuity or reward, till the year 1713, when he was offered the Deanery of St Patrick's in Dublin. This was a moſt grievous balk to his views; he had ſet his heart upon a Biſhopric in England, in which he was undoubtedly qualified to make a figure in the Houſe of Lords; but the Earl of Oxford did not think fit to gratify that inclination, probably from a caution to avoid giving ſo great an offence as it muſt have been to the oppoſite party. But with whatever view, or from whatever cauſe the Deanery was offered, he thought proper, conſidering the then precarious ſtate of his friends, to accept it, and immediately croſſed the Channel to take poſſeſſion of his new dignity; but before he had been a fortnight in Ireland, he was urged by a hundred letters to haſten back and reconcile Lord Oxford and Lord Bolingbroke, the conſequences of whoſe miſunderſtanding were juſtly dreaded by their friends (ll). Upon his return, he found their quarrels and coldneſs increaſed, and having predicted their ruin from this very cauſe, he laboured to bring about a reconciliation [X], as that upon which the whole intereſt of the party depended. But all his endeavours proving ineffectual, he went to Oxford by the coach, and thence to the houſe of a friend in Berkſhire, where he continued till the Queen's death, which happened in about ten weeks. While he was at this place, his mind being ſtill buſy for his friends, he wrote a diſcourſe called Free Thoughts upon the preſent State of Affairs, which he thought might be uſeful at that juncture, and ſent it up to London (mm); but ſome difference of opinion happening between him and Lord Bolingbroke, the publication was delayed [Y] till the Queen's death, and then he recalled his copy (nn). A few weeks after (nn) It was afterwards depoſited with the late Alderman Barber, and having been ſince publiſhed, is inſerted among his Works.

[U] The Conduct of the Allies ſucceeded beyond his expectation.] It was publiſhed on the 27th of November, 1711, juſt ten days before the Parliament met; and before the 28th of January, above eleven thouſand were ſold, ſeven editions having been printed in England, and three in Ireland. The Tory Members, in both Houſes, who ſpoke, according to our Author's own account, drew all their arguments from it; and the reſolutions which were printed in the Votes, and which would never have paſſed but for the Conduct of the Allies, were little more than quotations from it (68).

[W] He continued to exert himſelf for the Miniſtry.] Among other things in that cauſe, while he was at Windſor, juſt at the concluſion of the peace at Utrecht, he drew the firſt ſketch of A Hiſtory of the four laſt Years of Queen Anne (69). The work would have been publiſhed ſoon after, if his friends in the Miniſtry had not diſagreed about it, and after the Queen's death he ſpent much time in improving and correcting it (70); to this purpoſe our Author himſelf, in a letter to Mr Pope, dated 10th of January 1721, ſays he had written ſome Memorials of the four laſt years of the Queen's reign, with ſome other informations, which he received as neceſſary materials to qualify him for doing ſomething in an employment, then deſigned for him (meaning the place of Hiſtoriographer,) 'but as it was, continues he, 'at the diſpoſal of a perſon who had not the ſmalleſt 'ſhare of ſteadineſs or ſincerity, I diſdained to accept 'it (71).' Lord Orrery takes notice of this paſſage, but thinks the Doctor flattered himſelf too much in this point. 'At leaſt, ſays his Lordſhip, it is evident that he 'remained without any preferment till the year 1713, 'when he was made Dean of St Patrick's (72).' The noble Author, doubtleſs, had other grounds for his ſuſpicion, than this remark could ſuggeſt, ſince Dr Swift plainly intimates, that the deſign of making him Hiſtoriographer, did not commence till 1714.

[X] He laboured to bring about a reconciliation.] With this view he contrived to bring them to Lord Maſham's at St James's, and Lord and Lady Maſham, being acquainted with his purpoſe, left him alone with them; he then expoſtulated with them both, but to little effect, being only able to engage them to go to Windſor the next day, ſtill hoping, that if he could keep them together, they would come to ſome agreement. Swift ſoon after followed them; but was told by Lord Bolingbroke that his ſcheme had come to nothing; and he had the mortification to obſerve, that they grew more cold to each other every day. In the mean time Lord Oxford's credit grew daily leſs, and the Queen's health viſibly declin'd. Swift however contrived yet once more to meet them at Lord Maſham's, and was again left alone with them; this was the laſt time they ever met, and he ſpoke to them both with great freedom; but at length, deſpairing of his purpoſe, he told them he would retire, for that all was gone. Bolingbroke whiſpered him that he was right, but Oxford ſaid all would do well (73). It is no wonder that the Dean's attempt to reconcile his friends were unſucceſsful, for Bolingbroke declares, that 'he abhorred Ox-'ford to ſuch a degree, that he would rather have 'ſuffered baniſhment or death, than have taken mea-'ſures, in concert with him, to have avoided either (74).' But this he did not think fit to declare then to Swift, who thought the reunion might have been affected, if others, who had more concern and more influence than himſelf, would ſo have acted their parts (75). He communicated a particular account of the matter to Lord Orrery, who ſays it was too intereſting to be yet made public (76).

[Y] His Free Thoughts were ſuppreſſed by Lord Bolingbroke.] Notwithſtanding he lays the fault entirely upon Lord Oxford's reſerve, and backwardneſs in making a thorough change, by diſplacing all the Whigs, and even the Whimſicals (77), which could not but be agreeable to Bolingbroke, yet this Miniſter knew very well, that ſuch a thing was not to be declared openly. But what tranſgreſſed all bounds of prudence is this declaration, That the Elector of Hanover, as heir apparent to the crown, ought to have a chapel at Hanover, where divine ſervice may be performed according to the ritual of the church of England, and frequent it too, as King William, he ſays, did that of the Princeſs Mary before the Revolution. He likewiſe propoſes as neceſſary, to have the clauſe repealed in the act of ſucceſſion, empowering the Elector to nominate any number of regents to be added to the ſeven appointed by the Act, &c. Upon this account Lord Orrery, ſpeaking of this piece, ſays to his ſon, when you read it, digito compeſce labellum (78). Upon the whole, it is evidently wrote in the ſame ſpirit, and many of the obſervations are alſo the ſame with what we find in Lord Bolingbroke's letter to Sir William Wyndham. And, if we may believe our Author himſelf, it was his Lordſhip, and not Oxford, who had the firſt place in his heart. 'It is you, ſays he to 'Bolingbroke, that was my hero; the other, Oxford, 'never was: yet if he were, it was your own fault, 'who taught me to love him, and often vindicated him 'in the beginning of your miniſtry from my accuſa-'tions. But I grant he had the greateſt inequalities 'of any man alive, and his whole ſcene was fifty times 'more a what d'ye call it than yours. For I declare 'yours was uniform; and I wiſh you would ſo order it, 'that the world may be as wiſe as I upon that arti-'cle (79).' But we are told, that the Doctor imagined himſelf a ſubtle diver, who dextrouſly ſhot down into the profoundeſt regions of politics; yet was ſuffered only to after this fatal cataſtrophe, he went back to his ſtation in Ireland, all his connexions with the court being broken, and all his expectations diſappointed. It may indeed be truly ſaid, that his diſappointment was, in a great meaſure, the fruit of his own conduct (oo). It is certain, that during his connexion with thoſe of the higheſt rank, and who in any rank would have been great, he would never ſuffer himſelf to be treated but as an equal, and repulſed every attempt to hold him in dependance, or to keep him at a diſtance, with the utmoſt reſentment and indignation [Z]. As to his political principles, if his own account of them may be believed, he abhorred Whiggiſm only in thoſe who made it conſiſt in damning the Church, reviling the Clergy, abetting the Diſſenters, and ſpeaking contemptibly of Revealed Religion. He always declared himſelf againſt a Popiſh Succeſſor to the Crown, whatever title he might have by proximity of blood; nor did he regard the right line upon any other account than as it was eſtabliſhed by law, and had much weight in the opinions of the people. He was of opinion, that when the grievances ſuffered under the preſent government became greater than thoſe that might probably be expected from changing it by violence, a revolution was juſtifiable; and this he believed to have been the caſe, in that which was brought about by the Prince of Orange. He had a mortal antipathy againſt ſtanding armies in times of peace, and was of opinion, that our liberty could never be placed upon a firm foundation, till the ancient law ſhould be revived, by which our Parliaments were made annual: he abominated the political ſcheme of ſetting up a monied intereſt in oppoſition to the landed, and was an enemy to temporary ſuſpenſions of the Habeas Corpus act (pp); that he was not at any time a bigot to party, and that he did not indiſcriminately transfer his reſentments from principles to perſons, was ſo evident by his conduct, that it was an uſual ſubject of raillery towards him, among the Miniſters, that he never came to them without a Whig in his ſleeve (qq); and though it does not appear that he aſked any thing for himſelf, yet he often preſſed Lord Oxford in favour of Addiſon, Congreve, Rowe, and Steele, with whom, except the laſt, he frequently converſed during all Lord Oxford's Miniſtry, chuſing his friends by their perſonal merit, without examining how far their notions agreed with the politics then in vogue; and in particular, his friendſhip with Mr Addiſon continued inviolate, and with as much kindneſs as when they uſed to meet at Lord Halifax's or Lord Somers's; who were leaders of the oppoſite party [AA]. This to ſound the ſhallows neareſt the ſhore, and was ſcarce admitted to deſcend below the froth at the top. But the ſame pen intimates, that the reaſon was becauſe the deeper bottoms were too muddy for his inſpection (80). However it is evident, that he had no ſuſpicion of any ſuch muddineſs at the bottom, for he declares, that, if he had ſucceeded in reconciling the two great friends, the public intereſt both of church and ſtate would not have been the worſe, nor the proteſtant ſucceſſion endangered: and yet in his conſcience he thought himſelf a partaker in every ill deſign they had againſt the proteſtant ſucceſſion, or the religion and liberties of their country, and continues he can ſay with Cicero, that I ſhould be glad to be included with them in all their actions, tanquam in equo Trojano.

(80) Lord Orrery, Letter V. 11. and XXX. 1.

[Z] He repulſed every attempt to hold him in dependance, &c.] It happened, upon ſome occaſion, that Harley ſent him a bank bill of 50 l. by his private Secretary, Mr Lewis, which Swift inſtantly returned with a letter of expoſtulation and complaint. Harley invited him to dine, but he refuſed; the Miniſter wrote to Lewis to mediate between them, deſiring to be reconciled; but Swift ſent word, that he expected further ſatisfaction: Harley replied, that if he would but come and ſee him, he would make him eaſy; but Swift inſiſted, that he ſhould apologize by meſſage; and declared, that otherwiſe he would caſt him off (82). He would not ſuffer even negative civilities. Having one day dined with Mr St John, then Secretary of State, and remarking that he appeared to be much out of temper, he took the firſt opportunity of ſeeing him alone, and warned him never to behave to him with ſilent reſerve; for that he would not be treated like a ſchool-boy. 'I expect, ſays he, that if you hear or 'ſee any thing to my diſadvantage, you would let me 'know it in plain words, and not put me in pain to 'gueſs, by the change or coldneſs of your countenance 'or behaviour; for it is what I would hardly bear 'from a Crowned Head, and I think no ſubject's favour 'is worth it (83).' The Secretary received the reproof like a friend, as it was given, and apologized for his behaviour, declaring, that buſineſs had kept him up ſeveral whole nights, and drinking one more; and to make up matters, he preſſed the Doctor to ſtay dinner, which however he declined, being engaged with another friend. It is true, theſe accounts to Stella lie open to the ſuſpicion of being exaggerated to gratify his vanity, yet they are in ſome meaſure juſtified by a letter of his to Lord Oxford, after the connexion between them was broken. 'When I was with you, 'ſays he, I have ſaid more than once, that I would 'never allow quality or ſtation to make any diffe-'rence between men—I loved you juſt ſo much 'the worſe for your ſtation—In your public capacity 'you have often angered me to the heart; but as a 'private man never—I was too proud to be vain of 'the honour you did me—I was never afraid of 'offending you, nor am I now in any pain for the 'manner I write to you in.' In the ſame ſpirit, when he was deſired by his Lordſhip to introduce Dr Parnel to his acquaintance, he refuſed upon this principle, that a man of genius was a character ſuperior to that of a Lord in a high ſtation. He therefore obliged his Lordſhip to walk with his Treaſurer's ſtaff from room to room through his own levee, enquiring which was Dr Parnel, in order to introduce himſelf, and beg the honour of his acquaintance (84).

[AA] Leaders of the oppoſite party.] Among other perſons with whom he was intimately acquainted, during this gay part of his life, was Mrs Vanhomrigh, a Lady of good family, being the daughter of Mr Stone the Commiſſioner, and niece to the Accomptant-General of Ireland. The hiſtory of this family is not a little entertaining, and as the Doctor had no ſmall concern in it, we ſhall lay it before the reader. Mrs Vanhomrigh was the widow of Mr Bartholomew Vanlomrigh, a Merchant of Amſterdam, who removed thence to Dublin at the Revolution, being appointed Commiſſary of the Stores by King William, upon his expedition into Ireland; a place which, during the war, was computed to be worth 6000 l. per annum. After the affairs of Ireland were ſettled, he was appointed Muſter-Maſter General, and a Commiſſioner of the Revenue, and laid out about 12000 l. in the purchaſe of forfeited eſtates: but though he received the produce of this eſtate, and enjoyed his appointments thirteen years, yet when he died, in 1703, his expences had been ſo nearly equal to his revenue, that his whole fortune, including the value of his eſtate, amounted only to 16000 l. This, which however was no ſmall ſum, he directed, by his will, to be divided equally between his wife and four children, two ſons, and two daughters, Eſther and Mary. The ſons dying ſoon after their father, their ſhare fell to the daughters. With this encreaſe of fortune, in 1709 the widow and the two young ladies went to England, where they were viſited by perſons of the firſt quality; and Swift lodging within a few doors of their houſe, in Bury-Street St James's, uſed to be much there, coming and going without ceremony, as if he had been one of the family. During this familiarity, he became a kind of Preceptor to the young Ladies, particularly the eldeſt, Eſther, who was about twenty years of age, much addicted to reading, and a great admirer of

This removal was the great event which determined the colour of his life, bounded his views, and ſhewed him at once what he might poſſeſs, and for what he might hope [BB]. Upon his firſt arrival, he ſeems to have been treated as the Sacheverell of Ireland, being followed by the mob of one faction with execrations, and pelted with ſtones and dirt as he paſſed along the ſtreets; while the other mob attended him with ſhouts of applauſe (rr). As ſoon as he was ſettled at Dublin, Mrs Johnſon removed from the country to be near him; but they ſtill lived in ſeparate houſes, his reſidence was at the Deanery, and her's in lodgings upon Ormond Quay, on the other ſide of the river Liffy (ss). He was in debt at this time (tt); a ſituation which ill ſuited his ſpirit, and which determined him to a ſevere œconomy. However, he kept two public days a week, and though the circle of his viſitors was ſmall at firſt, yet it ſoon encreaſed, and always conſiſted of the beſt company [CC]. On theſe days, the dignity of his ſtation was ſuſtained with the utmoſt elegance and decorum, under the direction of Mrs Johnſon, who yet appeared in the circle, without any character diſtinct from the reſt of the company. She was, however, frequently invited with the Dean, whether to entertainments or parties of pleaſure, though not ſo generally as if ſhe had been his wife; ſhe viſited and received viſits as far as the practice is a meer ritual of good breeding: her friendſhips were ſtill among the men; but ſhe was treated with great politeneſs by the Ladies (uu). The Dean's mind had been now ſo filled with politics, that he found it impracticable to excel as a Preacher, his firſt and moſt laudable ambition, and frequently declared, that though he ſometimes attempted to exert himſelf in the pulpit, yet he could never riſe higher than preaching pamphlets (*). He was, however, ſtill a good Dean and a good Prieſt; he applied himſelf to the care of his Deanery, his Cathedral, its regulations, its income, and œconomy, with great diligence [DD]; he renewed the primitive practice of celebrating the Holy Communion every Sunday; of poetry; ambitious to be eſteemed a wit, exceſſively vain, full of pertneſs and gaiety, not without ſome agreeable accompliſhments; but far from being either beautiful or genteel. In a perſon of this diſpoſition, ſuch a character as that of Swift could not but excite admiration; and that admiration, by frequent converſe, at length begot love: in which it is more than probable that vanity had ſome ſhare, ſince that paſſion would have been highly gratified by an alliance with the firſt wit of the age. Thus goaded on by the united force of love and vanity, ſhe even ventured to make the Doctor a propoſal of marriage. It is probable that his connexions with Mrs Johnſon at this time were ſuch (†), that he could not with honour accept this propoſal: however, it is certain he declined it, though without aſſigning any other engagement as the reaſon. He appears firſt to have affected to believe her in jeſt; then to have rallied her on ſo whimſical a choice; and at laſt to have put her off with an abſolute refuſal. While he was in this ſituation, he wrote the poem called Cadenus & Vaneſſa (85): the principal view of which ſeems to have been at once to compliment and to rally her, to apologize for his conduct, and ſoften a tacit denial by leaving the event undetermined. The poem appears to have been written about the year 1713, a ſhort time before he left Vaneſſa, and the reſt of his friends in England, and retired to the place of his exile, which he always mentions with regret. In 1714 Mrs Vanhomrigh, the mother, died, and having lived at a rate greatly above her fortune, ſhe left ſome debts unpaid. Her two daughters, whoſe fortunes ſhe had likewiſe impaired, ſhe appointed joint executrixes of her will; an office, which however troubleſome, the ſituation of their affairs obliged them to accept: they had alſo contracted ſome debts in their own right, which they were not able immediately to pay, and therefore to avoid an arreſt, they privately followed the Dean into Ireland (86).

[CC] He kept the beſt company.] Thoſe who were particularly the companions of his choice, were ſuch as would have done honour to any character. For inſtance the Grattons, ſeven brothers, the ſons of Dr Gratton, a venerable and hoſpitable clergyman, who gave them all a liberal education. The eldeſt was a Juſtice of peace, and lived reputably on his patrimony in the country; another was a phyſician, and another a merchant, both eminent in their profeſſions; three others were clergymen, who had a competent proviſion in the church; and the youngeſt was a fellow of Dublin college, and maſter of the free-ſchool at Enniſkilling. They were all perſons of great merit, as much acquainted and as much beloved as any in the kingdom. The Jackſons, a family of which both men and women were genteel, agreeable, and well-bred, ſuch companions as no wiſe man ever wanted, if they could be had. George Rochford and Peter Ludlow, men of fortune, learning, wit, humour, and virtue; and Mr Matthew Lord, deemed the beſt lay ſcholar of his time. Theſe, with the fellows of the college, Dr Walmeſley, Dr Helſham, Dr Delany, Dr Stopford, afterwards Biſhop of Cloyne, and Dr Sheridan, Lady Euſtace, Mrs Moore, Lady Betty Rochford, and Mrs Ludlow, with Mrs Johnſon, and her friends, were the perſons with whom Swift ſpent ſome of his leiſure hours from the year 1714 to 1720 (88). However, there was among his companions one perſon, who could derive no honour from his lineage; a foundling, whom Swift therefore uſed to call Melchiſedeck. This gentleman's name was Worral, he was a clergyman, a maſter of arts, a reader and a vicar of his cathedral, and maſter of the ſong. He was nearly of the Dean's own ſtanding in the college, had good ſenſe, and much humour. He was married to a woman of great ſprightlineſs, good-nature, and generoſity, remarkably clean and elegant in her perſon, in her houſe, and at her table. But there is another particular in Mr Worral's character, which greatly contributed to his intimacy with the Dean: he was a good walker. The Dean uſed that exerciſe in an immoderate degree, under the notion of its being abſolutely neceſſary, not to health only, but to cleanlineſs, by keeping the pores of the ſkin clear, and throwing off impurities by perſpiration. Mr Worral's ſituation in the church naturally engaged his frequent attendance upon the Dean, this attendance commonly ended in a walk, and the walk in their dining together, either at Mr Worral's or at the Deanery; the Dean, being a ſingle man, was oftener a gueſt to Mr Worral, than Mr Worral was a gueſt to him; and this brought on an agreement, that the Dean ſhould dine with him whenever he would at a certain rate, and invite as many friends as he pleaſed upon the ſame terms. This gentleman is lately dead, and has left a large ſum of money to be diſpoſed of to public charities at the diſcretion of his executors, except 500 l. which was appropriated to the Dean's hoſpital (89).

(88) Hawkeſworth, from Deane Swift, p. 108. and Delany, p. 90. et ſeqq. The reaſon of this particular liſt of his companions was thought neceſſary to wipe off a cenſure of Lord Orrery, who ſays his choice of companions in this period ſhewed him of a depraved taſte. Letter VI.

(89) Ibid. from D. S. 299. and J. R. p. 92. This agreement with Worral, it is true, ſuited well with the Dean's being in debt, but what can be ſaid for the want of that hoſpitality enjoined the ſuperior clergy by the Apoſtle?

[DD] He applied himſelf to the care of his Deanery with great diligence.] This was the more neceſſary, as the Archbiſhop of Dublin, and ſome of his old friends in the chapter, ſet themſelves againſt his meaſures with all their force, and laboured to diſappoint him in the exerciſe of his power, by every art of oppoſition and delay. This behaviour ſerved only to whet his courage. His maxim was, Tu ne cede malis, ſed contra audentior ito. His firſt ſtep therefore was to reduce theſe brethren to reaſon and obedience; and he ſucceeded ſo perfectly and ſo ſpeedily in it, that, in a ſhort time after his arrival, not one member of that body offered to contradict him, even in trifles. On the contrary, they held him in the higheſt reſpect and veneration, ſo that he ſat in the chapter-

Sunday; at this ſacrament he was conſtantly preſent, and conſecrated it with his own hands in a manner equally graceful and devout; he attended at Church every morning, and generally preached in his turn; he alſo conſtantly attended the performance of the anthem on a Sunday night, though he did not underſtand muſic, to ſee that the choir did not neglect their duty (ww). As to his employment at home, he ſeems to have had no heart to apply himſelf to ſtudy of any kind, but to have reſigned himſelf wholly to ſuch amuſements as offered, that he might not think of his ſituation, the misfortune of his friends, and the diſappointment of his hope. The firſt remarkable event of his life, that occurred after his ſettlement at the Deanery, was his marriage to Mrs Johnſon, after a moſt intimate friendſhip of more than ſixteen years: this was in 1716, the ceremony being performed by Dr Aſhe, then Biſhop of Clogher, the Dean's Tutor at the College [EE]. But whatever were the motives of this marriage, the Dean and the Lady continued to live afterwards juſt in the ſame manner as they had lived before. Mrs Dingley was ſtill the inſeparable companion of Stella, wherever ſhe went; and ſhe never reſided at the Deanery, except when the Dean was ſeized with violent fits of giddineſs, which ſometimes laſted near a month. From this period to the year 1720, is a chaſm in his life, which has been found difficult to fill up (xx). Lord Orrery thinks he employed this time upon Gulliver's Travels; and it is highly probable, that having indulged his reſentment, which his diſappointed hopes had produced, till it could be contained no longer, he conceived the firſt notion of expreſſing it in ſuch a manner, as might correct the enormities which he expoſed, and with this view began his Travels, the firſt copy of which was probably finiſhed before the year 1720 [FF]. About this time the Dean, who had already acquired the character of a humouriſt

[EE] He married Stella in 1716.] Till this time he had continued his viſits to Vaneſſa, who, though ſhe had ſuffered very great pecuniary loſſes, had yet preſerved her reputation and her friends (92). The Dean appears ſtill to have preſerved the character of her Preceptor; but ſoon after he viſited her on another account. He went as an advocate for Mr Dean Winter, whom he took with him, a gentleman who was a profeſſed admirer of Vaneſſa, and had made her ſome overtures of marriage; but though he had an eſtate of 800l. a year, beſides 300l. per annum preferment in the church, yet Vaneſſa rejected the propoſal in ſuch terms, that it was never repeated. She was alſo addreſſed by Dr Price, afterwards Archbiſhop of Caſſel, but without ſucceſs (93). From this time the Dean's viſits were much leſs frequent. In the year 1717 her younger ſiſter Mary died, and, the whole remains of the family fortune being then ſettled in Vaneſſa, ſhe retired to Selbridge, a ſmall houſe and eſtate which had been purchaſed by her father, about twelve miles diſtant from Dublin: from this place ſhe wrote frequently to the Dean, and he anſwered her letters. In theſe letters ſhe ſtill preſſed him to marry her; and in his anſwers he ſtill rallied, and ſtill avoided a poſitive denial; till at length, being unable to ſuſtain her weight of miſery any longer, ſhe writ, in 1723, a very ſerious epiſtle to him, inſiſting peremptorily upon as ſerious an anſwer, and an immediate acceptance or abſolute refuſal of her as his wife. His reply was delivered by his own hand. He brought it with him, when he made his final viſit at Selbridge; and, throwing down the letter upon her table, with great paſſion haſtened back to his horſe, carrying in his countenance the frowns of anger and indignation. Lord Orrery obſerves (94), that the Doctor had a natural ſeverity of face, which even his ſmiles could ſcarce ſoften, or his utmoſt gaiety render placid and ſerene: but when that ſternneſs of viſage was encreaſed by rage, it is ſcarce poſſible to imagine looks or features, that carried in them more terror and auſterity. Vaneſſa had ſeen him in all tempers, and from his outward behaviour could not but gueſs at the inward contents of his letter. She read it with as much reſolution as the preſent cruelty of her fate would permit. She found herſelf intirely diſcarded from his friendſhip and converſation; her offers were treated with inſolence and diſdain; ſhe met with reproaches inſtead of love, and with tyranny inſtead of affection (95). In ſhort, ſhe did not ſurvive this letter many days (96): but, during that ſhort interval, was compoſed enough to cancel a will made in Swift's favour, and make another, wherein ſhe left her fortune (which by long retirement was in ſome meaſure retrieved) to her two executors, Dr Berkley, late Biſhop of Cloyne, and Mr Marſhall, one of the King's Serjeants at law. She had choſen the latter, not only as he had an excellent character, but as he was her relation. She had little perſonal acquaintance with Dr Berkley; his virtues and his genius were univerſally known; yet other motives perhaps induced her to appoint him a joint executor. In ſuch an appointment ſhe not improbably deſigned to mortify the pride of Dr Swift, by letting him ſee, that in her laſt thoughts ſhe preferred a ſtranger before him. 'Thus, concludes his Lordſhip, periſhed at Selbridge, 'under all the agonies of deſpair, Mrs Eſther Vanhomrigh, a miſerable example of an ill-ſpent life, 'fantaſtic wit, viſionary ſchemes, and female weakneſs.' As the laſt gratification of her vanity, ſhe directed, in her will, all the letters that paſſed between the Dean and her, together with the abovementioned poem, the only copy perhaps of which was in her hands, to be publiſhed; and the Poem was publiſhed accordingly. But Dr Berkley, upon a careful peruſal of the letters, finding the Dean's to conſiſt only of compliments, excuſes, apologies, and thanks for trifling preſents, while her's were filled with paſſionate declarations of her love, thought proper to ſuppreſs them. Dr Delany and Mr Dean Swift have ſaid every thing that could be thought of to apologize for the conduct of Vaneſſa in this moſt ridiculous affair; and in ſo doing have unavoidably, though tacitly, impeached Cadenus of notorious indiſcretion, while they clear him from the imputation of any vicious intercourſe: and indeed the Dean's whole conduct in it, not only as a clergyman, but as a man of ſenſe and honour, is abſolutely indefenſible.

(92) Among theſe are reckoned Mr Conolly, the late Biſhop of Cloyne, the late Judge Lindſay, and the Lord Chief Juſtice Marley: all perſons of high rank and reputation. Deane Swift, p. 162.

[FF] He finiſhed his Travels before 1720.] We have an account of the general plan, which at the ſame time conveys the ſpirit and principle of this undertaking, from the Author himſelf, in a letter to Pope, wherein his view is put under a cover, yet that cover is made of glaſs, and well anſwers his intention thereby, which was to ſhew his meaning the better. Having given that friend ſome intimations of his Travels, and his deſign of coming to England, Mr Pope expreſſes his joy as follows: 'After ſo many diſperſions, 'and ſo many diviſions, two or three of us may yet 'be gathered together, not to plot, but divert our'ſelves, and the world too, if it pleaſes; or, at worſt, 'to laugh at others as innocently, and as unhurtfully 'as at ourſelves.' In anſwer to this, the Dean informs him, that he had prepared his Travels for the preſs, and declaring that he liked the ſcheme of their meeting, after diſtreſſes and diſperſions, goes on thus: 'But 'the chief end I propoſe in all my labours, is to vex 'the world, rather than divert it; and if I could 'compaſs that deſign without hurting my own perſon 'or fortune, I would be the moſt indefatigable writer 'you have ever ſeen, without reading. I have ever 'hated all nations, profeſſions, and communities, and 'all my love is toward individuals; for inſtance, I hate 'the tribe of Lawyers, but I love Counſellor ſuch a one, 'and Judge ſuch a one. 'Tis ſo with Phyſicians. I 'will not ſpeak of my own trade. Soldiers, Engliſh, 'Scotch, French, and the reſt; but principally I hate 'and deteſt that animal called Man, although I heartily 'love John, Peter, Thomas, and ſo forth. mouriſt and a wit, was firſt regarded with general kindneſs, as the Patriot of Ireland. He wrote A Propoſal for the Univerſal Uſe of Iriſh Manufactures; a tract which, as it was apparently calculated for the ſervice of Ireland, and zealouſly condemned a ſacrifice of intereſt to England, firſt turned the ſide of popularity in his favour (yy); that popularity roſe to the height of adoration in 1724 [GG], when a patent having been obtained by one Wood (zz), to coin a hundred and eight thouſand pounds in copper for the uſe of Ireland, under which, by ſome iniquitous practices, he would have acquired exorbitant gain, and proportionably impoveriſhed the nation; the Dean, in the character of a Draper, wrote a ſeries of letters to the people, urging them not to receive this copper money (aaa) [HH]. Theſe letters united

'ſhould be only rationis capax. Upon this great foun'dation of miſanthropy, though not in Simon's manner,
'the whole building of my Travels is erected, and I
'are of my opinion (97).' In theſe few ſtrokes we have the key to that work perfectly formed, though unhammered. That part has been done ſince by the noble Author, ſo often mentioned, who has likewiſe both filed and poliſhed it. His reflexions are admirable. And if I differ from his Lorſhip in one remark, let the mentioning it be taken as it is intended in the ſentiment of that maxim in the civil law, which declares that Exceptio confirmat regulam. The remark I mean is in the XIth Letter, where from Swift's raillery upon the ſtructure of the human body in the ſeventh chapter of the voyage to Brobdingnag, which his Lordſhip thinks unpardonable, he ventures to pronounce the lunacy and ideocy, which Swift fell into before his death, to be providential judgments, whereby he was puniſhed for his wickedneſs in kind. It will hardly be denied, ſince it is evident from many of Swift's letters, that ſatire, when he wrote theſe travels, was, in his opinion, trifling, and of no uſe, unleſs it run into a libel. This principle neceſſarily requires ſtrong exaggerations; in working which up, if he was carried ſometimes into a faulty exceſs, yet the deſign of reforming his fellow creatures was ſtill in view, and the principal point in view. Prudence, in his preſent ſituation, with regard to his governors, kept him from throwing himſelf into their hands; he therefore ſubſtituted human nature in general in the room of particular perſons: whence, in keeping to his firſt principle, his ſatire unavoidably grew into a libel upon human nature, in the execution of which, ſome ſallies of wit may indeed have been indulged a little too far, without any deliberate purpoſe of debaſing and ridiculing his own ſpecies. In this light I own I cannot ſee ſuch a degree of impiety and profaneneſs in any of his travels, as will juſtify a particular application of God's judgments upon the Author for them in this world. His Lordſhip's conjecture, that this work was the employment of Dr Swift's mind, while bleeding from the wound given it by the death of the Queen, is very conſiſtent with this, as well as his other particular remarks upon it; but, after all, it is no more than a conjecture, though a very probable one; and it is certain that the whole was at leaſt reviſed, perfected, and publiſhed, at a time when he was far from having any reaſon to be out of humour with his own ſpecies (98).

[GG] Made him very popular.] This ſervice perhaps would not have been ſo long and ſo zealouſly remembered, if a proſecution had not been commenced againſt the printer. The piece being obſerved to ſpread very faſt, a perſon in great office ſent in haſte for the Chief Juſtice Whitſhed, and informed him of a ſeditious, factious, and virulent pamphlet, lately publiſhed, with a deſign of ſetting the two kingdoms at variance; he directed, at the ſame time, that the printer ſhould be proſecuted with the utmoſt vigour. The Chief Juſtice had ſo quick an underſtanding, that he reſolved, if poſſible, to outdo his orders. The printer was ſeized, and forced to give great bail. The jury brought him in not guilty, although they had been culled with the utmoſt induſtry. The Chief Juſtice ſent them back nine times, and kept them eleven hours, until, being tired out, they were forced to leave the matter to the mercy of the Judge, by what is called a ſpecial verdict (99): but the cauſe being ſo very odious and unpopular, the trial of the verdict was put off from term to term, till, upon arrival of the Duke of Grafton, Lord Lieutenant, his Grace, after mature advice and permiſſion from England, was pleaſed to grant a Noli proſequi (100). No public notice however was taken of the Dean (101), who did not ſpare to embelliſh his ſatires at the expence of the Chief Juſtice the ſame year (102).

(99) During the trial, the Chief Juſtice, among other ſingularities, laid his hand on his breaſt, and proteſted ſolemnly, that the author's deſign was to bring in the Pretender.

[HH] The Drapier's letters.] Upon the arrival of Lord Carteret, as Lord Lieutenant, ſoon after the publication of the fourth letter, ſeveral paſſages were ſelected as ſufficient ground for a proſecution; and his Excellency and council publiſhed a proclamation, offering 300*l.* reward for a diſcovery of the author. This proclamation gave the Dean a remarkable opportunity of illuſtrating his character. It happened that the Butler, whom he had employed as his amanuenſis, and who alone was entruſted with the ſecret, went out in the afternoon of the day of the proclamation without leave, and ſtaid abroad the whole night, and part of the next day. There was great reaſon to apprehend that he had made an information, and, having received the reward, would never return. The man however came home in the evening, and the Dean was adviſed by his friends to take no notice of his fault, leſt he ſhould be provoked to a breach of truſt, the fear of which was now removed by his return. But the Dean rejected this counſel with the utmoſt diſdain; and, commanding the man into his preſence, ordered him immediately to ſtrip off his livery, and leave the houſe. 'You villain, ſaid he, I know
'I am in your power, and for that very reaſon I will
'the leſs bear with your inſolence or neglect.' The man, in very ſubmiſſive terms, confeſſed that he had been drinking all night, and intreated to be forgiven; but Swift was inexorable. He then begged that he might be confined in ſome part of the houſe ſo long as the proclamation could entitle him to any reward, leſt, when he was driven from his ſervice, and deſtitute of another, the temptation might be too ſtrong for his virtue, and his diſtreſs might involve him in a crime which he moſt abhorred. His maſter continued ſtill inexorable, and the man was diſmiſſed. During all the time of danger, Swift obſtinately refuſed to contribute one farthing towards his ſupport; nor could he be perſuaded to ſee his face: but, when the time limited in the proclamation was expired, he was permitted to return to his ſervice; ſoon after which he was called haſtily up by the Dean, who, without any preface, again ordered him to ſtrip off his livery, put on his own cloaths, and then come to him again. The poor fellow, though he was greatly aſtoniſhed at the proceeding, knew Swift too well to expoſtulate; and therefore, with whatever reluctance, did as he had been commanded. When he returned, the Dean ordered the other ſervants to be called up, who immediately attended, expecting to ſee the Butler diſmiſſed in terrorem, and to hear themſelves warned, in very ſevere terms, of his offence. Swift, as ſoon as they had ranged themſelves in order before him, ordered them to take notice, that Robert was no longer his ſervant; 'he is now, ſaid the Dean, Mr Blakely,
'the Verger of St Patrick's cathedral, a place which I give
'him as a reward for his fidelity.' The value of this place is between thirty and forty pounds a year. However, Robert would not quit his maſter, but continued to be his butler ſome years afterwards (103). As to Lord Carteret, now Earl Granville, it appears, by many of Swift's writings, that he lived in good friendſhip with him during his Lieutenancy, notwithſtanding his Lordſhip had ſigned the proclamation. Swift once aſked him how he could concur in it; to which his Excellency replied, in the words of Virgil,

He was equally diligent to recommend his friends to Carteret as he had been to Oxford, and with the ſame dignity and freedom 'Pray, my Lord, ſaid he one day, have you united the whole nation in his praiſe, filled every ſtreet with his effigies, and every voice with acclamations; and Wood, though he was long ſupported by his friends, who procured the patent, was at length compelled to withdraw it, and his money was totally ſuppreſſed (bbb). Whereupon the Dean came out with A full and true Account of the ſolemn Proceſſion to the Gallows, at the Execution of William Wood, Eſq; and Hard-ware Man [II]. From this time the Dean's influence in Ireland was almoſt without bounds; he was conſulted in whatever related to domeſtic policy, and in particular to trade. The weavers always conſidered him as their Patron and Legiſlator after his Propoſal for the Uſe of Iriſh Manufactures, and came frequently in a body to receive his advice in ſettling the rates of their ſtuffs, and the wages of their journeymen; and when elections were depending for the city of Dublin, many corporations refuſed to declare themſelves till they knew his ſentiments, and inclinations, which were always followed. Over the populace he was the moſt abſolute Monarch that ever governed men, and he was regarded by perſons of every rank, with veneration and eſteem. Thus he lived as the Tutelar-patron of that kingdom, in an unexampled ſtate of power and influence, as long as his health permitted him to enjoy it (ccc). No wonder then, that in the midſt of this ſplendor in Ireland, he refuſed an offer that was made to him while he was in England, in a viſit to Mr Pope in 1726, of a ſettlement in the midſt of his friends, within twelve miles of London (ddd). The ſame year he had alſo an invitation from Lord Bolingbroke, to ſpend a winter with him at his houſe on the banks of the Loire in France; and this he would have accepted, but that he received an account from Ireland, that Mrs Johnſon (for ſhe ſtill went by her maiden name) was dangerouſly ill (eee). Her conſtitution was tender and delicate, and as the Dean himſelf ſays, ſhe had not the ſtamina vitæ (fff). In the year 1724, ſhe began viſibly to decay, and in the year 1726, was thought to be dying. The Dean received the news with agonies not to be felt, but by the tendereſt and moſt ardent friendſhip; nor conceived, but by the moſt lively imagination [KK]; and immediately haſted back into Ireland. It happened, however, that ſhe recovered a moderate ſtate of health, and the Dean returned again to England, in 1727, to finiſh the Miſcellanies, in concert with Pope and Arbuthnot (ggg). From England, he was once more about to ſet out for France, upon Lord Bolingbroke's invitation, when news arrived of the King's death. He had attended the late Queen Caroline, while ſhe was princeſs, in his former excurſions to England, and he had ſeen her twice in one week by her Royal Highneſs's command in this (hhh) [LL]. She had always treated the Dean with Lord Carteret having gained the advantage of him in ſome diſpute concerning the diſtreſſes of Ireland, he cried out in a violent paſſion, 'What the vengeance brought 'you among us? Get you gone, get you gone. Pray 'God Almighty to ſend us our boobies back again (104).

[II] A full and true account, &c.] This paper is one of the Dean's nonpareils in the jocoſe way. The dangerous conſequence of Wood's patent was a moſt ſerious affair, and accordingly is handled as ſuch in the Drapier's letters. The noble author, to whom we are ſo much indebted in this memoir, having recommended them (105) to the peruſal of his ſon for the ſtile and conduct of their manner, proceeds thus; 'But, if they appear too grave 'for ſo young a man, and one who is ſo little intereſted 'in the preſent, and much leſs in the paſt affairs of Ire'land, you will find a paper at the end of them that 'will excite your riſibility, or I am miſtaken.' His Lordſhip then goes on to give the title of A full and true Account, &c. and obſerves, 'that the Author makes 'the ſeveral artificers attend William Wood (repre'ſented by a log of timber) to the gallows, and each 'tradeſman expreſs his reſentment in the terms of his 'proper calling. The COOK will BASTE him, the 'BOOKSELLER will TURN OVER A NEW LEAF WITH 'HIM, the TAYLOR will SIT IN HIS SKIRTS; and ſo on 'through a number of people (106) of different con'ditions. Then follows the proceſſion, moſt humour'ouſly deſcribed. The whole is a piece of ridicule too 'powerful for the ſtrongeſt gravity to withſtand.'

[KK] He received the news with the greateſt agonies.] A character ſo extraordinary as that of Dean Swift naturally raiſes a curioſity to ſee him in every circumſtance and change of life, and the more eſpecially when exhibited by himſelf, as it is in the preſent caſe, in a letter to Dr Sheridan, dated July 27, where he pours forth his grief as follows. 'I have yours juſt now of the 19th, 'and the account you give is nothing but what I have 'ſome time expected with the utmoſt agonies; and 'there is one aggravation of conſtraint, that, where 'I am, I am forced to put on an eaſy countenance. 'It was, at this time, the beſt office your friendſhip 'could do, not to deceive me. I was violently bent 'all laſt year, as I believe you remember, that ſhe 'ſhould go to Montpelier, or Bath, or Tunbridge. I in'treated, if there was no amendment, they might both 'come to London. But there was a fatality, although 'I indeed think her ſtamina could not laſt much longer, 'when I ſaw ſhe could take no nouriſhment. I look 'upon this to be the greateſt event that can ever happen 'to me; but all my preparations will not ſuffice to make 'me bear it like a philoſopher, nor altogether like 'a Chriſtian. There hath been the moſt intimate 'friendſhip between us from her childhood, and the 'greateſt merit on her ſide that ever was in one human 'creature towards another. Nay, if I were now near 'her, I would not ſee her; I could not behave myſelf 'tolerably, and ſhould redouble her ſorrow—Judge in 'what a temper of mind I write this—The very time 'I am writing, I conclude the faireſt ſoul in the world 'hath left its body—Confuſion! that I am this moment 'called down to a viſitor, when I am in the country, 'and not in my power to deny myſelf—I have paſſed 'a very conſtrained hour, and now return to ſay I know 'not what. I have been long weary of the world, and 'ſhall, for my ſmall remainder of years, be weary of 'life, having for ever loſt that converſation which could 'only make it tolerable—I fear, while you are reading 'this, you will be ſhedding tears at her funeral; ſhe 'loved you well, and a great ſhare of the little merit 'I have with you is owing to her ſolicitations (107).' Perhaps no one part of Swift's life is more picturesque of the ſingularity of his character than this. Could it be imagined, did not the facts ſhew it, that he was at this very time engaged in publiſhing and writing ſome materials of the Miſcellanies in concert with Pope and Arbuthnot, particularly the Memoirs of Scriblerus, notes upon the Dunciad (108)?

[LL] He viſited the Princeſs of Wales.] The ſtate of that court at this time is well known, and repreſented with exquiſite wit and humour in Gulliver's travels; where the Prince is repreſented wearing ſhoes with one heel higher than the other, which gave him a hobble in his gate. In his letter to Sheridan, cited in the text, ſpeaking of the Princeſs, he ſays, 'She charges me, 'without ceremony, to be the author of a bad 'book (*), though I told her how angry the miniſtry 'were; but ſhe aſſures me, that both ſhe and the P—— 'were very well pleaſed with every particular; but, con'tinues he, I diſowned the whole affair, as you know I 'very well might (109), only gave her leave, as ſhe liked 'the book, to ſuppoſe what author ſhe pleaſed (110).' He had before, in the ſame letter, informed this intimate friend, that there was a ſettled reſolution to aſſault Sir Robert Walpole (†); and declares he himſelf was highly diſpleaſed with him and his partiſans.—That he was adviſed by all his friends not to go to France (as he with great civility; and the Dean had treated her with his uſual, and peculiar frankneſs. The third day after the death of King George I, he attended at court, and kiſſed the new King and Queen's hands, upon their acceſſion, and was blamed by his friends for deferring it ſo long. What proſpect he had of a change in public affairs on this event, or of any advantages which ſuch a change might produce to himſelf or his friends, does not appear; but he was earneſtly intreated to delay his journey; and when he had again determined to ſet out, he was, upon ſome new incidents, again prevailed upon not to go, by the perſuaſions of ſome perſons whom, he ſays, he could not diſobey. Many ſchemes were propoſed, in which he was eagerly ſollicited to engage, but he received them coldly; not becauſe he was determined to enter no more into public life, but becauſe the ſchemes were ſuch as he did not approve (iii). He was ſoon after ſeized with one of his fits of giddineſs and deafneſs; a calamity which was greatly aggravated by the news that Mrs Johnſon was again ſo ill, that the Phyſicians deſpaired of her life. Upon this occaſion, he relapſed into the agonies of mind, which he had felt the year before: he expected, by the next poſt, to hear that ſhe was dead, and intreated that he might be told no particulars, but the event in general; for that his age being then within three months of ſixty, his weakneſs and his friendſhip would bear no more. As he deſpaired of ſeeing her alive, he determined not to return to Ireland ſo ſoon as he had intended, but to paſs the winter either near Saliſbury-Plain, or in France. And that he might not be interrupted by company, and condemned to the torment of ſuppreſſing his ſorrow to preſerve the rules of good breeding, he quitted the houſe of Mr Pope at Twickenham, and retired to a village near London, with a female relation for his nurſe. The next letter that he received he kept an hour in his pocket before he could ſufficiently fortify himſelf againſt the ſhock which he expected when he ſhould open it (kkk): however, as Stella's life ebbed by ſlow degrees, and ſometimes ſeemed at a ſtand, if not to flow, his hope of a parting interview revived, and he ſet out for Ireland as ſoon as he was able to travel. He found her alive (lll); but after languiſhing about three months, ſhe expired on the 28th of January, 1727, in the forty-fourth year of her age, regretted by the Dean with ſuch exceſs of affection and eſteem, as the warmeſt ſenſibility only could feel, and the moſt excellent character excite [MM]. From the death of Stella, the Dean's life became he intended for two months) for fear of their vengeance, 'in a manner which, ſays he, they cannot execute here.' However he was reſolved not to engage againſt the miniſtry. 'I reckon, continues he, there will be a 'warm winter, wherein, my comfort is, I ſhall have 'no concern (111).'

(111) Letters to Sheridan, No. XXII.

[MM] Stella's death was lamented by Swift with an affection excited by her character.] Stella muſt needs have been a woman of a moſt excellent character: the writers of Swift's life have vied with each other in ſetting forth that excellence. 'STELLA, ſays Lord Orrery, was a 'moſt amiable woman in mind and perſon. She had 'an elevated underſtanding, with all the delicacy and 'ſoftneſs of her ſex. Her voice, however ſweet in it'ſelf, was ſtill rendered more harmonious by what ſhe 'ſaid. Her wit was poignant without ſeverity: her 'manners were humane, polite, eaſy, and unreſerved. 'Wherever ſhe came, ſhe attracted attention and eſteem. 'As virtue was her guide in morality, ſincerity was 'her guide in religion: ſhe was conſtant, but not often'tatious, in her devotions. She was remarkably pru'dent in her converſation. She had great ſkill in muſic, 'and was perfectly well verſed in all the leſſer arts that 'employ a lady's leiſure. Her wit allowed her a fund 'of perpetual chearfulneſs: her prudence kept that 'chearfulneſs within proper limits. She exactly an'ſwered the deſcription of PENELOPE in HOMER:

'A woman loveliеſt of the lovely kind,
'In body perfect, and complete in mind.

'Such was STELLA: yet, with all theſe accompliſh'ments, ſhe never could prevail upon Dr Swift to 'acknowledge her openly as his wife. A great genius 'muſt tread in unbeaten paths, and deviate from the 'common road of life; otherwiſe, ſurely a diamond of 'ſo much luſtre might have been publickly produced, 'although it had been fixed within the collet of matri'mony: but the flaw which, in Dr Swift's eye, re'duced the value of ſuch a jewel, was the ſervile ſtate 'of her father, who, as was ſaid before, was a menial 'ſervant to Sir William Temple. Ambition and pride 'will at any time conquer reaſon and juſtice; and each 'larger degree of pride, like the larger fiſhes of prey, 'will devour all the leſs: thus the vanity of boaſting 'ſuch a wife was ſuppreſſed by the greater vanity of 'keeping free from ſuch an alliance (112).' His Lord'ſhip here plainly uſes the words pride and vanity to ex'preſs the ſame quality; but, in deſcribing Swift's character, he is more accurate in diſtinguiſhing the two qualities, and tells us, that Swift himſelf uſed to ſay, that his pride kept him from being vain. However, his Lordſhip's rival in drawing Stella's character makes this inaccuracy in his Lordſhip's draught a handle to animadvert upon him. 'Why the Dean, ſays he, did not ſooner marry 'this excellent perſon, why he married her at all, why 'his marriage was ſo cautiouſly concealed, and why he 'was never known to meet her but in the preſence of 'a third perſon, are enquiries which no man can an'ſwer, or has attempted to anſwer, without abſurdity; 'and are therefore unprofitable objects of ſpecula'tion (113).' In this diſpoſition the ſame writer, not ſatisfied with his Lordſhip's character of Stella, has ſupplied what he thought the defects therein as follows. 'Her ſtature, ſays he, was tall, her hair and eyes black, 'her complexion fair and delicate, her features regular, 'ſoft, and animated, her ſhape eaſy and elegant, and 'her manner feminine, polite, and graceful. As to her 'wit, it was confeſſed by all her acquaintance, and 'particularly by the Dean, that ſhe never failed to ſay 'the beſt thing that was ſaid, whenever ſhe was in 'company, though her companions were uſually perſons 'of the beſt underſtanding in the kingdom (114). 'Neither was her wit merely of the colloquial kind; 'ſhe had great force of poetical fancy, could range her 'thoughts in a regular compoſition, and expreſs them 'in correct and harmonious verſe.' We have a beautiful inſtance of this in a poem addreſſed to Swift on his birth-day, 1721, which concludes with the following lines:

(113) Hawkeſworth, p. 26.

(114) Ibid. See inſtances of this, under the name of Bons mots de Stella, in Vol. XII. of Swift's Works, in 8vo, and two ſpecimens of her poetry are inſerted in the appendix to his life.

'Long be the day that gave you birth,
'Sacred to friendſhip, wit, and mirth;
'Late dying, may you caſt a ſhred
'Of your rich mantle o'er my head;
'To bear with dignity my ſorrow
'One day alone; then die to-morrow (115).'

(115) Hawkins, in the Appendix to Swift's life, p. 42.

Lord Orrery, in ſpeaking of the Dean's conduct to Stella, obſerves, that a woman of her delicacy muſt needs repine at ſuch an extraordinary ſituation. 'The out'ward honours, ſays his Lordſhip, which ſhe received, 'are as frequently beſtowed upon a miſtreſs as a wife. 'She was abſolutely virtuous, and yet was obliged to 'ſubmit to all the appearances of vice, except in the 'preſence of thoſe few people, who were witneſſes of 'the cautious manner in which ſhe lived with her huſ'band, who ſcorned even to be married like any other 'married folks. Inward anxiety affected by degrees 'the calmneſs of her mind, and the ſtrength of her body. 'She began to decline in her health in 1724, and, 'from the firſt ſymptoms of decays, ſhe rather haſtened 'than ſhrunk back in the deſcent, tacitly pleaſed to find 'her foot-ſteps tending to that place, where they neither 'marry nor are given in marriage. She died towards the 'end of January, 1727 or 1728, abſolutely deſtroyed by came much more retired, and the auſterity of his temper daily encreaſed; he could not join in the ſocial chearfulneſs of his public days; theſe entertainments therefore were diſcontinued, and he ſometimes avoided the company of the moſt intimate friends. In this ſolitary life, he frequently amuſed himſelf with writing, as appears by the dates of many of his pieces, which are ſubſequent to this time; and it is very remarkable, that although his mind was doubtleſs greatly depreſſed, and his principal enjoyment at an end, when Mrs Johnſon died, yet there is an air of trifling and levity in ſome of the pieces, which he wrote afterwards, that is not to be found in any other [NN]. However, in 1733, when an attempt was made to repeal the Teſt Act in Ireland, he wrote a copy of verſes (mmm) againſt that attempt, with ſo much boldneſs, as even brought his life in ſome danger [OO]. But the fits

'the peculiarity of her fate, a fate which perhaps ſhe 'could not have incurred by an alliance with any other 'perſon in the world (116).' Here again his Lordſhip's rival interpoſes, and tells us, that 'the Dean's 'peculiar connexion appears to have been ſuſpected, 'if not known, by his particular acquaintance, one of 'whom had the courage, indirectly, to blame his con'duct ſeveral times, by ſetting before him the example 'of a clergyman of diſtinguiſhed merit, who married 'nearly in the ſame circumſtances; but, inſtead of con'cealing his marriage, retired into thrifty lodgings, 'till he had made a proviſion for his wife, and then 'returned to the world, and became eminent for his hoſ'pitality and charity (117).' The Dean, whether moved by theſe repreſentations, or ſome other motive, did at length earneſtly deſire that ſhe might be publickly owned as his wife; but, as her health was then declining, and his œconomy became more ſevere, ſhe ſaid it was too late, and inſiſted that they ſhould continue to live as before: to this the Dean in his turn conſented, and ſuffered her to diſpoſe entirely of her own fortune by her own name to a public charity, when ſhe died (118).

(116) Lord Orrery's letter, as before.

(117) Delany, p. 63.

(118) Id. p. 56, and 288.

'It appears, continues this writer, by ſeveral little inci'dents, that Stella regretted and diſapproved the Dean's 'conduct, and that ſhe ſometimes reproached him with 'unkindneſs; for to ſuch regret and reproach he certainly 'alludes in the concluſion of his poem on her birth-day 'in 1726 (*):' Thus we ſee this writer agrees with his Lordſhip in the point of Stella's regret and reſentment; and he obſerves, that it ſeems to be generally agreed, in concurrence with his Lordſhip, that Stella was deſtroyed by the peculiarity of her circumſtances; and that the fabric, however weak by the delicacy of its compoſition, would not have fallen ſo ſoon, if the foundation had not been injured by the ſlow minings of regret and vexation.

(*) It is inſerted in his Works, Vol. III. Part II. p. 121. edit. 1755. 4to.

In ſo flagrant an inſtance of the moſt inhumanly ſavage cruelty (I had almoſt ſaid murder) what can be ſaid for the author of it? Mr Hawkeſworth indeed has told us (119), that it is generally agreed, that in this inſtance, as in every other, the Dean's intention was upright, though his judgment might be erroneous. But he had better have ſaid nothing.

(119) Hawkeſworth, p. 27.

[NN] A greater air of trifling in ſome of his pieces after this time than in any before.] He had eſtabliſhed his principle of Vive la bagatelle(†), and was reſolved to put it in execution. Among theſe trifling pieces are his directions to ſervants, and ſeveral of his letters to Dr Sheridan ſtand foremoſt. In the laſt remark we gave the picture of Swift's wife, and we ſhall here give ſome ſketches of this friend, done by the ſame hands. 'Dr 'Sheridan, ſays Lord Orrery, was a ſchoolmaſter, and, 'in many inſtances, perfectly well adapted for that 'ſtation. He was deeply verſed in the Greek and 'Roman languages, and in their cuſtoms and antiqui'ties. He had that kind of good-nature, which ab'ſence of mind, indolence of body, and careleſsneſs 'of fortune, produce; and, although not over ſtrict in 'his own conduct, yet he took care of the morality of 'his ſcholars, whom he ſent to the Univerſity remark'ably well founded in all claſſical learning (120), and 'not ill inſtructed in the ſocial duties of life. He was 'ſlovenly, indigent, and chearful. He knew books 'much better than men: and he knew the value of 'money leaſt of all. In this ſituation, and with this 'diſpoſition, Swift faſtened upon him as upon a prey, 'with which he intended to regale himſelf, when'ever his appetite ſhould prompt him. Sheridan there'fore was kept conſtantly within his reach; and the 'only time he was permitted to go beyond the limits 'of his chain, was to take poſſeſſion of a living in the 'county of Cork, which had been beſtowed upon him 'by the then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, the preſent 'Earl of Granville. Sheridan, in one fatal moment, 'or by one fatal text, effected his own ruin (121); 'and this ill-ſtarred, good-natured, improvident man 'returned to Dublin, unhinged from all favour at court, 'and even baniſhed from the caſtle. But ſtill he re'mained a punſter, a quibbler, a fiddler, and a wit: 'not a day paſſed without a rebus, an anagram, or a 'madrigal. His pen and his fiddle-ſtick were in con'tinual motion, yet to little or no purpoſe (122).' Mr Hawkeſworth, apparently thinking his Lordſhip too ſevere upon this friend of Swift, ſets him in a more favourable light. 'As Swift, ſays he (123), was, un'doubtedly, much more tenderly and ſtrictly connected 'with Stella than with any other woman, ſo his friend'ſhip ſeems to have been more intimate and unreſerved 'with Sheridan than with any other man; his letters 'to him are evidently the ſpontaneous effuſions of his 'heart, whether he was chearful or ſad, and ſeem to 'imply a perfect acquaintance with every peculiarity 'of his circumſtances.' This writer, in proceeding, agrees with his Lordſhip in other particulars; but, paſſing over Sheridan's ill conduct in ſilence, he obſerves, that 'this gentleman was by nature ſuited to Swift as a com'panion in the higheſt degree: he had a vein of humour 'that was a conſtant occaſion of merriment, he had an 'abſence of mind which rendered him a perpetual object 'of raillery, and an indolent good-nature which made 'him unapt to take offence; he was always diſpoſed to 'be chearful, and therefore readily concurred in the 'entertainment of Swift's hours of pleaſantry; and 'could, without much pain or diſpleaſure, give way 'to his petulance or his coldneſs, in his paroxyſms of 'fretfulneſs or reſerve: he alſo greatly contributed to 'Swift's amuſement by little ſprightly pieces of the 'inferior kind of poetry, which he was always writing; 'and yet more to his employment, by hints and 'materials which he was every moment throwing 'out (124).' This writer concludes his account, in a further defence of Sheridan againſt his Lordſhip's inſinuation, that he was held in contempt by Swift, as follows: 'With this eaſy, negligent, contented crea'ture, Swift paſſed much of his time, as well during 'Mrs Johnſon's life as afterwards; and though there is 'in general an air of ſuperiority in his letters, and 'might be ſometimes in his behaviour a want of that 'complacency which no familiarity ſhould exclude, yet 'it appears, that the Dean did not hold Sheridan cheap. 'Sheridan he loved for his own merit, and was content 'to have deſerved his love by the intereſt of another. 'Stella, ſays he, loved you well; and a great ſhare of the 'little merit I have with you is owing to her ſollicita'tions (125).'

(121) In his way to his living he ſtopt at Cork to wait upon his Biſhop, and, preaching there on a Sunday, which happened to be the firſt of Auguſt, the Anniverſary day of King George I's Acceſſion, on this text, ſufficient to the day is the evil thereof, ſuch a clamour was raiſed againſt him (though the choice of the text was pure accident, and no politics in the ſermon) that the Lord Lieutenant was obliged to withdraw his preſentation. [OO] His life was in ſome danger.] The Diſſenters often affected to call themſelves brother Proteſtants and fellow Chriſtians with the members of the eſtabliſhed church, an affectation which is rallied by the Dean with his uſual ſpirit. Among other inſtances, to expoſe the abſurdity of it, he has the following:

Thus at the bar that blockhead Betteſworth,
Though half a crown o'erpays his ſweat's worth,
Who knows in law nor text nor margent,
Calls Singleton (*) his brother ſerjeant.

(*) This gentleman was long the boaſt of Ireland for his extraordinary ſkill in the law.

Theſe lines ſo provoked Betteſworth, who was alſo a member of the Iriſh parliament, that he ſwore, in the hearing of many perſons, to revenge himſelf, either by murdering or maiming the Author: and for this purpoſe he engaged his footman, with two ruffians, to ſecure the Dean wherever he could be found. As ſoon as this oath and attempt were known, thirty of the nobility and gentry of the liberty of St Patrick waited upon the Dean in form, and preſented a paper, ſubſcribed with their names, in which they ſolemnly engaged, in behalf of themſelves and the reſt of the liberty, to defend his perſon and fortune, as the friend and benefactor of his country. When this paper was delivered, Swift was in bed, giddy and deaf, having been ſome time before ſeized with one of his fits: But, with all the dignity of habitual preheminence, he dictated the following anſwer.

'Gentlemen,

fits of giddineſs and deafneſs became more frequent and violent, as he grew into years; and in 1736, while he was writing a ſatire on the Iriſh Parliament, which he called The Legion Club, he was ſeized with one of theſe fits, the effects of which were ſo dreadful, that he left the Poem unfiniſhed, and never afterwards attempted a compoſition of any length, either in verſe or proſe. From this time his memory was perceived gradually to decline, and he appeared every day more fretful and peeviſh (*), and even grew weary of life [PP]; yet his converſation remained ſtill lively and ſevere, but the ſatire more frequent and more bitter. He alſo continued to correſpond with his friends in England, particularly Mr Pope. In the beginning of the year 1741, his paſſions grew ſo violent, his memory ſo decayed, and his reaſon ſo depraved, that the utmoſt precautions were taken to keep all ſtrangers from approaching him, and his friends found it neceſſary to have guardians appointed of his perſon and eſtate. Early in the year 1742, his reaſon was wholly ſubverted, and his rage became abſolute madneſs. In October, after his phrenzy had continued ſeveral months, his left eye ſwelled to the ſize of an egg, and the lid appeared to be ſo much inflamed and diſcoloured, that the ſurgeon expected it to mortify; ſeveral large boils alſo broke out on his arms and body. The extreme pain of this tumour kept him waking near a month, and during one week it was with difficulty that five perſons kept him by meer force from tearing out his own eyes. However, when the tumour ſubſided, and the pain left him, he appeared ſo far to have recovered his underſtanding and temper (nnn), that the ſurgeon was not without hopes that he might once more enjoy ſociety, and be amuſed by the company of his old friends (ooo). But this hope was but of ſhort duration; for a few days afterwards, he ſunk into a ſtate of total inſenſibility [QQ], ſlept much, and could not, without great difficulty, be prevailed upon to walk croſs the room. After he had continued ſpeechleſs a whole year in this ſtate of helpleſs ideocy, his houſe-keeper went into his room on the 30th of November, 1743, in the morning, and telling him it was his birth-day, and that bonfires and illuminations were preparing to celebrate it as uſual, he immediately replied, 'Tis all folly; they had better let it alone (ppp). This, and ſome other inſtances of ſenſe and reaſon ſhewn afterwards, prove that his diſorder had not totally deſtroyed, but only ſuſpended the powers of his mind (qqq). But from the year 1744, he was perfectly ſilent to his death, which happened in the latter end of October, 1745, without the leaſt pang or convulſion, in the ſeventy-eighth year of his age (rrr). Lord Orrery thinks he certainly foreſaw his fate [RR]; that his frequent attacks of giddineſs, and his manifeſt decay of memory, gave room for ſuch apprehenſions; and this ſeems to be countenanced by his laſt will, which is dated May 3, 1740, juſt before he ceaſed to be a reaſonable Being. In it having left about twelve hundred pounds in ſpecific legacies [SS], he bequeathed the reſt of his fortune, which amounted to about eleven thouſand pounds, to erect and endow an hoſpital for ideots and lunatics. He was buried in the great iſle of St Patrick's Cathedral, under a ſtone of black marble, inſcribed with an epitaph written by himſelf [TT]. His character was very ſingular,

'Gentlemen,

'I receive, with great thankfulneſs, theſe many kind 'expreſſions of your concern for my ſafety, as well as 'your declared reſolution to defend me (as far as the 'laws of God and man will allow) againſt all murderers 'and ruffians, who ſhall attempt to enter into the liberty 'with any bloody and wicked deſigns upon my life, 'my limbs, my houſe, or my goods. Gentlemen, my 'life is in the hands of God, and, whether it may be 'cut off by treachery, or open violence, or by the 'common way of other men, as long as it continues, 'I ſhall ever bear a grateful memory for this favour you 'have ſhewn, beyond my expectation, and almoſt exceeding my wiſhes. The inhabitants of the liberty, 'as well as thoſe of the neighbourhood, have lived with 'me in great amity for near twenty years; which I am 'confident will never diminiſh during my life. I am 'chiefly ſorry that, by two cruel diſorders of deafneſs 'and giddineſs, which have purſued me for four months, 'I am not in a condition either to hear or to receive 'you, much leſs to return you my moſt ſincere acknowledgments, which in juſtice and gratitude I ought 'to do. May God bleſs you and your families in this 'world, and make you for ever happy in the next (126).'

(126) Appendix to the account of his life, &c. by Hawkins.

[PP] He grew weary of life.] This appears by many paſſages in his Letters, and expreſſions to his friends. Among other inſtances we ſhall give the following: In 1739, he had been ſtanding with a Clergyman under a very large heavy pier-glaſs, which, juſt as they moved to another part of the room, fell down and broke to pieces; whereupon the Clergyman, turning to Swift, ſaid, 'What a mercy it is that we moved the moment we did; 'for if we had not, we ſhould certainly have been killed.' The Dean replied, that as to himſelf, he was ſorry he had changed ground, and wiſhed the glaſs had fallen upon him (*).

(*) Hawkeſworth, p. 30.

[QQ] He ſunk into a ſtate of total inſenſibility.] This was the effect of another diſeaſe, a kind of dropſy; his brain was loaded with water. Mr Stevens, an ingenious clergyman of Dublin, pronounced this to be the caſe during his illneſs; and, upon opening his body, it appeared that he was not miſtaken: but, though he often intreated the Dean's friends and phyſicians that his head might be trepanned to diſcharge the water, no regard was paid to his opinion or intreaty (127).

(127) Delany, p. 149.

[RR] He certainly foreſaw his fate.] 'I have often, 'ſays Lord Orrery, heard him lament the ſtate of childhood and idiotiſm to which ſome of the greateſt men 'of this nation were reduced before their death. He 'mentioned, as examples within his own time, the 'Duke of Marlborough and Lord Somers: and, when 'he cited theſe melancholy inſtances, it was always 'with a heavy ſigh, and with geſtures that ſhewed great 'uneaſineſs, as if he felt an impulſe of what was to 'happen to him before he died (128).'

(128) Letter XXI.

[SS] Specific legacies.] His will, like all his other writings, is drawn up in a peculiar manner. Even in ſo ſerious a compoſition he could not help indulging himſelf in leaving legacies that carry with them an air of raillery and jeſt. He diſpoſes of his three hats, his beſt, his ſecond beſt, and his third beſt beaver, with an ironical ſolemnity that renders the bequeſts ridiculous. He bequeaths to Mr John Gratton a ſilver box, to keep in it the tobacco which the ſaid John uſually chewed, called pigtail. But his legacy to Mr Robert Gratton is ſtill more extraordinary. Item, I bequeath to Mr Robert Gratton, Prebendary of St Andrew's, my ſtrong box, on condition of his giving the ſole uſe of the ſaid box to his brother, Dr James Gratton, during the life of the ſaid Doctor, who hath more occaſion for it.

lar, and has been attempted by several writers, the substance of which is as follows. In his person, he was large, robust, and masculine; his deportment was commanding, and his walk erect. His voice was sharp and high toned, especially when he read prayers, but not effeminate; and there was a natural severity in his aspect, which even his smiles could scarce soften, nor could his utmost gaiety relax. He was cleanly even to superstition; his nails were always pared to the quick, to prevent the least gathering of dirt under them, and he never dressed without a bason of water by him, with which he carefully cleansed his feet. Among his singularities, were his resolution never to wear spectacles, and his obstinate perseverance in the use of too much exercise (sss). Regularity was peculiar to him in all his actions, even in the greatest trifles. His hours of walking and reading never varied. His motions were guided by his watch, which was so constantly held in his hand, or placed before him on the table, that he seldom deviated many minutes in the daily revolutions of his exercises and employments. His manner was without ceremony, but not rustick; for he had a perfect knowledge of all the modes and variations of politeness and complaisance, which he practised in a manner peculiar to himself; and the respect that was due to him by these rules, he took care to exact, without the least abatement. He had seen the great world, and profited much by his experience. His capacity and strength of mind were undeniably equal to any task whatsoever. His pride, his spirit or his ambition, call it by what name you please, was boundless; but his views were checked in his younger years, and the anxiety of that disappointment had a visible effect upon all his actions. He was sour and severe, but not absolutely ill-natured. He was sociable only to particular friends, and to them only at particular hours. In company his rule was never to speak more than a minute at a time, and then to wait at least as long for others to take up the conversation. His colloquial stile, like that of his writing, was clear, forcible, and concise. He greatly excelled in punning, a talent he said which no man affected to despise, but those which were without it. But his conversation abounded with turns of wit of a higher kind [UU]. The Dean also greatly excelled in telling a story, his sentences were short and perspicuous, his observations piercing; and though in the latter part of his life he was very apt to tell his stories too often, yet his wit, as well as his virtues, was always superior to the wretched expedients of those despicable babblers, who are perpetually attempting to put off double entendre and prophaneness for wit and humour. His conversation was in the highest degree chaste, and wholly free from the least tincture of irreligion. As he was zealous to preserve all the delicacies of conversation, he was always best pleased, when some of the company (ttt) were ladies [WW]. He had not the least tincture of vanity in his conversation;

(sss) It wasted his flesh, and produced a poorness in his blood, of which he was told by his Physicians; and when he was reduced to idiotism, so as not to be able to walk, he recovered his flesh in a short time. Hawkesworth, P. 39.

(ttt) In a letter to Pope, written in 1732, he complains that even his female friends had forsaken him, which was what vexed him most.

It is inserted in his will, after expressing his desire to have his body buried in the great isle of his Cathedral, on the South side, under the pillar next to the monument of Primate Narcissus Marsh, three days after his decease, as privately as possible, and at twelve o'clock at night, that a black marble of feet square, and seven feet from the ground, fixed to the wall, may be erected, with the inscription in large letters, deeply cut, and strongly gilded. Lord Orrery very justly remarks (129), 'that this monumental inscription serves 'to confirm an observation which he had made in a 'former letter, that the Dean was not an elegant writer 'of Latin. An harsher epitaph, continues his Lordship, has seldom been composed: it is scarce intelligible; and, if intelligible, is a proof how difficult a 'task it is, even for the greatest genius to draw his 'own character, or to represent himself and his actions 'in a proper manner.' The former letter, here referred to by his Lordship, is the tenth, where, in speaking of two Latin poems, Epistola ad Thomam Sheridan, and Carberiæ Rupes, he observes, that 'our Author was extremely sollicitous to have them printed among his works (130): and, what is no less true than amazing, 'he assumes to himself more vanity upon these two Latin 'poems than upon many of his best English performances. It is said that Milton in his judgment, continues the noble Author, preferred the Paradise Regained to the Paradise Lost. There possibly might 'be found some excuse for such a preference; but in 'Swift's case there can be none: he understood the 'Latin language perfectly well, and he read it constantly; but he was no Latin poet. And if the Carberiæ 'Rupes and the Epistola ad Thomam Sheridan had been 'the produce of any other author, they must have undergone a severe censure from Dr Swift.'

[UU] Turns of wit of a higher kind.] The following deserves particular notice. He greatly admired the talents of the late Duke of Wharton, and, hearing him one day recount many of his frolics, Aye, my Lord, said he, you have had many frolics; but let me recommend one more to you: Take a frolic to be virtuous; I assure you it will do you more honour than all the rest (131).

(131) Observations, p. 216.

[WW] He was best pleased in the company of the ladies.] The particular charm which attached him to their company and acquaintance is excellently set forth by Lord Orrery: 'I have just now, says his Lordship, cast my 'eye over a poem called Death and Daphne, which 'makes me relate an odd incident relating to that 'nymph. Swift, soon after our acquaintance, introduced me to her as to one of his female favourites. 'I had been scarce half an hour in her company, before 'she asked me if I had seen the Dean's poem upon '*Death and Daphne. As I told her I had not, she immediately unlocked a cabinet, and, bringing out the 'MS, read it to me with a seeming satisfaction, of 'which at that time I doubted the sincerity. While 'she was reading, the Dean was perpetually correcting 'her for bad pronunciation, and for placing a wrong 'emphasis upon particular words. As soon as she had 'gone through the composition, she assured me smilingly, that the portrait of Daphne was drawn for herself†. 'I begged to be excused from believing it, and protested 'that I could not see one feature that had the least resemblance: but the Dean immediately burst into a 'laughter. You fancy, says he, that you are very polite, but you are much mistaken; that lady had rather 'be a Daphne drawn by me, than a Sacharissa by any 'other pencil. She confirmed what he had said with 'great earnestness; so that I had no other method of 'retrieving my error, than by whispering in her ear, 'as I was conducting her down stairs to dinner, that 'indeed I found 'Her hand as dry and cold as lead (132).

(132) A line in that poem.

'You see the command which Swift had over all his 'females, and would have smiled to have found his 'house a constant seraglio of very virtuous women (133), 'who attended him from morning till night, with an 'obedience, an awe, and an assiduity, that are seldom 'paid to the richest, or the most powerful lovers; no, 'not even to the Grand Signior himself. Not any of 'his Senators presumed to approach him when he 'signified his pleasure to remain in private, and without interruption. His nightgown and slippers were 'not easier put on or off, than his attendants. No 'Prince ever met with more flattery to his person, or 'more devotion to his mandates (134). To these ladies, proceeds his Lordship, Swift owed the publication of many pieces, which ought never to have been 'delivered to the press. He communicated every 'composition, as soon as finished, to his female senate, 'who not only passed their judgment on the performance; but constantly asked, and almost as constantly obtained a copy of it. You cannot be surprized, that it was immediately afterwards seen in 'print: and when printed, became a part of his works.'

tion; he uſed to ſay he was too proud to be vain. He generally ſpoke as he thought, in all companies, and at all times. If the converſation turned upon ſerious ſubjects, he was neither petulant in the debate, nor negligent of the iſſue. He would liſten with great attention to the arguments of others, and whether he was engaged or not in the argument, he would recapitulate what had been ſaid, ſtate the queſtion with great clearneſs and preciſion, point out the controverted particular, and appeal to the opinion, either of ſome neutral perſon, or of the majority. It is however true, that he kept his friends in ſome degree of awe, and was therefore rather an entertaining, than a deſirable gueſt. He was open to adulation, and could not, or would not diſtinguiſh between low flattery, and juſt applauſe. Yet he was not leſs open to admonition, if it was offered without arrogance, and by perſons of whoſe ability and honeſty he had no doubt [XX]. Such was Swift as a companion; as a maſter, he was not leſs remarkable. As he expected punctual, ready, and implicit obedience, he always tried his ſervants when he hired them, by ſome teſt of their humility. Among other queſtions, he always aſked whether they underſtood cleaning ſhoes; 'becauſe, ſaid he, my kitchen-wench (uuu) has a ſcullion that does her drudgery, 'and one part of the buſineſs of my groom and footman, is conſtantly to clean her ſhoes 'by turns;' if they ſcrupled this, the treaty was at an end; if not, he gave them a further hearing. He appeared to be churliſh and auſtere to his domeſtics in general; but in reality was a good maſter (wwww). As a member of civil ſociety, he was a zealous advocate for liberty, the detector of fraud, and the ſcourge of oppreſſion. In politics, he was neither Whig nor Tory, Jacobite nor Republican; he was Dr Swift. As an Eccleſiaſtic, he was ſcrupulouſly exact, in the exerciſe of his function [YY], as well with regard to ſpiritual as temporal things. He was extremely exact and conſcientious in promoting the members of his choir according to their merit, and never advanced any perſon to a vicarage, who was not qualified in all reſpects in the higheſt degree [ZZ]. He could never be induced to take fines for any of the chapter-lands [AAA]. He always choſe to raiſe the rents, as the method leaſt oppreſſive to the preſent tenant, and moſt advantageous to all future tenants and landlords; he conſtantly refuſed to give charity out of the chapter-funds [BBB], which he alledged were ſcarce ſufficient to maintain the neceſſary repairs of the cathedral, and he expended more money to ſupport and adorn it, than had been applied to the ſame uſe in any period of equal length ſince it was firſt built. He was a faithful Guardian of the (wwww) He gave them board-wages at the higheſt rate, and if any of them left any part of their wages unreceived, he paid them intereſt for that time. Id. ibid.

[XX] He was open to admonition.] As an inſtance of this, we are told that in his Poem of Baucis and Philemon, which does not conſiſt of quite two hundred verſes, Mr Addiſon made him blot out fourſcore, add fourſcore, and alter fourſcore (135); to this may be added the following inſtance: It was cuſtomary with his friends to make him ſome little annual preſent on his birthday: Dr Delany, ſoon after he was admitted to ſome degree of intimacy, ſent him, with ſuch a memorial of his eſteem, ſome verſes, in which he upbraids him, though with great delicacy, for miſapplying his talents, and admoniſhes him to turn the force of his ridicule, of which he was ſo great a maſter, upon thoſe who had laboured to employ it againſt the ſacred doctrines of Chriſtianity. The Dean, as he had ſuffered Addiſon's correction with approbation, received the admonition with kindneſs: he ſighed, and ſaid, with great appearance of regret, that it was too late, and from that day, took all occaſions to diſtinguiſh Dr Delany by the name of friend (136). The Reader will find a third inſtance of this ſort, in the courſe of his work (137), in the caſe of a moſt ſevere reprehenſion from his friend Pope, which was apparently taken as kindly as it was meant.

(137) In the Article of Lord Bolingbroke, Vol. I. p. 3577. Rem. [FF].

[YY] He was exact in the exerciſe of his function.] In this reſpect he had one very ſingular practice. As he conſtantly attended the ſervice of the church, ſo as ſoon as the preacher mounted the pulpit, the Dean took out a pencil and a piece of paper, and carefully noted whatever was wrong both in the expreſſions and the manner in which they were delivered, whether they were too ſcholaſtic to be generally underſtood, or ſo coarſe and vulgar as was unbecoming the dignity and gravity of a ſermon: and he never failed to make theſe the ſubject of an admonition to the preacher as ſoon as he came into the chapter-houſe. We have already obſerved, that though he did not underſtand muſic, yet he always attended at the anthem to ſee that the choir did their duty; and notwithſtanding his want of ſkill in it, his power of ridicule extended even to muſic, of which he gave an inſtance too ſingular to be forgotten. Dr Pratt, who was the Provoſt of Dublin-college, had, in his travels, acquired much of the Italian taſte for this art, and Tom Roſſengrave, a celebrated performer, being juſt returned from Italy, played a voluntary one day at St Patrick's cathedral: the Doctor happened to dine at the deanery the ſame day, and was ſo extravagant in his encomiums on Roſſengrave's voluntary, that ſeveral of the company ſaid they wiſhed they had heard it. Do you? ſaid Swift; then you ſhall hear it ſtill; and immediately ſung out ſo lively, and yet ſo ridiculous an imitation of it, that all the company were kept in continual laughter till it was over; except one old gentleman, who ſat with great compoſure, and, though he liſtened, yet ſhewed neither curioſity nor approbation: after the entertainment he was aſked by ſome of the company, how it happened that he had been no more affected with the muſic? to which he anſwered, with great gravity, that he had heard Mr Roſſengrave himſelf play it before (138).

(138) Hawkeſworth, p. 37.

[ZZ] He was very conſcientious in diſpoſing of a vicarage.] He once refuſed a vicarage to a perſon, for whom the Lady Carteret was very importunate, though he declared to her Ladyſhip, that if it had been in his power to have made the Gentleman a Dean or a Biſhop, he would have obliged her willingly; becauſe, ſaid he, Deaneries and Biſhoprics are preferments in which merit hath no concern, though the merit of a vicar will be brought to the teſt every day (139).

(139) Letters ſigned J. R. p. 19.

[AAA] He never raiſed the fines, but the rents of the chapter-lands.] He once reſolved never to renew a certain leaſe belonging to the deanery, without raiſing the rent 30l. a year. The tenant had often ſolicited him, inſtead of raiſing the rent, to take a larger fine; and this man, a very ſhort time before the Dean had loſt his memory, urged him with a very large ſum, not doubting of ſucceſs from the Dean's known fondneſs for money. But the Dean maintained his integrity, refuſed the offer with indignation, and fulfilled his purpoſe of raiſing the rent, though at this time his memory was ſo bad, that the next day he did not remember what he had done; and his love of money ſo predominant over every thing but his virtue, that, though he complained of being deſerted, yet he baniſhed his beſt friends, merely to ſave the expence of entertaining them, and would ſometimes refuſe them a ſingle bottle of wine (140).

(140) Letters ſigned J. R. p. 145 and 208.

[BBB] He refuſed to give charity out of the chapter-funds.] When any perſon ſolicited ſuch an alienation, he uſed to tell them that this money was appropriated; but, ſays he, as you declare, that the perſon to be relieved is an object of Chriſtian charity, I will give out of my private purſe any ſum proportioned to my revenue, if you will contribute a ſum in the ſame proportion to yours; my deanery is worth 700l. per annum, your income is 200l. if you will give two ſhillings, I will give ſeven, or any larger ſum after the ſame rate (141).

rights of his Deanery, and even determined to aſſert his right of abſence againſt the Archbiſhop of Dublin, at the expence of ſeveral hundred pounds, when he did not believe he ſhould ever again claim the privileges for himſelf; becauſe he would not hurt his ſucceſſor by an injurious preſident (xxx). The poor, in the liberty of his Cathedral, were better regulated than any other in the kingdom: They were all badged, and were never found begging out of their diſtrict. For theſe, he built and furniſhed a little Alms-houſe, being aſſiſted by ſome voluntary contributions, and he preſerved among them uncommon cleanlineſs and decency, by conſtantly viſiting them in perſon. Nor was his care and kindneſs confined to his Cathedral; he improved his Living of Laracor, though he continued there but a ſhort time, and left both the houſe and glebe a convenient and agreeable retreat to his ſucceſſor, at a conſiderable expence (yyy). In his private capacity, he was not only charitable but generous, and whatever miſanthropy may be found in his writings, there does not appear to have been any in his life. His writings in defence of the poor people of Ireland are well known, and that he might not be wanting himſelf, while he pleaded their cauſe with others, he conſtantly lent out a large ſum of money in ſmall portions to honeſt, induſtrious, and neceſſitous tradeſmen, upon eaſy terms [CCC]. Beſides this, he frequently gave five and ten pounds, without any parade, when proper objects offered. He was diligent to relieve the poor, and at the ſame time, to encourage induſtry, even in the loweſt ſtation; he uſed regularly to viſit a great number of poor, chiefly women, as well in the public ſtreets, as in the bye allies, and under the arches of Dublin [DDD]. If he was not exempt from the infirmity of loving money, yet he was clear of the vice. If his œconomy degenerated into avarice, it muſt be confeſſed it did not contract his bounty. He turned all the evil of exceſſive frugality upon himſelf; it induced him to walk when he had been uſed to ride, and he would then ſay, he had earned a ſhilling or eighteen-pence, which he had a right to do what he pleaſed with, and which he conſtantly applied to his uſual charities, which by this expedient he could continue, and yet expend leſs upon the whole than before [EEE]. Whilſt he abounded in charity, he was not leſs diligent in the practice of other virtues, or leſs devout and conſtant in the ſolemnities of religion. He was remarkably temperate, both in eating and drinking. He was not only juſt but punctual in his dealings, and he had an inviolable regard for truth. As he conſtantly attended divine worſhip when he was at home, ſo he uſed always to go early to church when he was in London, and never to ſleep without aſſembling his family in his own chamber to prayers. An abhorrence of hypocriſy was a ſtriking particular in his character; he even carried it to ſuch an exceſs, that it is not eaſy to determine, whether it was more a virtue than a vice; for it brought upon him the charge of irreligion, and encouraged others to be irreligious. In proportion as he abhorred hypocriſy, he dreaded the imputation of it, and therefore concealed his piety with as much diligence, as others conceal their vices, which cuſtom has not made reputable [FFF]. As his abhorrence of hypocriſy exempted him from affectation, the natural equity of his mind ſecured him againſt envy. He cultivated genius wherever he found it, and in whatever degree, with great zeal and aſſiduity, and would frequently ſpend much time in correcting and improving any literary compoſition [CCC] He lent large ſums upon eaſy terms.] The money was repaid, with a ſmall gratuity by way of intereſt, to the perſon who kept the account of the diſburſements and weekly payment; for he received back theſe loans by a certain ſum out of the weekly profit of the borrower's trade in ſuch proportions as the whole ſhould be repaid in a year (142).

[DDD] He viſited the poor in bye allies.] Some of theſe ſold plumbs, ſome hobnails, others tape, and others gingerbread, ſome knitted, ſome darned ſtockings, and others cobbled ſhoes; theſe women were moſt of them old, deformed, or crippled, and ſome were all three. He ſaluted them with great kindneſs, aſked how they throve, and what ſtock they had; if the ware of any of them was ſuch as he could poſſibly uſe, or pretend to uſe, he bought ſome, and paid for every halfpenny-worth ſixpence; if not, he always added ſomething to their ſtock, and ſtrictly charged them to be induſtrious and honeſt (143).

(143) Letter ſigned J. R. p. 132, 133.

[EEE] Yet expend leſs upon the whole than before.] The diſtribution even of this charity was marked with the peculiarity of his temper; for, that he might proportion his bounty to the neceſſities and the merit of various objects, and yet give but one piece of money at a time, he conſtantly kept a pocket full of all ſorts of coin from a ſilver threepence to a crown piece (144). Some of theſe poor people, to whom he uſed to give money when he met them in his walks, he named, partly for diſtinction and partly for humour, Cancerina, Stumpa-nympha, Pull-a-gown-a, Friterilla, Flora, Stumpantha. In a letter to Dr Sheridan he writes thus: 'No ſoul has broke his neck, or is hanged, or married; 'only Cancerina is dead, and I let her go to her grave 'without a coffin and without fees (145).'

(145) His Letter, No. XXXIII. dated Dublin, March 7, 1733.

[FFF] He concealed his piety with diligence.] His conſtant attendance at church when he was at the deanery, he knew would be conſidered as the duty of his ſtation; but whatever had the appearance of voluntary devotion he always took care to hide: when he went to church in London, it was early in the morning; ſo that, though he was conſtantly at prayers and at the ſacrament, yet he appeared to neglect both, as he was at home when others were at church; and, when he went to prayers in his family, the ſervants aſſembled at the appointed hour as it were by ſtealth, without notice from a bell, or any other call except the ſtriking of a clock: ſo that Dr Delany was ſix months in his family, before he ſuſpected him of this unfaſhionable practice.

The ſame principle, upon which he thus ſtudiouſly avoided the appearance of good, made him frequently incur appearances of evil, eſpecially when an opportunity offered of indulging his peculiar vein of humour. One inſtance of this has already been given (146); but there are others leſs excuſable. Soon after he was made Dean of St Patrick's, he had dined one Sunday with Dr Raymond, Vicar of Trim; and when the bell had rung, and the people were aſſembled to evening prayers at the church, which was not above two hundred yards diſtant, 'Raymond, ſaid he, I'll lay you a 'crown that I begin prayers before you this afternoon.' Dr Raymond accepted the wager; and they both ran as faſt as they could to church. Raymond, being much nimbler than Swift, arrived firſt at the door, and, entring the church, walked decently towards the reading deſk; Swift never ſlackened his pace; but running up the iſle, left Dr Raymond behind him in the middle of it, and ſtepping into the deſk, without putting on a ſurplice, or opening the book, began the ſervice in an audible voice, and thus won his wager (147).

that had the leaſt appearance of ingenuity [GGG]. As a Writer, he had no equal. His ſtyle is maſterly, correct, and ſtrong, never diffuſive, yet always clear; and if we conſider it in compariſon of his Predeceſſors, he has out-done them all, and is one, perhaps the chief, of thoſe few ſelect Engliſh Writers, who have excelled in elegance and propriety of language (zzz). In politics, his favourite topic, he appears like a maſterly gladiator; he wields the ſword of party with eaſe, juſtneſs, and dexterity, and while he entertains the ignorant and the vulgar, he draws an equal attention from the learned and the great [HHH]. When he is ſerious, his gravity becomes him; when he laughs, his readers muſt laugh with him. In poetry, he would not take pains to excel; but became, in ſome meaſure, ſuperior to it, and aſſumed more the air and manner of a Critic, than a Poet (aaaa). But what ſhall be ſaid for his love of trifles, and his want of delicacy and decorum (bbbb)? Forgive him theſe errors, and draw a veil over certain excreſcences of wit and humour; you will then admire him as an honour to the public, and a ſcourge to all the knaves and fools of his time. Upon the whole, his conduct was greatly variegated, ſo much as to appear even capricious and contradictory. However, if we look a little deeper than the ſurface, theſe ſeeming contradictions will be found to ariſe from the ſame principles. Swift was naturally temperate and chaſte, it was therefore eaſy for him to be frugal; but he was alſo naturally high-ſpirited, and therefore as wealth is the pledge of independance, it is not ſtrange his frugality ſhould verge to exceſs. However, as he acted upon Chriſtian principles of general virtue, he did not deliver himſelf up to natural propenſions, when contrary to his duty; and therefore his love of money did not contract his charity to the poor, or defraud his ſucceſſors to enrich himſelf. The ſame ſpirit which ſecured his integrity, by diſdaining the meanneſs of a lye, produced that dread of hypocriſy which concealed his piety, and betrayed him into appearances of evil; and the ſame want of natural tenderneſs which made him obdurate and auſtere, transferred the diſtribution of his liberality from inſtinct to religion. Such was Jonathan Swift, whoſe life, with all the advantages of genius and learning, was a ſcale of infelicity, gradually aſcending, till pain and anguiſh deſtroyed the faculties by which they were felt. An inſtructive leſſon to teach the wiſe humility, and the ſimple content. The firſt authentic edition of his Works was printed at Dublin in eight Volumes, 8vo. (ccc); after this ſeveral editions were printed at London (dddd), the laſt of which came out in 1755, in ſix Volumes 4to, with his life prefixed by John Hawkeſworth; and again in twelve Volumes, 8vo, 1761. The Doctor had begun a Hiſtory of England, and had purſued it through two or three reigns from William the Conqueror; but the contempt which he conceived of our ancient Monarchs, made him ſoon lay the deſign aſide (eeee).

[HHH] Mr Melmouth has lately opened the ſecret.] He obſerves, that Swift's ſtyle has this peculiarity, not to have one metaphor in his works. His images are ſurprizingly unexpected, and exhibited in their true, genuine, native form; this ſtrikes the greateſt: and, being fetched generally from common life, they captivate the loweſt of the people (148). Hence he appears a Beggar among Beggars, and a King among Kings. P

SYDENHAM [Dr THOMAS], a learned Phyſician, and of very great practice, in the XVIIth century, was the ſon of William Sydenham of Winford Eagle in Dorſetſhire Eſq; and born there in the year 1624 [A]. In Midſummer-term, 1642, he was entered a Commoner of Magdalen-hall in Oxford: But leaving the univerſity when it became a garriſon for the uſe of King Charles I, he went to London. There he fell accidentally into the company of Dr Thomas Cox, a noted and eminent Phyſician, who finding him to be a perſon of more than ordinary parts, encouraged and put him into a method to ſtudy phyſic at his return to the univerſity. Upon the delivery of that place to the Parliament's forces, in 1646, he retired again to Magdalen-hall (a), and entering on the Phyſic Line, was created Batchelor in that faculty April 14, 1648 (b), not having before taken any degree in Arts. About that time, ſubmitting to the authority of the Viſitors appointed by Parliament, he was, by means of a near relation of his, made Fellow of All-Souls College, in the room of one ejected at the Penbrochian Viſitation. Having continued ſome years there, and ſtudied Phyſic with the utmoſt induſtry and application, he left the univerſity without his Doctor's degree, which he took afterwards at Cambridge; and ſettling at Weſtminſter, practiſed his faculty with the utmoſt ſucceſs and reputation: ſo that he was eſteemed the chief Phyſician in that city from the year 1660 to 1670. He was particularly famous for the cool regimen which he preſcribed in the Small-pox [B], and

[B] He was particularly famous for the cool regimen which he preſcribed in the Small-pox.] When he firſt began to practiſe; 'the common method in faſhion 'among the moſt eminent Phyſicians, both of the 'Court and City, was to uſe their utmoſt endeavours 'to ſubdue the malignity and putrefaction, which, in 'their judgment, tainted and diſſolved the blood in 'the confluent kind of ſmall-pox, by the uſe of the moſt 'generous and active medicines; ſuch as Venice-treacle, 'Virginian ſnake-root, contrayerva, zedoary, ſaffron, 'volatile ſalt of hartſhorn, powder of viper's fleſh, and 'the like. But Dr Sydenham fell upon the cold regi- 'men, and diſcharged all the train of warm alexi- 'pharmic remedies, ſuch as thoſe here enumerated, 'and inſtituted a method of practice the reverſe to theirs. 'For he opened not only the curtains round the bed, 'but often the windows likewiſe to let in freſh air into 'the room; took the ſick perſons out of bed, and plied 'them conſtantly with diluting and attempering, or 'with and that has been almoſt univerſally followed ſince, to the inexpreſſible benefit of Mankind, as it hath preſerved millions of Lives. He was famous alſo for his method of giving the bark after the paroxyſm, or return of the fit, in agues; and for his uſe of laudanum (c). In the latter part of his life, he was Licentiate of the College of Phyſicians; and, at the requeſt chiefly of his friends, he communicated at divers times to the world, the uſeful Obſervations he made in the courſe of his practice [C]. Having for a long time been

' with acid and cooling remedies. In the mean time ' he often, through the ſeveral ſtages of the diſtemper, ' preſcribed ſix drachms or an ounce of ſyrup of white ' poppies to be taken in the evening, or at the begin- ' ning of the night, and to be repeated, and the doſe ' to be increaſed, as great wakefulneſs and inquietude ' ſhould demand.' This account we give in Sir Richard Blackmore's words (2). But we cannot help obſerving, how injuriouſly he treats Dr Sydenham, in the ſame place; when he aſcribes this practice of his not to ſkill and judgment, but to obſtinacy, and downright oppoſition to the reſt of the faculty. . . ' Our moſt celebrated ' Phyſicians (ſaith Sir Richard) before Dr Sydenham ' declared for the hot regimen; but that Doctor having ' taken a reſolution at his firſt entering upon the prac- ' tice of Phyſic, as he himſelf aſſured me in converſa- ' tion, to act directly contrary in all caſes to the common ' method then in faſhion among the moſt eminent ' Phyſicians, (and he told me his reaſons for it) in con- ' formity to the deſign, did, in the management of ' this diſeaſe, as well as others, oppoſe the common ' method of the Phyſicians of the Court and City.' But it appears from the Doctor's own obſervations, that he grounded his practice upon more rational principles than oppoſition. Of which take the following ſpecimen (3) . . . ' To me, ſaith he, indeed it ſeems agree- ' able to reaſon, that the longer Nature is in working ' and perfecting ſeparation, ſo the ebullition be not ' quite torpid, ſo much the more certainly and uni- ' verſally the ſeparation is performed; and upon its ' being ſo finiſhed, it is neceſſary that the ſucceſs of ' the following cure muſt eſpecially depend, as from ' the contrary method the event of the buſineſs muſt be ' quite contrary; for from that hot regimen no good ' comes, as from over-haſty fruit no advantage; ſeeing ' it frequently happens, that the patient falls either ' downright into a phrenzy, or, which is worſe, great ' ſweats ariſe, whereby particles not fit for ſeparation, ' nor anſwering the nature of pus (which very pus not- ' withſtanding is the genuine product of this ſeparation) ' are ejected, or the ſmall-pox being too much forced ' out, by giving cordials, and by a hot regimen, run ' all into one, a ſad ſpectacle, and that threatens a fatal ' event: and theſe and the like ſymptoms are uſually ' occaſioned by theſe errors; whereas I never obſerved ' any miſchief from the other method, for Nature, left ' to herſelf, does her work in her own time, and ſe- ' parates, and then expels the matter in the right way ' and manner.'. . . Elſewhere, he lays it down for a rule, Quo ſedatior eſt ſanguis, eo melius erumpent puſtulæ, i. e. The calmer the blood is, the better will the puſtles of the ſmall-pox come out (4).

[C] He communicated at divers times to the world the uſeful Obſervations he made in the courſe of his practice.] They ſeem to have been moſtly drawn, not to ſay extorted, from him by his friends: ſome of them being written by way of letter to Gentlemen that deſired his opinion, or preſſed him to make public what obſervations he had made; conceiving a very high opinion of his abilities, from what he had already publiſhed. They came out in the following order; I. Methodus curandi Febres, propriis obſervationibus ſuperſtructa, i. e. The method of curing Fevers, founded upon his own obſervations. Lond. 1666. 4to. Reprinted ſeveral times at London, and alſo at Amſterdam, Leiden, Leipſic, Geneva, &c. J. Pechey, M. D. hath tranſlated them into Engliſh, in one volume, 8vo, intituled, ' The whole ' works of that excellent practical Phyſician, Dr Tho- ' mas Sydenham. Wherein not only the Hiſtory and ' Cures of acute Diſeaſes are treated of, after a new ' and accurate method; but alſo the ſhorteſt and ſafeſt ' way of curing moſt chronical Diſeaſes.' . . . And another tranſlation of them by J. Swan, M. D. was publiſhed in 1749. 8vo.

Theſe " incomparable Treatiſes, as Dr Goodall rightly obſerves (5), are drawn (as it were by another Hippocrates) from his moſt exact and nice obſervation of Diſeaſes, and their ſymptomes; to which are added moſt judicious natural Hypotheſes, and curative Indications, deduced from them. He hath given ſuch an exact hiſtory of all acute diſeaſes, from the beginning of 1661, to 1680, that there is ſcarcely a ſentence to be found therein, which is not of moment. Several weighty obſervations are likewiſe taken notice of by this ſagacious Phyſician, which other Authors have omitted, as particularly the ſeveral conſtitutions of the Air ſpecifically different, which depend not upon the manifeſt qualities thereof, but upon ſome inexplicable cauſes, and produce Diſeaſes as ſpecifically different, which Conſtitutions, after ſome time, give place one to another; and are accompanied with a peculiar and ſpecifically different Fever, both as to its ſymptomes and cure; theſe Fevers he calls ſtationary, diſtinguiſhing them from the ſporadique, or intercurrent Fevers, depending upon the manifeſt qualities or alterations of the Air; the Ptyaliſme that attends adult perſons, and the Diarrhœa which uſually accompanies Children in the Flux-pox; the day when the Ptyaliſme ordinarily ceaſeth, been troubled with the Gout (d); about the year 1670, he began to be more sorely afflicted with that excruciating diſtemper; which much hindered his practice, and his great uſefulneſs in the world. After having greatly ſuffered by it, he died at his houſe in Pall-Mall, Weſtminſter, December 29, 1689, and was buried in the ſouth iſle of St James's Church. He was a learned man, of a ſolid judgment, and a florid Writer; of a generous and public ſpirit, great integrity, and very charitable (e). The character given of him by Sir Richard Blackmore, is both falſe and injurious [D].

(d) See his Treatiſe of the Gout, about the beginning: When he wrote that Treatiſe he had been thirty-four years troubled with it.

Dr Sydenham's eldeſt brother, named William, was engaged, and zealous, in the Parliament's Service; a Colonel; Governor of Weymouth, and of the Iſle of Wight; Member of Cromwell's Parliaments, one of the Commiſſioners of the Treaſury, &c. (f). His eldeſt daughter, Mary, was married to Walter Thornhill of Wareham in Dorſetſhire, and by him had the late celebrated Painter, Sir James Thornhill Knight.

ceaſeth, with the danger enſuing thereupon; the great tendency to ſymptomatical ſweats, in the diſtinct Pox; Convulſions in Children before the eruption of the Small-pox, which he obſerveth to be the uſual prognoſtick of a mild diſtemper; the mania or frenzy following Agues, with the different cure it requires; the Jaundiſe, obſervable at the going off of the colica hyſterica; the limpid Urine, which he aſſerts to be the moſt univerſal and pathognomonick ſign of hyſterical and hypochondriacal affections; which diſeaſes do frequently aſſume the ſhape of nephritick and colical diſtempers, yet are really different, both in their original and cure; with many of the like kind, diſperſed throughout his Book."

It appears from his writings, That he regulated his Practice more by his own Obſervations and Enquiries, than by the method either of his predeceſſors or contemporaries.

There was among Biſhop More's MSS. 'Theologia Rationalis, by Dr Sydenham the famous Phyſician:' which we ſuppoſe is now, among the reſt of his books, in the public Library of the Univerſity of Cambridge.

[D] The character given of him by Sir Richard Blackmore, is both falſe and injurious.] It is in his Treatiſe upon the Small-pox (6) that he gives this character of Dr Sydenham. 'For, having obſerved, that 'a man 'of good ſenſe, vivacity, and ſpirit, may arrive to 'the higheſt rank of Phyſicians without the aſſiſtance 'of great Erudition, and the knowledge of Books;' ... 'This (adds he) was the caſe of Dr Sydenham, who 'became an able and eminent Phyſician, though he 'never deſigned to take up the profeſſion till the 'civil wars were compoſed; and then being a diſband-'ed officer, he entered upon it for a maintenance, 'without any learning preparatory for the undertaking 'of it. And to ſhew the reader what contempt he 'had for writings in Phyſic, when one day I aſked 'him to adviſe me what books I ſhould read to qualify 'me for practice, he replied, Read Don Quixote, it is 'a very good book, I read it ſtill. So low an opinion 'had this celebrated man of the learning collected out 'of the authors, his predeceſſors. And a late cele-'brated Phyſician (7), whoſe judgment was univerſally 'relied upon as almoſt infallible in his profeſſion, uſed 'to ſay, as I am well informed, that when he died, he 'would leave behind him the whole myſtery of Phyſic in 'half a ſheet of paper. It is true, both theſe Doctors 'carried the matter much too far by vilifying Learn-'ing, of which they were no maſters, and perhaps 'for that reaſon.'—In this paſſage there are ſeveral miſtakes. For it is falſe, that Dr Sydenham was a diſbanded officer—that he never deſigned to take up the profeſſion of Phyſic till the civil wars were compoſed—that he did it for a maintenance; for his father was a gentleman of a plentiful eſtate (8). And his ſtyle and manner of writing plainly ſhew, that he had all the learning preparatory for any Science. ... As for the advice, here mentioned, it was plainly a banter; and ſhews, what low opinion the Doctor had of the then young Mr Blackmore's genius and capacity, and that he thought him fitter to ſtudy Don Quixote than Phyſic. ... It ſeems Sir Richard was ſeverely cenſured, for the mean Reflexions he had here made upon Learning. For, in another place (9), he is forced to make an apology for himſelf, in the following words ..... 'Some Gentlemen have been diſingenuous and unjuſt 'to me, by wreſting and forcing my meaning in the 'Preface to another book, as if I condemned and ex-'poſed all Learning, though they knew I declared, 'that I greatly honoured and eſteemed all men of ſu-'perior Literature, and Erudition, and that I only 'undervalued falſe or ſuperficial Learning, that ſigni-'fies nothing for the Service of Mankind; and that as 'to Phyſick, I expreſly affirmed, that Learning muſt 'be joined with native Genius to make a Phyſician of 'the firſt rank; but if thoſe talents are ſeparated, I 'aſſerted, and do ſtill inſiſt, that a man of native Sa-'gacity and Diligence, will prove a more able and uſeful 'Practiſer, than a heavy notional Scholar, encumbered 'with a heap of confuſed Ideas: For I never ſhall be con-'vinced, that a man, either of a dull Thought and a 'cloudy Imagination, let his head be ever ſo much ſtuffed 'with undigeſted notions; nor on the other hand, one 'who is a meer rattle, and pertly inſignificant, or of-'fenſive by a ſtrong infuſion of the coxcomb in his make, 'will ever prove a good Phyſician.'

SYDENHAM, at length, a mighty Genius, came,
Who founded Medicine on a nobler Frame.
Who ſtudied Nature through, and Nature's Laws,
Nor blindly puzzled for the peccant cauſe.
Father of Phyſick He .... Immortal Name!
Who leaves the Grecian but a ſecond fame:
Sing forth, ye Muſes, in ſublimer ſtrains,
A new Hippocrates in Britain reigns;
With every healing Plant his grave adorn,
Saviour of many Millions yet unborn:
Forgive this Tribute to the glorious Dead,
You knew The Man, whom I have only read;
More is his Due who freed me from the Rules
Of tyrant Notions, and pedantick Schools.
Keep him ye humbler Sons of Art in view,
Hopeleſs to teach, ambitious to purſue.

The great Mr Locke wrote a Poem, in praiſe of our learned Author's Method of curing Fevers, which is prefixed to his works in Latin. We have reaſon to wonder, that it is not inſerted in the collection of Mr Locke's works, three Volumes folio, together with the ſame Author's two Poems on the Peace between England and the United Provinces in 1654 (11); ſince, without them, his works are not compleat.

SYDNEY, or SIDNEY [Sir PHILIP], the darling of his time, was the eldeſt ſon of Sir Henry Sydney [A], by Mary his wife, eldeſt daughter of John Dudley Duke of Northumberland.

[A] Was the eldeſt ſon of Sir Henry Sidney.] The Sidney family, anciently ſeated at Cranley in Surrey, and Kingeſham in Suſſex, derive themſelves lineally from Sir William Sidney, Knt, that came out of Anjou with King Henry II, who then made him his Chamberlain.——From him deſcended Sir William Sidney, Knt, a brave officer by ſea and land in King Henry VIIIth's reign, Chamberlain, and Steward to that King. He died Feb. 11. 1552-3, leaving Henry his ſon and heir, mentioned above. This Henry was from his infancy bred at Court, being a companion, and many times a bed-fellow to Prince Edward, afterwards King Edward VI, who, when he came to the crown, made him principal Gentleman of his Privy chamber; knighted him in 1549; and ſent him embaſſador to France, when he was but two and twenty years of age; and, in 1550, conſtituted thumberland (a). He was born the 29th of November, 1554, at Penſhurſt in Kent, as is ſuppoſed, and had his Chriſtian name given him by his father, from King Philip (b), then lately married to Queen Mary I. While very young [B], he was at ſchool at Shrewſbury, being near to his father, then Lord Preſident of Wales; and ſo forward in his learning, that at twelve years of age, he ſent two Letters to his father, one in Latin, and the other in French; to which the father returned a moſt excellent anſwer, which is inſerted in the note (c) [C]. Soon after he was ſent, for his better education, to Chriſt's-Church-college in Oxford; where continuing till he was about ſeventeen years of age, under the tuition of Dr Thomas Thornton, Canon of that houſe (d), he made an incredible proficiency in all conſtituted him his chief Cup-bearer for life. In the 2d and 3d of Philip and Mary, he was made Vice-Treaſurer, and general manager of the royal revenue, within the kingdom of Ireland. And, two years after, Juſtice of Ireland, in the Lord Deputy's abſence; as he was thrice afterwards. In the 2d of Queen Elizabeth, anno 1560, he was appointed Lord Preſident of Wales; and, in 1563, ſent embaſſador to France, and to Scotland. The year following, he was created a Knight of the Garter. And, April 7, 1567, conſtituted Deputy of Ireland; as he was again in 1575, and 1576. During his firſt deputation, he ſuppreſſed the rebellion of Shan O-Neile, and ſet the head of that rebel on the top of Dublin-caſtle. In the ſecond, he ſuppreſſed the moſt dangerous inſurrection, begun, and long continued by ſome of the Butlers. And in the third, the commotion made by the Earl of Clanrickard and his two ſons. Upon his firſt arrival as Deputy there, he cauſed the old ſtatutes for the aboliſhing of coin and livery to be revived, and put in due execution; and deviſed that the remoter Provinces ſhould be governed by Preſidents. He diſtributed the country into ſhires, for the currency of her Majeſty's writs. And increaſed the revenues of the Crown 10000l. a year. He built the bridge of Athlone over the great river Shanon; began the walling and fortifying of the town of Carrick-fergus in Ulſter; rebuilt the town of Athenry in Conaught; ſtrengthened Athlone with gates, and other fortifications; laid the foundation of the bridge at Caterlogh; made a ſtrong gaol at Molingar, &c. He likewiſe built convenient rooms in the caſtle of Dublin, for the preſervation of the Records of that kingdom, that lay neglected; and cauſed the Statutes of Ireland to be printed, which before had never been publiſhed. Alſo, while he was Lord Preſident of Wales, he repaired the caſtle at Ludlow, then in great decay, and erected divers new buildings therein. He was a man of a very public ſpirit, of great abilities, modeſt, pious, and patient; and, in his younger years, for comelineſs and beauty, the ornament of the court (1).

[B] While he was very young.] His intimate acquaintance and companion, Sir Fulke Grevil, informs us (2), that he was, even from his tendereſt years, a child of very uncommon parts.

'Of whoſe Youth, ſaith he, I will report no other 'wonder, but this; That though I lived with him, 'and knew him from a child, yet I never knew him 'other than a man: with ſuch ſtaiedneſs of mind, love-'ly, and familiar gravity, as carried grace, and reve-'rence above greater years. His talk ever of know-'ledge, and his very play tending to enrich his mind; 'ſo as even his teachers found ſomething in him to 'obſerve, and learn, above that which they had uſually 'read, or taught. Which eminence by nature, and 'induſtry, made his worthy father ſtile Sir Philip in 'my hearing (though I unſeen) Lumen familiæ ſuæ:' the light of his family.

[C] To which the father returned a moſt excellent anſwer.] It was as follows: 'I have received two letters from 'you, one written in Latine, the other in French; 'which I take in good parte, and will yow to exerciſe 'that practiſe of Learning often: For that will ſtand 'yow in moſte ſteade, in that profeſſion of lyf that yow 'are born to live in. And, ſince this ys my firſt Letter 'that ever I did write to yow, I will not, that yt be all 'emptie of ſome Advyſes, which my naturall Care of 'yow provokethe me to wiſhe yow to followe, as Do-'cuments to yow in this your tendre age. Let your 'firſt Actyon be, the Lyfting up of your Mynd to 'Almighty God, by harty Prayer, and felyngly dyſgeſt 'the woords yow ſpeak in prayer, with contynual me-'ditation, and thinkinge of him to whom yow praye, 'and of the matter for which yow praye. And uſe 'this as an ordinarye, at, and at an ordinarye hower. 'Whereby the Time ytſelf will put you in remem-'braunce to doe that, which you are accuſtomed to doe. 'In that tyme apply your ſtudy to ſuch houres as your 'diſcrete Maſter doth aſſigne yow, earneſtlye; and the 'Time (I knowe) he will ſo lymitt as ſhal be both 'ſufficient for your Learninge, and ſaf for your Health. 'And mark the Sens, and the Matter of that you reade, 'as well as the Woordes. So ſhall yow bothe enrieche 'your Tonge with Woordes, and your Wytte with 'Matter; and Judgment will growe as Yeares growyth 'in yow. Be humble and obedient to your Maſter, 'for unles yow frame yourſelfe to obey others; yea, 'and feale in your ſelfe, what Obedience ys; yow ſhall 'never be able to teach others how to obey yow. Be 'curteeſe of geſture, and affable to all men, with di-'verſitee of reverence, accordinge to the dignitie of 'the perſon. Ther ys nothinge, that wynneth ſo muche 'with ſo lytell coſt. Vſe moderate Dyet, ſo as, after 'your meate, yow may find your wytte freſher, and 'not duller, and your body more lyvely, and not more 'heavye. Seldom drinke wine, and yet ſometime doe, 'leaſt, being enforced to drink upon the ſodayne, yow 'ſhould find yourſelf inflamed. Vſe Exercife of Bodye, 'but ſuch as ys without peryll of your yointes or bones. 'It will encreaſe your force, and enlardge your breathe. 'Delight to be cleanly, as well in all partes of your 'bodye, as in your garments. It ſhall make you grate-'full in yche company, and otherwiſe lothſome. Give 'yourſelf to be merye, for yow degenerate from your 'father, yf yow find not yourſelf moſt able in wytte 'and bodye, to doe any thinge, when yow be moſt 'merye: But let your myrthe be ever void of all 'ſcurilitee, and bitinge woords to any man, for an 'wound given by a woorde is oftentimes harder to be 'cured, then that which is given with the ſwerd. Be 'you rather a herer, and bearer away of other mens 'Talke, then a begynner or procurer of ſpeeche, other-'wiſe yow ſhall be counted to delight to hear yourſelf 'ſpeake. Yf you heare a wiſe ſentence, or an apt 'phraſe, commytte yt to your memorye, with reſpecte 'of the circumſtaunce, when yow ſhall ſpeak yt. Let 'never Othe be hard to come out of your mouthe, nor 'word of rybaudrye; deteſt yt in others, ſo ſhall cuſ-'tome make to yourſelf a lawe againſt hit in yourſelf. 'Be modeſt in ych aſſemble, and rather be rebuked of 'light Felowes for meden-like ſhamefaſtnes, then of 'your ſad Frends for pearte boldnes. Thinke upon 'every woorde that you will ſpeak, before yow utter 'hit, and remembre how Nature hath rampered up (as 'yt were) the Tonge, with teeth, lippes, yea and here 'without the lippes, and all betokeninge raynes, or 'bridles, for the looſe uſe of that membre. Above 'all thinges tell no Untruthe, no not in triſels. kind kind of learning (e). Upon his leaving the univerſity, in 1572, he was ſent to travel [D]; and, though aged but eighteen, gained reverence and eſteem among ſome of the moſt learned men abroad (f). Charles IX, King of France, under pretence of being taken with his knowledge and extraordinary merit, made him one of the Gentlemen of his Chamber [E]. But it was juſtly thought, that this was only one of the treacherous favours heaped by that baſe Prince on the Proteſtants, in order to trepan Admiral Coligni and his adherents to Paris, at the King of Navarre's wedding; when the Proteſtants, fancying themſelves ſecure by that marriage, were barbarouſly maſſacred on the 24th of Auguſt, 1572 (g). In that extremity of danger, Mr Sidney ſecured himſelf by taking refuge in the houſe of Sir Francis Walſingham (b), Embaſſador there from the Queen of England. Thence he went through Lorrain, and by Straſburg and Heidelberg, in September or October following, to Francford: where he lodged in the houſe of the famous Printer Wechel, and by that means became acquainted with the learned Hubert Languet, a lodger in the ſame houſe; who conceived the utmoſt tenderneſs and affection for him, as appears by his letters [F]. Continuing his travels in Germany, he arrived at Vienna in May 1573, where he met Languet, and ſtayed with him till September, when he went into Hungary, and parts adjacent. He paſſed next into Italy, where he remained all the winter following, and moſt of the ſummer 1574, and then returned with Languet into Germany. The next ſpring, he came back by Francford, Heidelberg, and Antwerp, into England, where he arrived about May 1575 (i). In the year 1576, when not above one and twenty years old, he was ſent by Queen Elizabeth to condole the death of the Emperor Maximilian II, and to congratulate his ſucceſſor, Rodolph II, upon his new dignity. But under the ſhadow of this compliment, he waited, at the ſame time, upon ſuch of the German Princes, as were intereſted in the defence and preſervation of the Proteſtant Religion, or their own native Liberties; and prevailed upon them to enter into a religious League with England. He alſo took an opportunity, to condole with the Elector Palatine's ſons on the death of their father, Frederic III; and to demand of Count Caſimir, the money Queen Elizabeth had diſburſed for the wars in France (k) [G]. The next year, in his return, he waited upon that gallant Prince, Don John of Auſtria, Governor of the Low-Countries for the King of Spain, and William Prince of Orange: by the former of which, though received at firſt as a youth, a ſtranger, and an enemy; yet after ſome converſation, he was ſo ſtruck with him, that the beholders wondered to ſee, what tribute that brave and high-minded Prince paid to his worth, giving more honour and reſpect to this hopeful young Gentleman, than to the Embaſſadors of mighty Princes (l). In 1579, when a marriage was in agitation between Queen Elizabeth and Francis Duke of Alençon, or Anjou [H], Mr Sidney, though neither Magiſtrate nor Counſellor, took the liberty humbly,

[D] In 1572, he was ſent to travel] Sir Fulke Grevil ſays (4), that he was ſent to travel 'at fourteen 'years old,' which ſurely muſt be a great miſtake (5). His words are theſe: 'Are not the Arts and Languages, which enabled him to Travel at fourteen years old, and in his Travail to win reverence amongſt the chief Learned men abroad, witneſſes beyond exception, that there was great inequality of worth and goodneſſe in him? Inſtance that reverend Languet, mentioned for honour's ſake in Sir Philip's Arcadia, learned uſque ad miraculum, &c.' But this is not the only miſtake in that ill-written Life: For what follows ſoon after, is equally full of faults . . . 'So as this reverend Languet, orderly ſequeſtered from his ſeverall funftions under a mighty King, and Saxonie the greateſt Prince of Germany, became a nurſe of knowledge to this hopefull young Gentleman, and without any other hire, or motive than this ſympathy of affections, accompanied him in the whole courſe of his three years travail.'——But it is certain, that Languet did not quit his other employments to accompany Mr Sidney in his three years travel.——'The like miſtakes, as A. Wood obſerves (6), are in that Life, concerning Languet's coming into England in February 1573, onely to ſee that excellent plant of his own poliſhing, at which time, it is ſaid, he was ſixty-ſix years of age, whereas he was but ſixty-one; that alſo he and Sidney parted at the Sea, which could not be, for Duke John Caſimire, with whom he came, went away ſo ſuddenly, that Languet could not take leave of him.'

[F] As appears by his Letters.] Theſe Letters of Hubert Languet to Sir Philip Sydney, were publiſhed at Francfort, in 1633. 12mo. and reprinted in 1646, with the beautiful types of Elzevir, 12mo. and the ſame year at Groningen. The title of them is, 'Huberti Langueti Epiſtolæ Politicæ et 'Hiſtoricæ ad Philippum Sydnæum equitem Anglum 'illuſtriſſimi Proregis Hyberniæ filium, Vliſſingenſem 'Gubernatorem.' In theſe Letters, are uncommon ſtrains of the utmoſt Affection, Tenderneſs, and Eſteem for Sir Philip; and they are written in a moſt pure and elegant Latin ſtyle.

[G] The money Queen Elizabeth had diſburſed for the wars in France.] In the Caſtrations to Holinſhed's Chronicle (8), it is obſerved, That Mr Sidney performed all theſe Commiſſions 'in ſuch exquiſit order, and adviſed wiſe courſe, omitting nothing he ſhould doo, 'nor fupplieng anie thing he ſhould not doo in ceremonie or otherwiſe, as he exceedinglie therein ſatisfied 'hir Majeſtie, both by his letters and report, and wan 'to himſelfe great credit and ſingular commendation.'

[H] In 1579, when a marriage was in agitation between Queen Elizabeth, and Francis Duke of Alençon.] Mr Strype hath placed this under the year 1572, which is void of all probability: for, it is not credible that Mr Sidney ſhould thus addreſs the Queen, when he was but a youth of about eighteen. Mr Strype mentions it again under the year 1579, but very imperfectly; and refers to the Letter in the Appendix, No XIX. which is not to be found there (9). It is at length in the Cabala (10). Perhaps he was miſled by the titles of Alençon and Anjou, which belonged to the ſame perſon.

He was naturally of a warm and high ſpirit, ſo jealous of his honour and reputation, that he could not brook the leaſt intrenchment on either, from his equals or inferiors [K], nor even from perſons of the higheſt rank. That quarrel occaſioned his retiring from the Court in 1580: during which receſs, he wrote his eloquent and entertaining

[I] Mr Sidney, though neither Magiſtrate nor Counſellor, took the liberty humbly and privately by letter.] The minutes of that letter are printed in Mr Strype's Annals of the Reformation (11). But it is printed at length in the Cabala (12), as I have juſt now ſaid.——In it, he uſes many good Arguments for diſſuading her from this Marriage; particularly, the Diſadvantage and Danger that would thence redound to her Proteſtant Subjects; and the great Encouragement it would give to the Papiſts, and other diſaffected perſons.—Then he conſiders the Motives her Majeſty had alledged for this ſudden change; namely, Fear of ſtanding alone in reſpect of foreign powers; and Apprehenſion of Contempt from her own Subjects, from whom ſhe ought to have reſpect.—— But, with regard to the firſt, 'Truly, ſaith he, ſtanding 'alone, with good foreſight of Government, both in 'peace and warlike defence, is the honourableſt thing 'that can be to a well-eſtabliſhed Monarchy; thoſe 'buildings being ever moſt ſtrongly durable which lean 'to none other, but remain firm on their own founda-'tion.' Then he ſhews, how improbable it is, that the Duke of Anjou and She ſhould be united in One Intereſt, the chief ſtrength and ſupport of Government.—'Mon-'ſieur's deſires, and yours, how they ſhould meet in 'publick matters, I think no oracle can tell: For as 'the Geometricians ſay, that parallels, becauſe they 'maintain divers lines, can never join; ſo truly, two, 'having in the beginning contrary principles, to bring 'forth one Doctrine, muſt be ſome miracle. He of the 'Romiſh Religion; and if he be a man, muſt needs have 'that manlike property, to deſire that all men be of his 'mind: You the Erecter and Defender of the contrary; 'and the only ſun that dazzleth their eyes. He French, 'and deſiring to make France great: Your Majeſty 'Engliſh, and deſiring nothing leſs then that France 'ſhould grow great. He, both by his own fancy, and 'his youthful Governours, embracing all ambitious 'hopes, having Alexander's image in his head, but, 'perhaps, evil painted: Your Majeſty, with excellent 'vertue, taught what you ſhould hope; and by no leſs 'wiſdom, what you may hope; with a Council re-'nowned over all Chriſtendom, for their well tempered 'minds, having ſet the utmoſt of their ambition in 'your Favour; and the ſtudy of their ſouls in your 'Safety.'——As to the Apprehenſion of Contempt; —'What is there, ſaith he, either within you or with-'out you, that can poſſibly fall into the danger of con-'tempt, to whom fortunes are tyed by ſo long deſcent 'of your royal Anceſtors. But our minds rejoyce with 'the experience of your inward Vertues, and our eyes 'are delighted with the ſight of you.' After many other arguments, to convince her Majeſty, that ſhe is in no manner of danger of Contempt; he concludes his letter thus:——'As for this man, as long as he is 'but Monſieur in might, and a Papiſt in profeſſion, he 'neither can, nor will greatly ſhield you: And if he 'grow to be King, his defence will be like Ajax's ſhield, 'which rather weighed them down, then defended thoſe 'that bare it. Againſt Contempt, if there be any, 'which I will never believe, let your excellent vertues 'of Piety, Juſtice, and Liberality, daily, if it be poſſi-'ble, more and more ſhine; let ſuch particular actions 'be found out (which be eaſie as I think to be done) 'by which you may gratifie all the hearts of your 'people. Let thoſe in whom you find truſt, and to 'whom you have committed truſt in your weighty 'affairs, be held up in the eyes of your ſubjects. 'Laſtly, doing as you do, you ſhall be as you be, the 'Example of Princes, the Ornament of this Age, the 'Comfort of the afflicted, the Delight of your people, 'and the moſt excellent Fruit of your progenitors, and 'the perfect Mirrour of your poſterity.'——A. Wood ſays, that this letter was written at the deſire of Robert Earl of Leiceſter, as he ſuppoſes; and that it was the occaſion of the quarrel between Mr Sidney and the Earl of Oxford (13). But there doth not ſeem to be ſufficient ground for either of thoſe aſſertions.

'Mr Mollineux,

See below, note [AA], Mr Walpole's obſervation upon this Letter.

[L] Of which an inſtance is given, in a violent diſpute between him and Edward Vere Earl of Oxford.] Fulke Grevil, Lord Brook, hath ſet down a long and circumſtantial account of that Diſpute (15), of which the ſubſtance is this. "One day as Mr Philip Sidney was at Tennis, the Earl of Oxford came abruptly into the court, and wanted the other to give place to him, and depart; 'forgetting to entreat that, which he could 'not legally command.' Mr Sidney not complying, the Earl began to expoſtulate more roughly, and at laſt commanded Mr Sidney and his companion to quit the court. Thereupon Mr Sidney calmly anſwers, 'That if his Lordſhip had been pleaſed to expreſs his 'deſire in milder terms, perhaps he might have led 'out thoſe, that he ſhould now find would not be driven 'out.' This anſwer blowing up the Earl into a flame, made him ſcornfully call Mr Sidney a Puppy. And the latter, pretending not to underſtand, cauſed his Lordſhip to repeat the epithet of Puppy a ſecond time. Upon which Mr Sidney gave my Lord the lie, ſaying, 'All the world knows, puppies are gotten by dogs, 'and children by men.' A crowd gathering about, Mr Sidney, with ſome ſharp words, led the way abruptly out of the Tennis-court; and the great Lord continued his play, not much to his reputation. Mr Sidney expected ſatisfaction, and ſends a Gentleman of worth upon that errand to the Earl; who there-upon reſolves to give his young antagoniſt a challenge. In the mean time the Privy-Council interpoſed, and endeavoured to reconcile them; but in vain. The Queen therefore undertakes to do it, and lays before Mr Sidney 'the difference in degree between Earls 'and Gentlemen; the reſpect inferiors owed to their 'ſuperiors; and the neceſſity in Princes to maintain 'their own creatures, as degrees deſcending between 'the people's licentiouſneſs, and the anointed ſove-'reignty of crowns; how the Gentleman's neglect of 'the Nobility taught the peaſant to inſult upon both.' To which Mr Sidney replied, with all due reverence: 'That place was never intended for privilege to wrong: 'witneſs herſelf, who, how ſovereign ſoever ſhe were 'by throne, birth, education, and nature; yet was 'ſhe content to caſt her own affections into the ſame 'moulds her ſubjects did, and govern all her rights 'by their laws. Again, he beſought her Majeſty to 'conſider, that although the Earl of Oxford were a 'great Lord by birth, alliance, and grace; yet he 'was no Lord over him: and therefore the difference 'of degrees between freemen could not challenge 'any other homage than precedency.' Theſe truths did not diſpleaſe the Queen, though he obeyed not her commands, but choſe rather to withdraw from the court."——Edward Earl of Oxford was a man of violent paſſions, and made a very bad Huſband to his wife, Anne, daughter of William Lord Burleigh (16).

Romance,

Romance, called Arcadia [M]. His noble and generous diſpoſition to relieve all who were in diſtreſs, appears from ſeveral inſtances, as well as from his Letters; and he was ſo univerſally applauded for it, that his fame ſpread even beyond the bounds of Europe. For, in 1580, when, upon the death of the King of Portugal, the Spaniards had ſeized that kingdom; Don Antonio, the chief competitor thereto (o), applied to Mr Sydney for his aſſiſtance. His Letter is ſo remarkable, that we thought proper to inſert it in the note (p) [N]. The treaty of marriage between Queen Elizabeth and the Duke of Anjou being renewed in 1581, Mr Sydney was one of thoſe noble gallants, that performed, at the royal juſtings, barriers, and turney, for the entertainment of the Duke and his train (q): being very fond of thoſe paſtimes [O]. And upon the Duke's departure from England, in the February following, he attended him to Antwerp, with his uncle, Robert Dudley, Earl of Leiceſter, and the chief of the Engliſh court (r). In 1583, John, Prince Palatine of the Rhine, being made a Knight of the Garter, gave his procuration to Mr Philip Sydney, to receive his ſtall, and take poſſeſſion of it in his name; and thereupon he was knighted by the Sovereign, at Windſor-caſtle, January the 13th, the morning before he proceeded to take poſſeſſion of the ſtall (s). In 1584, he wrote an Anſwer to the Libel againſt his uncle, commonly known by the title of 'Leiceſter's Commonwealth:' which Anſwer was firſt publiſhed by Arthur Collins Eſq; (t). The year following, he projected an expedition to America, without the knowledge and conſent of the Queen or his own relations; wherein he was to be joined by the brave Sir Francis Drake [P]. But when he was got to Plimmouth, and ready to embark, the Queen, who was unwilling to riſk a perſon of his worth

[M] Called Arcadia.] He dedicated it to his dear ſiſter Mary, Counteſs of Pembroke; and there is a room at Wilton, the lower pannels whereof are finely painted, with repreſentations of the ſtories mentioned therein (17). One G. M. (probably Gervaſe Markham) wrote the ſecond and laſt part of the Arcadia, printed at London in 1615. 4to. And in the eighth edition, at London, 1633, Sir W. A. Knight, made a ſupplement of a defect in the third part of the Hiſtory; and R. B. of Lincoln's-Inn, Eſq; (18), added then to it a ſixth book. In 1662 the Arcadia was publiſhed again in ſix Books, with ſeveral of his other Works added to them (19). It hath borne fourteen editions; and been modernized by Mrs Stanley, in 1725. fol. It hath alſo been tranſlated into French, Dutch, and other languages. It ſeems he deſired upon his death-bed (but not in his will, as Sir Fulke Grevil ſays,) that it ſhould be deſtroyed or ſuppreſſed (20).

'Illuſtrious Nephew, Philip Sidney,

'I write this not only to incloſe and forward to you 'Captain Allen's Letters, but alſo to deſire you to 'write to me often, and preſerve me in your friendſhip. 'My affairs (praiſed be God) go on extremely well. 'The Fleet is ready to ſail, fully manned and well 'equipt, and I do expect to receive a conſiderable 'quantity of ſtores or ammunition by the ſhips from 'Flanders, in order to equip a ſecond expedition, on 'board which I intend to go, with about ſix or ſeven 'thouſand men; which number is getting ready by 'three or four friends, who are willing to riſque the 'ſame fate with me; theſe are Monſieur de Babues, 'Monſieur de St Luc, Monſieur de Sordiac, and Monſieur de Belleville (that is, if they can get leave for 'that purpoſe) there will come alſo Count Roxaſocar, 'who is now in Flanders. Beſides the abovenamed, 'there are other Gentlemen that will go in the beſt 'manner they can: This is to be underſtood, if they 'continue in the ſame mind, and do not retract: But 'I am of opinion they will not, or at leaſt the four 'abovenamed; and though many more ſhould go, if 'I did not ſee you in the company, I ſhall ſay, Numerum non habet illa ſuum. I have received good 'news from Portugal, both in regard to the Natives, 'as well as to Spaniards; the former wiſhing my preſence, and the latter deſiring to return into their 'own country. The King of France aſſiſts me 'ſufficiently, his Mother ſtill better, the States of 'Flanders very well; and only Dominga keeps ſilent, but ſhe is not to be blamed, conſidering her 'huſband's affairs. I remain in health, God grant 'you the ſame, according to my wiſhes.

[O] Being very fond of thoſe paſtimes.] So we are informed by Mr Edmund Molineux, who was ſecretary to his father.—'For at all ſuch diſports he commonlie 'made one; and he would bring in ſuch a livelie gallant ſhew, ſo agreeable to everie point, which is required for the expreſſing of a perfect deviſe (ſo rich 'he was in thoſe inventions) as, if he ſurpaſſed not all, 'he would equall, or at leaſt ſecond the beſt. Wherein, 'as he rightlie deſerved, he ever gained ſingular commendation (22).'

(22) Caſtations to Holinſhed's Chronicle, p. 1555.

[P] Wherein he was to be joined by the brave Sir Francis Drake.] This expedition was of Sir Philip's 'own 'projecting, wherein he faſhioned the whole body, with 'purpoſe to become Head of it himſelf. As the ſcope 'of this journey was mixt both of ſea and land ſervice; 'ſo had it accordingly, diſtinct Officers and Commanders, choſen by Sir Philip out of the ableſt Governors 'of thoſe martial times. The project was contrived 'between themſelves in this manner; that both ſhould 'equally be Governors when they had left the ſhore of 'England; but while things were preparing at home, 'Sir Francis was to bear the name, and by the credit 'of Sir Philip have all particulars abundantly ſupplied.' ... Accordingly the preparations went on with great vigour and chearfulneſs; through Sir Philip's intereſt, nothing being refuſed Sir Francis that he could aſk. When all was ready, Sir Francis repairs to the fleet at Plimmouth; having promiſed Sir Philip, that when he ſtaid for nothing but a wind, he would ſend poſt for him. A letter comes, according to agreement: And, in the mean time, our Court having advice that Don Antonio, candidate to the Crown of Portugal, was coming for England, and intended to land at Plimmouth; 'Sir 'Philip, turning occaſion into wiſdom, puts himſelf 'into the employment of conducting up that King; 'and under that veil leaves the Court without ſuſpicion; overſhoots his father-in-law, then Secretary of 'State (23), in his own bow; and comes to Plimmouth, 'where he is received with a great deal of outward 'pomp and compliment.' In the mean time Don Antonio not coming, and Sir Philip's deſign being found out; he is commanded back again to Court, as is above related.——His Project, it ſeems, was to plant a Colony upon the main of America, and to poſſeſs himſelf of Nombre de Dios, or ſome other good Port near; as a fit rendez-vous between the two ſeas, for the ſupply or retreat of an army upon all occaſions. For this purpoſe it was, that he had fitted out a Fleet, to which the United Provinces had promiſed to join one of theirs. And he had drawn in thirty Gentlemen, of great blood and ſtate here in England, every one of them to ſell a hundred pounds a year in land; to ſecond and countenance this firſt Fleet with a ſecond.——The reaſon of his keeping it ſo ſecret, (beſides the utmoſt point of Prudence with regard to the enemy) was, Becauſe he thought it impoſſible to obtain the Queen's, and his great Relations Conſent, for his engaging in an employment ſo remote, and of ſo hazardous a nature. His Unexperience would alſo be a very ſtrong objection. And while the affair was unknown, he knew it would paſs without interruption; or, when it was done, preſumed the Succeſs would put Envy and all her agents to ſilence (24).

in an employment ſo remote, and of ſo hazardous a nature, ſent meſſengers to ſtay him; or, if he did not readily comply, to ſtop the whole fleet. By his own management, the meſſengers being intercepted upon the road, and their letters forcibly taken from them by two ſoldiers, diſguized as ſailors; the Queen, thereupon, ſent her royal command to him by a Peer of the realm, abſolutely to quit the enterprize (u). At his return to Court, he was appointed Governor of Fluſhing, one of the cautionary towns delivered by the Dutch to Queen Elizabeth; as alſo General of the Horſe under his uncle, Robert Earl of Leiceſter: in both which employments, he manifeſted ſingular wiſdom and valour, and brought great honor to his country (w). His firſt exploit, after being arrived in the Low-Countries, was contriving, in July 1586, the ſurpriſe of Axel; in the execution of which, he behaved like a moſt conſummate General, uſing both ſuch diligence and ſecrecy, that he ſurpriſed the town, before the inhabitants could have intelligence of his coming, and without the loſs or hurt of any one of his men. Likewiſe, upon his entrance into the town, he placed a band of choice ſoldiers, to make a ſtand in the market-place, for ſecurity to the reſt: and, when the ſervice was over, rewarded every one liberally, out of his own purſe, according to their reſpective merits. Soon after, in an attempt to ſurpriſe Graveling in the night, he ſhewed a great deal of penetration, care, and judgment, worthy of an old officer; by venturing only a detachment, and not hazarding the lives and honor, of the whole Engliſh army, in that treacherous expedition (x). His fame and high deſerts were now ſo well known and eſtabliſhed, that he was put in nomination for the crown of Poland, upon the death of Stephen Batori; but Queeen Elizabeth refuſed to further his advancement, not out of emulation, but out of fear to loſe the jewel of her times (y). During thoſe unreaſonable diſcontents and jealouſies, that prevailed in the confederate army, between the two Generals, Robert Earl of Leiceſter, and Count Hohenloe; Sir Philip behaved with that incomparable goodneſs, prudence, and diſcretion, as diſſipated thoſe clouds, and turned much to the public advantage. So that, by the real proof he gave of his abilities above others, in a very little time his reputation and authority became ſo conſiderable in the United Provinces, that it would have been no hard matter for him, to the prejudice of his uncle, and the diſtraction of the public affairs in thoſe parts, to have raiſed himſelf a fortune. But in the whole courſe of his life, he did ſo conſtantly ballance Ambition with the ſafer precepts of divine and moral Duty, as no pretence whatſoever could have enticed him to break through the rules of a good Patriot (z). Good and happy man! but how ſhort is all human felicity! For, on the 22d of September, 1586, being ſent out with a party to intercept a convoy that was coming into Zutphen, he fell into an ambuſcade, and had his horſe killed under him. Taking another, he returned to the charge, when he received a terrible wound in his left thigh, which broke the bone quite in pieces [Q]. He then

[Q] Which broke the bone quite in pieces.] The beſt account of this melancholy accident is comprized in a letter, from Robert Earl of Leiceſter to Sir Thomas Heneage, publiſhed by the ingenious William Oldys, Eſq; Norroy, in the Britiſh Librarian (25), and alſo communicated by him to Arthur Collins, Eſq; (26), part of which runs thus: 'Sithens my other Letters of 'the 20th it fell oute, that yeſterday morninge ſome 'intelligence was broughte, that the Enemie was bring-'ing a Convoye of Victual, garded with three hundred 'horſe. There was ſente out to ympeache that, two 'hundred horſe and three hundred footemen, and a 'nomber more both horſe and foote to ſecond them: 'Among other young men my nephew Sir Philip Syd-'ney was, and the rather for that the Colonell Norrice 'himſelf went with the ſtande of footemen, to ſecond 'the reſt; but the vanguard of the Prince was marched 'and came with this convoye, and being a myſtie 'morninge, our men fell into the Ambuſcade of Foote-'men, who were three thouſand, the moſt muſketts, 'the reſt pykes. Our horſemen being formoſte by their 'haſte indeed, would not turne, but paſt through and 'charged the horſemen that flede at the backe of their 'footemen ſo valientlie, as, albeyt they were eleven 'hundred horſe, and of the verie chief of all his troupes, 'they brake them, being not two hundred. Many of 'our horſes hurt and killed, among which was my 'Nephewes owne. He wente and changed to another, 'and woulde needes to the charge again, and onſte 'paſte thoſe muſketters; where he receyved a ſore 'wounde upon his thighe, three fingers above his knee, 'the bone broken quite in pieces; but for which chance, 'God did ſend ſuch a daye as I think was never many 'yeres ſene, ſo fewe againſte ſo many.'—Here the Earl proceeds to enumerate the Commanders and other perſons of Diſtinction in this rencounter, whoſe names were Colonel Norrice, who had the charge of the foot, my Lord of Eſſex, Sir Thomas Perrot, 'and my un-'fortunate Phillip, ſays he, with Sir William Ruſſel, 'and divers Gentlemen, and not one hurte, but only 'my Nephew. They killed four of their enemies chief 'Leaders, and carried the valient Count Hannibal 'Gonzaga away with them upon a horſe; alſo took 'Captain George Creſier, the principal Soldier of the 'camp, and Captain of all the Albanez. My Lord 'Willoughbie overthrew him at the firſt encounter, 'horſe and man. The Gentleman did acknowledge it 'himſelf. There is not a properer Gentleman in the 'world towards than this Lord Willoughbie is; but 'I can hardly prayſe one more than another, they did 'all ſo well; yet every one had his horſe killed or hurt.' And it was thought very ſtrange, 'that Sir William 'Stanley, with three hundred of his men, ſhould paſs 'in ſpight of ſo many muſketts, ſuch troops of horſe, 'three ſeveral times, making them remove their ground, 'and to return with no more loſs than he did. Albeyt, 'I muſt ſay (continues the Earl) yt was too much loſs 'for me; for this young Maune was my greateſt Com-'fort, next her Majeſtie of all the world, and if I could 'buy his lief with all I have, to my ſherte, I would geve 'yt. How God will diſpoſe of him I know not, but 'feare I muſt needes, greately, the worſte; the Blow 'is in ſo dangerous a place, and ſo great; yet did I 'never heare of any manne that did abide the dreſſinge 'and ſetting his bones better than he did: and he was 'carried afterwards in my barge to Arnheim, and 'I heare this day he ys ſtill of good hearte, and com-'forteth all aboute him as much as maye be. God of 'his mercie graunt me his lieffe, which I cannot but 'doubt of greately. I was abrode that tyme in the 'fielde, giving ſome order to ſupplie that buſineſs, 'which did indure almoſte twoe Owres in continuall 'fighte; and metinge Phillip commynge upon his horſe-'backe, not a litle to my greafe. But I woulde you 'had ſtode by to heare his moſt loyal Speeches to her 'Majeſtie; his conſtant minde to the cauſe; his lovinge 'care over me, and his moſte reſolute determination for 'deathe, not one jot appalled for his blow; which ys 'the moſt grievous that ever I ſawe with ſuch a bullet; 'ryding ſo a long myle and a halfe, uppon his horſe, 'ere he came to the campe; not ceaſing to ſpeak ſtill 'of her Majeſtie; being glad, yf his hurte and deathe 'mighte any waye honour her Majeſtie; for her's he 'was whileſt he lyved, and God's he was ſure to be 'yf he dyed: Prayed all men to thinke that the cauſe 'was as well her Majeſtie's as the Countrie's; and not 'to then rode back to the camp, about a mile and a half, on horſe-back; and, after the dreſſing of his wound, was carried in a barge to Arnheim. For about ſixteen days there were great hopes of his recovery; but the ball not being extracted (aa), and a mortification enſuing, he prepared himſelf for death [R], and at laſt expired on the 17th of October, in the thirty-ſecond year of his age (bb). The States of Zealand requeſted of the Queen, and his noble friends, that they might have the honor of burying him at the public expence of their government: But their requeſt was not granted; the Queen, in regard to his great worth and accompliſhments, giving order for his burial at her own expence (cc). Whereupon, his body was brought from Arnheim to Fluſhing; and, after having remained there eight days, was put on board a veſſel, the 1ſt of November, with all military honors, and landed at the Tower-wharf, the 5th day of the ſame month. Being conveyed to the Minories, it lay there in ſtate a conſiderable time, till his magnificent funeral (dd) in St Paul's cathedral, the 16th of February following. No monument was erected to him; but, ſome time after, the Inſcription, given below [S], was painted on a wooden tablet, and faſtened to a pillar near his grave. ' to be diſcoraged, for you have ſeen ſuche ſucceſſe as ' maye encorage us all; and this my hurte is the ordi- ' nance of God, by the happe of the warre. Well ' I pray God, yf yt be his will, ſave me his lieſſe; ' even as well for her Majeſty's ſervice ſake, as for myne ' own comforte.'——Fulke Grevil, Lord Brooke, adds the following circumſtances (27): Before he ſet out upon this fatal expedition " he had compleatly put on his Armour, but meeting the Marſhal of the Camp lightly armed, out of emulation, he took off his cuiſſes [or thigh-armour] and ſo diſarmed that part, where he received his fatal wound. The weather being miſty, they fell unawares upon the enemy, who had made a ſtrong ſtand to receive them, near to the very walls of Zutphen; by reaſon of which accident, their troops happened not only to be unexpectedly engaged within the level of the great ſhot, that played from the ramparts, but more fatally within ſhot of their muſketts, which were layd in ambuſh within their own trenches. After he was wounded, the horſe he rode upon, being rather furiouſly choleric than bravely proud, forced him to forſake the field, but not his back, as the nobleſt and fitteſt biere to carry a martial commander to his grave. In which ſad progreſs, paſſing along by the reſt of the army, where his uncle the General was, and, being thirſty with exceſs of bleeding, he called for drink, which was preſently brought him: But, as he was putting the bottle to his mouth, he ſaw a poor ſoldier carryed along, who had been wounded at the ſame time, gaſtly caſting up his eyes at the bottle. Which Sir Philip perceiving, took it from his head before he drank, and delivered it to the poor man, with theſe words, " Thy neceſſity is yet greater than mine."——Mr Cibber rightly obſerves (28), That " this generous behaviour of our gallant Knight, ought not to paſs without a panegyric. All his deeds of bravery, his politeneſs, his learning, and courtly accompliſhments, do not reflect ſo much honour upon him, as this one diſintereſted, truly heroic action: It diſcovered ſo tender and benevolent a nature; a mind ſo fortified againſt pain; a heart ſo overflowing with generous ſentiments, to relieve, in oppoſition to the violent call of his own neceſſities, a poor man languiſhing in the ſame diſtreſs, before himſelf, that none can read it without the higheſt admiration.——Bravery is often conſtitutional; fame may be the motive to feats of arms; a ſtateſman and a courtier may act from intereſt; but a ſacrifice ſo generous as this, can be made by none but thoſe who are good as well as great, who are noble-minded, and glorioufly compaſſionate like Sidney."

[R] He prepared himſelf for death.] Firſt, he called unto him the Miniſters, who were all excellent men, of divers nations, and before them made ſuch a confeſſion of Chriſtian Faith, as no book but the heart can truly and feelingly deliver: Then, deſired them to accompany him in Prayer. Next, he called for his will, which was dated the laſt day of September, 1586, and to which he then undoubtedly added the codicil that bears date the ſeventeenth of October (29), the ſame day he dyed. After that he called for muſick, eſpecially that ſong, which he had made himſelf, intituled, La cuiſſe rompuë, or The broken Thigh. The laſt ſcene of this tragedy, was the parting between him and his brother Sir Robert; of whom he took his leave in theſe words, ' Love my memory, cheriſh my friends; their ' faith to me may aſſure you they are honeſt. But, ' above all, govern your will and affections by the will ' and word of your Creator; in Me beholding the end ' of this world, with all her vanities (30).'

The ingenious Author of the Life of Mr Edmund Spencer gives a remarkable inſtance of Sir Philip Sidney's exquiſite judgment, and of his great munificence to the truly learned (40). His words are theſe: "It is ſaid Spencer was a ſtranger to Sir Philip Sydney, when he had begun to write his Fairy Queen; and that he took occaſion to go to Leiceſter-houſe, and to introduce himſelf, by ſending in to Sir Philip a copy of the ninth Canto of the firſt book of that Poem. Sir Philip was much ſurprized with the deſcription of Deſpair in that Canto, and is ſaid to have ſhewn an unuſual tranſport, on the diſcovery of ſo new and uncommon a genius. After he had read ſome ſtanzas, he bid his ſteward give the perſon that brought thoſe verſes fifty pounds; but, upon reading the next ſtanza, he ordered the ſum to be doubled. The Steward was no leſs ſurprized than his Maſter, and thought it his duty to make ſome delay, in executing ſo ſudden and laviſh a bounty: But, upon reading one ſtanza more, Sir Philip raiſed his gratuity to two hundred pounds, and commanded the Steward to give it immediately, leſt, as he read further, he might be tempted to give away his whole eſtate."..... No wonder, therefore, that 'the Poets of his time, eſpe-'cially Spenſer, reverenced him not only as a Patron, but 'a Maſter; ſince he was almoſt the only perſon in any 'age (not excepting Mecænas) that could teach the beſt 'rules of Poetry, and moſt freely reward the perform-'ances of Poets (41).'

[Z] They extol his abilities.] They were obſerved, at his firſt appearance into the world, by that wiſe man, William of Naſſau, Prince of Orange; who, having converſed with him, both by word of mouth and letters, about the moſt important Affairs of Europe, conceived ſuch a high idea of his extraordinary Merit; that he deſired Sir Fulke Grevil, (when he waited upon his Highneſs at Delft) to acquaint the Queen with Mr Sidney's great Abilities. 'Proteſting, that, if he could 'judge, her Majeſty had one of the ripeſt and greateſt 'Counſellors of Eſtate in that young Man, at that time 'in Europe: to the trial of which he was pleaſed to 'leave his own credit engaged, until her Majeſty might 'employ that Gentleman, either amongſt her friends 'or enemies (42).'—Henry King of Navarre, after-wards the great Henry IV. King of France, having 'found out this Maſter-Spirit among us, uſed him like 'an equal in nature, and a perſon fit for friendſhip with 'a King (43).'——His uncle, Robert Earl of Leiceſter, when he firſt carried him over to the Low-Countreys, 'not only deſpiſed his youth for a Counſellor, but alſo 'bore a ſtrict hand over him as a forward young man. 'But, in a ſhort time, he ſaw this ſun ſo riſen above his 'horizon, that both he and his ſtars were glad to fetch 'light from him. And in the end acknowledged, that 'he held up the Honour of his caſual Authority by him 'whilſt he lived, and found reaſon to withdraw himſelf 'from that burthen after his death (44).'——His Father-in-law, Sir Francis Walſingham, that wiſe and active Secretary, who had influence in all countries, and a hand upon all affairs; often confeſſed alſo to Sir Fulke Grevil, 'that his Philip did ſo far over-ſhoot him in his own 'bow, that thoſe Friends, which at firſt were Sir Philip's 'for the Secretary's ſake, within a while became ſo 'fully poſſeſſed by Sir Philip, that now he held them 'at the ſecond-hand, by his ſon-in-law's native courte-'ſie (45).'——And he merited even the Praiſe and Eſteem of his Enemies. Don John of Auſtria's regard for him hath been already mentioned. And the Spaniſh Secretary, Don Bernardine de Mendoza, 'acknow-'ledged openly; That howſoever he was glad, King 'Philip

Thus, when Virtue is come to perfection, it preſently leaves us; and the beſt things are ſeldom laſting. Reſt then in peace, O Sidney! if I may be allowed this addreſs; we will not celebrate thy memory with tears, but with admiration. Whatever we loved in thee, as the beſt of authors ſpeaks of that beſt Governor of Britain (ii), whatever we admired in thee, continues, and will continue in the memories of men, the revolutions of ages, and the annals of time. 'Philip his maſter had loſt, in a private gentleman, a 'dangerous enemy to his ſtate, yet he could not but 'lament to ſee Chriſtendom deprived of ſo rare a light 'in theſe cloudy times; and bewail poor widow Eng-'land (ſo he termed her) that, having been many years 'in breeding one eminent ſpirit, was in a moment be-'reaved of him.——Indeed, as Sir Fulke Grevil goes 'on, he was a true model of worth; a man fit for 'conqueſt, plantation, reformation, or what action ſo-'ever is greateſt and hardeſt among men.'... Souldiers 'honoured him, and were ſo honoured by him, that 'no man thought he marched under the true banner of 'Mars, that had not obtained Sir Philip Sidney's ap-'probation. Men of affairs, in moſt parts of Chriſten-(46) Life &c. as above, p. 38, 39. 'dom, entertained correſpondency with him (46).' 'He was a Stateſman, Soldier, and Scholar, a compleat 'maſter of matter and language, as his immortal pen 'ſhews. Certain it is, he was a noble and matchleſs 'Gentleman; and it may be juſtly ſaid, without hyper-'bole or fiction, as it was of Cato Uticenſis, that he (47) Naunton's Fragmenta, as above, p. 36. 'ſeemed to be born to that only which he went 'about (47).'

[AA] His Modeſty, his Piety, his Generoſity, his Goodneſs, his Sincerity, his Honeſty.] Fulke Grevil, Lord Brook, teſtifies, that he was 'ſuch a lover of Mankind, and 'Goodneſs, that whoſoever had any reall parts, in Him 'found comfort, participation, and protection to the 'uttermoſt of his power; like Zephyrus he giving life 'where he blew.'... A man of 'ſuch eminence, that 'he was not only a nouriſher of Vertue in Courts, but 'a reformed Standard, by which even the moſt humour-'ous perſons could not but have a reverend ambition 'to be tried and approved.... Beſides which honour 'of Nature and Education, his very waies in the world 'did generally adde reputation to his Prince, and coun-'try, by reſtoring amongſt us the ancient majeſtie of 'noble and True Dealing..... His heart and tongue 'went both one way, and ſo with every one that went 'with the Truth; as knowing no other kindred, partie, 'or end. Above all, he made the Religion he profeſſed, 'the firm baſis of his life: For this was his judgement '(as he often told Sir Fulke Grevil) that our true-heart-'edneſſe to the Reformed Religion in the beginning, 'brought Peace, Safetie, and Freedom to us; con-'cluding, that the wiſeſt and beſt way, was that of the 'famous William Prince of Orange, who never divided 'the conſideration of Eſtate from the cauſe of Religion, 'nor gave the ſound party occaſion to be jealous or 'diſtracted, upon any appearance of ſafety whatſoever. '.... The Greatneſs which he affected was built upon 'true worth; eſteeming Fame more than Riches, and (48) Life &c. as above, p. 38, 40, 41, 42, 45. 'Noble actions far above Nobility itſelf (48).'——This 'Gentleman's large, yet uniform, diſpoſition was every 'where praiſed; greater in himſelf than in the world; 'yet greater there in Fame and Honour than many 'of his ſuperiors; reverenced by forrain Nations in one 'form, of his own in another; eaſily cenſured, hardly 'imitated.——The Ingenuitie of his Nature did ſpread 'itſelf ſo freely abroad; as who can ſay he ever did him 'harm; whereas there be many, that may thankfully 'acknowledge he did them good. Neither was this 'in him a private, but a publique affection; his chief 'ends being not Friends, Wife, Children, or him-'ſelfe; but, above all things, the honour of his 'Maker, and Service of his Prince, or Country (49).' (49) p. 46, 47.

This further Character is given of him in Holinſhed's Chronicle (50). He was 'a gentleman of great hope, (50) Edit. 1587. 'and exceeding expectation, endowed with manie rare Vol. III. p. 1551, 'Gifts, ſingular Vertues, and other Ornaments both of mind 1552. 'and bodie; one generallie beloved and eſteemed of all 'men.——He greatlie abounded in ſundrie good Ver-'tues, which, wherever he came, procured him Love, 'but chiefly in Juſtice and Liberality (a worthy and moſt 'ſpeciall note in a Governor) which gained him hearty 'love, coupled with Fame and Honor. For the which, 'eſpecially thoſe under his late charge and government 'greatly loved, honoured, and in a ſort adored him, (51) This laſt paragraph is taken from the Caſtrated Sheets of Holinſhed's Chronicle, p. 1554. 'when he was alive.——' He was reckoned, for his 'Modeſtie, Courteſie, Affabilitie, and other ſpeciall Ver-'tues, amongeſt the verie prime Gentlemen for his 'yeares that this age hath bred, or our countrie affoord-'ed; and ſo complet a man to everie Perfection, as the 'memorie of him ought not to be forgotten (51).'

In a modern Life of him (52), he is ſtyled, 'the (52) Lives of the Poets, as above, Vol. I. p. 76. 'great Ornament to human Nature, to Literature, and 'to Britain.'——And the immortal Grotius pays a juſt tribute to his memory, by taking notice of his learning, 'and ſaying, That he was born for every great thing. (53) Grotii Annal. et Hiſt. de Rebus Belgicis, edit. 1657. fol. p. 98. Juvenis ad maxima quæque nati, ut qui claris natalibus opibuſque, rarum decus! literas adjunxiſſet; hoc major avun-culo Leiceſtrio, cui & fortunæ, quantacunque ea futura erat, ſucceſſor deſtinabatur (53).

But the Hon. Horace Walpole doth not paſs ſo favorable, and as ſome may think a more impartial, judgment upon him. His words are, ... 'No man ſeems 'to me ſo aſtoniſhing an object of temporary admiration 'as the celebrated friend of the Lord Brooke, the famous 'Sir Philip Sidney. The learned of Europe dedicated 'their works to Him; the republic of Poland thought 'him at leaſt worthy to be in the nomination for their 'crown. All the muſes of England wept his death. 'When we at this diſtance of time inquire what pro-'digious merits excited ſuch admiration, what do we 'find.'——Great valour.——But it was an age of he-'roes.——In full of all other talents we have a tedious, 'lamentable, pedantic, paſtoral romance, which the 'patience of a young virgin in love cannot now wade 'through; and ſome abſurd attempts to fetter Engliſh 'verſe in Roman chains; a proof that this applauded 'author underſtood little of the genius of his own lan-'guage. The few of his letters extant are poor mat-'ters; one to a ſteward of his father, an inſtance of 'unwarrantable violence. By far the beſt preſumption 'of his abilities [to us who can judge only by what we 'ſee] is a pamphlet publiſhed amongſt the Sidney-'papers (54), being an anſwer to the famous libel (54) In the Introduction, p. 62. 'called Leiceſter's commonwealth. It defends his uncle 'with great ſpirit: What had been ſaid in derogation 'to their blood ſeems to have touched Sir Philip moſt. 'He died with the raſhneſs of a volunteer, after having 'lived to write with the ſang froid (55), and prolixity (55) Cool blood. 'of Mademoiſelle Scuderi (56).'——After all, there (56) Noble Authors of England, Vol. I. p. 284. muſt have been ſomething very extraordinary in Sir Philip Sydney's Perſon and Manner, now loſt at this diſtance of time, which could draw ſuch a volume of letters, as Hubert Languet wrote to him, and thoſe very uncommon Commendations of his Cotemporaries, mentioned above.

SYDNEY, or SIDNEY (ALGERNOON), was the second surviving son of Robert Earl of Leicester, by his wife Dorothy, eldest daughter of Henry Piercy Earl of Northumberland. He was born about the year 1621, or 1622 (a) [A]. His noble father was very careful to give him a good education; and in 1632, when he went embassador to Denmark, took him with him; as also when he was embassador in France (b) [B]. Upon the breaking out of the rebellion in Ireland, in the year 1641, he had a commission for a troop of horse in his Father's regiment, who was Lord Lieutenant of that kingdom; and went over thither with his brother the Lord Viscount Lisle, where he behaved very gallantly. In 1643, he had the King's permission to come to England, with his brother the Lord Lisle, but, withal, they received express orders on their allegiance to repair to his Majesty at Oxford: which the Parliament hearing of, sent into Lancashire where they landed, and had them taken into custody [C]. The King believing it happened through their own management, was greatly offended with them; and thereupon they entered into the measures of the Parliament (c), under which Algernoon accepted of a command: And 2000 l. was ordered him for his arrears (d). The Earl of Manchester (Serjeant-Major-General of the counties of Essex, Norfolk, Suffolk, Hertford, Cambridge, Huntingdon, and Lincoln) constituted him, May 10, 1644, Captain of a troop of horse, in his own regiment, consisting of one hundred, to be raised for the defence of the King, Parliament, and Kingdom. And, April the 2d, 1645, Sir Thomas Fairfax, Commander in chief of all the forces raised for the defence of the kingdom, made him Colonel of a regiment of horse. He was in the battles of York, and other places; and likewise Governor of Chichester. His brother, the Lord Viscount Lisle, being appointed Lieutenant-general of Ireland, and Commander of the forces there, made him Colonel of a regiment of horse, to serve in the expedition into Ireland, which was in 1646. He became Lieutenant-general of the horse in that kingdom, and Governor of Dublin. But in 1647, that Government was taken from him, and given to Colonel Jones. However, the House of Commons ordered that some recompence might be given to Colonel Algernoon Sydney (e). He came over to England about that time; and, May 7, 1647, had, among others, the thanks of the House of Commons, for his good service in Ireland: and was afterwards made Governor of Dover (f). In 1648, he was nominated one of the Judges of King Charles I, but did not appear in that tragical affair (g) [D]. He was, by inclination and principle, so grounded in his opinion for a Commonwealth, that, when Oliver Cromwell had assumed the government, he refused to act under him; or his son Richard, who succeeded him in the Protectorship: During which time, he lived retired at Penshurst, and other places, when it is conceived he began to write his Discourses on Government, or at least some part of them. But, on the resignation of Richard, and the restoration of the Long Parliament, and their Speaker, Lenthall; they having voted, on the 7th of May, 1659, a Declaration to secure the Liberty and Property of the people, both as Men and Christians, without a single Person, King, or House of Peers, he then came into their measures. Whereupon, on the 13th of the month just now mentioned, he was named by that Parliament one of the Council of State, with the Lord Fairfax, Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, and others (h). The 5th of June following, he was nominated one of the Commissioners, with Sir Robert Honeywood, and Bulstrode Whitelock Esq; to go and mediate a peace between the Kings of Sweden and Denmark. But Mr Whitelock declining that employment, and Mr Thomas Boone being appointed in his room (i), Sir Robert Honeywood, Colonel Sydney, and Mr Boone, went on that embassy, which was not ended at the Restoration of King Charles the Second (k). They were successful in their negotiations, and obtained a peace between Denmark and Sweden (l).

[A] Born about the year 1621, or 1622.] He says, in April 1661, that he was 'growing very near forty (z).'

[B] As also when he was embassador in France.] Whilst he was there, the Countess his mother, in a Letter to the Earl at Paris, dated Nov. 10, 1636, acquaints his Lordship, 'That she hears him [her son Algernoon] 'much commended by all that come from thence, for 'a huge deal of Wit, and much Sweetness of Nature (a).'

[C] And had them taken into custody.] The order of the House of Commons for that purpose was in these words.

'Die Jovis ult. Augusti, 1643.

'A letter was read from the Committee at Liverpoole 'and Manchester, and an intercepted letter, there taken 'from Captayne Sidney, newly come out of Ireland, to 'Orlando Bridgman at Chester, of his intentions to goe 'to the Kinge, were read:

'Ordered,

'That a letter bee written to the Deputy Lieutenants 'and Committees in the Countie of Lancaster, to send 'upp in safe custody the Lord Lisle, Captayne Sidney, 'and Sir Richard Grinville, guarded with a strong con'voy: And that the Committees and Deputie Lieute'nants in the Counties betwixt this and Lancashire, 'respectively, doe appointe a good convoy with the 'said persons, through their severall Counties, and that 'a stay bee made of all their goods and armes, till this 'Howse take further order. And Mr Ashurst is to 'prepare this letter, and to write the same accord'ingly.'

[D] But did not appear in that tragical affair.] The anonymous Author of the Reflections upon Col. Sidney's last Paper (3), says, that 'He was not only named in 'this execrable commission, but was actually in the 'Court, and upon the bench as a coasessor with that 'villain Bradshaw and the rest at the tryal of that il'lustrious sufferer; as he was able to make appear from 'a true transcript of every several day's proceeding, 'in the Tryal; the original whereof is attested under 'Phelps the Clerk of that pretended Court's own hand, 'and was by him drawn up, and the names of all that 'were present each day entered by order from the 'Keepers of the Liberties of England. It is true he 'was not present when the sentence was passed, nor 'the execrable warrant for the barbarous execution 'signed.'——In April 1651, he had a great quarrel with the Earl of Oxford, the occasion not known, which ended in a duel; as appears by this entry in Whitelock's Memorials (4), 'That the Earl of Oxford, and Colonel 'Sidney, were gone into Flanders to fight a duel with 'seconds.'

But

But Col. Sydney was ſo noted a Republican [E], and had acted all along with ſuch earneſtneſs againſt the King's friends, that he did not think it ſafe or adviſable to return to England, though he was adviſed to it by General Monk [F]; therefore, according to his father's

[E] But Col. Sydney was ſo noted a Republican.] With what eye he was looked upon at the Court of England, appears plainly from the following Extract of a Letter of his Father's to him ..... 'Concerning you, 'what to reſolve in myſelf, or what to adviſe you, 'truly I know not; for you muſt give me leave to 'remember, of how little weight my opinions and 'counſels have been with you, and how unkindly and 'unfriendly you have rejected thoſe exhortations and 'admonitions, which, in much affection and kindneſs, 'I have given you upon many occaſions, and in almoſt 'every thing, from the higheſt to the loweſt, that hath 'concerned you: and this you may think ſufficient to 'diſcourage me from putting my advices into the like 'danger. Yet ſomewhat I will ſay: and, firſt, I think 'it unfit, and perhaps as yet unſafe, for you to come 'into England; for I believe Powell (5) hath told you, 'that he heard, when he was here, that you were likely 'to be excepted out of the general act of pardon and 'oblivion: and, though I know not what you have 'done or ſaid here or there, yet I have ſeveral ways 'heard, that there is an ill opinion of you, as of any, 'even of thoſe that condemned the late King. And 'when I thought there was no other exception to you, 'than your being of the other party, I ſpoke to the 'General in your behalf, who told me, that very ill 'offices had been done you; but he would aſſiſt you 'as much as juſtly he could. And I intended then alſo 'to ſpeak to ſomebody elſe; you may gueſs whom 'I mean (6): But ſince that I have heard ſuch things 'of you, that, in the doubtfulneſs only of their being 'true, no man will open his mouth for you. I will 'tell you ſome paſſages, and you ſhall do well to clear 'yourſelf of them. It is ſaid, that the univerſity of 'Copenhagen brought their album unto you, deſiring 'you to write ſomething therein; and that you did 'ſcribere in albo theſe words;

.... Manus hæc inimica tyrannis
Enſe petit placidam ſub libertate quietem.

'And put your name to it (7). This cannot chooſe 'but be publicly known, if it be true. It is alſo ſaid, 'that a miniſter, who hath married a Lady Laurence, 'here at Chelſea, but now dwelling at Copenhagen, 'being there in company with you, ſaid, "I think "you were none of the late King's judges, nor guilty "of his death," meaning our King. "Guilty! ſaid "you: do you call that guilt? why, it was the juſteſt "and braveſt action that ever was done in England, "or any where elſe;" with other words to the ſame 'effect. It is ſaid alſo, that, you having heard of a 'deſign to ſeize upon you, or to cauſe you to be taken 'priſoner, you took notice of it to the King of Den-'mark himſelf, and ſaid, "I hear there is a deſign to "ſeize upon me; but who is it that hath that deſign? "Eſte nôtre bandit (8)?" by which you are underſtood 'to mean the King. Beſides this, it is reported, that 'you have been heard to ſay many ſcornful and con-'temptuous things of the King's perſon and family, 'which, unleſs you can juſtify yourſelf, will hardly be 'forgiven or forgotten; for ſuch perſonal offences make 'deeper impreſſions than public actions, either of war 'or treaty (9).'

[F] That he did not think it ſafe or adviſable to return to England, &c.] This account he gives us himſelf: 'I choſe rather to remaine beyond the ſeas, then to 'return into my owne country, though general Monk, 'upon the account of many obligations receaved from 'me, did deſire me to returne, with large offers of all 'the advantages he could procure for me (10).'—— He had ſome thoughts of returning home at firſt, but ſuffered himſelf to be directed by his relations, and at laſt had reaſon to think, that he acted wiſely by ſtaying abroad. This appears from the following extracts of ſome of his letters to his father .... 'I did hope, 'that, by the time I could returne from hence, our 'Meſſenger might have met me with an Anſweare 'unto my letters at Copenhagen. I now deſpaire of 'that, and am abſolutely uncertaine what courſe I ſhall 'take, unleſſe I find ſomme other letters, at my returne, 'that may inſtruct me. ..... I ſhall conclude what 'I have to ſay relating unto my own concernements, in 'deſiring your Lordſhip, and my Lord of Northumber-'land, to doe that which you think beſt, according to 'the preſent ſtate of things, and to ſend me directions 'how to diſpoſe of myſelf, which I ſhall exactly fol-'lowe. ..... Your Lordſhip may better know my 'motions then myſelf; for I ſhall take my meaſures, 'for ſtaying or returning, juſt according to what I ſhall 'heare from England (11).'... In the following letter we find, it had been his Father's 'opinion, He ſhould 'returne immediately home.'... But very ſoon after, he ordered him, 'to remove from Stockholm to Ham-'burgh, and from thence into Holland, or ſome place 'in Germany (12).' He acknowledges in another letter (13), how prudent that courſe had been. 'I think, 'ſays he, the councell given me by all my Freinds, to 'keep out of England for a while, doth too clearely 'appeare to have bin good, by the uſage my compa-'nions have already receaved, and perhaps will be yet 'further verified by what they will find. Nothing doth 'ſeeme more certaine to me, then that, I muſt either 'have procured my ſafety, by ſuch meanes as Sir Arthur 'Haſelrigg is ſayed to have uſed; or runne the fortune 'of ſomme others, whoe have ſhewed themſelves more 'reſolute.'——In another Letter, he expreſſes himſelf in a yet more ſtrong and pathetick manner. .... 'I confeſs, 'we are naturally inclined to delight in our own coun-'try, and I have a particular love to mine. I hope I 'have given ſome teſtimony of it. I think, that be-'ing exiled from it is a great evil; and would redeem 'myſelf from it with the loſs of a great deal of my 'blood. But, when that country of mine, which 'uſed to be eſteemed a paradiſe, is now like to 'be made a ſtage of injury; the liberty, which we 'hoped to eſtabliſh, oppreſſed; luxury and lewdneſs 'ſet up in its height, inſtead of the piety, virtue, 'ſobriety, and modeſty, which we hoped, God by our 'hands would have introduced; the beſt of our nation 'made a prey to the worſt; the parliament, court, 'and army, corrupted; the people enſlaved; all 'things vendible; no man ſafe, but by ſuch evil and 'infamous means, as flattery and bribery; what joy 'can I have in my own country in this condition? Is 'it a pleaſure to ſee, that all I love in the world is ſold 'and deſtroyed? Shall I renounce all my old princi-'ples, learn the vile court-arts, and make my peace 'by bribeing ſome of them? Shall their corruption 'and vice be my ſafety? Ah! no: better is a life 'among ſtrangers, than in my own country upon ſuch 'conditions. Whilſt I live, I will endeavour to pre-'ſerve my liberty; or, at leaſt, not conſent to the 'deſtroying of it. I hope I ſhall die in the ſame prin-'ciples, in which I have lived, and will live no 'longer than they can preſerve me. I have in my life 'been guilty of many follies; but, as I think, of no 'meanneſs. I will not blot and defile that which is 'paſt, by endeavouring to provide for the future. I 'have ever had in my mind, that when God ſhould 'caſt me into ſuch a condition, as that I cannot ſave 'my life, but by doing an indecent thing, he ſhews 'me the time is come, wherein I ſhould reſign it. 'And when I cannot live in my own country but by 'ſuch means as are worſe than dying in it; I think he 'ſhews me, I ought to keep myſelf out of it. Let 'them pleaſe themſelves with making the King glo-'rious, who think a whole people may juſtly be ſa-'crificed for the intereſt and pleaſure of one man, and 'a few of his followers: let them rejoice in their ſub-'tilty, who, by betraying the former powers, have 'gained the favour of this, not only preſerved, but 'advanced themſelves in theſe dangerous changes. 'Nevertheleſs, perhaps they may find the King's 'glory is their ſhame; his plenty the people's miſery; 'and that the gaining of an office, or a little mony, is 'a poor reward for deſtroying a nation (which, if it 'were preſerved in liberty and virtue, would truly be 'the moſt glorious in the world) and that others may 'find they have with much pains purchaſed their own 'ſhame and miſery; a dear price paid for that, which 'is not worth keeping, nor the life that is accom-'panied with it. The honour of Engliſh Parliaments 'hath ever been, in making the nation glorious and 'happy, not in ſelling and deſtroying the intereſt of 'it, to ſatisfy the luſts of one man. Miſerable nation! 'that, from ſo great a height of glory, is fallen into 'the moſt deſpicable condition in the world; of hav-'ing all its good depend upon the breath and will of 'the

' the vileſt perſons in it! cheated and ſold by them ' they truſted! infamous traffic, equal almoſt in guilt ' to that of Judas! In all preceding ages Parliaments ' have been the palace of our liberty; the ſure de- ' fenders of the oppreſſed: they, who formerly could ' bridle Kings, and keep the balance equal between ' them and the people, are now become inſtruments of ' all our oppreſſions, and a ſword in his hand to de- ' ſtroy us; they themſelves led by a few intereſted ' perſons, who are willing to buy offices for them- ' ſelves, by the miſery of the whole nation, and the ' blood of the moſt worthy and eminent perſons in it. ' Deteſtable bribes, worſe than the oaths now in ' faſhion in this mercenary court! I mean to owe ' neither my life nor liberty to any ſuch means: when ' the innocence of my actions will not protect me, I ' will ſtay away till the ſtorm be over-paſſed. In ſhort, ' where Vane, Lambert, and Haſelrigg cannot live in ' ſafety, I cannot live at all. If I had been in Eng- ' land, I ſhould have expected a lodging with them; ' or, though they may be the firſt, as being more emi- ' nent than I, I muſt expect to follow their example in ' ſuffering, as I have been their companion in acting. ' I am moſt in a maze at the miſtaken informations, ' that were ſent to me by my friends, full of expecta- ' tions of favours and employments. Who can think, ' that they, who impriſon them, would employ me; ' or ſuffer me to live, when they are put to death? ' If I might live, and be employed, can it be expect- ' ed, that I ſhould ſerve a government that ſeeks ſuch ' deteſtable ways of eſtabliſhing itſelf? Ah! no: I ' have not learnt to make my own peace, by perſe- ' cuting and betraying my brethren, more innocent ' and worthy than myſelf. I muſt live by juſt-means, ' and ſerve to juſt ends, or not at all. After ſuch a ' manifeſtation of the ways by which it is intended the ' King ſhall govern, I ſhould have renounced any ' place of favour, into which the kindneſs and induſtry ' of my friends might have advanced me; when I ' found thoſe, that were better than I, were only fit ' to be deſtroyed. I had formerly ſome jealouſies: ' the fraudulent proclamation for indemnity increaſed ' them: the impriſoning of thoſe three men, and ' turning out of all the officers of the army, contrary ' to promiſe, confirmed me in my reſolutions not to ' return. To conclude, the tide is not to be diverted, ' nor the oppreſſed delivered; but God, in his time, ' will have mercy on his people: he will ſave and ' defend them, and avenge the blood of thoſe, who ' ſhall now periſh, upon the heaps of thoſe, who, in ' their pride, think nothing is able to oppoſe them: ' happy are thoſe, whom God ſhall make inſtruments ' of his juſtice in ſo bleſſed a work. If I can live to ' ſee that day, I ſhall be ripe for the grave, and able ' to ſay with joy, " Lord, now letteſt thou thy ſer- " vant depart in peace &c." Farewel. My thoughts ' as to King and ſtate depending upon their actions, ' no man ſhall be a more faithful ſervant to him than I, ' if he make the good and proſperity of his people his ' glory; none more his enemy, if he doth the con- ' trary ——— (14).'

[G] And the November following at Rome.] In a letter from thence to his Father, he ſays, ... ' I hope my ' being heare, will in a ſhort time ſhewe, that the Place ' was not ill choſen, and that, beſides the liberty and ' quiet which is generally granted to all perſons heare, I ' may be admitted into that company, the knowledge ' of which will very well recompence my journey. I ' was extreamely unwilling to ſtay in Hamburgh, or ' any place in Germany, finding my ſelfe too apt to ' fall too deepe into melancholy, if I have neither bu- ' ſineſſe nor company to divert me; and I have ſuch ' an averſion to the converſation and entertainments of ' that country, that if I had ſtayed in it, I muſt have ' lived as a hermite, though in a populous city. I ' am heare well enough at eaſe, and believe I may ' continue ſoe, unleſſe ſome boddy from the Court of Eng- ' land doth think it worth theire paines to diſturbe me. I ' ſee nothing likely to ariſe heare to trouble me. I ' have already viſited ſeverall Cardinalls; to morrowe ' I intend to pay the ſame reſpect to the Cardinal ' Gizi, nephew to the Pope. .... They are all ge- ' nerally civill, and I aſk no more..... I doe not ' heare ſee thoes ſignes of Eaſe, Satisfaction, and ' Plenty, that weare in Pope Urban his time, but that ' littell concernes Strangers; the company of perſons ' excellent in all Sciences, which is the beſt thing ' Strangers can ſeeke, is never wanting ——— (15).' In one of his ſubſequent Letters he gives a very curious account, and characters, of the ſeveral Cardinals (16).

[H] But, to all appearance by orders from England, he was forced, about the middle of the year 1661, to remove from thence to Fraſcati.] ' I heare (ſaith he in one of ' his Letters to his father) of an Iriſh Prieſt, one Plunket, ' nephew to Nickleſſe Plunket, who is very buſy in ' prating and ſcribling. I know not the Man, nor ' what exceptions he can have unto me, unleſſe it be ' for being an Engliſhman, ſommtimes imployed in ' Ireland: But I apprehend nothing but Orders from ' England to my prejudice: He ſayeth, ſuch will ' comme, as ſhall force me to change my ſtation (17).' ..... ' Heare is, ſaith he in another Letter (18), ' one Plunket, a young Iriſh Prieſt, that gives me ' ſomme trouble, by fooliſh diſcourſes; amongſt others, ' he ſayes I am an Atheiſt, and bred up in your Lord- ' ſhip's houſe under a Maſter, from whom I learnt ' thoes opinions. He was anſweared, that was very ' improbable, and that my life and converſation gave ' teſtimony of the contrary; but though that weare, ' it concerned no body heare —— (19).' .... ' The ' other day, as he goes on, I was informed, that ' Orders had bin ſent from the Court heare, to the ' Internuntio in Flanders, to make the beſt enquiry ' he could of me, my birth, perſon, and quality. To ' whom information was given by one White..... They weare put upon this enquiry by ' the fooliſh prating of ſome Prieſts, who ſpoke of ' me, as the only Enimy the King had left, and that I ' being taken away, his Majeſty might reagne in quiet. ' Theis are but very ſlight vapours, and if nothing ' commes from England to my prejudice, I will eaſily ' blowe them away ———.' However, he thought fit to remove to Fraſcati; from whence writing to his Father, he ſays (20), ... ' I find myſelf at preſent ' as well as I can be, untill the time comme that I ' may conveniently returne into my owne country. ' The Prince Pamphilio, nephewe to the laſt Pope, ' hath given me very convenient lodgings in his Villa ' de Belvedere, which is one of the fineſt of Italy.' .... My converſation is with birds, trees, and ' books. In theſe laſt months, that I have had no bu- ' ſineſs at all, I have applied myſelf to ſtudy a little ' more than I have done formerly: and though one ' who begins at my age, cannot hope to make any ' conſiderable progreſs that way; I find ſo much ſa- ' tisfaction in it, that, for the future, I ſhall very un- ' willingly (though I had the opportunity) put myſelf ' into any way of living, that ſhall deprive me of that ' entertainment. Whatſoever hath been formerly the ' objects of my thoughts and deſires, I have now in- ' tention of ſeeking very little more than quietneſs and ' retirement ———.' And again; ' I left Rome, ' wheare I had made a great deale of acquaintance, to ' avoid the neceſſity of making and receiving viſits, ' and live now as a hermite in a palace.' .... to other parts of Italy; as also to Germany, and France [I]. In December, 1663, he dates a letter from Bruſſels (p). And from Ludlow it appears (q), that a proſpect of ſome Troubles in England had brought him thither; 'thinking convenient to draw nearer home, 'that if an opportunity ſhould offer, he might not be wanting to [what he thought] his 'Duty and the publick ſervice.' About that time, he had the offer of a commiſſion in a regiment raiſed in England for the ſervice of the Emperor; and, if he did not obtain it, he propoſed to paſs the ſummer following as a volunteer in Hungary (r). He was far from being in his Father's good graces; and, at times, during his exile, was reduced to great ſtreights and neceſſities [K]. So obnoxious likewiſe was he to our court, that ſome perſons are ſaid to have been ſent to aſſaſſinate him at Augſburg; but he eſcaped, by being then come to Holland (s). Thus he continued for ſeventeen years wandring from place to place, in indigence, and not without danger ſometimes of loſing his life; becauſe it was known that he could not be corrupted, as his own words are (t). But, at laſt, his Father, the Earl of Leiceſter, deſiring to ſee him before his death, he obtained leave from King Charles II. for his return, in 1677, as alſo his Pardon; through the intereſt of the Earl's grandſon, Robert Earl of Sunderland [L], who was then a great favorite at court. When that 'opinion is well ſettled, I may hope to live quietly in 'England, and then ſhall think it a ſeaſonable time to 'returne. I have ſomme inclinations this autume to 'goe to Naples, and from thence to Sicily, and Malta, 'to paſs the winter in ſome of thoes places, and re-'turne to Rome in the Springe. It is not uſual for 'me, to look ſoe many moneths before-hand, nor 'poſſible to extend my ſight any farther. I muſt then 'knowe from my friends at home, wheather it be yet 'time to returne thither; I have ever had it in my 'thoughts to chooſe that before any thing; but if it 'be ſtill inconvenient for me to take that reſolution, 'I muſt then think of making another pauſe at Rome, 'or ſomme other place, that may prove convenient (22).' [K] He was far from being in his Father's good graces; and reduced to great ſtreights, &c.] This is abundantly evident from the following extracts from ſome of his letters to his father... 'Though it is long ſince I heard 'from your Lordſhip, and the contents of the laſt letter 'I receaved were ſuch, as gave me littel expectation 'of having others, or reaſon to think mine would be 'acceptable unto you, I eſteeme it my duty to continue 'writing, untill I doe, by ſomme more indubitable 'teſtimony, find, your Lordſhip hath ſoe farre rejected 'me, as to be unwilling to heare of me, or my con-'cernments (25),'... 'I write to your Lordſhip ſome-'tymes, becauſe I am not forbidden: Not often, becauſe 'I am neither commandyd, nor have reaſon to think 'that diligence would be acceptable unto you (26)... 'According to my couſtume, I give your Lordſhip this 'teſtimony of my being alive; which I think neceſſary, 'ſince your Lordſhip gives no ſigne of remembering 'I am ſoe (27).'... And, that he was reduced to great ſtreights and neceſſities, the following extracts from two of his letters will plainly ſhew.... 'I did intend to have ſayed no 'more; but it is a folly to conceale the Evills that 'oppreſſe me. I have with difficulty writ this; and 'the troubled thoughts into which the letters receaved 'by the laſt poſt have caſt me, give me not eaſily the 'liberty of ſaying more. The Misfortunes into which 'I was fallen, by the deſtruction of our Party, did not 'ſhake me. The cheates and thefts of Servants were 'too ordinary to trouble me. I ſuffered my Mother's 'Legacy, to be drawne from me, upon which I might 'have ſubſiſted a good while. I was not very much 'ſurpriſed to find myſelf betrayed, and robbed of all 'that with which I had truſted Lady Strangford, but 'I confeſſe, that I am ſorely troubled to find, that 'Sir Jo. Temple is going into Ireland; the agreement 'which he had ſoe often ſaied ſhould be made with 'Strangford broken; from which I might expect ſomme 'part of what is due unto me, to live upon. The 'mortgage to the Earl of Thanet to continue upon 'Andrewes his land, which is the ſoreſt miſchiefe that 'ever fell upon me ſince I was borne, and that I was 'ſoe often promiſed ſhould be taken of, and put upon 'Portling lands, as it ought to be: And by all theis 'meanes together, I find myſelfe deſtitute of all help 'at home, and expoſed to all thoſe troubles, inconve-'niencies, and miſchiefs, unto which They are expoſed, 'whoe have nothing to ſubſiſt upon; in a place farre 'from home, wheare no aſſiſtance can poſſibly be ex-'pected, and wheare I am knowne to be of a quality, 'which makes all lowe and mean wayes of living 'ſhamefull and deteſtable. Theis are part of the evils, 'with which I finde myſelf encompaſſed, and out of 'which I ſee noe iſſue; nor can I make one ſtep, that 'is not as likely to prove my deſtruction, as preſerva-'tion. It will not, I think, be thought ſtrange, that 'I am ſenſible of them, ſince he that is not, muſt be 'an Angell, or a Beaſt: My only hope is, that God 'will, ſomme way or other, put an end to my troubles, 'or my life (29).'.... 'Perhaps, ſharp-ſighted braines 'might, in a condition like unto mine, find more oc-'caſion of trouble then I doe: I finde ſtupidity an ad-'vantage; Nature hath given me a large proportion of 'it; and I did artificially encreaſe it, to that degree, 'that if I weare not awakened with the bitter ſenſe 'of ſomme miſchiefes, that the Lady Strangford hath 'brought upon me (which Sir John Temple ever made 'me hope he would remove) I ſhould reſt well enough 'at eaſe, in a dull indolence, and never trouble myſelf 'with the thoughts of examining, wheare I ſhould have 'bread for three moneths: This may ſhewe your Lordſhip, 'into what ſtate Nature and Fortune have brought one 'that receaved life from you (30).'——However his Father remitted him Money now and then (31).

[L] Through the intereſt of the Earl's grandſon, Robert Earl of Sunderland.] Biſhop Burnet ſays (32), 'That it 'was the Court of France obtained leave for him to 'return in 1678, when the Parliament was preſſing the 'King into a war. He did all he could to divert peo-'ple from that war; ſo that ſome took him for a pen-'ſioner of France: But to thoſe to whom he durſt ſpeak 'freely, he ſaid, he knew it was all a juggle; that our 'Court was in an entire confidence with France, and 'had no other deſign, in this ſhew of a war, but to raiſe 'an army, and keep it beyond-ſea till it was trained 'and modelled.' Such is the Biſhop's account; but it appears from a Letter of our Author's to Henry Savile, Eſq; then Embaſſador in France, that it was that Gentleman who obtained leave for him to return. The letter is dated from Nerac in Gaſcogne, Dec. 18. N. S. 1682 (33), and is as follows. 'I received yeſterday, 'in one and the ſame packet, three letters from you, 'of which one had paſſed through Paris whilſt I was 'there, and that would have ſpared me a journey of 'four hundred leagues, if I had then received it. This 'would have been a convenience unto me; but my 'obligation unto you is the ſame, and I ſo far acknow-'ledge it to be the greateſt that I have in a long time 'received from any man, as not to value the leave you 'have obtained for me to return into my country, after ſo 'long an abſence, at a lower rate than the ſaving of my 'life. You having proceeded thus far, I will, without 'any ſcruple, put myſelf intirely upon the King's word; 'and deſire you only to obtain a paſs to ſignify it, and 'that his Majeſty is pleaſed to ſend for me; ſo as the 'officers of the ports or other places may not ſtop me, 'as they will be apt to do as ſoon as they know my 'name, if I have not that for my protection. . . . . 'I have no other buſineſs than what ſolely concerns my 'perſon and family. I deſire not to be a day in Eng-'land unknown to the King or his Miniſters; and will 'loſe no time in waiting upon the Secretary as ſoon as 'I can after my arrival. I think it no ways reaſonable 'that I ſhould ſtay in England, if the King do not ſee 'I may do it without any ſhadow or poſſibility of pre-'judice unto him; and, unleſs I can ſatisfy him in that 'point, I deſire no more than to return on this ſide the 'ſeas after the three months, where I intend to finiſh 'my days, without thinking any more of living in 'England (*).'——Though, in the printed copy, this Letter is dated in the year 1682; there is very great reaſon to believe, that it was written in 1677.

I reaſſumed (continues he) my former de-'ſigne of returning into France; and to that end 'bought a ſmall parcell of ground, in a friend's name, 'with an intention of going immediately unto it: 'this proceeded from the uneaſineſs of my life, when 'I found, that not only the reall diſcontents, that 'grew to be too common, weare aſcribed unto me, 'but ſham plots faſtened upon me, ſoe as I could 'never think my life a day in ſafety.'

[N] He loſt his election; as he did alſo in the next Parliament.] He takes notice of his being elected, in one of his letters to Henry Savile Eſq; dated October 29. . . . . 'I am not able, ſaith he, to give ſo much as 'a gueſs whether the Parliament ſhall ſit the 26th of 'January or not, and though I think myſelf in all 'reſpects well choſen, am uncertain whether I ſhall be 'of it, or not, there being a double return; and no-'thing can be aſſured, until the queſtion ariſing there-'upon be determined, unleſs it be that as I and my 'Principles are out of faſhion; my inclinations going 'one way, my friendſhip and alliance with thoſe that 'are like to give occaſion for the greateſt conteſts 'drawing another, I ſhall be equally diſliked and ſuſ-'pected by both parties, and thereby become the moſt 'inconſiderable member of the Houſe.'

[O] He was ſo imprudent as to reſort chiefly with the Duke of Monmouth, and other diſcontented perſons.] That gave the Court an opportunity of involving him in their guilt: Notwithſtanding he proteſts his innocence, and ſeems to be conſcious that no legal advantage could have been taken againſt him. His own account is in theſe words. 'In Aprill laſt [1683] I was told 'by a perſon of eminent quality, virtue, and under-'ſtanding, that I ſhould infaillibly be made a priſoner. 'I aſked upon what pretence: he alleagued ſomme 'things that weare entirely frivolous, relating unto 'vild perſons, whoes faces and names I did not know; 'but concluded ſomme or other would be found; and 'that if I was once taken, it mattered not for what 'cauſe; it being impoſſible to avoid condemnation, 'before ſuch judges and juryes as I ſhould be tryed by. 'About the middell of June the towne was full of 'rumours of a plot, ſayd to be diſcovered by Keeling, 'and not long after by Weſt: ſomme perſons fled, 'and a proclamation iſſued to have them apprehended; 'my name was in every coffee-houſe, and ſeverall in-'formations weare given me, that I ſhould certainly 'be ſeaſed: I mentioned this to ſeverall perſons; but, 'knowing no raiſons why I ſhould abſent myſelf, re-'ſolved not to do it; and continued in that minde, 'though I was told, earely in the morning one the '26 of June, that the Duke of Monmouth was re-'tired, and Coll. Rumſey had rendered himſelf. This 'concerned me ſoe littell, that I ſpent that morn-'ing upon my uſuall ſtudyes, or entertaining ſuch 'freinds as came to ſee me; and whileſt I was at 'dinner, a meſſenger came and arreſted me in the 'Kings name, by an order from four Lords of the 'Privy Councell (35).'——And, whereas part of his indictment was, 'Conſpiring the death of the King;' He endeavours to clear himſelf of that imputation, in the following words: . . . . 'but noe man ſayd, that 'any mention was ever made of it in my preſence; 'even the King knowes I am not a man to have any 'ſuch deſigne; and I am noe more capable of it then of 'eating of him, if he weare (†) death: I think I may 'ſay, I did once ſave his life; but I am ſure I never 'endeavoured to take it away: if the meetings men-'tioned weare to be taken for conſpiracyes againſt his 'Majeſtyes life, ſomething muſt have been there pro-'poſed and reſolved concerning the wayes, manner, 'time, place, or perſons, by whome it ſhould be 'effected; of which not one word is pretended, nor 'that he was ſo much as named (36).'

But, if the Secret Hiſtory of the Rye-houſe Plot, and of Monmouth's rebellion, written by Ford Lord Grey, and lately publiſhed (37), is to be credited; Col. Sydney had a greater ſhare in that Plot, than he was willing to own, or imagined could be proved. The ſhare he had in it appears from the following extracts from that Hiſtory. . . . . 'In February at Chi-'cheſter the Duke of Monmouth acquainted me, that 'my Lord of Eſſex, Lord Howard, Lord Ruſſell, Co-'lonel Sidney, Mr Hambden, and himſelf, had been 'contriving Inſurrections in ſeveral parts of this king-'dom, and deſigned to engage ſome in Scotland to do 'the like; that he was to have a meeting, at his return 'to London, with the perſons above named, but be-'lieved it would not be long before they diſagreed, 'for he feared my Lord of Eſſex, Colonel Sidney, and 'Mr Hambden intended a Commonwealth, which 'could not be without the deſtruction of the King; and 'if that was their intention, my Lord Ruſſell, and 'himſelf were reſolved to quit them entirely, and to 'think of ſaving themſelves; for they would both 'rather lie at the King's mercy for what was paſſed, 'than that his life ſhould be indangered, or his liberty 'taken away, which was next to death (38).'—— 'Col. Sidney addreſſing his diſcourſe to me [Lord Grey] 'began with a long prologue of the neceſſity we were 'reduced to of taking up arms, and of the lawfulneſs 'of it; and from thence deſcended to a particular 'account of their ſeveral proceedings and reſolutions, 'ſince the firſt time of their meeting (39).'—— 'Col. Sidney ſaid he had heard, when wiſe men drew 'their ſwords againſt their King, they laid aſide the 'thoughts of treating with him (40).'——I aſked *Col. The same day, by a warrant from the Secretary of State, he was committed to the Tower for high-treason. A little while after, all his effects were likewise secured (z). On the 7th of November following he was brought to the bar of the court of King's-bench, and arraigned upon an indictment of high-treason [Q]. The Court, for fashion-sake, allowed him a fortnight for his tryal (aa); to which he was brought the 21st of November [R]. The three first witnesses against him were Robert West, Colonel Romsey, and Mr Keeling; whose depositions not being grounded upon their own knowledge, but upon the report of others [S], were only Hearsay Evidence; and consequently invalid in case of Treason. The single Evidence against him was the Lord Howard of Escrick, a man of an abandoned character; 'whose deposition was very 'rhetorical, but nothing at all to the purpose (bb) [T].' So, to corroborate this lame evidence, Col. Sydney's Discourses on Government were produced; as 'a seditious and 'traiterous libel [V], the design of which was, to persuade the People of England, that it is 'lawful,

[Q] Upon an indictment of high-treason.] The points he was indicted for, were, his 'contriving and intend'ing, to disturb the peace and tranquillity of this king'dom of England; to stir up war against the King;
'to subvert his government; to depose and deprive
'him; and to bring and put him to death: For 'which purpose, he had, the 30th day of June, 1683,
'and divers other times, as well before as after, met
'and consulted with divers traytors; promised, that 'he would be aiding and assisting in their treasons;
'had sent one Aaron Smith into Scotland, to invite 'divers evil disposed subjects of that kingdom to come 'into England, to consult with him and other tray'tors. And, that in order to persuade the subjects of 'the King of England that it is lawful to make and 'stir up an insurrection and rebellion against him, he 'had composed and written a certain false, seditious,
'and traiterous libell (46), in which, among other 'things, is contained as followeth, viz. "The Power
"originally in the people of England is delegated
"unto the Parliament. He (meaning King Charles II)
"is subject unto the law of God, as He is a man to "the People that makes him a King, inasmuch as He "is a King, the Law sets a measure unto that sub"jection, and the Parliament judges of the particular "cases thereupon arising &c."——Col. Sidney makes the following observations upon this indictment. 'The 'meetings to conspire were said to be on the 30th of
'June, and many other days, both before and since;
'whereas he was then, and had been some days be'fore, and ever since, a close prisoner.——He was

'to put in a special plea that he had in his hand ready

'that, if he did not immediately plead guilty, a judg-

[S] Whose depositions not being grounded upon their own knowledge, but upon the report of others.] Mr Sydney objected to West's evidence; because he had confessed many Treasons, and was not pardoned. But the Chief Justice Jeffreys replied, That he knew no legal objection against him, and that he was a good witness in my Lord Russel's tryal. What he gave an account of, was only of a general insurrection intended in England; without any thing particular to Col. Sydney, or his indictment. And he declared, that, 'as to him in particular, he 'knew nothing, and did never speak with him till
'since the discovery of the plot. . . . Mr Keeling declared, 'he did not know Col. Sydney (50).'

(50) Tryal of Algernon Sidney Esq; printed in 1684. fol. p. 13, 14, 15, 17. and his last Speech. They are both in the State-Tryals.

[T] The Lord Howard of Escrick, ... whose deposition was very rhetorical, but nothing to the purpose.] Col. Sydney made the following objections against him, and his testimony. 'I have this to say concerning my Lord
'Howard: He hath accused himself of divers treasons,
'and I do not hear that he has his pardon of any:
'He is under the terror of those treasons, and the 'punishment for them: He hath shewn himself to be 'under that terror: He hath said, That he could not 'get his pardon, until he had done some other jobbs,
'till he was past this drudgery of swearing: That is,
'that he having incurred the penalty of High-Treason,
'he would get his own indemnity by destroying others.
'This, by the law of God and man, I think, destroys 'a man's testimony. Besides, he is my Debter, he 'owes me a considerable sum of money I lent him in 'time of his great necessity; he made some covenants 'with me for the payment of that money, which he
'hath broken; and when his mortgage was forfeited,
'and I should take the advantage the law gives me, he
'finds out a way to have me laid up in the Tower. . . .
'Another thing is, when I was a prisoner, he comes 'to my house, and speaks with my servant, and says,
'how sorry he was that I should be brought in danger
'upon this account of the Plot, and there he did in the 'presence of God, with hands and eyes lifted up to 'heaven, swear, he did not believe any plot, and that 'it was but a sham.'——[The Earl of Anglesey, the Lords of Clare, and Paget, Mr Philip and Mr Edward Howard, and Dr Burnet, being produced in Col. Sydney's behalf, unanimously testified, that they heard the Lord Howard declare the same things.]——Col. Sydney depreciated moreover the Lord Howard's character, by alledging, that he endeavoured slily to get possession of his plate and other goods . . . . 'He was 'desirous to go further (says the Colonel) and he would 'not only pay my debt by his Testimony against me;
'but he would have got my plate and other goods in
'my hands into his hands, and he desired my men,
'as a place of trust, to put them into his hands (51).'

[V] Col. Sydney's Discourses on Government were produced, as a seditious and traiterous libel.] There were only a few extracts of them read (52), though Mr Sydney desired that it might be All read. ‘ lawful, nay, that they have a right to ſet aſide their Prince, in caſe it appear to them, ‘ that he hath broken the truſt laid upon him by the people (cc).’ However, upon this imperfect evidence, the Colonel was brought in guilty of high-treaſon; and, on the 26th of November, condemned to be drawn, hanged, and quartered (dd) [W]. Two days before ſentence, he ſent, by the Lord Halifax (ee), a Petition to his Majeſty, wherein he repreſented the hardſhip of his Caſe; and prayed that his Majeſty would be pleaſed to admit him into his preſence; and if he did not ſhew, that it was for his Majeſty's Honour and Intereſt to preſerve him from the ſaid oppreſſion, he would not complain, though he were left to be deſtroyed (ff). But the King was pleaſed to refer him to the ſame Judges of whom he complained (gg). And all the favour he could obtain, was, to have the moſt ignominious part of his ſentence changed into beheading. His Execution was reſpited for ſome days [X], the tryal being univerſally cryed out on, as a piece of moſt enormous injuſtice (hh). At length he was beheaded upon Tower-hill, on the 7th of December; at which time he delivered a Paper to the Sheriffs [Y], that was printed about a fortnight after (ii). with whom he had dealings. But Mr Sidney pleaded in his own defence, That ‘ Similitude of hands can be ‘ no evidence;—that it is nothing. For we know that ‘ hands will be counterfeited, ſo that no man ſhall know ‘ his own hand. . . . . But theſe very papers, ſuch as ‘ they are, (added he) do abhor, as much as any one ‘ can, ſuch a deſign [as the plot he was accuſed of]. ‘ Look upon them; you ſee they are all old ink. Theſe ‘ papers may be writ perhaps theſe twenty years, the ‘ ink is ſo old. But it is a polemical diſcourſe; it ſeems ‘ to be an anſwer to Filmer, &c.——I ſay firſt, it is not ‘ proved upon me: and ſecondly, it is not a crime if ‘ it be proved.’ Afterwards he proves, that he never publiſhed any part of it; and that no man could ſay he ever printed a ſheet in his life. But, to uſe his own words, he was ‘ not heard:’ And therefore had nothing left but to ‘ appeal to God and the world.’ He inſiſted all along, that, at moſt, it could amount but to conſtructive treaſon. But Lord Chief Juſtice Jeffreys affirmed, that it was plain treaſon within 25 Edw. III. Whereupon the Colonel aſked, whether writing was an act? ‘ Yes, ſaid Jeffreys, it is agere (53).’ . . It appears from the very beginning and whole draft of the book, that it was intended as an Anſwer to Sir Robert Filmer's Patriarcha; and not writ with a deſign to raiſe an inſurrection at that time. The beginning of it is in theſe words: ‘ Having lately ſeen a book, intituled ‘ Patriarcha, written by Sir Robert Filmer, concerning ‘ the univerſal and undiſtinguiſhed right of all Kings, ‘ I thought a time of leiſure might be well employed ‘ in examining his doctrine, and the queſtions ariſing ‘ from it; which ſeem ſo far to concern all mankind, ‘ that, beſides the influence upon our future life, they ‘ may be ſaid to comprehend all that in this world ‘ deſerves to be cared for.’ . . . . But, from names mentioned in it, it is undeniable, that ſome parts of it, at leaſt, had not been written twenty years. As for inſtance . . . . ‘ Old Audley, Dog Smith, Biſhop Duppa, ‘ Brownloe, Child, Daſhwood, Fox, &c. are to be ‘ eſteemed fathers of the people of England (54).’ And this other paſſage, where he names ‘ Hide, Arlington, Danby, their graces of Cleveland and Portſmouth, Sunderland, Jenkins, and Chiffinch;’ immediately after mentioning the ‘ bawds, whores, thieves, ‘ buffoons, paraſites, and ſuch vile wretches as are ‘ naturally mercenary, that had too much power at ‘ Whitehall (55).’——However this was the firſt indictment of high-treaſon, upon which any man loſt his life for writing any thing, without publiſhing it; and it is hoped will be the laſt.——Sir John Hawles rightly obſerves, That the evidence in this caſe, and almoſt all the circumſtances of the Tryal, were originals: and that Col. Sydney was talked to death under the notion of a Commonwealth's-man (56).

[W] Condemned to be drawn, hanged, and quartered.] At the hearing of this ſevere ſentence, Col. Sydney broke out into theſe words . . . ‘ Then, o God, o God, ‘ I beſeech thee to ſanctify theſe ſufferings unto me, ‘ and impute not my blood to the country, nor the city, ‘ through which I am to be drawn; let no inquiſition ‘ be made for it: but if any, and the ſhedding of blood ‘ that is innocent, muſt be revenged, let the weight of ‘ it fall only upon thoſe that maliciouſly perſecute me ‘ for righteouſneſs ſake.’ Whereupon Lord Chief Juſtice Jeffreys ſaid to him; ‘ I pray God work in you a temper ‘ fit to go unto the other world, for I ſee you are not fit ‘ for this.’ But the Colonel, holding out his hand, replied, ‘ My Lord, feel my pulſe, and ſee if I am ‘ diſordered; I bleſs God, I never was in better temper ‘ than I am now (57).’ . . . He tells us in his Apology, That ‘ the Chief Juſtice, having performed this exploit, ‘ is ſaid to have bragged unto the King, that noe man ‘ in his place had ever rendered unto any King of Eng‘ land ſuch ſervices as he had done, in making it to ‘ paſſe for lawe, that any man might be now tryed by ‘ a jury not conſiſting of freeholders; and that one ‘ witneſſe, with any concurrent circumſtance (as that ‘ of the buying the knife) was ſufficient to convict ‘ him (58).’

[X] His execution was reſpited for ſome days.] Biſhop Burnet, in his inaccurate way, ſays (59), that it ‘ was ‘ reſpited for three weeks.’ But, if we reckon from the time of his conviction, it was but ſixteen days; and, ‘ from his ſentence, only eleven days.’

[Y] At which time he delivered a Paper to the Sheriffs.] It began thus: ‘ Men, Brethren, and Fathers; Friends, ‘ Countrymen, and Strangers.’———And, after ſetting forth the Hardſhip of his Caſe, and the Inſufficiency of the Evidence againſt him, concluded in theſe words . . . . . ‘ But I was long ſince told that I muſt die, or the ‘ Plot muſt dye. Leaſt the means of deſtroying the ‘ beſt Proteſtants in England ſhould fail, the Bench ‘ muſt be filled with ſuch as had been blemiſhes to the ‘ bar. None but ſuch as theſe would have adviſed with ‘ the King's Council, of the means of bringing a man ‘ to death; ſuffered a Jury to be packed by the King's ‘ Solicitors, and the Under-Sheriff; admit of Jury-men ‘ who are not freeholders; receive ſuch evidence as is ‘ above-mentioned; refuſe a copy of an indictment, ‘ or to ſuffer the ſtatute of 46 Edw. III. to be read, ‘ that doth expreſly enact, It ſhould in no caſe be denied ‘ unto any man upon any occaſion whatſoever; over‘ rule the moſt important points of law without hearing. ‘ And whereas the Stat. 25 Ed. III. upon which they ‘ ſaid I ſhould be tried, doth reſerve unto the Parliament all conſtructions to be made in points of treaſon, ‘ They could aſſume unto themſelves not only a power ‘ to make conſtructions, but ſuch conſtructions as nei‘ ther agree with law, reaſon, or common ſenſe. By ‘ theſe means I am brought to this place. The Lord ‘ forgive theſe practices, and avert the evils that threaten ‘ the Nation from them. The Lord ſanctifie theſe my ‘ ſufferings unto me; and, though I fall as a ſacrifice ‘ unto Idols, ſuffer not Idolatry to be eſtabliſhed in this ‘ land. Bleſs thy people, and ſave them. Defend ‘ thy own cauſe, and defend thoſe that defend it. Stir ‘ up ſuch as are faint; direct thoſe that are willing; ‘ confirm thoſe that waver; give wiſdom and integrity ‘ unto all. Order all things ſo as may moſt redound ‘ unto thine own glory. Grant that I may dye glorifying thee for all thy mercies, and that at the laſt thou ‘ haſt permitted me to be ſingled out as a witneſs of thy ‘ truth; and even by the confeſſion of my oppoſers, ‘ for that Old Cauſe in which I was from my youth ‘ engaged, and for which thou haſt often and wonder‘ fully declared thyſelf.’ . . . . . The Colonel ſuſpecting the Sheriffs might ſuppreſs it, gave a copy of it to a friend. It was a fortnight before it was printed: but when it was underſtood that written copies of it went about, it was at length printed (60). Several Animadverſions were made upon it, particularly one, intituled, ‘ Reflections upon Col. Sidney's Arcadia; the Old Cauſe, ‘ being ſome Obſervations upon his laſt Paper, given ‘ to the Sheriffs at his execution.’ Lond. 1684. in four ſheets fol.

[Z] His attainder was reverſed at the Revolution.] It was one of the firſt Acts of the Parliament, which met after the Revolution; being paſſed Feb. 13, 1688-9. The preamble of that Act runs thus: "Whereas Algernoone Sydney Eſq; in the term of St Michael, in the 35th year of the reign of our late Sovereign Lord, King Charles the Second, in the Court of King's-Bench at Weſtminſter, by means of an unlawful return of Jurors, and by denial of his lawful Challenges to divers of them for want of freehold, and without ſufficient legal evidence of any Treaſons committed by him; there being at that time produced a Paper, found in the cloſet of the ſaid Algernoon, ſuppoſed to be his hand-writing, which was not proved by the teſtimony of any one witneſs to be written by him; but the Jury was directed to believe it, by comparing it with other writings of the ſaid Algernoon: And, beſides that Paper ſo produced, there was but one ſingle Witneſs to prove any matter againſt the ſaid Algernoon; and by a partial and unjuſt conſtruction of the Statute, declaring what was his treaſon, was moſt unjuſtly and wrongfully convicted, and attainted, and afterwards executed for high-treaſon." ... Therefore it is enacted, that the Records and Proceedings, relating to his conviction, judgment, and attainder, ſhould be cancelled.

[AA] The character given of him by Biſhop Burnet, &c.] It is in theſe words: He was 'a man of moſt extra-'ordinary courage, a ſteady man even to obſtinacy, ſin-'cere, but of a rough and boiſterous temper that could 'not bear contradiction. He ſeemed to be a Chriſtian, 'but in a particular form of his own: He thought it 'was to be like a divine Philoſophy in the mind: But 'he was againſt all publick worſhip, and every thing 'that looked like a Church.'——[Upon this the author of Memoirs of Algernon Sidney Eſq; cited above, makes the following note: 'This the reader will 'underſtand with ſome allowance. That our Author 'was an enemy to all the civil eſtabliſhments of Chriſti-'anity, is very certain; but it does not follow from 'thence, that he was againſt all public worſhip (61).' ——Whereby we are to underſtand, He was in the ſame ſentiments upon that point as the late Dr Matthew Tindal; who frequently declared, That even his very notions, if any one ſhould endeavour to eſtabliſh by Authority, he would for that very reaſon oppoſe them to the utmoſt of his power. His maxim being, That there muſt be no civil eſtabliſhment of Religion, but every one is to be left to do what is right in his own eyes.]——But, to proceed with Biſhop Burnet's character of Col. Sydney. 'He was ſtiff to all repub-'lican principles; and ſuch an enemy to every thing 'that looked like a monarchy, that he ſet himſelf in 'a high oppoſition againſt Cromwell, when he was 'made Protector. He had ſtudied the hiſtory of go-'vernment in all its branches beyond any man I ever 'knew. He had a particular way of inſinuating him-'ſelf into people that would hearken to his notions, 'and not contradict him (62).'

To which edition are added, 'Memoirs of his 'Life, and an Apology for himſelf, both now firſt pub-'liſhed, and the latter from his original manuſcript. 'With an alphabetical Index of the principal matters.' They are very much admired; and the Earl of Orrery gives the following great character of them: 'Har-'rington (63) has his admirers, he may poſſibly have his 'merits, but they flow not in his ſtyle. A later writer, 'of the ſame republican principles, has far excelled 'him; I mean Algernon Sydney, whoſe diſcourſes con-'cerning government are admirably written, and con-'tain great hiſtorical knowledge, and a remarkable 'propriety of diction; ſo that his name, in my opinion, 'ought to be much higher eſtabliſhed in the temple of 'literature, than I have hitherto found it placed (64).' There are ſome chaſms in them, and are very probably thoſe ſheets which were taken to be produced at his tryal.

[B] Being the ſon of a Biſhop.] His father was Edward Synge, born at Bridgnorth in Shropſhire, and from thence removed into Ireland by his eld ſt brother George Synge, afterwards biſhop of Cloyne; (of whom an account is given in the next note;) under whoſe care he ſpent his younger days at the ſchool of Droghedah: and, growing up, was ſent to the univerſity of Dublin, where he became exemplary for a diligent application to his ſtudies. He had early ſome eccleſiaſtical preferments in the cathedral of St Patrick's, Dublin. Afterwards he became vicar of Iniſhonane in the county of Cork (3), and was promoted to the Deanery of Elphin. During the uſurpation, he conſtantly uſed the Common-Prayer in all the public offices of his miniſtry; being ſecured from proſecution by his intereſt with Dr Gorge, the then Auditor-general. After the Reſtoration, he was advanced to the biſhoprick of Limerick, and conſecrated January 27, 1660. On the 21ſt of December, 1663, he was tranſlated to the united biſhopricks of Cork, Cloyne, and Roſs. He dyed December 22, 1678. He was a learned and zealous Preacher, very much admired and approved of by all that heard him; and, beſides an eaſy, familiar, correct ſtyle to recommend his Sermons, he had one peculiar excellence in his manner of ſpeaking or delivery; that every one of his congre-of another [C], and the father of two Biſhops [D]. He was the ſecond and youngeſt ſon of Edward, Biſhop of Cork &c and was born April 5, 1659, at Iniſhonane, a village within ten miles of Cork (a). His father was then Vicar of the pariſh, and lived there in the time of the Uſurpation, uſing conſtantly the Common-Prayer, notwithſtanding the ſevere prohibition to the contrary. The father living at Cork from the time he was promoted to that See, the ſon was educated in the Dioceſe-ſchool there. From thence he was admitted a Commoner in Chriſt-Church, Oxford; where he took the Degree of Batchelor of Arts. Soon after that, he went to Cork to viſit his father; on whoſe death, which happened about that time, inſtead of returning to Oxford, he choſe to finiſh his ſtudies in the univerſity of Dublin. There he was admitted ad eundem, and at the uſual time took the degree of Maſter of Arts. In what years he was ordained Deacon and Prieſt, we cannot learn. His firſt preferment was two ſmall pariſhes in the dioceſe of Meath, Laracor and Augher, both together of about the yearly value of 100 l. Some time after, he exchanged theſe for the Vicarage of Chriſt-Church in the city of Cork, of about the ſame value, but one of the heavieſt Cures in Ireland. This he ſerved for above twenty years: the greateſt part of them without an aſſiſtant; his ſcanty income not allowing him to pay one. During theſe years he preached Himſelf twice every Sunday, catechiſed, and diſcharged all the other duties of his function. Some benefices of no note, conſiſtent with his great Cure, were at different times given him by the Biſhops of Cork and Cloyn, which at laſt increaſed his income to about 400 l. a year. In this ſituation, an offer was made him by the Government, in the year 1699, of the Deanery of Derry. But though this was a Dignity, and double in value to all he had, he declined it. His motive was filial piety: He would not ſeparate himſelf from an aged Mother, who could not, or would not remove with him. Continuing at Cork, he was choſen Proctor for the Chapter, in the Convocation called in 1702-3. Soon after, the late Duke of Ormond, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, gave him the Crown's title to the Deanery of St Patrick's in Dublin. This title the Chapter diſputed, claiming a right of election in themſelves; and, to aſſert this right, they choſe Dr John Stearne, then Chancellor of the Cathedral, who died Biſhop of Clogher, their Dean. The title of the Crown being then thought defective, as ſince on a full diſcuſſion it has been found, Dr King, Archbiſhop of Dublin, propoſed an Accommodation, which took place with a full conſent of the Government, and the approbation of the Crown-lawyers. By this, Dr Stearne continued Dean, and the Archbiſhop gave the Chancellorſhip to Mr Synge. This brought him to Dublin, without any addition of income, or eaſe from labour. For, the Chancellor of St Patrick's, as ſuch, has the care of the Pariſh of St Werburg, one of the moſt noted in Dublin. This great Cure he ſerved for eight years, preaching almoſt conſtantly to a crowded audience. In this time he took his degree of Doctor in Divinity. A new Convocation being ſummoned in 1713, he was choſen Proctor for the Chapter of St Patrick's. On Dr Stearne's promotion to the ſee of Dromore, Dr King, Archbiſhop of Dublin, appointed him his Vicar-general: And he continued ſo, till he was made Biſhop of Raphoe in 1714 [E]. His diſtinguiſhed zeal for the late Revolution, and the Hanover ſucceſſion, which had effectually obſtructed his preferment in the latter years of Queen Anne's reign, were the cauſe of his immediate advancement, as ſoon as that ſucceſſion happily took place. In 1716 he was made Archbiſhop of Tuam [F]; preſently after a Privy-Counſellor; and in the years 1716, 1717, 1718, [C] And nephew of another.] Namely, of George Synge, Biſhop of Cloyne in the laſt century. This Dr George Synge was elder bother of Edward mentioned in the laſt note, and born at Bridgnorth in Shropſhire, in the year 1594; being deſcended from an ancient and good family. In 1609, he was admitted a Commoner in Balliol-college in Oxford, where he diligently applied himſelf to his ſtudies for eight years, and in 1616 commenced Maſter of Arts. Thence paſſing into Ireland, he was, on the merit of his many eminent virtues, received with ſingular humanity by Chriſtopher Hampton, Archbiſhop of Armagh; who appointed him his Chaplain, conſtituted him Vicar-general of his dioceſe, and cauſed him to be promoted to the deanery of Dromore. On the 11th of November, 1638, he was conſecrated Biſhop of Cloyne. Upon the breaking out of the Iriſh rebellion in 1641, he was forced to fly to Dublin, and remain ſome time there for his own ſafety. In February, 1644, his Majeſty appointed him one of his Privy-Council for Ireland; and, on the vacancy of the Archbiſhoprick of Tuam in 1646, nominated him to that See; of which the national troubles hindered his having any enjoyment. The year following he returned to his native town of Bridgnorth, where he dyed in 1653, and was buried in the church of St Mary Magdalen in that town. He was a prelate of ſingular gravity and great learning, eſpecially in polemic Divinity, and in the knowledge of the civil and canon law. He was tall of ſtature, of a graceful preſence, and polite converſation; charitable to the poor, beneficent to all, and in a conſtant exerciſe of hoſpitality and generoſity ſecond to none (5).

Theſe were originally that portion of Oblations, which, before the Inſtitution of Pariſhes, was reſerved to the Biſhop for his maintenance; the other three parts being employed for the ſupport of the inferior Clergy, the repairing the fabricks of Churches, and the Suſtenance

This learned Prelate, in the courſe of his Miniſtry, compoſed and publiſhed ſeveral very excellent Treatiſes for the promotion of Religion, Piety, and Virtue; of which an account is given below [G]. He died at Tuam, July 24, 1741, with

of the poor. After the inſtitution of pariſhes, the Tythes were diſtributed for a time in the ſame way. But when Biſhopricks came to be endowed with lands and other firm poſſeſſions, then the Biſhops, to encourage a quick foundation of Churches, and to eſtabliſh a better proviſion for the reſiding Clergy, did tacitly recede from their Quarter part.——This portion the Archbiſhop of Tuam, and his ſuffragan Biſhops, were originally intitled to, as well as the reſt, in their reſpective Biſhopricks, to make up a ſufficient revenue for the ſupport of the dignity of their places. At the Reformation, the Conaught clergy became more poorly provided for than in any other part of the kingdom; which was partly occaſioned by lay-impropriations, partly for want of a ſettled form of tything, and partly by the Quarter-Epiſcopals, which gave the Biſhops a fourth part of the Tythes of moſt of the pariſhes in their dioceſes; and that, with the Impropriator's right to two parts, left the Clergy but a fourth, a poor and miſerable maintenance. The Biſhops of that province were not much better provided for; and without the Quarter-Epiſcopals would have been in as mean a condition as the reſt of the Clergy. The Archbiſhopric of Tuam, for inſtance, was reduced to 160*l. per annum.*——In 1636, the then Archbiſhop of Tuam, jointly with the Biſhops of Elphin, Clonfert, and Killala, petitioned K. Charles I. to grant them ſuch lands as they could by good proof, or ſtrong probability, ſhew to have belonged to their Sees; or which they had an equitable right to; and that were with-held from them by unjuſt pretences: to the end they might be enabled to maintain themſelves with their own lands, without the epiſcopal Quarter part of Tythes, any great addition of charge to the King, or the plurality of commendams. This petition, through the hearty concurrence of the Lord Deputy Wentworth, met with a favourable reception. But the enſuing rebellion, in 1641, hindered the final and happy ſettlement of that affair.——Good Archbiſhop Synge, at the meeting of the next parliament after his conſecration, took care to have an act paſſed, in 1717, for diveſting his See for ever of the ſaid Quarter-epiſcopal part, and for ſettling the ſame on ſuch Rectors, Vicars, or Curates, as do perſonally diſcharge the reſpective cures within the dioceſes of Tuam and Enaghdune. He alſo procured a clauſe in that act, to enable him to demiſe a ſhare of the demeſne lands of the Archbiſhoprick, in the ſame manner as he by law could demiſe other lands, not demeſne, belonging thereto, at the rent of three fourths of the full yearly value (8).

He alſo publiſhed Two Letters concerning the Juriſdiction of the Houſe of Lords of Ireland. They were writ at the time when it was queſtioned, and before a Britiſh Act of Parliament took it away. They were very well liked (9).

Theſe ſeveral Treatiſes are written in a polite, ſenſible, eaſy, and rational manner: and have been ſo well received by the Public, that many of them have paſſed through ſeveral Editions. The 21ſt Edition, for inſtance, of the "Anſwer to all the Excuſes which Men "make for not coming to the Communion," was publiſhed in 1752, as was alſo the 13th of his "Eſſay "towards making the Knowledge of Religion eaſy," in 1754. TALBOT [CHARLES], Duke of Shrewſbury, well deſerves a place in theſe memoirs, as a patriot Stateſman. He was born on St. James's Eve, 1660, and, in reſpect to his family [A], King Charles II. ſtood his God-father, being the firſt to whom that monarch did this honour after his Reſtoration (a). He loſt his father when he was ſeven years of age (b), and being brought to enquire into the popiſh religion (in which he had been bred) by the diſcovery of the popiſh plot in 1679, he applied to Dr Tillotſon, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who having ſoon reconciled him to the Church of England, he attended the Doctor for the firſt time at the public worſhip in Lincoln's-Inn Chapel, on Sunday the 4th of May that year (c). However, this change of his religion had not, it ſeems, a ſuitable influence upon the moral part of his conduct. His Lordſhip, among other excellent endowments, was particularly diſtinguiſhed by a very handſome perſon, which procuring him an eaſy acceſs to the Ladies (d), he indulged himſelf in ſome exceſſes with the ſex. This reaching the ears of his Converter, Doctor Tillotſon, gave occaſion to the moſt elegant and polite letter, that was ever penned by that eloquent Divine [B]. As it was his loyalty that apparently

[A] In reſpect to his family.] This family (1) is ſaid to have been in England before the Conqueſt, but the firſt mentioned in our records, is Richard Talbot, who is declared to have great poſſeſſions in the time of the Conqueſt (2). From him, after ſeveral deſcents, ſprung Gilbert Talbot, who flouriſhed in the reigns of Henry III. and Edward I, and having married Guenthlian, daughter of Rheſe ap Griffith, Prince of Wales, his deſcendants reliuquiſhed their paternal arms, a bend of ten peeces argent and gules, and bore a lion rampant, or, in a field gules, within a bordure engrailed of the firſt, which were the arms of the ſaid Rheſe and his anceſtors, Princes of Wales (3). Gilbert's great grandſon, Richard, was ſummonſed to Parliament by the title of Lord Talbot, July 5, ann. 1330. Edward III, whoſe grandſon of the ſame name had iſſue Gilbert, his ſon and heir, who dying without male iſſue, his younger brother became heir to Gilbert's only daughter. This younger brother was the famous Sir John Talbot, who makes ſuch a figure in our hiſtory for his heroic atchievements, eſpecially in France, under Henry V. (4), and was Earl of Shrewſbury, May 20, 1442, in the 20th year of the reign of Henry VI, and in the 24th of that King, ann. 1446, was Earl of Wexford, and created by Patent Earl of Waterford in Ireland. From this great Earl was deſcended lineally Edward the eighth Earl of Shrewſbury, who dying Jan. 14, ann. 1616, without male iſſue, the titles came to the heirs of Sir Gilbert Talbot of Grafton, ſecond ſon to John the ſecond Earl of Shrewſbury, of this houſe. This Sir Gilbert Talbot being twice married, was immediately ſucceeded by the eldeſt ſon of the firſt marriage, Sir Gilbert Talbot, Knight, of Grafton, who dying without iſſue male, his younger brother by their father's ſecond marriage became Sir John Talbot of Grafton, Knight, who being twice married, was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon of the firſt marriage (5), Sir John Talbot of Grafton, whoſe grandſon, George Talbot, by the death of Edward the eighth Earl of Shrewſbury, without iſſue male, in the 15th year of the reign of James I, became the ninth Earl of Shrewſbury, to whoſe ſon, John the tenth Earl, ſucceeded his ſon and heir, Francis the eleventh Earl, Father to the Subject of the preſent article, who was the twelfth Earl, and both firſt and laſt Duke of Shrewſbury.

[B] Doctor Tillotſon wrote a letter to him.] It was in theſe terms.

'My Lord,

'It was a great ſatisfaction to me to be any ways inſtrumental in the gaining your Lordſhip to our religion, which I am really perſuaded to be the truth. But I am, and always was, more concerned, that your Lordſhip ſhould continue a virtuous and good man, than become a Proteſtant; being aſſured that the ignorance and errors of men's underſtanding will find a much eaſier forgiveneſs with God, than the faults of the will. I remember that your Lordſhip once told me, that you would endeavour to juſtify the ſincerity of your change by a conſcientious regard to all other parts and actions of your life. I am ſure you cannot more effectually condemn your own act, than by being a worſe man after your profeſſion to have embraced a better religion. I will certainly be one of the laſt to believe any thing of your Lordſhip that is not good; but I always feared I ſhould be one of the firſt, that ſhould hear it. The time I laſt waited upon your Lordſhip, I had heard ſomething that afflicted me very ſenſibly, but I hoped it was not true, and was therefore loth to trouble your Lordſhip about it. But having heard the ſame from thoſe, who, I believe, bear no ill will to your Lordſhip, I now think it my duty to acquaint you with it. To ſpeak plainly, I have been told, that your Lordſhip is of late fallen into a converſation, dangerous both to your reputation and virtue, two of the tendereſt and deareſt things in the world. I believe your Lordſhip to have a great command and conduct of yourſelf; but I am very ſenſible of human frailty, and of the dangerous temptations to which youth is expoſed in this diſſolute age. Therefore I earneſtly beſeech your Lordſhip to conſider, beſides the high provocation of Almighty God, and the hazard of your ſoul, whenever you engage in a bad courſe, what a blemiſh you will bring upon a fair and unſpotted reputation; what uneaſineſs and trouble you will create to yourſelf from the ſevere reflections of a guilty conſcience; and how great a violence you will offer to your good principles, your nature, and your education, and to a mind the beſt made for virtuous and worthy things. And do not imagine you can ſtop when you pleaſe. Experience ſhews us the contrary, and that nothing is more vain, than for men to think they can ſet bounds to themſelves in any thing that is bad. I hope in God no temptation has yet prevailed on your Lordſhip apparently firſt prompted a diſlike to the religion of his Anceſtors, ſo this principle being embelliſhed (to ſpeak in the courtly phraſe of theſe times) with a turn to gallantry, a ſweet temper, and fine addreſs, rendered him very acceptable to the gay Court of Charles. And at the coronation of King James, he was pitched upon to bear the curtana, or pointleſs ſword (e). In this reign, he had alſo the command of a regiment of horſe; but when that unfortunate prince broke into the conſtitution, by aſſuming an arbitrary and diſpenſing power, the Earl reſigned his regiment, and went to the Prince of Orange, having firſt borrowed 12000 l. to ſupport him, part of which was from Father Peters (f). Biſhop Burnet, who was well acquainted with the Prince's affairs at this time, tells us, that the Earl of Shrewſbury was one of the nobles chiefly truſted by his Highneſs, and on whoſe advice he governed all his motions, and drew his declaration (g). On the Prince's landing in the Weſt, the Earl was ſent by him to take poſſeſſion of Briſtol, and he was principally concerned in promoting the aſſociation to revenge any attempt that ſhould be made upon his Highneſs's perſon. He was afterwards appointed, with the Earls of Oxford and Clarendon, to treat with the Lords ſent by King James, to know what the Prince demanded, and was primarily conſulted in all affairs of the Revolution. During the debates about ſettling the nation, ſome methods being propoſed, which gave the Prince great uneaſineſs, the Earl of Shrewſbury was one of the three Lords to whom he choſe to explain himſelf diſtinctly. When the Prince and Princeſs were declared King and Queen of England, the Earl was ſworn of the Privy Council, and made ſole Principal Secretary of State (h): he was alſo one of the Commiſſioners appointed to hear and determine the claims exhibited, to be performed at the Coronation, in which he bore one of the three ſwords, April 11, 1689: and on the 18th he was conſtituted Lord Lieutenant of Worceſterſhire, and was alſo Lord Lieutenant of Herefordſhire (i). But the Court afterwards taking ſome meaſures he did not approve, he reſigned the Secretary's place (k) in December, 1690, and was ſucceeded by the Lord Viſcount Sidney (l), but was ſworn into the other department of that office on the 4th of March, 1693, in the room of the Earl of Nottingham. On the 25th of April following, 1694, he was elected Knight of the Garter (m), and on the 30th of that month advanced to the dignities of Marquis of Alton and Duke of Shrewſbury (n). May 11, he was appointed Lord Lieutenant of Angleſey, as he was alſo of Flintſhire and Denbyſhire on the 31ſt of that month. On the 5th of November, 1695, King William did him the honour to dine with him at his ſeat at Heythrop in Oxfordſhire (o), and the ſame year, as alſo in 1697, he was one of the Lords Juſtices of England during his Majeſty's abſence abroad [C]. In May 1699, he reſigned the ſeals of Secretary of State (p), on account of his ill ſtate of health, occaſioned by an unlucky fall from his horſe in a fox-chace, when the creature happened to give him a blow upon the breaſt in riſing, which brought on him ſuch a ſpitting of blood, and ſhortneſs of breath, as made him uncapable of going through the buſineſs of his poſt. However, on the 25th of October following, he was appointed Lord Chamberlain of the Houſhold (q), as a place of eaſier management; but the diſcharge of blood increaſing, he was adviſed by his phyſicians to go to a warmer climate, as the only means of effecting his recovery (r). Hereupon he reſolved to reſign his ſtaff and key as Chamberlain, and prepared to go abroad. This happening at the juncture when his friends, the Earl of Orford, the Lord Somers and Halifax, were haraſſed by the Parliament (s), gave a handle to ſuch as would not believe his illneſs, to report him for a deſerter, who was leaving the Kingdom out of cowardice (t) [D].

'ſhip ſo far, as to be guilty of any looſe act. If it 'has, as you love your ſoul, let it not proceed to an 'habit. The retreat is yet eaſy and open, but will 'every day become more difficult and obſtructed. God 'is ſo merciful, that upon your repentance, and reſolu'tion of amendment, he is not only ready to forgive 'what is paſt, but to aſſiſt us by his Grace to do better 'for the future. But I need not enforce theſe conſi'derations upon a mind ſo capable of, and eaſy to re'ceive, good counſel. I ſhall only deſire your Lord'ſhip to think again and again, how great a point of 'wiſdom it is in all our actions to conſult the peace of 'our minds, and to have no quarrel with the conſtant 'and inſeparable companion of our lives. If others diſ'pleaſe us, we may quit their company; but he that 'is diſpleaſed with himſelf, is unavoidably unhappy, 'becauſe he has no way to get rid of himſelf.

'My Lord, for God's ſake and your own, think of 'being happy, and reſolve by all means to ſave your'ſelf from this untoward generation. Determine rather 'upon a ſpeedy change of your condition, than to gra'tify the inclinations of your youth in any thing but 'what is lawful and honourable; and let me have the 'ſatisfaction to be aſſured from your Lordſhip, either 'that there has been no ground for this report, or that 'there ſhall be none for the future; which will be the 'welcomeſt news to me in the world. I have only to 'beg of your Lordſhip to believe, that I have not done 'this to ſatisfy the formality of my profeſſion; but that 'it proceeds from the trueſt affection and good-will, 'that one man can poſſibly bear to another. I pray 'God every day for your Lordſhip, with the ſame con'ſtancy and fervour, as for myſelf, and do moſt ear'neſtly beg, that this counſel may be acceptable and 'effectual.' I am &c.

[C] He was one of the Lords Juſtices in 1697.] It is ſaid, that the year before, Lord Peterborough promiſed Sir John Fenwick his life, if he would accuſe the Duke of Shrewſbury and the Lord Orford of having a deſign to bring in King James, and that the firſt mentioned Lord wrote a book, with the aſſiſtance of Dr D'Avenant, and put one Smith's name to it (6), againſt the Duke, which loſt Lord Peterborough, with all honeſt men, the Houſe of Commons, voting the firſt a ſcandalous deſign to make a difference between the King and his beſt friends (7), and the Houſe of Peers ordering the ſecond to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman.

[D] Leaving the kingdom out of cowardice.] The Writer of his life tells us, that he retired to his friend, Mr Mackey's houſe, at Dover, for two or three days, till the yacht could be got ready, that was to tranſport him. And that he there received the King's ſurprizing order from a Secretary of State, to take Paris in his way to Montpelier, and to viſit the French King. Accordingly he went to that Monarch at Verſailles, who received him coolly, and entertained him with nothing but bagatelles [trifles]; that in coming from the King, he met the Count de Lauſun, who, after the uſual civilities, aſked him if he would not ſee the Chevalier St George: to which the Earl anſwered, that if he was to ſee him, he ſhould chuſe rather to ſee him there than in England. The ſame Writer aſſures us, that he even never viſited the Earl of Middleton, who was married to his mother's ſiſter, and with whom he had been for many years in the moſt intimate and affectionate friendſhip (*).

He had ſcarce got to Montpelier, when the King of Spain dying, his Grace concluded we ſhould be drawn into a new war, and therefore haſtening out of France, he retired to Geneva, where he paſſed his time very agreeably for a year; but the fogs from the lake bringing a return of his diſorder, obliged him to croſs the Alps to Italy. Naples was the place he had deſigned for his reſidence; but King Philip having got poſſeſſion of that kingdom, his Grace went to Rome, took a very handſome palace near the Capitol, and lived there above three years (u). On Queen Anne's acceſſion to the throne, having reſigned the Chamberlain's place (w), he received letters both from the Duke of Marlborough and Earl Godolphin, offering him the place of Maſter of the Horſe to her Majeſty; and entreating him to come and ſhare in the adminiſtration with them (x): but his health would not permit him to think of a return to England, and public buſineſs at that time. His enemies there, who had before repreſented his diſtemper as a meer ſtate trick, now gave out that he was a Roman Catholic again, and the Engliſh Papiſts, joining in the cry, ſaid, his journey to Rome was to reconcile himſelf to their Church. But this was ſo far from being a true ſtate of the caſe, that the more he ſaw of Popery abroad, the more he was confirmed in the Proteſtant Religion and intereſt [E]; inſomuch, that by expoſing the follies of the former, he converted the Earl of Cardigan and his brother from it, even at Rome (y). He converſed indeed indifferently with all ſorts of people, eſpecially the Literati, and improved his knowledge in painting and architecture, to which laſt he applied aſſiduouſly; and made a very good collection of the firſt (z). His evenings he generally paſſed at the Princeſs Carpigni's, where he firſt ſaw his Dutcheſs; ſhe was the widow of a Count belonging to the late Queen of Sweden, and daughter to the Marquis Paliotti of Bologna in Italy (aa). As ſhe had a great many engaging qualities, and he of a generous, as well as amorous temper, there grew a ſtrict friendſhip between them, which at length concluded in a marriage [F]; but was not celebrated till he got into a Proteſtant country, and ſhe had made an abjuration of the Romiſh Faith, at Augſburgh in Germany, to which place ſhe followed him, after he had made the tour of Lombardy, Venice, Padua, and Verona. The ceremony being completed, they left Augſburgh, and paſſing, in their way to England, through Cologne to Francfort (bb), his Grace communicated his marriage in a letter from thence to the Duke of Marlborough [G], then in Flanders. This great general arriving, November the 1ſt, at Francfort, in order to proceed to Vienna, was entertained, with his retinue, at dinner by the Duke of Shrewſbury, who, on the 22d of that month, arrived at the Hague, and landed in England with the Duke of Marlborough, December 30, 1705. On his arrival, meeting with a cool reception from his old friends, the Whigs, he retired firſt into Worceſterſhire and Shropſhire, and from thence to his purchaſe at Heythrop, near Woodſtock, in Oxfordſhire (cc). During this retirement, the other party left no ſtone unturned to get ſo conſiderable a man on their ſide, knowing the great regard the Queen had for him, and the reputation he had with the people. And repreſenting to him the ingratitude of a party to whom he had been ſo uſeful, he was at laſt prevailed upon to come to Court, and April 15, 1710, was made again Lord Chamberlain of the Houſhold by Queen Anne, and ſworn again of her Privy Council. Alſo May 10, 1712, his Grace was appointed Lord Lieutenant, and Cuſtos Rotulorum of Shropſhire. Afterwards he entered into all the meaſures of the miniſtry for obtaining a peace (dd); and to give the finiſhing ſtroke to it, he accepted of going Ambaſſador extraordinary to the French court, in order to complete it, on the 23d of November (ee). However, as he was neither to be flattered nor cajoled, and inſiſting on ſeveral beneficial articles of commerce, which the French would have declined, he ſoon found a coldneſs in that court towards him, and thereupon ſollicited his return, which however he did not preſently obtain. When he came to England, he had hardly time to ſettle his private affairs before he was ſent out of the way (as the Writer of his Life relates) Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in September the ſame year. The uncommon reception he met with at Dublin, where the Recorder complimented him with the great ſhare he had in the Revolution, and the Peers and Clergy complimented him on the great ſhare he had in making the peace, was the genuine effect of party infatuation. However, no man in his poſt could behave with more care for the Proteſtant Intereſt, and the liberties of that country [H], tempering, as much as poſſible, the rage

[E] The more he was confirmed in the Proteſtant Religion and intereſt.] He often ſaid, that all Engliſhmen ought to travel, to value the more their ſo happy conſtitution; for that the more we ſaw of the foppery of the Romiſh Religion, and the oppreſſion in deſpotic governments, the more we ſhould ſupport that eaſy and happy government in Church and State we are under at home. He abhorred the proceſſions made to the Madonas, and the worſhipping of our Saviour in the ſhape of a wafer erected on a throne as an earthly King. He was ſo ſtrict, that he would never enter into their Churches to ſee any curioſities during the time of any ſervice whatſoever, to avoid any indecency from himſelf, or ſcandal to others (8).

[F] Concluded in a marriage.] The ſtory which paſſed current in England, that his Grace was bullied into this marriage by two of the Lady's brothers in Italy, is ſaid to be intirely falſe and groundleſs. Since he was gone from her above ſix months before the marriage; and the Marquis Paliotti, her brother, who was ſaid to be the perſon that bullied him, he never ſaw till ſix weeks after his marriage; when he came to meet them at Cologne, in their way to England from the Palatine court at Duſſeldorp, to which Paliotti then belonged (9).

[G] He communicated his marriage to the Duke of Marlborough.] His Grace, it is ſaid, diſcovered, by the ſtile of this letter, that the Duke of Shrewſbury had done a thing, for which he wanted to make an apology; and his friends in England believed he was aſhamed of it, ſince the notice they had of it, was by his letter to Mr De la Faye, one of the Clerks of the Secretary's Office, who took care of his letters (10).

(10) His Life.

[H] He maintained the Proteſtant Intereſt, and the liberty of that country.] Though he was now under the influence of a Tory-Adminiſtration, yet the Writer of his Life obſerves that did not bias him to either party, of which he gives the following inſtances. He could have had Sir Richard Leving (ſet up by the Tories) choſen Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, inſtead of Mr Broderick, ſet up by the Whigs; but he would, neither rage and animoſities of both parties. The conſequence of which was, as might be expected, that the Whigs feared to truſt him, and the Tories ſuſpected him: ſo that when he returned to England, they had the inſolence to print a Satire, and cry it about the ſtreets, before he was on ſhip-board, intituled Polyphemus, or Ireland's Eye, alluding to his ſingle eye (ff). His coming over was occaſioned by the great variance between Oxford and Bollingbroke, and the illneſs of the Queen, who in the laſt extremity, took the ſtaff from Oxford, and delivered it, two days after, on her death-bed, to the Duke of Shrewſbury. So that at the Queen's death, he was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Lord High-Treaſurer of Great Britain, and Lord Chamberlain, three great places never before in the hands of one perſon at the ſame time. His Grace ſigned the Proclamation for proclaiming King George I, and was one of the Lords appointed by his Majeſty to govern the nation till his arrival. After which, on September 26, 1714, he was made Groom of the Stole and Privy Purſe (gg); and, on the appointing of a new Privy Council, he was ſworn into it. He was alſo conſtituted Lord Lieutenant of Worceſterſhire; and on the 17th of October, declared Lord Chamberlain of the houſhold to his Majeſty, in whoſe favour he ſtood very well to the laſt. But his diſorder turning into an obſtinate aſthma, he grew to be frequently out of order, and reſigned the Chamberlain's key ſome months before his death, the immediate cauſe whereof was a fever, which coming upon his aſthma, carried him off on the 1ſt of February, 1717-18, at his ſeat at Iſleworth, in the fifty-eighth year of his age. On the Monday before he died, he ſent for all his ſervants into his room, and telling them, that let his Phyſicians ſay what they would, he was ſure he muſt die ſoon, deſired, if death ſhould carry him off ſuddenly, they would do that juſtice to his memory, to declare, as he did, that he died in the communion of the Church of England, of which he had been above thirty years an unworthy member. On Tueſday he received the Sacrament, from the hands of William Talbot, Biſhop of Saliſbury, his relation, and Dr Chark, his pariſh Miniſter. He preſerved his judgment, and ſenſes, to the laſt minute. Even on the day he died, he bid the Dutcheſs and his Phyſician go to dinner, and come and chat with him when they had done; but before dinner was over, he expired.

(ff) His Life, ubi ſupra, p. 54.

(gg) His Dutcheſs was alſo made one of the Ladies of the Bedchamber to her Royal Highneſs the Princeſs of Wales, afterwards Queen Caroline. Peerage of England.

As to his Lordſhip's character, the Writer of his Life aſſures us, that he was one of the fineſt gentlemen of the age he lived in, very handſome in his perſon, of an admirable addreſs, and the charmingeſt way of ſpeaking; he was the kindeſt maſter to his ſervants, and the juſteſt to his creditors, that ever was known. He was a nobleman of great gallantry, when young, among the Ladies (bb). He might have had many great matches in his own country, and ſome he liked well enough in that view, if he had not found the Ladies facile. He was always a Courtier as long as he was perſuaded the Court acted for the intereſt of his Country; but whenever a ſtep was taken there, which he thought againſt that intereſt, he went out of the great offices with as much eaſe as he ſhifted his cloaths. This reſolution to join implicitly with no party, brought him under a misfortune which generally attends a true Patriot Spirit, not to be thought ſteady to any. But though his conduct did not always eſcape ſuch miſrepreſentations as are the ordinary effect of miſtake or malice, yet, in general, he had the good opinion of all; ſo that King William uſed to ſay, that the Duke of Shrewſbury was the only man of whom the Whigs and Tories both ſpoke well (ii).

(ii) Memoirs of the Noble Family of Talbot, p. 7.

Although his heir at law differed from him in Religion, and was a diſtant relation; yet for the honour of the family, he left the whole Eſtate to go together, which from four thouſand pounds a year, and in debt, he brought to eight thouſand, out of debt (kk). By his will, it was not to be alienated from the honour; and an Act of Parliament has been ſince obtained for that purpoſe [I]. On his deceaſe, the titles of Duke and Marquis being only granted to him and his heirs male, became extinct; but the Earldom of Shrewſbury devolved on Gilbert Talbot, the eldeſt ſurviving ſon of Thomas Talbot of Longford, only ſon of John the tenth Earl of Shrewſbury. But this Gilbert being in Holy Orders, in the Romiſh Church, died without iſſue in 1743, whereby the honours deſcended to his brother George, whoſe ſon of the ſame name, born December 11, 1719, is the preſent Earl of Shrewſbury, who, November 21, 1753, married Elizabeth, daughter of the honourable John Dormer of Peterly, in the county of Bucks, Eſq; (ll).

neither by bribery nor influence, break in upon that liberty, which ought to be ſacred in a Parliament's choice of their Speaker. In the ſame ſpirit, when General Stewart, at his Levee one morning, ſpeaking of an election with joy that the Tories had carried, made uſe of the word we, the Duke took him up ſhort, and 'bid him not ſpeak in the plural number, for he came not there to be of any party, but to adminiſter juſtice impartially to all; to ſerve his Queen, and to protect the ſubjects in their liberty.' Moreover, when the election for the city of Dublin came on, and the Tories, as a mark of diſtinction, wore laurels in their hats, he ordered the yeomen of the guards to deny entrance to every body without diſtinction, that ſhould come to court with that, or any other badge of diſſention. And when the Papiſts, who were very numerous at Dublin, joined with the Tories to mob the Whigs, he tacitly permitted the guards to diſperſe them.

The iſſue of this ſecond match, was John Talbot of Salwarp in Worceſterſhire, whoſe ſon, Sherington Talbot of Salwarp and Lacock in Wiltſhire, had by a ſecond marriage four ſons, of whom the third ſon, William, was Grandfather to the Chancellor (3).

[B] The ſon of a Biſhop.] His Grandfather marrying Mary, the daughter of Thomas Doughty of Whittington in Worceſterſhire, Eſq; had iſſue, beſides two daughters (4), an only ſon, William, who was born at Stourton-Caſtle in Staffordſhire, a ſeat of his Father, a little before the Reſtoration of King Charles II, and was admitted a Gentleman Commoner of Oriel-College, in the beginning of the year 1674, at the age of fifteen; and the year following ſpoke a good ſpeech in the Encænia (5). He took the degree of A. B. Octob. 16, 1677 (6), and proceeded to A. M. June 23, 1680 (7), after which he took Holy Orders, obtained a Benefice, and married the daughter of Mr Criſpe, an eminent Attorney at Chipping-Norton in Oxfordſhire. After the Revolution, by the intereſt of his Kinſman, Charles Talbot, then Earl of Shrewſbury, he was promoted to the Deanery of Worceſter, April 23, 1691, in the room of Dr Hickes, ejected for refuſing to take the oaths to the new government. In June following, he was diplomated Doctor of Divinity by Archbiſhop Tillotſon (8); and diſtinguiſhing himſelf in the pulpit, he was more than once called to preach before Queen Mary (9). Upon the demiſe of Dr Fell, he was advanced to the Biſhopric of Oxford, to which he was conſecrated September 24, 1699, with leave to hold his Deanery in Commendam (10). He held this See till 1715 (11), when he ſucceeded Dr Burnet in that of Saliſbury (12), and upon the Death of Dr Crew, he was tranſlated thence (13), on the 23d of September, 1722, to the Biſhopric of Durham, of which County he was Lord Lieutenant, and Cuſtos Rotulorum. He continued in this See till his death, which happened on the 10th of October, 1730. After the deceaſe of his firſt wife, without iſſue, he entered into a ſecond marriage with Catharine, daughter of Alderman King of London, who brought him eight ſons and ſeveral daughters. Of thoſe who lived to maturity, beſides Charles, the Eldeſt, the ſubject of the preſent article, were, 2. Edward, who was born in the city of Worceſter, and bred at Oriel-College in Oxford, where, after taking his firſt degree in Arts, he was choſen Fellow, October 30, 1712. He proceeded A. M. October 14, 1714, and reſigned his Fellowſhip, October 20, 1715, apparently on account of his marriage with Mary, daughter to the Reverend Mr Martin. He died, in 1720, Archdeacon of Berkſhire, having iſſue an only daughter, Catharine. 3. Sherington Talbot, who being bred to the army, became Captain of an independent company of foot, afterwards Lieutenant Colonel, and thence Colonel of a regiment of foot, February 17, 1747. He married a daughter of — Midget, who died September 6, 1749, and has iſſue two ſons, William and Charles, both living in 1756. 4. Henry, a Commiſſioner of the Salt duty, who married firſt a daughter of —— Lloyd, by whom he has iſſue a daughter, Elizabeth; and marrying ſecondly Catharine, daughter of Sir Hugh Clopton of Stratford upon Avon in Warwickſhire, hath by her, who died May 17, 1754, no iſſue. He is ſtill living a Widower. The Biſhop's daughters were Henrietta Maria, married to Dr Charles Trimnel, late Lord Biſhop of Wincheſter; and Catharine, married to Exton Sayer, LL. D. who being bred to the Civil Law at Trinity-hall in Cambridge, became a Fellow of that College, and an Advocate in Doctors Commons (14), and after his marriage, was made Chancellor of Durham, Surveyor of his Majeſty's Land Revenues, &c. and died Member of Parliament for Totneſs in 1731. His Lady ſurvived him, and died in Auguſt 1734 (15). The Biſhop was of a magnificent taſte and temper, which often run him into difficulties, through expence, from which he was as often extricated by his moſt worthy ſon, the Chancellor (16).

[C] He married the heir of Charles Matthews.] She was, by her mother's ſide, great grand-daughter, and heireſs of David Jenkins, Eſq; of Henſol in the ſame County. This was the famous Judge Jenkins, who was deſcended of an ancient and honourable family (17), and being one of the Juſtices of South Wales, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning and eminency in his profeſſion, and for his ſteady adherence to the cauſe of King Charles I. It being a part of his Character, that he could neither be flattered by promiſes, nor intimidated by threats (18). Such a character is of great uſe and ſervice to the public, by raiſing a ſpirit of emulation. We ſhall therefore exhibit the principal articles, which conſtituted it, in the following ſuccinct account of this very worthy Judge. He was born at Henſol, in the of pariſh Pendeylwin, in Glamorganſhire, became Commoner of St Edmund's-Hall, Oxon, in 1597; and after taking the degree of A. B. went to Grey's-Inn, ſtudied the Common Law, and when Barriſter, had good buſineſs in his profeſſion. In the firſt of Charles I. being a Bencher, he was elected Summer Reader, but refuſed to read. Being afterwards made one of the Judges for South Wales (19), he continued in that office till the Rebellion broke out, at which time he either impriſoned divers perſons in his Circuit, or condemned them to die, as being guilty of High Treaſon for bearing arms againſt the King. At length being taken Priſoner at Hereford, when that city was ſurprized by the Parliament forces, December 18, 1645, he was carried up to London, and ſent to the Tower, whence being brought to the Bar in Chancery, he denied the authority of that Court, becauſe their ſeal was counterfeited, and conſequently the Commiſſioners thereof conſtituted againſt law: whereupon being committed to Newgate, he was impeached of Treaſon, and brought to the Bar of the Houſe of Commons; but denying their authority, and refuſing to kneel, he was fined for that contempt 1000 l. remitted to Newgate, and thence removed to Wallingford Caſtle. About that time he uſed his utmoſt endeavour to create a breach between the Parliament and the Army, but without effect. In 1650, an Act paſſed for his trial in the High Court of Juſtice, ſo that expecting to be hanged, he reſolved to ſuffer with the Bible under one arm, and Magna Charta under the other (20). 'But, proceeds my Author, Harry Martin, as it is ſaid, urging to his fellows, that ſanguis martyrum eſt ſemen eccleſiæ, and that this way of proceeding would do them miſchief, they thought good not to take away his life ().' He was afterwards ſent to Windſor-Caſtle, where remaining till January, 1656, he was ſet at liberty, and then lived a while in Oxford, where he became a conſtant auditor of the Sermons of Dr Edward Hyde at Halywell, then lately ejected from his Rectory of Brightwell, near Wallingford. After the Reſtoration, he was deſigned to be made one of the Judges in Weſtminſter-Hall; but refuſing to comply with the uſual demands of the perquiſites on that occaſion, which he thought too much after all his ſufferings, he retired to his Eſtate in Glamorganſhire, then reſtored to him. He died at Cowbridge, in that County, Dec. 6, 1667, aged eighty-one or more, and was buried at the weſt end of that Church. He died as he lived, preaching with his laſt breath to his Relations, and thoſe that were about him, loyalty to his Majeſty, and obedience to the Laws of the Land. He was a Perſon of great abilities in his profeſſion, and was often conſulted by Sir John Banks, and William Noye (†), in their Attorney-ſhips, ſion in the Univerſity, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Law, with a deſign to make it his profeſſion. In which view, he was admitted a member of the Society of Lincoln's-Inn, and in a ſhort time called to the Bar conſiderably before his courſe of reading was expired (e). He ſoon made a diſtinguiſhed figure in his profeſſion, and growing into the general eſteem of the publick, he was choſen, in 1719, Member of Parliament for Tregony in Cornwall. On the death of Sir Clement, Knight, he was made Sollicitor-General, April 23, 1726, and became likewiſe one of the Repreſentatives in Parliament for the city of Durham [D], his Father being then Biſhop of that See. On the 29th of November, 1733, his Majeſty King George II. delivered to him the Great Seal, and he was thereupon ſworn of his Majeſty's moſt Honourable Privy Council, and likewiſe conſtituted Lord High-Chancellor, and created a Baron of Great Britain, by the name, ſtile, and title of Lord Talbot, Baron of Henſol in the County of Glamorgan (f). Upon theſe promotions, he reſigned the following year the Chancellor (g) of the Dioceſe of Oxford, which had been given him by his Father, when Biſhop of that See (h); and in Auguſt, 1735, the honorary degree of Doctor of Civil Law was conferred upon him by that Univerſity (i). He was now grown to be the delight and honour of his Country, both in his judicial and miniſterial capacity. But the glory and happineſs Britain promiſed herſelf under the impartial Adminiſtration of this great and good man, was, like all other exquiſite pleaſures, of a very ſhort duration; for, after an illneſs of five days continuance, he expired (k) on the 14th of February 1736-7, at his houſe in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, in the fifty-third year of his age (). When he became ſenſible that his diſſolution approached, he prepared for it with the utmoſt calmneſs and ſerenity, ſetting his houſe in order, and becoming a true pattern of dying, as he had always done of living, like a Chriſtian. His Corpſe was conveyed to his Eſtate at Barrington in Glouceſterſhire, and interred in the chancel of that Church on the 23d of February, in a grave of free-ſtone cemented (l).

(†) He tells us himſelf, that in the times of the Attorneyſhips of Maſter Noye and Lord Banks, they were pleaſed often to make uſe of him. Dedication to his Works.

(e) It is ſaid, that this was done through the influence of Lord Chancellor Cowper, to whoſe advice it was owing that he undertook the ſtudy of the law, though extremum redijſſe pudet was his own modeſt apology for not attempting it. (g) In Auguſt this year, 1734, he was choſen a Governor of Charter-Houſe.

(h) He took this office with a deſign of reſigning it to his Brother Edward; but his Father, the Biſhop, leaving that See before this brother was qualified for the place, the Chancellor held it till this time. From private information, he was ſucceeded in it by Dr Tho. Teniſon. See Archbiſhop Teniſon's article.

In the Preface he ſhews the uſe of this Collection to the Students of the Law; in which view, having recommended (24) Fitzherbert, Stamford, Lord Broke and Dyer, Croke and Plowden, he obſerves, that many things in them being grown obſolete, and gone into diſuſe, and many other points diſtracted by variety of opinion, it imports, the Student before theſe, and as ſoon as he has acquired the rudiments of the Law, diligently to read over the ſolemn judgments and reſolutions of the Judges, to prevent being impoſed on by falſe opinions. 'For this purpoſe, continues he, I have written obſervations upon Perkinſon, St Germain, Broke, the old Tenures, Fitzherbert's Natura Brevium, and the old Naturæ Brevium (25); theſe being the books generally 'read in the firſt place, after Littleton. I have alſo 'compiled a book of Reports in ſeveral diviſions, after 'the example of Fitzherbert and Lord Broke, and have 'brought them down to our own times, and have 'made obſervations upon all the year-books, and 'upon the rules of Law. So that the Student, by their 'aſſiſtance, may ſafely ſteer through the ſtraits of the 'Law, without any danger of ſtriking upon the Rocks 'of Error.' He then concludes in theſe terms, 'Amidſt 'the ſound of drums and trumpets, ſurrounded with 'an odious multitude of Barbarians, broke with old 'age, and confinement in priſons, where my fellow-'ſubjects, grown wild with rage, detained me for fifteen 'years together, I beſtowed many watchful hours 'upon this performance.' To the Preface is annexed, ſeveral judgments of the Sages of the Law againſt innovations. Of theſe, the fourteenth runs thus: 10 Edward IV. 4. The Common Law has been from the beginning of the world, for it is Common Reaſon; which is here ſingled out from the reſt, becauſe this rule was remarkably always followed, and expreſsly avowed by the Lord Chancellor Talbot from the Bench, whenever any thing repugnant to it was offered from the Bar (§).

[D] Member for Durham.] At this time he was one of the Voters for the Exciſe Scheme, which made ſo great a noiſe, and created ſo much diſturbance in the nation (26), the Populace being drawn even into inſurrections on the occaſion in various parts, by the arts and induſtry of the Anti-courtiers, whoſe whole aim and deſign therein appeared not long after to be nothing more than to diſplace the Miniſter, Sir Robert Walpole (27). This, no doubt, was diſcerned and deteſted, among many others, by the Solicitor General, who without being biaſſed on one hand by their miſrepreſentations; or, on the other hand, by any undue regards to the obligations of his Poſt, or the hopes of future favours, followed the pure convictions of his own heart, after a thorough conſideration of the matter, and voted ſtrictly according to his conſcience (28).

(‡) Some other pieces came out under the Judge's name, in the view of recommending them thereby to the public; but they were diſowned by him.

His

His Lordſhip was ſo much the darling of his Country, that his character has been attempted by ſeveral hands; among others, by the Author of the Craftſman (m), which being evidently extorted by the meer force of truth, it will not be amiſs to give the ſubſtance of it. Having mentioned the importance of the Chancellor's Office, both in the judicial and political capacity, and ſhewn, that by the firſt the properties of all the people of England are, in a great meaſure, in his power; he then obſerves, that the Lord Chancellor, as Keeper of the Great Seal, is not only the ſecond perſon in the Kingdom, next the Royal Family, but hath, or ought to have, a great influence at the Council Table upon all important deliberations, and no Grant, Patent, or Treaty, can be made without his ſanction. In both theſe reſpects, he is called in law The Keeper of the King's Conſcience; and no body ever diſcharged that high truſt with more capacity and uprightneſs, than the late excellent Peer, whoſe death we now lament. His determinations, with regard to private property, met with almoſt univerſal approbation; and I don't remember that he ever put the ſeal to any Grant, Patent, or Treaty, which gave the leaſt offence to the Nation. He roſe by merit to the head of his profeſſion, and not only ſupported himſelf in it with dignity, but adorned it, and acquired every day new praiſe and eſteem. His prudence, moderation, and patience, in the execution of his office, even amidſt the higheſt provocations, make one ſhining part of his character, and are hardly to be paralleled by any inſtances of thoſe who have ſat before him upon that bench. Yet, notwithſtanding this amiable diſpoſition of mind, he diſcovered ſuch courage and reſolution upon all occaſions, as could not be ſhaken by the tricks of the wealthy, the applications of the powerful, or the tears of the diſtreſſed. His only aim was right and equity, which he conſtantly purſued, on whomſoever the weight of his decrees might happen to fall. He was a great enemy to the chicanery of his profeſſion, and rendered the Court of Juſtice more eaſy, as well as leſs expenſive, by preventing all unneceſſary delays, eſpecially when they appeared to be merely vexatious, and diſcountenancing the artifices of thoſe who endeavoured to keep the evil day from themſelves, at the expence of their injured Proſecutors. I could give ſome late notable inſtance of this, if particular circumſtances were proper in a general character. In a word, he poſſeſſed all the great talents of his moſt renowned Predeceſſors, without any of their frailties, and hath left a noble example to all his Succeſſors; ſo that he was not only a bleſſing to the age in which he lived, but may poſſibly derive the ſame happineſs to his poſterity, by exciting thoſe, who follow him in that high office, to an emulation of his virtues. The great increaſe of buſineſs in the Court of Chancery ſince the ſeal was put into his hands, is an evident proof of that confidence, which the Suitors repoſed in him, and will do immortal honour to his memory, though it proved fatal to his life; for the conſtant fatigue of his employment was one of the principal cauſes of his death (n), and therefore he may be truly ſaid to have fallen a Martyr to the Public Good. But I muſt not forget to mention, that he had no mean, or ſelfiſh attachment to any Party, beſides that of his Country, and ſeemed reſolved to contribute all in his power towards reſtoring it to a flouriſhing condition. Under the influence of ſuch a man, we had reaſon to hope for a complete coalition of Parties; or, at leaſt, for a re-union of all ſuch as wiſh well to their King and Country, which neither weak, nor wicked and corrupt men will ever have it in their power to accompliſh (o). I ſhall leave the diſplay of his private virtues to thoſe who had the honour of his acquaintance [E], and will only obſerve, that no man ever left a more general good character as a Chriſtian, a Father, a Maſter, and a Friend, than the late Lord

(m) A periodic weekly Paper, well known, to be undertaken, and ſupported by, at leaſt, an aſſumed Spirit of Patriotiſm, in oppoſition to the then Miniſtry.

(n) His conſtitution was delicate and tender, and though pliable, yet far from being robuſt.

(o) It was generally ſaid, that had the Chancellor lived a little longer, he would have had the lead in the Miniſtry.

[E] I ſhall leave the diſplay of his private virtues to others.] Accordingly this was attempted by a Perſon, who obſerves, that his Religion was his governing principle; it was well grounded, and active; his piety was rational and manly. He was a ſincere Son of the Church of England, and ready to maintain her in her juſt rights, and legal poſſeſſions. He was an enemy to perſecution, and had a diffuſive, general, and Chriſtian Charity, which made him a friend to all mankind. He had a great regard for ſuch of the moſt worthy of the clergy, as were diſtinguiſhed for their Learning (*), Sincerity, Moderation, and Charity.

He was a careful and indulgent father, and as no man ever deſerved more of his children, no man could be more affectionately beloved by them; there was ſomething ſo peculiar in this reſpect, that none ſeemed to know how to be in ſuch friendſhip with his ſons, as my Lord Chancellor. The harmony which ſubſiſted in his houſe, was a very great pleaſure to all who beheld it; like the precious ointment, to which the Pſalmiſt compares ſuch a union, it did not only refreſh and invigorate the ſuperior parts, but ran down to the ſkirts of his clothing; it was viſible among all his domeſtics; his ſervants were united in an affection to their Lord, and a friendſhip for one another; they were kept in their duty, not by any raſh and rigorous commands, but by a certain regard to decency and order, that reigned throughout the family; every one was ſo eaſy in his ſituation, that he was inſenſible of his dependance, and treated as a humble friend. As to Lord Talbot's private Donations, proceeds the ſame Writer, we have been aſſured of the truth of the following particulars. There was found in his Lordſhip's ſcrutoire, in his own handwriting, a liſt of no leſs than one hundred and fifty perſons, who were annual Penſioners of his unbounded Charity. And the poor of all the neighbouring villages ſurrounding his eſtate at Barrington were, by his Lordſhip's order, ſupplied with phyſick in ſickneſs, and the indigent aged, who were paſt their labour, provided with neceſſaries of life. At the ſame time, the labour of the induſtrious huſbandman always met with encouragement; and, in a word, from his bounteous hand the hungry were ſure to be fed, and the naked to be clothed.

As no riches could exceed his deſert, ſo no man ever poſſeſſed them, who knew the right uſe of them more. Every line written by Mr Pope was verified in Lord Talbot's conduct (29). He had, in all reſpects,

The ſenſe to value riches, with the art
T'enjoy them, and the virtue to impart;
Not meanly, nor ambitiouſly purſued,
Not ſunk by ſloth, nor rais'd by ſervitude;

With ſplendor, charity, with plenty, health;
O teach us, TALBOT, Thou'rt unſpoil'd by wealth!
That ſecret, rare between th'extremes to move
Of mad good-nature, and of mean ſelf-love.

(*) Of this we have a remarkable inſtance in Mr Stackhouſe, who having publiſhed Propoſals for printing his Body of Divinity by ſubſcription, was invited to dine with his Lordſhip, who, after ſubſcribing largely himſelf, recommended it to ſeveral of the moſt eminent Counſel then at his table, who thereupon followed his Lordſhip's example; ſo that our Divine returned with about a hundred Guineas in his pocket. From the information of the Author himſelf.

Who

Lord Chancellor. He died full of glory, but, to the great misfortune of his Country, not full of years; and the general ſorrow which his death has occaſioned, will do his noble family more honour, than the higheſt titles, or the moſt ſumptuous monuments (p). By his Lady, who died in 1720, he had five ſons; 1. Charles-Richard Talbot, who died unmarried, in 1733, aged twenty-four (q). 2. William, the preſent Earl Talbot, of whom hereafter. 3. John Talbot, who from Eton-School was admitted a Fellow-Commoner at Trinity-Hall in Cambridge (r). He removed here to Lincoln's-Inn, and applied himſelf to his Father's profeſſion, was called to the Bar, and was made Recorder of Brecknock in Wales, for which Town he was choſen a Member in the Parliament ſummoned to meet June 13, 1734. On the 4th of April, 1740, he was made Second Juſtice of the Counties of Cheſter, Flint, Denbigh, and Montgomery, which promotion vacating his ſeat in Parliament, he was re-elected for the ſame Town, and was conſtantly choſen for that Borough, till the laſt Parliament of the late King George II, when he was elected for Ilcheſter in Somerſetſhire (s). He was alſo Steward to the Dean and Chapter of St Paul's, and ſo continued to his death (t), which happened September 22, 1756 (u). He was twice married; firſt to a daughter of Sir Matthew Decker of Richmond in Surry, who dying without iſſue, he married, ſecondly, the eldeſt daughter of the Lord Viſcount Chetwynd of Ingſtre in Staffordſhire, by whom he has left ſeveral children of each ſex (w). The Chancellor's fourth ſon, Edward, died an infant (x). The fifth, George, being alſo bred at Eton-School, was there entered a Gentleman-Commoner of Exeter-College in Oxford (y), where he proceeded regularly to the degree of A. M. as a Grand Compounder, June 10, 1737 (z), after his Father's death, who had given him the place of Clerk of the Cuſtodies of Idiots and Lunaticks (aa). But entering into the Church, he accepted the Living of Guyting in Glouceſterſhire (*); and July 9, 1659, on account of his exemplary character, was created LL. D. by his Univerſity at the inſtallation of their preſent Chancellor, the Earl of Weſtmoreland (bb). On the 17th of January, 1760, he married a ſiſter of the preſent Lord Folkſtone (cc), and ſtill continues only a private Clergyman, having declined the Biſhopric of St David's, which was offered to him, on the death of Dr Ellis, January 17, 1761 (dd). We have a ſermon of his in print, which was preached on the opening of the Infirmary at Glouceſter.

The preſent Earl Talbot was bred at Eton, and thence entered a Gentleman-Commoner of Exeter-College, under the tuition of Mr Upton, late Prebendary of Rocheſter (ee), and had the honorary degree of LL. D. conferred upon him in June, 1736 (ff). He was ſeated at Henſol in Glamorganſhire in the life-time of his Father, and was repreſentative for that County in the Parliament which firſt met on buſineſs, January 23, 1734-5 (gg). He was created an Earl by the title of Earl Talbot, March 21, 1761 (hh), and on the 24th of that month, was appointed Lord Steward of the Houſhold to his Majeſty, and ſworn of the Privy-Council (ii). In February, 1733-4, he married Mary, daughter, and ſole heir of Adam Cardonell, Eſq; Secretary to John Duke of Marlborough, whom he attended in all his glorious Campaigns. By this Lady, who is ſtill living, he has a daughter, Cecil, born in July, 1735, and married on the 6th of Auguſt, 1756, to George Rice, Eſq; Member in the laſt, and preſent, Parliament for the County of Carmaerthen in Wales (kk). The Earl had alſo a Son William, born November 5, 1739; but he died ſhortly after (ll).

TANNER (THOMAS), late Biſhop of St Aſaph, a very learned Man, eſpecially in the Hiſtory and Antiquities of the Britiſh nation, was born January 25, 1673-4, at Market-Lavington in Wiltſhire, being the eldeſt ſon of the Rev. Mr Thomas Tanner, Vicar of that pariſh (a). In November, 1689, he became a Student in Queen's College in Oxford [A]; and being admitted Clerk of the ſame Houſe in 1690, took the degree of Batchelor of Arts in 1693. Thence he removed to All-Souls College, in January 1694, of which he was then made Chaplain; and elected Fellow, November 2, 1696 (b). He had diſtinguiſhed himſelf, ever ſince his coming to the Univerſity, by his diligence and learning, particularly in the ſtudy of Antiquities (c); which was cultivated with great zeal and ſucceſs by many of his contemporaries, eſpecially by Mr Edmund Gibſon, his intimate acquaintance, and Fellow-Collegian at Queen's College, afterwards the late moſt worthy Biſhop of London. And our Author gave an early ſpecimen of his great knowledge therein [B], by publiſhing his Notitia Monaſtica, in 1695 [C], when he was but about twenty-two years of age (d). The learned Dr John Moore, Biſhop of Norwich, having ſoon after made him his Chaplain, collated him, March the 6th, 1700-1, to the Chancellorſhip of Norwich; which place he adorned by his univerſal acquaintance with the Municipal and Eccleſiaſtical Laws, and occaſioned his being frequently conſulted by perſons in the moſt eminent Stations [D]. He marrying about the ſame time Roſe, eldeſt daughter of the Biſhop, his Lordſhip made him, on the 24th of November, 1703, his Commiſſary in and throughout the Archdeaconry of Norfolk; and, January 1, 1706-7, Commiſſary alſo in and throughout the Archdeaconry of Sudbury, and town of Bury St Edmund's. In June 1706, he was inſtituted to the Rectory of Thorp near Norwich, being preſented to it by Duncan Dee, Eſq; Common Hunt of the City of London (e). He had taken his Maſter of Arts degree in 1696; and, in Act-term, 1710, he took that of Doctor in Divinity. By his father-in-law, Biſhop Moore, then Biſhop of Ely, he was collated, in 1713, to a Prebend in that Church, and inſtalled the 10th of September (f). And Dr Green, Biſhop of Norwich, collated him, December 7, 1721, to the Archdeaconry of Norfolk (g), which he was inſtalled into the 26th of the ſame month. Quitting in 1723 his Prebend of Ely, he was made Canon of Chriſt's-Church in Oxford, and inſtalled February 3, 1723-4. In the year 1727, the lower Houſe of Convocation ſhewed their proper reſpect for his Learning and Abilities, by unanimouſly chuſing him their Prolocutor, however contrary to his inclination (h). And his Majeſty further expreſſed his regard for him, by promoting him to the Biſhopric of St Aſaph, to which he was conſecrated January 23, 1731-2. But he did not long enjoy this dignity; for he died at Chriſt's-Church, December 14, 1735; and was buried in the Cathedral there, where a monument is erected, containing a juſt and true character of this worthy Prelate (i) [E]. He had three wives, 1. Roſe, eldeſt daughter of Biſhop Moore, which died March 15, 1706, aged twenty-five, by whom he had only a daughter, that died February 17, 1703, aged fourteen months (k). 2. Francis, daughter of Mr Jacob Preſton, citizen of London: ſhe died June 11, 1718, aged forty. By her he had two daughters, who died young; and his ſon and heir, the Rev. Dr Thomas Tanner, Rector of Hadley and Monks-Ely in Suffolk, and Prebendary of Canterbury; who hath married Mary, third daughter of Dr John Potter, late Archbiſhop of Canterbury. 3. In May 1733, his Lordſhip married to his third Lady, Mrs Elizabeth Scottow of Thorp, aforementioned, a very conſiderable fortune. She ſurviving him, was remarried to Robert Britiffe, Eſq; late Recorder of Norwich. What our learned Prelate publiſhed, or left ready for the preſs, is ſet down below in the note [F]. He made large collections for the Hiſtory and Antiquities of his native County of Wilts; but as he happened to be preferred at ſome diſtance from it, he was by that means hindered from proſecuting and finiſhing that work (l). Another much larger Collection of his, which he bequeathed to the Bodleian Library,

Of theſe he was freely communicative; and kindly aſſiſtant to all lovers of the Antiquities of Britain, as is acknowledged with honour and gratitude by ſeveral Authors [H]. For many years he was a very uſeful member of the Society of Antiquaries at London, and one of its principal ornaments. He gave many charitable Legacies; among the reſt, 100 l. to the corporation for the relief of widows and orphans of the poor clergy: And his public and private virtues are ſtill in remembrance [I].

' ries, and Houſes of Friers, heretofore in England
' and Wales; and alſo of all the Colleges and Hoſ-
' pitals founded before A. D. MDXL.' being a large work founded upon his little book with the ſame title, above mentioned. It was publiſhed by his brother, the Rev. John Tanner, A. M. Vicar of Loweſtoft in Suffolk, and Precentor of the Cathedral Church of St Aſaph. Lond. 1744. fol. The Editor compiled the Preface, from that of the firſt edition, and the many references and uſeful hints left by the learned Author for improving it. He moreover digeſted ſeveral parts, which he found unfiniſhed: Peterborough, in particular, and ſeven other places in Northamptonſhire; the latter part of Yorkſhire; and all Wales, are of his doing (8). Upon the whole, this is the moſt uſeful Repertory for the Monaſtical Hiſtory of theſe Kingdoms that could have been contrived; and the learned world is greatly obliged to the induſtrious Author, for his great pains therein. 2. Another work left by Biſhop Tanner ready for the preſs was, Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica; ſive, de Scriptoribus qui in Anglia, Scotia, & Hibernia ad Sæculi XVII. initium floruerunt, literarum ordine juxta familiarum nomina diſpoſitis Commentarius, &c. or an Account of the Engliſh, Scotch, and Iriſh Writers; compiled not only from Leland, Bale, and Pitts, but alſo from numberleſs other Authorities, both printed and MS. The learned Dr Wilkins, Rector of Hadley and Monks-Eley in Suffolk, and Prebendary of Canterbury, fitted it for the preſs, and prefixed a long Preface, in which is included Boſton of Bury *. 3. He left Boſton of Bury ready for the preſs (10); which is included, in the Preface juſt now mentioned. 4. He ſupplied, from the Author's own manuſcript, many conſiderable Paſſages, all the quotations, and a learned Preface, that had been omitted by B. R. in his edition of Robert Hegge's Legend of St Cuthbert, with the Antiquities of the Church of Durham (11).

TAYLOR (JEREMY), Biſhop of Downe and Connor in Ireland, and one of the beſt Divines and Writers, in the laſt century, was born at Cambridge (a) [A]. Being of very pregnant parts, he was admitted at thirteen years of age in Gonville and Caius College, where he continued till he had taken his Maſter of Arts degree (b) [B]. Afterwards entring into holy orders, he occaſionally ſupplied three or four times his chamber-fellow Mr. Riſden's turn, at the Lecture in St Paul's Church, London: wherein he acquitted himſelf with ſuch applauſe above his years, that Archbiſhop Laud, the great Judge and Patron of Learning, having notice of it, and obſerving the ſmartneſs of his diſcourſes, the quickneſs of his parts, and the ſweetneſs and modeſty of his temper and behaviour, got him elected Fellow of All-Souls College in Oxford in 1636 (c) [C], thinking it would be an advan-

advantage to the world, if a perſon of ſuch excellent parts had better opportunies of ſtudy and improvement afforded him, than a courſe of conſtant preaching would allow of. And thankfully did our Author make the beſt uſe of the glorious opportunity that was put in his power. Soon after, endeavours were uſed by ſome Romiſh emiſſaries to ſeduce him to Popery; but a Sermon he preached at St Mary's on the 5th of November, 1638 [D], convinced them that they were miſtaken in their man. Archbiſhop Laud made him his Chaplain, and gave, or procured, him the Rectory of Uppingham in Rutlandſhire [E]. Undoubtedly he would have given him greater preferment, had not the national troubles ſo ſoon enſued. Upon taking Uppingham, he did not immediately leave the Univerſity, but continued there a year or two longer, for his further improvement. About 1640, he quitted it and his Fellowſhip; and marrying, ſettled at his Rectory, where he was much admired for his excellent caſuiſtical Sermons (d). On the 1ſt of November 1642, he was created Doctor in Divinity at Oxford (e); being then Chaplain in ordinary to King Charles I, and a frequent Preacher before him and the Court, whilſt they were in that city. In the ſtation of a Chaplain, he attended his Majeſty in ſeveral campaigns: where, though he had not the command of time and books, yet he laid the foundation of many Treatiſes in defence of the Church of England [F]. Upon the decline of the King's cauſe, his living being ſequeſtred, he retired into Wales, where he met with a kind reception from Richard Vaughan, Earl of Carbery, of Golden Grove in Caermardhynſhire: through whoſe favour and protection, he was permitted to exerciſe his Miniſtry, and keep ſchool, for the ſupport of himſelf and his children. In this ſolitude he began to write his excellent Diſcourſes [G], which are enough of themſelves to furniſh a Library; and have rendered his

'However, he being a perſon of moſt wonderful parts, 'and like to be an ornament thereunto, he was diſ-'penced with, and thereby obtained in that houſe, 'much of that Learning, wherewith he was enabled 'to write caſuiſtically.'

[D] Soon after, endeavours were uſed by ſome Romiſh emiſſaries to ſeduce him to Popery, &c.] For this we have Ant. Wood's authority; whoſe account is in theſe words.... 'About the ſame time he was in a ready 'way to be confirmed a member of the Church of Rome, 'as many of that perſuaſion have ſaid, but upon a 'Sermon delivered in St Mary's Church in Oxon on the '5th of November (Gunpowder-treaſon day), ann. '1638, wherein ſeveral things were put in againſt the 'Papiſts by the then Vicechancellor, he was afterwards 'rejected with ſcorn by thoſe of that party, particularly 'by Fr. à Sancta Clara, his intimate acquaintance; to 'whom afterwards he expreſſed ſome ſorrow for thoſe 'things he had ſaid againſt them, as the ſaid Sancta Clara 'hath ſeveral times told me (4).'... But, as Walter Harris, Eſq; juſtly obſerves (5), Ant. Wood 'gives 'for it only the Word of Francis à Sancta Clara, a Fran-'ciſcan Frier, and an intimate acquaintance of Mr 'Taylor's; who doubtleſs would be vain enough to 'boaſt of ſuch a conqueſt. But his learned Writings 'againſt Tranſubſtantiation, and his Diſſuaſives from 'Popery, will for ever defend his Memory from ſuch 'groundleſs aſperſions.'.... We therefore very properly ſay, that endeavours only were uſed to ſeduce him to Popery: for, that he remained notwithſtanding firm in the Proteſtant Religion, not only the Sermon here referred to, but the reſt of his Works abundantly teſtify; there being in them the ſevereſt ſtrokes againſt Popery, and all along a fund of ſound ſenſe, quite free from ſuperſtition. The Sermon here mentioned was printed at Oxford, in 1638. 4to. It is on Luke ix. 54.

The Diſcourſe is divided into Twenty-two Sections. In the firſt he treats, ' Of the nature of Faith, and that ' its duty is compleated in believing the Articles of the ' Apoſtles Creed.' Of the inſufficiency and uncertainty ' of Tradition to expound Scripture, or determine ' Queſtions. 6. Of the uncertainty and inſuffi- ' ciency of Councels Eccleſiaſticall to the ſame pur- ' poſe. 7. Of the fallibility of the Pope, and ' the uncertainty of his expounding Scripture, and re- ' ſolving Queſtions. 8. Of the diſability of Fathers, ' or Writers Eccleſiaſticall, to determine our Queſtions, ' with certainty and truth. 9. Of the incompetency of ' the Church in its diffuſive capacity to be Judge of ' Controverſies, and the impertinency of that pretence ' of the Spirit. 10. Of the authority of Reaſon, and ' that it, proceeding upon the beſt grounds, is the beſt ' judge. 11. Of ſome cauſes of Errour in the exerciſe ' of Reaſon, which are inculpate in themſelves. 12. Of ' the innocency of Errour in opinion in a pious perſon. ' 13. Of the deportment to be uſed towards perſons ' diſagreeing, and the reaſons why they are not to be ' puniſhed with death, &c. 14. Of the practice of ' Chriſtian Churches towards perſons diſagreeing, and ' when Perſecution firſt came in. 15. How farre the ' Church or Governours may act to the reſtraining falſe ' or differing opinions. 16. Whether it be lawfull ' for a Prince to give toleration to ſeveral Religions. ' 17. Of compliance with diſagreeing perſons, or weak ' Conſciences in general. 18. A particular conſidera- ' tion of the Opinions of the Anabaptiſts. 19. That ' there may be no Toleration of Doctrines incon- ' ſiſtent with piety or the publique good. 20. How ' far the Religion of the Church of Rome is Tolera- ' ble (8). 21. Of the duty of particular Churches in ' allowing communion. 22. That particular men ' may communicate with Churches of different perſua- ' ſions, and how farre they may do it.'

(8) He gives many ſubſtantial reaſons, why it cannot be tolerated.

Our learned Author delivers himſelf with great freedom, in ſeveral parts of this Book, upon many important points; particularly about the Athanaſian Creed (9). ' . . . If I ſhould be queſtioned, ſays he, concerning ' the Symbol of Athanaſius, I confeſſe I cannot ſee that ' moderate ſentence and gentleneſſe of charity in his ' Preface and Concluſion, as there was in the Nicene ' Creed. Nothing there but damnation and periſhing ' everlaſtingly, unleſſe the Article of the Trinity be ' believed, as it is there with curioſity and minute par- ' ticularities explained. . . . . Beſides, if it were ' conſidered concerning Athanaſius Creed, how many ' people underſtand it not, how contrary to naturall ' reaſon it ſeems, how little the Scripture ſayes of thoſe ' curioſities of Explication, and how Tradition was ' not cleare on his ſide for the Article itſelfe, much ' leſſe for thoſe formes and minutes, . . . and after all ' this, that the Nicene Creed itſelfe went not ſo farre, ' neither in Article, nor Anathema, nor Explication, it ' had not been amiſſe if the final judgement had been left ' to Jeſus Chriſt. . . . .' This Treatiſe hath been very much admired and praiſed by all Lovers of Liberty and Toleration; and as much condemned by perſons of different ſentiments. Therefore, Samuel Rutherford, Profeſſor of Divinity in the univerſity of St Andrew's, animadverted upon it, in his Free Diſputation againſt pretended Liberty of Conſcience, &c. Lond. 4to. We are told, that in the writing of this Book, the Author made uſe of a like ſtratagem as J. Hales did in writing his Tract concerning Schiſm, to break the Preſbyterian power, and ſo countenance diviſions between the Factions, which were then too much united againſt the loyal Clergy. For, in that book, he inſiſts on the ſame topics of Schiſm and Hereſy, of the incompetency of Councils and Fathers to determine our Eccleſiaſtical Controverſies, and of ſcrupulous Conſciences; and urgeth far more cogent Arguments than Hales did, but ſtill he had prepared his antidote to prevent any dangerous effect of his diſcourſe. For the judicious reader may perceive ſuch a reſerve (though it lye in ambuſcade, and is compacted in a narrow compaſs) as may eaſily rout thoſe troops, which began too ſoon to cry Victory, and thought of nothing elſe but dividing the ſpoil (10).

ſtian, wherewith they abound. But after he had ſpent ſome years in this agreeable retirement, a ſevere illneſs happening in his family, and depriving him, in two or three months, of three of his ſons, young men of great hopes, it ſo ſenſibly affected him, that he could no longer live with any comfort in the place. Coming therefore to London, he officiated for a while in a private congregation of Loyaliſts, to his great hazard and danger. At length, he became acquainted with Edward Lord Conway, a perſon of great honour and generoſity, who invited him into Ireland, and afforded him a pleaſant and commodious retreat at Portmore (f), a ſeat adapted for ſtudy and contemplation. There he continued till King Charles the Second's Reſtoration; when he came over to England, to bear a part in the univerſal triumph (g). On the 24th of April, 1660, he was one of the perſons that ſubſcribed the declaration of the Nobility and Gentry, which adhered to the late King, in and about the city of London (h). And, in conſideration of his Merit and Learning, being promoted to the ſees of Down and Connor in Ireland, by letters patent, dated January 19, 1660-1, he was conſecrated the 27th of the ſame month in St Patrick's Church in Dublin: A little before which he had been made a Privy-councellor for that Kingdom. And June 21, 1661, the King granted him alſo the Adminiſtration of the Biſhopric of Dromore, by way of additional reward, for his ſufferings in defence of the Church of England, of which he had been one of the moſt undaunted Champions. He diſcharged his epiſcopal office with the utmoſt care and faithfulneſs; and gave excellent Rules and Directions to his Clergy, of which he taught them the practice by his own example. The Univerſity of Dublin manifeſted their particular regard for him, by deſiring to have him for their Vice-chancellor [H]; which honourable office he kept to his dying day (i). Having laudably behaved in every ſtation of life, he died at Liſnegarvy, or Liſburne, Auguſt 13, 1667, and was buried in the choir of the Church of Dromore, which he had rebuilt at his own expence. He left by will to the poor of the pariſhes of Dromore, Liſburne, and Ballintobber, 10 l. each. He was eſteemed a perſon of great learning and eloquence; of a piercing wit, and deep judgment; an ornament to the pulpit; exceeding humble and humane; ſo charitable to the poor, that, except moderate portions to his three daughters, he ſpent all his income on alms and publick works (k). One, who differed from him both in opinion and practice (l), is forced to own that he was 'a man 'of admirable wit, great parts, had a quick and elegant pen, was of abilities in critical 'learning, and of profound ſkill in antiquity, &c.' But his character is given to greater advantage, and more at length, by his ſucceſſor, Biſhop Ruſt [I]; the concluſion of which is in theſe words. 'This great Prelate had the good-humour of a Gentleman, the elo-'quence of an Orator, the fancy of a Poet, the acuteneſs of a Schoolman, the profound-'neſs of a Philoſopher, the wiſdom of a Chancellor, the ſagacity of a Prophet, the reaſon 'of an Angel, and the piety of a Saint. He had devotion enough for a Cloiſter, learning 'enough for an Univerſity, and wit enough for a College of Virtuoſi. And had his parts 'and endowments been parcelled out among his poor Clergy that he left behind him, it 'would perhaps have made one of the beſt dioceſes in the world.'

[I] But his character is given to greater advantage, and more at length, by his ſucceſſor, Biſhop Ruſt.] The chief part of it is in theſe words .... 'He was none 'of God's ordinary works, but his Endowments were 'ſo many and ſo great, as really made him a Miracle. 'Nature had befriended him much in his Conſtitution; 'for he was a perſon of a moſt ſweet and obliging hu-'mour, of great candour and ingenuity; and there 'was ſo much of ſalt, and fineneſs of wit, and pretti-'neſs of addreſs in his familiar diſcourſes, as made his 'converſation have all the pleaſantneſs of a comedy, 'and all the uſefulneſs of a ſermon. His ſoul was 'made up of Harmony, and he never ſpoke but he 'charmed his hearer, not only with the clearneſs of his 'reaſon, but all his words, and his very tone and cadences, 'were ſtrangely muſical. But that which did moſt of 'all captivate and enrich, was the gaiety and richneſs of 'his fancy. For he had much in him of that natural 'Enthuſiaſm, that inſpires all great Poets and Orators; 'and there was a generous ferment in his blood and 'ſpirits, that ſet his fancy bravely at work, and made 'it ſwell and teem, and become pregnant, to ſuch de-'grees of luxuriancy, as nothing but the greatneſs of 'his wit and judgment could have kept it within due 'bounds and meaſures. And indeed it was a rare 'mixture, and a ſingle inſtance hardly to be found in 'any age. For the great Trier of Wits has told us, 'that there is a peculiar and ſeveral complexion re-'quired for wit and judgment and fancy; and yet all 'theſe might have been found in this great perſonage 'in their eminency and perfection. But that which 'made his wit and judgment ſo conſiderable, was the 'largeneſs and freedom of his ſpirit. For truth is plain 'and eaſy to a mind diſentangled from ſuperſtition and 'prejudice. He was one of the Ἐκλεκτικοὶ, a ſort of 'brave Philoſophers, that Laertius ſpeaks of, that did 'not addict themſelves to any particular ſect, but in-'genuouſly ſought for truth among all the wrangling 'ſchools. And they found her miſerably torn and 'rent to pieces, and parcelled into rags by the ſeveral 'contending parties, and ſo disfigured and miſhapen, 'that it was hard to know her; but they made a ſhift 'to gather up her ſcattered limbs; which, as ſoon as 'they came together, by a ſtrange ſympathy and con-'naturalneſs, preſently united into a lovely and beauti-'ful body. This was the ſpirit of this great man; he 'weighed men's reaſons, and not their names, and 'was not ſcared with the ugly vizars men uſually put 'upon perſons they hate, and opinions they diſlike; 'nor affrighted with the anathemas and execrations of 'an infallible chair; which he looked upon only as bug-'bears to terrify weak and childiſh minds. He conſidered, 'that it is not likely any one party ſhould wholly en-'groſs truth to themſelves; that obedience is the only 'way to true knowledge (which is an argument that he 'hath managed rarely well in that excellent ſermon of 'his (16), which he calls Via Intelligentiæ;) that God 'always, and only teaches, docible and ingenuous 'minds, that are willing to hear, and ready to obey 'according to their light; that it is impoſſible a pure, 'humble, reſigned, God-like, ſoul ſhould be kept out 'of heaven, whatever miſtakes it might be ſubject to 'in this ſtate of mortality; that the deſign of heaven 'is not to fill men's heads, and feed their curioſities, 'but to better their hearts, and mend their lives. Such 'conſiderations as theſe made him impartial in his diſ-'quiſitions, and give a due allowance to the reaſons of 'his adverſary, and contend for truth, and not for 'victory. To theſe advantages of nature, and excel-'lency of his ſpirit, he added an indefatigable induſtry, 'and God gave a plentiful benediction; for there were 'very few kinds of learning but he was a maſter and a 'great maſter in them. He was a rare Humaniſt, and 'hugely verſed in all the polite parts of Learning, and 'thoroughly concocted all the antient Moraliſts, Greek 'and Roman Poets and Orators; and was not unac-'quainted with the refined wits of the later ages, whe-'ther French or Italian. But he had not only the ac-'compliſhments of a Gentleman, but ſo univerſal were 'his parts, that they were proportioned to every thing. 'And though his ſpirit and humour were made up of 'ſmoothneſs and gentleneſs, yet he could bear with the 'harſhneſs and roughneſs of the ſchools, and was not 'unſeen in their ſubtilties and ſpinoſities, and upon 'occaſion could make them ſerve his purpoſe. And 'yet it is believed he thought many of them very near 'akin to the famous Knight of the Mancha, and would 'make ſport ſometimes with the romantic ſophiſtry, 'and fantaſtic adventures of ſchool-errantry. His ſkill 'was great both in the Civil and Canon Law, and Ca-'ſuiſtical Divinity; and he was a rare conductor of ſouls, 'and knew how to counſel and to adviſe; to ſolve 'difficulties, and determine caſes, and quiet conſciences. '.... He underſtood what the ſeveral parties in Chri-'ſtendom have to ſay for themſelves, and could plead 'their cauſe to better advantage than any advocate of 'their tribe; and when he had done, he could confute 'them too, and ſhew that better arguments than ever 'they could produce for themſelves, would afford no ſuffi-'cient ground for their fond opinions. We ſhall add 'only his great acquaintance with the Fathers and Ec-'cleſiaſtical Writers, and the Doctors of the firſt and 'pureſt ages both of the Greek and Latin Church, 'which he has made uſe of againſt the Romaniſts, to 'vindicate the Church of England from the challenge 'of innovation, and prove her to be truly antient, 'catholic, and apoſtolical. But religion and virtue is 'the crown of all other accompliſhments, and it was 'the glory of this great man to be thought a Chriſtian; 'and whatever you added to it, he looked upon as a 'term of diminution. And yet he was a zealous Son 'of the Church of England; but that was, becauſe he 'judged her (and with great reaſon) a Church the moſt 'purely Chriſtian of any in the world. In his younger 'years he met with ſome aſſaults from Popery, and the 'high pretenſions of their religious orders were very 'accommodate to his devotional temper. But he was 'always ſo much maſter of himſelf, that he would 'never be governed by any thing but reaſon, and the 'evidence of truth; which engaged him in the ſtudies 'of theſe controverſies; and to how good purpoſe, the 'world is by this time a ſufficient witneſs. But the 'longer and the more he conſidered, the worſe he liked 'the Roman cauſe; and became at laſt to cenſure them 'with ſome ſeverity; but I have ſo great an opinion of 'his judgment, and the charitableneſs of his ſpirit, 'that I am afraid he did not think worſe of them than 'they deſerve. He was a perſon of great Humility; 'and notwithſtanding his ſtupendous parts and learn-'ing, and eminency of place, he had nothing in 'him of pride and humour, but was courteous and 'affable, and of eaſy acceſs, and would lend a ready 'ear to the complaints, yea to the impertinencies of 'the meaneſt perſons. His humility was coupled with 'an extraordinary Piety; and it is believed he ſpent 'the greateſt part of his time in heaven. His ſolemn 'hours of prayer took up a conſiderable portion of his 'life. .... But he was not only a good man God-ward, 'but he was come to the top of St Peter's gradation, 'and to all his virtues added a large and diffuſive Cha-'rity. And whoever compares his plentiful incomes 'with the inconſiderable eſtate he left at his death, will 'be eaſily convinced, that Charity was ſteward for a 'great proportion of his revenue. But the hungry that 'he fed, and the naked that he cloathed, and the di-'ſtreſſed that he ſupplied, and the fatherleſs that he 'provided for; the poor children that he put appren-'tice, and brought up at ſchool, and mantained at 'the Univerſity, will now ſound a trumpet to that 'Charity, which he diſperſed with his right hand, but 'would not ſuffer his left hand to have any knowledge 'of it.'

TEMPLE

TEMPLE [Sir WILLIAM], an eminent Statesman (*), and polite Writer, was sprung from a younger branch of the same stock with the late Sir Richard Temple, Lord Viscount and Baron Cobham, who carried up his original as high as to Leoric, or Leofric, Earl of Chester, in the time of King Ethelbald, anno 710 (a); from whom descended the first Earl of Leicester, Leofric, chiefly instrumental in raising Edward the Confessor to the throne, as well as his successor, Harold [A]; and was ancestor to Edwin, sometimes stiled Earl of Leicester and Coventry, who is said to have assumed the surname of Temple, from the manor of Temple in the hundred of Sparken-hall, standing in Wellesborough in Leicestershire (b). This stock was divided into two branches by Nicholas Temple, living in 1372, in the forty-sixth year of the reign of Edward III, who had two sons, Robert and Thomas, of whom Robert, the elder, was seated at Temple-hall near Bosworth in Leicestershire (c), and by the gift of his father having lands at Burton under Needwood in Staffordshire, his son, stiled Richard Temple of Burton, siding with Richard III, forfeited most of his estate, and died in 1507, being ancestor to the family of Temple-hall. From Thomas, the youngest son of Nicholas, descended Peter, who became Lord of the manor of Stow in Buckinghamshire, whose posterity settling there, were ancestors to Viscount Cobham, above mentioned. Peter's youngest son, Anthony, was father of Sir William Temple, who being educated at Eton-school, became Fellow of King's College in Cambridge, A. M. and master of the Free-school at Lincoln. He was intended for the law, but having a turn to philosophy, he wrote two treatises upon that subject in very elegant Latin (d). One of which being printed in 1581, with a dedication to Sir Philip Sidney, that Gentleman took him into his patronage, prevailed with him to leave the College, and attend him as his Secretary, when he was made Governor of Flushing and Ramekins. Sir Philip died in the arms of this Secretary, to whom he bequeathed thirty pounds per ann. for life, having also taken care to recommend him to the Earl of Essex, who employed him as his Secretary till his tragical end, in 1600; a stroke which proved fatal to Mr Temple, who not only fell with the Earl from the prospect he had of making his fortune, but was persecuted by Secretary Cecil, from whose resentment being obliged to retire into Ireland, he accepted of the Provostship of Dublin-College, in 1609, at the solicitation of Archbishop Usher (e), and in the Parliament of 1613 was its representative. He was knighted May 4, 1622, by the Lord St John, having been made, January 31, 1609, a Master in Chancery, in which he was continued, April 16, 1625, by King Charles I. He died in January 1626-7, in the seventy-third year of his age, and was buried in his College-chapel at Dublin (f), leaving, besides three daughters, two sons, John and Thomas; the eldest of whom, Sir John Temple, was father to the subject of the present article, Sir William Temple, Bart. who was born in London in 1628, and being first sent to school at Penshurst in Kent, under the care of his uncle, the celebrated Dr Hammond, then Minister of that parish, was removed thence, at ten years of age, to Mr Leigh, schoolmaster of Bishop Stortford in Hertfordshire. Having attained a competency of Greek and Latin there at the age of fifteen, he returned home (g); being hindered, by the disorders of the time, from going to the University, so that he was seventeen years old when he went to Cambridge, where he was placed under the tuition of the learned Dr Cudworth, then Fellow of Emanuel-College (h). His father, being a Statesman (i), seems to have designed his son for the same way of life. In which view, after two years spent at Cambridge, chiefly in acquiring a competency of French and Spanish, the two most useful languages for the purpose, he was sent abroad to compleat the plan of his education. He began his travels into France, in 1648, and chusing to pass through the Isle of Wight, where his Majesty was then Prisoner, he met there with Mrs Dorothy Osborn, second daughter to Sir Peter Osborn of Chicksand in Bedfordshire, then Governor of Guernsey for the King; who being then on a journey with her brother to their father at St Maloes, our young Traveller joined them, and there began an honourable amour with the young Lady, which at the end of seven years concluded in a happy marriage. In the interim, Mr Temple passed two years in France, and having learned that language perfectly, he soon after made a tour into Holland, Flanders, and Germany, in which he acquired a compleat mastery of the Spanish. He returned in 1654, and marrying Mrs Osborn, passed his time privately with his father, two brothers, and a sister, then in Ireland, all happy in that perfect harmony, which has been so often taken notice of in their family. As he rejected all sollicitations for accepting any employment under the Usurper, the five years he lived here, were spent chiefly in his closet, improving himself in history and philosophy (k). But at the Restoration, in 1660, being chosen a Member of the Convention in Ireland, while every body was trying to make their court to the King, he opposed the Poll-bill with such a spirit, as made a great deal of talk [B], and brought him into more conversation and business, than he had been used to in that country. In the succeeding Parliament, in 1661, he was chosen, with his father, for the County of Cassow, and often turned the house, in their warmest debates, by never entering into any of their parties

[A] Leofric the first Earl of Leicester.] This earl married the famous Godina, who rode naked through Coventry in the day-time, to regain the citizens their privileges, which they had forfeited by offending their lord her husband, and to free them from the taxes by which they were oppressed. Leofric died August 31, 1057, and was buried in the monastery which he had founded at Coventry, and which he had endowed with twenty-four lordships, besides enriching it with a prodigious quantity of silver utensils, so that it was one of the most magnificent houses of the kind then in England (1).

[B] He opposed the Poll-bill, &c.] Though he and many others thought it to the height of what the nation could bear, the lords justices, whilst it was debating, sent a message to the house to desire it might be doubled, which (among a great many that disliked it) Sir William Temple only opposed, though the rest afterwards joined with him: the lords justices, hearing whence the difficulty arose, sent some to reason with him: his answer was, that he had nothing to say to it out of the house, where they chose a time to pass it in his absence (2).

or factions. In 1662, he was choſen one of the Commiſſioners to be ſent from that Parliament to the King, and took this opportunity of waiting on the new Lord Lieutenant, the Duke of Ormond, then at London. He returned into Ireland ſoon after, but with a reſolution of quitting that Kingdom, and removing his family to England. On his return, he obſerved a very different countenance in the Duke of Ormond (now at Dublin) (l) from what he had found before, and ſoon grew to have ſuch a ſhare in his kindneſs and eſteem, that the Duke complained of him, as the only man in Ireland that had never aſked him any thing: and when Mr Temple mentioned his deſign of carrying his family to England, his Grace ſaid, he ſhould at leaſt give him leave to write in his favour to the two great Miniſters, the Lord Chancellor [Clarendon], and the Earl of Arlington, Secretary of State; and the Duke did it ſo much to his advantage, that it was this recommendation which gave Sir William the firſt entrance into their good graces, and to the good opinion of the King (m), which he made no other uſe of, than to tell Lord Arlington, that if his Majeſty had any employment abroad, which he thought ſuch a man as he capable of ſerving him in, he ſhould be very happy in it; but deſired it might not carry him into the northern climates, to which he had a great averſion. Lord Arlington replied, he was ſorry for it, becauſe there was at that time no other undiſpoſed of, but that of going Envoy to Sweden (n). However, in 1665, about the beginning of the firſt Dutch war, the ſame Lord ſent him a meſſage to come immediately to his houſe, which he did, and found his Lordſhip's buſineſs was to tell him, the King had occaſion to ſend one abroad upon an affair of the greateſt truſt and importance, and that he had reſolved to make him the firſt offer of it; but that he muſt know preſently, whether he would accept of it or no, without telling him what it was, and be content to go in three or four days, without ſaying more of it to any of his friends: after a little conſideration, he told that Lord, he took him to be his friend, and ſince he muſt conſult with no one elſe, would be adviſed by him. His Lordſhip ſaid, his advice was, that whether he liked it or no, he ſhould not refuſe it, as an entrance into his Majeſty's ſervice, and the way to ſomething he might like better (o). The buſineſs was to go with a ſecret commiſſion to the Biſhop of Munſter, with which he ſet out on Auguſt 24, and executed it ſo greatly to the ſatisfaction of King Charles II. [C], that upon his return from that Prelate's Court to Bruſſels, his Majeſty ſent him a commiſſion to take the character of Reſident there, with a Patent for a Baronet (p). Bruſſels being the place he had wiſhed for in his travels ſo many years before, Sir William, April 1666, ſent for his family (q); but before their arrival, was poſted again into Munſter. For upon the Biſhop's liſtening to terms of accommodation with France, our Reſident having wrote two letters in vain to diſſuade him from that alliance, went in diſguiſe on the ſame errand to Munſter [D], where, though he came too late to fix that Prince in his firſt alliance, yet he engaged him for five or ſix thouſand of his beſt troops into Spaniſh ſervice. This done, he returned to Bruſſels, where he paſſed a year with great pleaſure and ſatisfaction. Two months after the concluſion of the peace with the Dutch at Breda, our Reſident's ſiſter, who lived with him at Bruſſels, taking a ſtrong fancy to ſee Holland, he was willing to give her that ſatisfaction, and went thither incognito. But while he was at the Hague, he made a private viſit to M. De Witt, in which occaſional interview, he laid the foundation of the great intimacy and confidence that grew afterwards between them (r). In the ſpring of 1667, a new war broke out between France and Spain, which bringing Bruſſels in danger of falling into the hands of the former, Sir William ſent his Lady and family into England, but ſtaid there with his ſiſter till Chriſtmas following, when the King ſent for him to come over privately to England, and taking the Hague in his way, there to make De Witt another viſit (s). He did ſo, and then, purſuant to his inſtructions, [C] He executed his commiſſion to the King's mind.] He went, without either train or character, to Coeſvelt, where the Biſhop then was, and in three nights (for he kept cloſe in the day-time) perfected and ſigned the treaty (3), and then returned to Bruſſels, where alderman Backwell made the firſt and great payment of the ſubſidies the King was to give the Biſhop, and ſoon after received the news that the Biſhop was in the field, by which this negotiation began firſt to be diſcovered; but no body ſuſpected the part he had in it, and he continued privately at Bruſſels, till it was whiſpered to the marquis Caſtel Rodrigo, their governor, that he came upon ſome particular errand, (which he was then at liberty to own) who thereupon ſent to deſire his acquaintance, to which he eaſily conſented, and, in ſome private conferences, the marquis repreſenting to him the mutual neceſſity of a conjunction between England and Spain, upon advice that the French were marching to the aſſiſtance of the Hollanders; theſe overtures the court of England thought fit to entertain, and therefore appointed him reſident (4).

[D] He went in diſguiſe on the ſame errand.] He paſſed for a Spaniſh envoy, having twenty Spaniſh guards to attend him. Thus he went firſt to Duſſeldorp, where the duke of Newburgh, though in the French intereſt, gave him a guard to Dortmund; but, on his arrival there, the gates being ſhut, he was forced to go to a village about a league's diſtance, which being full of Brandenburg troops, he was obliged to eat and lodge in a barn upon ſtraw, with his page for a pillow. The page heard one of the Brandenburg ſoldiers aſk ſome of his guards after an Engliſh envoy who was expected, the fellow ſaid he was upon the road, and would be at Dortmund in a day or two. He was next day entertained, at a caſtle of the biſhop of Munſter, by one Gorges, a Scotch lieutenant-general in that prelate's ſervice, with what he calls a very epiſcopal way of drinking. Coming into the great hall, where ſtood many flagons ready charged, the general called for wine to drink the King's health. They brought him a formal bell of ſilver, that might hold about two quarts. He took it, pulled out the clapper, and, giving that to Sir William, to whom he intended to drink, had the bell filled, drunk it off to his Majeſty's health, and then aſking Sir William for the clapper, put it on, turned down the bell, and rung it out to ſhew he had played fair, and left nothing in it: this done, he took out the clapper, deſired Sir William to give it to whom he pleaſed, then gave his bell to be filled again, and brought it to Sir William: he, being never uſed to drink, and ſeldom would try, had commonly ſome gentleman with him that would ſerve for that purpoſe, when it was neceſſary; and ſo he had the entertainment of ſeeing this health go current through about a dozen hands, with no more ſhare in it than juſt what he pleaſed (5).

proposed those overtures that produced the Triple Alliance; to perfect which, immediately after his arrival at the English Court, he returned, January 16, 1668, N. S. in five days, with the character of Envoy extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Holland (t), where the conferences being opened two days after, he brought that treaty to a perfect conclusion in five days more. The ratifications of this alliance being exchanged on the fifteenth of February (u) following, he repaired to Brussels, and a treaty being set on foot between France and Spain at Aix-la-Chapelle, he set out for that place on the 24th of April, in quality of his Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary, and Mediator. He arrived there on the 27th, and it was chiefly owing to his assistance (w), that the Spaniard was brought to sign the articles of that peace on the 2d of May. This service being compleated, he returned to Brussels on the 9th of that month, without any other thoughts than to remain in that city in his former station of Resident. But upon his arrival there, he met with letters from the Earl of Arlington that brought him the King's orders to continue in the equipage of an Ambassador, in order to serve his Majesty in the same quality in Holland: where, upon occasion of the late alliances, his Majesty was resolved to renew a character which the Crown of England had discontinued since King James's time (*). Sir William being now left at liberty to return to England as soon as he pleased, embraced the opportunity, and returning by the way of Holland, left most of his domestics and equipage at Utrecht. Upon his arrival at London, he was received with all possible demonstrations of favour, both by King and Court. If he had been forward to press his fortune (and he was put in mind of it enough by his friends (†)) he would not have slipt the advantage of coming home with so general an opinion of great merits: but he thought himself sufficiently rewarded by the honour of serving his Majesty (x). The Spanish Ambassador, and Baron d'Isola, the Emperor's Envoy, as well as other of his friends, would needs have asked the Peerage for him, and it was with difficulty enough, that he prevented it; but it was what he never coveted, and was resolved, if it were ever offered him, it should either begin with his father, or his son (y). All difficulties being removed for his departure to Holland [E], he set out, and arrived at the Hague with his new character of the King's Ambassador, in the latter end of August, 1668 (z) He was received and distinguished by all the marks of regard and esteem they could express for his character and person, and by the good opinion he had gained, was able to bring the state into such measures, as M. De Witt said, he was sure was not in the power of any other man to do. He lived in confidence with that great Minister, by order from the King, and in constant and familiar conversation with the Prince of Orange, then eighteen years old. He likewise compassed the chief design of his embassy, in engaging the Emperor and Spain in the measures that were then desired (aa). But in the interim happened Madam's journey to England, so well known to have changed them all (bb). And though Sir William had observed a disposition in the Court before, to complain of the Dutch upon small occasions, very unlike what he left it in; yet he suspected nothing till Lord Arlington, in September 1669, hurried him over, by telling him, as soon as he received his letter, he should put his foot in the stirrup. When he came to his Lordship, whom he always saw first, he found he had not one word to say to him, and after making him wait a great while, only asked him several indifferent questions about his journey; and he was received next day as coldly by the King. The secret soon came out, and Sir William Temple was pressed to return to the Hague, and make way for a war with Holland. But he excused himself from having any share in it; which so much provoked the Lord Treasurer Clifford, that he refused to pay him an arrear of two thousand pounds, due from his embassy. All this passed without unkindness from the King (cc); but my Lord Arlington's usage, so unlike the friendship he had professed, was resented by our Ambassador, who now retired to his house at Sheen near Richmond in Surry [F] (dd); and in this interval of his leisure and retreat, he writ his Observations (bb) The Duke of Buckingham, and some other Courtiers of wit and humour, began now to ridicule Sir William's formal gravity, as well as his political capacity, Sir William, as appears from the course of his letters, being remarkable for understanding the ceremonies of business, and disliking great stress upon them, as of service in procuring access to any negotiation.

[E] All difficulties being removed for his departure.] The chief of these were some new regulations in the Exchequer concerning foreign employments, which brought down the equipage-money of ambassadors from 3000*l.* to 1500*l.* in France and Spain, and to 1000*l.* in all other courts; and their allowance from 100*l.* a week to 10*l.* a day in France and Spain, and to 7*l.* a day in other places. This was pretended to be only a necessary scheme of parsimony; but Sir William took it as aimed at him in spight, and resented it the more, because he found, by the short experience of his last embassy, this would not defray the expence of another with any honour to the King or himself; and though, says he, I do not pretend to make my fortune by these employments, yet I confess I do not pretend to ruin it neither. He had therefore several times resolved to refuse this embassy, unless it were upon the old terms; but at last yielded to the sollicitations and arguments of Lord Arlington, Sir Orlando Bridgeman, and especially Sir Robert Long, who observed, that, after a year or two of this embassay, he could not fail of being either secretary of state, or sent ambassador into Spain, 'which, says Sir William, are 'both certain ways of making any man's fortune (6).'

[F] He returned to Sheen.] How he passed his time there, appears from a letter, dated November 22, 1670, to his father, in which he writes thus (7): 'Sir,

(7) Vol. II. of his Letters, p. 288.

'I must make my humble acknowledgments for so great 'a present as you have been pleased to send me towards 'that expence I have resolved to make at Sheen; and 'assure you no part of it shall either go any other way, 'or lessen what I had intended of my own. I doubt 'not but to compass what I told you of my Lord Lisle, 'for enlarging my small territories there; when that 'is done, I propose to bestow 1000*l.* upon the con-'veniencies of the house and garden, and hope that 'will reach all I care for; so that your 500*l.* (8) may 'be laid out rather for ornament than use, as you seem 'to desire, by ordering me to make the front perfectly 'uniform.' His father having shewn a dislike of his hasty resolve to retire absolutely from public affairs, and throwing up all his pretensions from the Court, in this letter he lays before him the whole grounds of that resolution, submitting the whole with great duty and respect to his father's censure. These it should seem had brought the old gentleman into his way of thinking; for, in another letter to his father, dated September 14, 1671 (9), wherein he gives him an account of the safe arrival in England of his wife and family: 'All people, 'says he, are full of the politicks and expectations of 'what will be next, which you must expect to hear from 'Gazettes, and no more from me, who shall not so much 'as enquire or care to know, but return to my corner at 'Sheen,

However, about the end of the ſummer, 1673, the King growing weary of that war, ſent for Sir William, who was always wanted upon that occaſion, to go into Holland, and conclude the peace; but powers having been ſent at this time from thence to the Marquis de Freſno, the Spaniſh Ambaſſador at London, Sir William was ordered to treat it with him, and it was concluded in three days, and the point of the flag carried, that had been ſo long conteſted (ff). In June, 1674, he was again ſent Ambaſſador into Holland [G], with offer of the King's mediation between France and the Confederates, then at war, which was not long after accepted, and Lord Berkeley, Sir William Temple, and Sir Leoline Jenkins, were declared Ambaſſadors and Mediators, and Nimeguen (which Sir William had propoſed) was conſented to, at laſt, by all parties to be the place of Treaty. During his ſtay at the Hague, the Prince of Orange, who was fond of ſpeaking Engliſh, and of their plain way of eating, conſtantly dined and ſupped once or twice a week at his houſe, who thereby grew ſo much in the Prince's eſteem and confidence, as gave him the great part he had in that conſiderable affair of his marriage with Lady Mary.

'Sheen, and endeavour to paſs the reſt of my life as 'quietly and innocently as I can, and for the reſt, like 'a private man, run the fortune of my country. I have 'been long enough in courts and public buſineſs to know 'a great deal of the world and of myſelf, and to find 'that we are not made for one another, and that nei-'ther of us are like to alter either our natures or our 'cuſtoms, and that, in the courſe and period of public 'government, as well as private life, quiſque ſuos patimur 'manes.' Every one ſees that theſe ſtrains were the pure effects of peeviſhneſs and chagrin, ariſing from his diſappointment by the counſels which then prevailed at court, as is evident from his ſubſequent conduct. Beſides, Sir William had not been in buſineſs much above five or ſix years, and was but little turned of forty, a time of life not very compatible (as his amanuenſis Dr Swift pleaſantly obſerves upon another occaſion (*)) with ſettling in a corner to form concluſions de contemptu mundi & fugâ ſeculi. There is no doubt but he always took great delight in improving his ſituation at Sheen, which he expreſſes in a letter to Lord Lille from Bruſſels, Auguſt, 1667 (10), before his firſt coming over to England. 'The beſt on it is, ſays he, my heart is ſet ſo much 'upon my little corner at Sheen, that, while I keep 'that, no other diſappointments will be very ſenſible 'to me; and becauſe my wife tells me ſhe is ſo bold 'as to enter into talk of enlarging our dominions there, 'I am contriving here this ſummer, how a ſucceſſion 'of cherries may be compaſſed from May to Michael-'mas, and how the riches of Sheen vines may be im-'proved by half a dozen ſorts which are not yet known 'there, and which I think much beyond any that 'are (11).' During this retreat, towards the latter end of the year 1672, he writ his Obſervations upon the United Provinces of the Netherlands, as above mentioned, to which he alludes in a letter to Mr. de Wicquefort, dated October 10 that year (12). 'I will not tell you, 'ſays he, that I have ſucceeded ſo well in my ſmall 'country deſigns, as I have ſometimes done in great 'ones: But if ever any favourable accident (and this 'age produces ſtrange ones enough) ſhould bring you 'hither, I would let you ſee that our buildings are not 'altogether without neatneſs: at leaſt I would make 'you confeſs, that the fruits of my garden have another 'taſte than thoſe of my cloſet, and will keep better 'than thoſe of my embaſſies (13).'

[G] He was ſent Ambaſſador into Holland in June, 1674.] Though this prevented our miniſter from having an immediate hand in negotiating the famous treaty which was concluded with the Dutch on the 1ſt of December this year at London, containing the ſtipulation, that free ſhips ſhould make free goods; yet, as he was principally concerned in making the former treaty with the States, concluded at the Hague on the 17th of February, 1667-8, containing the ſame ſtipulation, it is worth while to ſee his opinion of it, as it appears in a letter from him to Sir Joſeph Williamſon, as follows (14):

'Sir, 'Hague, Nov. 6, N. S. 1674.

'I was extremely glad to find by yours of the 20th 'and 30th paſt, that his Majeſty had reſolved to ſupport 'me, in the claim I had made here, of a free trade for 'all our ſhips, and the merchandizes they carry (if not 'contraband) without any exception of their trading 'from one Enemy's port to another, which can't, I am 'ſure, be drawn from the words of the articles. This 'made me confident, even before the arrival of your 'letters, by a ſecond Memorial to the States General, 'to demand the reſtitution of the Rebecca, and to tell 'them very plainly, that if any diſputes might ariſe 'from the ſenſe of any articles in treaties ſubſiſting be-'tween his Majeſty and them, they could not be re-'ſolved without his Majeſty's conſent, and till that was 'obtained, they could not make themſelves the ſole 'Judges, or Interpreters, againſt the plain common 'ſenſe of any words, and to the prejudice of his Ma-'jeſty's ſubjects. This was the point I put all the 'weight upon in my Memorial. But having the day 'after received his Majeſty's pleaſure, with your ac-'count of what had paſſed here in your return this 'way, and your arguments upon this ſubject, I de-'manded an hour of the Penſioner, and had a very 'long debate with him upon this matter. The heads 'of his arguments were, the judgment he pretended 'of ſeveral Authors upon it, and the practice of France, 'Spain, and Sweden, with them and ourſelves in the 'time of his late Majeſty and King James, which he 'undertook to give me examples of; and laſtly, that 'it could not be the meaning, to drive an Enemy's trade, 'but only to preſerve a friend's. I eaſily eluded this laſt, by 'the anſwer I made it, and by my own free proteſtation, 'that at my ſigning the confirmation of thoſe articles, 'I had no ſuch ſenſe of them, as he would now give 'them; but took the meaning of them to be juſt the 'ſame with the words, that free ſhips made free goods 'in all caſes, unleſs that of contraband. For the ſenſe 'of Authors wrote upon general theories, and for their 'own credit, and that of their profeſſion, I ſaid they 'could not be admitted to interpret any particular trea-'ties between Princes and States, who might make 'what agreement they pleaſed between themſelves, 'and very different from what Authors call Jus gentium, 'or general reaſon, by which I think they commonly 'mean their own; that for the practice of other Kings, 'with them it was no rule of theirs with his Majeſty, 'nor any agreement that he ſhould not have juſtice from 'them, becauſe they could not obtain it from others; 'but, on the contrary, though they had it not, yet 'they ever demanded it, both from France and Spain, 'which was a certain proof, that they eſteemed that juſt 'in their own caſe, which they will not allow to be 'ſo in ours; that for the practice he offered to produce 'on our parts in his late Majeſty's time, I ſhould be 'content to ſee it, but could not tell how it could ſquare 'with the preſent caſe, ſince it was granted by articles 'never in force between his Majeſty and the States, till 'the treaty of Breda. I added, to what I ſaid in my 'Memorial upon the ſubject of their pretences to make 'a forced interpretation of plain words, without his 'Majeſty's conſent, that it was not fair to do it at this 'time, when the advantage of ſuch an article was only 'caſt on our ſide by the common revolutions of war 'and peace, which might be in their favour to-morrow, 'as they were on ours to-day. Whereas, when the 'advantage was by like accidents caſt on their ſide, as 'it had been with France and Spain, they had ever 'inſiſted on the very ſame points, that we do now, and 'never given over their inſtances upon it, whether they 'received ſatisfaction, or no. After a long and warm 'debate, I gained this from the Penſioner, that for his 'own part, he was content it ſhould be as I deſired it, 'ſince the King underſtood it ſo, and it was to be reciprocal 'between us. That he could do nothing upon it in the 'States General, till the States of Holland aſſembled, 'which would be about a fortnight hence; that he 'would then propoſe it there, and endeavour their 'compliance with his Majeſty, eſpecially if the Prince, 'at his return, approved of it: and that in the mean

Mary, ſo well known in the world, and ſo particularly related in his Memoirs [H]. In July, 1676, he removed his family to Nimeguen, where he paſſed that year without making any progreſs in the treaty; and the year after, his ſon was ſent over with letters from the Lord Treaſurer, ordering him to return and ſucceed Mr Coventry in his place of Secretary of State [I]. Sir William came to England in the ſpring of the year 1667-8; and though the affair of the Secretary's place was dropped at his deſire (gg), he did not return to Nimeguen that year. About this time, the Prince having the King's leave to come over, ſoon after married Lady Mary (hh); and from this happened another occaſion of unkindneſs between Lord Arlington and Sir William [K]. Lord Treaſurer [Oſborn] (who was related to Sir William's Lady) and he, being only in the ſecret of all that affair after the Prince and Princeſs were gone into Holland, the inclination at Court always leaning towards France; the King would have engaged Sir William Temple in ſome negotiations with that Crown, with which he was ſo ill ſatisfied, that he offered to give up his pretenſions to the Secretary's Place, and deſiring my Lord Treaſurer to acquaint his Majeſty with it, he went to Sheen, in hopes of being taken at his word. But upon diſcovery of the French deſigns not to evacuate the Spaniſh towns, agreed on by the treaty to be delivered up, the King commanded him to go upon a third embaſſy to the States with whom he concluded a treaty, by which England was engaged, upon the refuſal of the French to evacuate the towns in forty days, to declare immediate war with France; but before half the time was run out, one Du Croſs (ii) was ſent from our Court into Holland upon an errand that damped all the good humour that treaty had given them there, and the life it had put into all their affairs; and ſuch ſudden and ſurprizing change in our own, which Sir William Temple had ſeen too often to be aſtoniſhed at, gave him a diſtaſte to all public employments (kk). In 1679, he went back to Nimeguen, where the French delayed ſigning the treaty till the laſt hour, which, after he (bb) Upon this occaſion, Lord Arlington ſaid a very good thing, though not in very good humour: that ſome things were ſo ill in themſelves, that the manner of doing them could not mend them; and others ſo good, that the manner they were done in could not ſpoil them; and that the Prince of Orange's match was of the laſt ſort.

(gg) Mr Coventry made ſome difficulties of reſigning, unleſs he had leave to name his ſucceſſor, which the King refuſed; therefore Sir William deſired it might be let alone till all parties were agreed.

(hh) Growing weary, as Mr De Witt uſed to expreſs it, of the perpetual fluctuation he had obſerved in all our Councils, ſince Queen Elizabeth's reign.

(ii) Sir William, in his Memoirs, Part II. p. 335, characterized Du Croſs in ſuch a ſtile, as provoked him to write an Anſwer; to which Sir William replied in 1693.

'time, he would endeavour to get the goods in the Rebecca, or the product of them, depoſited till the States 'came to a reſolution in this matter, the ſhip itſelf being already free, and gone purſuant to the reſolutions 'taken by the States in May laſt upon this point.

'I have been longer in ſtating this matter, as it ſtands 'between me and the Penſioner, that being of ſo 'mighty importance to our trade at this time, his Ma'jeſty ought to ſee the right he had on his ſide, and be 'the firmer in maintaining it. And that you may pleaſe 'to inſtruct me in any further arguments, againſt I 'enter the liſts with Commiſſioners here, if this ſhould 'prove difficult, though the Penſioner be ſatisfied 'with it (15).'

[H] Particularly related in his Memoirs.] One advantage he made of it from an accident that then happened, may be worth mentioning, becauſe he reckoned it himſelf among the good fortunes of his life. There were five Engliſhmen taken and brought to the Hague whilſt he was there, and in the Prince's abſence, who were immediately tried, and condemned, by a Council of war, for deſerting their colours: ſome of his ſervants had the curioſity to viſit their unfortunate countrymen, and came home with a deplorable ſtory, that by what they had heard, it was a miſtake; and that they were all like to die innocent; but, however, that it was without remedy; that their graves were digging, and they were to be ſhot next morning. Sir William left nothing unattempted to prevent their ſudden execution, and ſent to the Officers, threatening them that he would complain, firſt to the Prince, and then to the King, who, he was ſure, would demand reparation, if ſo many of his Majeſty's ſubjects ſuffered unjuſtly: but nothing would do, till he made it his laſt requeſt to reprieve them one day only. This being granted, the Prince happened to come that day within reach of an anſwer to a meſſage he ſent; upon which they were releaſed. The firſt thing they did, was to go and ſee their graves, and the next, to come and thank Sir William Temple upon their knees (16).

[I] He returned to England upon a motion to ſucceed the Secretary's Place.] He might be more willing to come to England to look after his private affairs upon the death of his father, which happened this year, 1677. Sir John Temple was born in 1600, bred firſt under his father, in Dublin-College, but went early abroad for further accompliſhments, and after his return was finiſhed in the Court of King Charles I; by whom he was knighted, February 23, 1640, conſtituted Maſter of the Rolls in Ireland, and ſworn of the Privy-Council there, being in particular confidence and friendſhip with the Earl of Leiceſter, then declared Lieutenant of Ireland, when the rebellion broke out; in which he was deeply engaged; and upon the changes in the King's counſels and affairs, he was impriſoned for oppoſing the ceſſation, which the Duke of Ormond was commanded to make with the Iriſh rebels. In 1644, he was exchanged, and ſent for by the Parliament in England. In 1647, he was made one of the Commiſſioners in Munſter; and one of the Commiſſioners of the Great Seal in Ireland, in 1648. He was a Member of Parliament, and ſat in the Engliſh Houſe of Commons, till he was diſmiſſed among the Members excluded for voting, that his Majeſty's conceſſions from the Iſle of Wight, were a ſufficient ground for a treaty of peace. From this time he continued privately in London, till Oliver, the Protector, in 1657, made him one of the Commiſſioners for ſettling the titles of the Iriſh to their Eſtates, and alſo their delinquency. He received many other favours from Oliver, and continued Maſter of the Rolls during the Uſurpation; and alſo by King Charles II, and was ſworn again of the Privy-Council. In 1661, he, with his eldeſt ſon, repreſented the County of Caſlow; and in 1663, he was made Vice-Treaſurer of the Kingdom. In July, 1666, he had a grant of the lands of Palmerſton, in the County of Dublin. And dying in 1677, after he had that year given col. to be laid out in ſome additional buildings in the College of Dublin (17), he was buried there at his own requeſt, in the ſame grave with his father. He wrote the Hiſtory of the Iriſh Rebellion, which was publiſhed in 1641, 4to. 'A piece '(ſays Dr Borlace in, his hiſtory of that war) of that in'tegrity few can equal, none exceed, he having as 'Privy-Counſellor an opportunity to view all diſpatches; 'rarely obvious to others; and being ſingularly entire 'and ingenuous, adventured then into the liſts, when 'ſome dared ſcarce think on the attempt: never any 'thing was objected againſt his account.' He married a ſiſter of the famous Dr Hammond, and by her had four ſons, and one daughter, who all, except one ſon, ſurvived him; viz. William, John, Henry, and Martha. Sir William, in 1662, had a reverſionary grant after his father's deceaſe of the Maſterſhip of the Rolls, for which he received a Patent, December, 1677, and enjoyed it till the ſurrendering thereof on May 29, 1696, to William (afterwards Lord) Berkeley. Sir William's younger brother, Sir John Temple, became the beſt Lawyer in Ireland (18), and his ſecond ſon, Henry, was created Baron Temple of Mount Temple, and Viſcount Palmerſton, in 1722. Martha, Sir William's favourite ſiſter, was married, April 21, 1662, to Sir Thomas Giffard of Caſtlejordan, in the County of Kildare, Bart. who was buried at St Audeon's Church in Dublin, on the 9th of May, the ſame year (19).

[K] The unkindneſs between Lord Arlington and him.] Lord Arlington's coldneſs to Sir William began from his early acquaintance with the Lord Treaſurer [Danby] (they having travelled young together) and his relation to him by marriage, and he being now Chief Miniſter in Arlington's room, and they two living in the laſt degree of ill intelligence with one another, it was impoſſible to keep the favour of both, which was the true reaſon of Lord Arlington's falling out with him; with whom, from many circumſtances, he could not afterwards live well (20).

had concluded, he returned to the Hague, from whence he was ſoon ſent for to enter upon the Secretary's Place, which Mr Coventry was at laſt reſolved to part with. Accordingly he came over, and went to Court (ll), as all his friends hoped, with the deſign of entering upon that poſt; but he made a difficulty of it, becauſe he was not in the Houſe of Commons (mm), thinking the public buſineſs would ſuffer thereby in ſo critical a time: in which the conteſts between the two parties ran ſo high, that the King thought fit to ſend the Duke into Flanders, and the Parliament to put my Lord Treaſurer [Danby] into the Tower (nn). After this, his Majeſty again preſſed Sir William to be Secretary of State, uſing for an argument, that he had now no body to conſult with, at a time when he wanted the beſt advice. Hereupon Sir William, ſtill declining the Secretary's place (oo), adviſed his Majeſty to chuſe a Council whom he ſhould wholly truſt and adviſe with: the King in a few days conſented, and the choice of the perſons was wholly concerted between his Majeſty and Sir William; and the old Council, being diſſolved four days after, this new one was eſtabliſhed, of which Sir William Temple was one (pp). In 1680, the Counſels began again to be changed, upon the King's illneſs at the end of the ſummer, and the Duke of York's return privately to Court. In this Juncture, Sir William endeavouring to bring into the King's favour and buſineſs ſome perſons to whom his Majeſty had a diſlike, if not an averſion, met with ſuch treatment from them (qq) [L], as gave him a freſh diſtaſte to Court and Councils, whither he ſeldom went, reſiding chiefly at Sheen. Soon after this, the King ſent for him again, and propoſed his going Ambaſſador into Spain (rr). Sir William complied, and ſet himſelf to prepare for it (ss); but when his equipage was almoſt ready, and part of the money for it paid, the King changed his mind, and told him, he would have him defer his journey till the end of the Seſſions of Parliament, of which he was choſen a Member for the Univerſity of Cambridge (tt), in which the factions ran ſo high, that he ſaw it impoſſible to bring them to any temper. The Duke was ſent into Scotland; that would not ſatisfy them, nor any thing but a bill of excluſion, againſt which he declared himſelf, ſaying, his endeavours ſhould ever be to unite the Royal Family; but that he would never enter into any counſels to divide them (uu): and the laſt thing he did in Parliament, or Council, was on the 4th of January, to carry the King's laſt anſwer to the Commons Addreſs of the 20th of December, containing his Majeſty's reſolution never to conſent to the excluſion of the Duke of York [M]. But ſoon after this the Parliament being diſſolved by his Majeſty without the advice of his Privy-Council, contrary to what he had promiſed, Sir William made that bold ſpeech againſt it, for which he was very ill uſed by ſome of thoſe friends who had been moſt earneſt in promoting the laſt change in the Miniſtry [N]. Upon this, he grew quite tired of public buſineſs, declined the offer he had of ſerving again for the Univerſity in the next Parliament, that was ſoon after called, and met at Oxford (ww); and ſeeing his Majeſty's reſolution to govern without his Parliament, and to ſupply his treaſury another way, he went to Sheen a few days after, whence he ſent the King word, by his ſon, that he would paſs the reſt of his life as good a ſubject as any in his Kingdoms, but would never more meddle

[L] Met with ſuch treatment from them.] Theſe were the Lords Eſſex and Hallifax, who, to the Duke, laid the ſcheme of the new Council upon Sir William; though after admitting Lord Shaftſbury and the Duke of Monmouth into it, which was done without his conſent, he always declared his diſlike of the Council. And he ſoon found an opportunity of defeating their malice, and of ſecuring a good place in the Duke's favour, by aſſuring him, that whatever befell the King's affairs, or his Highneſs, he might always reckon upon him as a legal man, and one that would follow the Crown always, as became him; unleſs things ſhould ever grow ſo deſperate as to bring in Foreigners: at which the Duke laid his hand upon him, and bid him ſtick there, and he would deſire no more of him (21).

(21) Memoirs, Part III.

[M] He carried the King's meſſage to the Houſe.] Mr Secretary Jenkins had been charged with it the night before at Council, but he was thought too unacceptable to the Houſe for a meſſage which was likely to prove ſo; and the next morning the King would have had either Sir Robert Carr, or Mr Godolphin to carry it. They both excuſing themſelves, the King ſent for Sir William Temple, who told his Majeſty, he did not very well underſtand why a thing agreed upon laſt night at Council-table, ſhould be altered in his chamber; but that he was very willing, however, to obey him, and the rather, upon others having excuſed themſelves, and to ſhew his Majeſty that he intended to play no popular Games. Upon this he took the paper, telling the King he was very ſenſible how much of his confidence he formerly had, and how much he had loſt, without knowing the occaſion; or elſe he might have had part in conſulting this change of what was laſt night reſolved, as well, as in executing it; and he would confeſs to his Majeſty, that he had not ſo good a ſtomach in buſineſs, as to be content only with ſwallowing what other people had chewed. This anſwer, Sir William ſays, is the only thing, he could imagine, the King could ever take ill of him. In proceeding, however, he declares his approbation of the meſſage, which was his principal inducement for carrying it (22).

(22) Memoirs, Vol. III. p. 537.

[N] He made a bold ſpeech againſt it, &c.] The ſubſtance of it was, that he deſired the King and Council never to lay aſide the thoughts and endeavours of agreeing, either with this, or ſome other Parliament, as a matter of ſo great neceſſity to the ſtate of his Majeſty's affairs, both abroad, and at home. The Lord Hallifax anſwered him in a few words, that every body was ſenſible of the King's agreeing with his Parliament, though not with this: and Mr, afterwards Sir Edward, Seymour ſaid, he perfectly agreed with Sir William Temple. He had, in the ſame diſpoſition, ſpoken very freely before, upon the King's declaring his mind in the Council, without previouſly aſking their advice, to prorogue the Parliament for a longer time than he had intended (23); and that he would hear nothing againſt it, charging the Lord Chancellor to proceed accordingly. Hereupon Sir William, being left out of this ſecret, ſtood up, and told the King, that as to the reſolution he had taken, he would ſay nothing, becauſe he was reſolved to hear no reaſoning upon it; therefore he would only preſume to offer his Majeſty his humble advice, as to the courſe of his future proceedings; which was, that his Majeſty, in his affairs, would pleaſe to make uſe of ſome council or other, and allow freedom to their debates and advices, after hearing which, his Majeſty might yet reſolve as he pleaſed; that if he did not think the perſons, or number of this preſent Council ſuited with his affairs, it was in his power to diſſolve them, and conſtitute another of any number he pleaſed, and to alter them again when he would. But to make Counſellors that ſhould not counſel, he doubted whether it was in his Majeſty's power, or not, becauſe it implied a contradiction: and, ſo far as he had obſerved, either of former ages, or the preſent; he queſtioned whether it was a thing had been practiſed in England by his Majeſty's Predeceſſors, or was ſo now by any of the Princes in Chriſtendom (24).

with public affairs: the King assured him that he was not at all angry (xx). And, indeed, the striking of his name out of the Privy-Council (yy), was no more than a necessary consequence of the Duke's returning, and the change of all measures. From this time Sir William lived at Sheen till the end of that reign, and for some time in the next. When having purchased a small seat, called Moor-Park, near Farnham in Surry, which he took a great fancy to for its solitude and retirement, and the healthy and pleasant situation; and being much afflicted with the gout, and broken with age and infirmities, he resolved to pass the remainder of his life there, and in November, 1686, in his way thither, waited on King James, then at Windsor, and begged his favour and protection to one that would always live a good subject, but whatever happened, never enter again upon any public employment; desiring his Majesty never to give credit to whatever he might hear to the contrary. The King, who used to say Sir William Temple's character was, always to be believed, promised him whatever he desired, made him some reproaches for not coming into his service, which he said was his own fault, and kept his word as faithfully to Sir William, as Sir William did to his Majesty, during the surprizing turn of affairs that soon after followed by the coming of the Prince of Orange: which, whatever people may suspect, was so great a secret to him, that there is nothing surer than that he was not only unacquainted with it, but one of the last men in England that believed it (zz). At the time of this happy Revolution, in 1688, Moor-Park growing unsafe by lying in the way of both armies, he went back to the house he had given up to his son at Sheen, whom he had denied leave, though importunately begged, to go and meet the Prince of Orange at his landing. But after King James's abdication, and the Prince's arrival at Windsor, Sir William went to wait upon his Highness, and carried his son. The Prince pressed him to enter into his service, and to be Secretary of State, and said it was in kindness to him that he had not been acquainted with his design (aaa); but his age and infirmities confirming him in the resolution not to meddle any more with public affairs, he was contented his son should enjoy his Majesty's favours. Hereupon Mr John Temple was made Secretary at War, in the room of Mr Blathwayt; but he had hardly been a week in his office, when he resolved to make away with himself, as he did on the 14th of April, 1689 [O]. Mr Temple being a very promising Gentleman, of great natural abilities, as personal accomplishments, the public were extremely concerned at this private misfortune. As for Sir William Temple, though as a father he was sensibly affected with the loss of so worthy a son, yet he bore his affliction with a Christian resignation, or rather with the firmness of a Stoic, being of the opinion of that Sect, that a wise man may dispose of himself, and make his life as short as he pleased. About the end of this year, he retired to Moor-Park, where he turned himself wholly to the cares and amusements of a country life, and in his study, saw little company in a place so desolate, yet he had the honour of being often consulted by King William in some of his secret and important affairs, and of a visit from him in his way from Winchester, and he used to wait upon his Majesty at Richmond and Windsor, where he was always very graciously received, with that easiness and familiarity, and particular confidence, that had begun in Holland so many years before. In 1694, he had the misfortune to lose his Lady [P], who was a very extraordinary woman, as well as a good wife. He was then past sixty, at which age he practised what he had so often declared to be his opinion, that an old man ought then to conclude himself no longer of use in the world, except to himself and his friends. He lived four years after, extremely afflicted with the gout, which at last wore out his life, and with the help of age, and a natural decay of strength and spirits, ended it in January, 1698, in his seventieth year. He died at Moor-Park, where his heart was buried in a silver box, under the sundial in his garden, opposite to the window whence he used to contemplate and admire the works of nature with his dearly beloved sister, the ingenious Lady Giffard. This was the tenor of his Will. In pursuance to which, his body was privately interred in Westminster-

[O] His son made away with himself.] This remarkable catastrophe would well deserve a place in these Memoirs (†), were it not to be found in all our General Histories, to which we refer for the story (25): only observing, by way of supplement thereto, that this young Gentleman had been married about four years before, in France, to Mademoiselle Rambouillet, a rich heiress, and only daughter of Mr Du Plessis, a French Protestant of a very good family, a young Lady very eminent then, for her rare accomplishments of body and mind, and more so since, for her great Piety and Charity. She had by him two daughters, to whom their grandfather, Sir William Temple, at his death bequeathed the bulk of his estate, upon this condition, that they should not marry Frenchmen. Accordingly the eldest of them was married to Mr John Temple, youngest son to Sir John Temple, second brother to Sir William, and esteemed one of the best Lawyers in Ireland, where he was Sollicitor, and Attorney-General, many years (26). The youngest daughter became wife to Mr Nicholas Bacon of Shrubland in Suffolk. They were both living a few years ago (27).

[P] His wife was an extraordinary woman.] She was not only much esteemed by her own friends and acquaintance, some of whom were persons of the greatest figure, but valued and distinguished by King William (*), and especially Queen Mary, with whom she had the honour to keep a constant correspondence, being justly admired for her fine style and turns of wit in writing letters, and whom she out-lived about a month: the deep affliction for her Majesty's death having hastened her own. Sir William tells the following story as an instance of her courage. In 1671, as she was passing with her children to England in one of the King's yachts, they met the Dutch fleet, which refusing to strike to a yacht, the Captain, in great perplexity, thinking to get clear by her help, asked her what he should do. She told him, he knew his orders best, and what he was to do upon them, and left him to do as he thought fit, without any regard to her, or her children. He pursued his course, and landed her safe; after which she went to Court, where she was much commended for her part in what had passed. And the King extolled her behaviour as much as he blamed the Captain's, saying, she had shewed more courage than he; and then falling upon the Dutch insolence, Sir William, to whom this discourse was spoken, said, that however matters went, it must be confessed there was some merit in his family, since he had made the alliances with Holland, and his wife was like to have the honour of making the war (28).

(*) She carried his Proposal to make his addresses to her in two letters, one to King Charles, and the other to her Father, and was charged by the Prince to inform herself the most particularly she could of all that concerned the person, humour, and disposition of the young Princess. Idem.

[R] His character.] It is drawn in very advantageous terms, and begins in the true panegyrical ſtile, as follows: I think nothing harder than to write any body's character; and that of a friend is ſtill more difficult: if one tells truth, it is thought partiality; and if one does not, it is a real piece of injuſtice. I will try, by ſaying little, to avoid both imputations. Sir William Temple's perſon is beſt known by his pictures and prints; he was rather tall than low; his ſhape; when young, very exact; his hair a dark brown, and curled naturally, and, whilſt that was eſteemed a beauty, no body had it in greater perfection; his eyes grey, but lively; and his body lean, but extreme active, ſo that none acquitted himſelf better at all ſorts of exerciſe. He had an extraordinary ſpirit and life in his humour, with ſo agreeable turns of wit and fancy in his converſation, that no body was welcomer in all ſorts of company: and ſome have obſerved, that he never had a mind to make any body kind to him, without compaſſing his deſign. He was an exact obſerver of truth, thinking none that had failed once, ought ever to be truſted again; of nice points of honour; of great humanity and good-nature, taking pleaſure in making others eaſy and happy; his paſſions naturally warm and quick, but tempered by reaſon and thought; his humour gay, but very unequal from cruel fits of ſpleen and melancholy, being ſubject to great damps from ſudden changes of weather, but chiefly from croſſes, and ſurprizing turns in his buſineſs, and diſappointments he met with ſo often in his endeavours to contribute to the honour and ſervice of his country, which he thought himſelf two or three times ſo near compaſſing, that he could not think with patience of what had hindered it, or of thoſe that he thought had been the occaſion of his diſappointments. He never ſeemed buſy in his greateſt employments, was a great lover of liberty, and therefore hated the ſervitude of courts; ſaid he could never ſerve for wages, nor be buſy (as one is ſo often there) to no purpoſe; and never was willing to enter upon any employment, but that of a public miniſter. He had been a paſſionate lover, was a kind huſband, a fond and indulgent father, a good maſter, and the beſt friend in the world, and, knowing himſelf to be ſo, was impatient of the leaſt ſuſpicion or jealouſy from thoſe he loved. He was ever kind to the memory of thoſe he had once liked and eſteemed; wounded to the heart by grief, upon the many loſſes of his children and friends, till recovered by reaſon and philoſophy, and that perfect reſignation to Almighty God, which he thought ſo abſolute a part of our duty; upon thoſe ſad occaſions often ſaying, His holy name be praiſed, His will be done. He was not without ſtrong averſions, ſo as to be uneaſy at the firſt ſight of ſome he diſliked, and impatient of their converſation; apt to be warm in diſputes and expoſtulations, which made him hate the one and avoid the other, which he uſed to ſay might ſometimes do well between lovers, but never between friends; he turned his converſation to what is more eaſy and pleaſant, eſpecially at table, where he ſaid ill-humour ought never to come; and his agreeable talk at it, if it had been ſet down, would have been very entertaining to the Reader, as well as it was to ſo many that heard it. He had a very familiar way of converſing with all ſorts of people, from the greateſt princes to the meaneſt ſervants, and even children, whoſe imperfect language and natural and innocent talk he was fond of, and made entertainment out of every thing that could afford it; when that he liked beſt failed, the next ſerved his turn. He lived healthful till forty-two, then began to be troubled with rheums upon his teeth and eyes, which he attributed to the air of Holland, and which ended, when he was forty-ſeven, in the gout, upon which he grew very melancholy, being then Ambaſſador at the Hague; he ſaid a man was never good for any thing after it: and though he continued in buſineſs near three years longer, yet it was always with a deſign of winding himſelf out as faſt as he could; and making good his own rules, that no body ſhould make love after forty, nor be in buſineſs after fifty: and though from this time he had frequent returns of ill health, he never cared to conſult phyſicians; ſaying, he hoped to die without them; and truſted wholly to the care and advice of his friends, which he often expreſſed himſelf ſo happy in, as to want nothing but health, which ſince riches could not help him to, he deſpiſed them. He was born to a moderate eſtate, and did not much increaſe it during his employments, which he tells his ſon, in his letter to him before the ſecond part of his Memoirs, it is fit ſhould contribute ſomething to his entertainment, ſince they had done ſo little to his fortunes; upon which he could make him no excuſe, ſince it was ſo often in his power, that it was never in his thoughts, which were ever turned upon how much leſs he wanted, rather than how much more: and in a fine ſtrain of philoſophy he concludes; If yours have the ſame turn, you will be but too rich; if the contrary, you will be ever poor. King Charles II. gave him the reverſion of the Maſter of the Rolls place after his father, who kept it during his life; and the preſents made him in his ſeveral embaſſies, were chiefly laid out in building and planting, and in purchaſing old ſtatues and pictures, that ſtill remain in his family, which were his only expence or extravagance, but not too great for his income. Thoſe that knew him little, thought him rich; to whom he uſed to anſwer pleaſantly, that he wanted nothing to be rich, but an eſtate; and yet no body was more generous to his friends, or more charitable to the poor, in giving often, to true objects of charity, an hundred pounds at a time, and ſometimes three hundred. His religion was that of the church of England, in which he was born and bred: and how looſe ſoever Biſhop Burnet repreſents his principles, (from that common-place of hearſay that runs through the whole, for he was not acquainted with Sir William) yet there is no ground for ſuch uncharitable reflections given in his writings, in which his excellent letter to the counteſs of Eſſex is a convincing proof both of his piety and eloquence; and to that picture, drawn by himſelf in his works, I refer thoſe that care either to know or imitate him (29).

TENISON [THOMAS], Archbishop of Canterbury, was son of the Reverend Mr John Tenison, B. D. by Mary, the daughter of Thomas Dowson of Cottenham in Cambridgeshire, where she brought her husband this son, September 29 (a), 1630 (b). But his Father, being Rector of Mundesley in Norfolk [A], sent him, at a proper age, to the Free-school at Norwich, which was then in great repute, under the conduct of Mr Lovering, the Master. Thence he was removed to Cambridge, at seventeen years of age, and admitted a scholar upon Archbishop Parker's foundation, in Corpus-Christi, or Bennet-College, April 22, 1653. He took the degree of A. B. in Lent Term, 1656-7, and from the discouragement of the times to profess the study of Divinity, he applied himself to Physic. However, his thoughts continuing fixed upon the Priesthood, he procured a private ordination at Richmond in Surry, by Dr Duppa, Bishop of Salisbury, on the first dawning of the Restoration, in 1659 (c). He proceeded A. M. the following year (d), and being, by virtue of a pre-election, admitted Fellow of his College (e), March 24, 1661-2, he entered immediately into the province of Tutor, and was chosen one of the University-Preachers, in 1665. Some time before the breaking out of the plague that year, the Dean and Chapter of Ely presented him to the cure of St Andrew the Great in Cambridge, where he conscientiously attended his duty during the whole continuance of that calamity [B], out of gratitude for which, the Parishioners presented him with a handsome piece of plate at his leaving them, in 1667, for the Rectory of Holywell and Nedingworth, in Huntingtonshire (f), given him by Edward Earl of Manchester, who had at that time placed his son Thomas under his tuition, in the College (g), and afterwards appointed him his Chaplain, in which relation he was likewise continued by his successor, Earl Robert. The same year, 1667, he proceeded B. D. and about this time he entered into the conjugal state with Ann, daughter of Dr Richard Love, sometime Master of his College [C]. In 1670, he commenced Author, by (†) His tenant at Ickleton assisted Dowsing in levelling the Chancel there. Masters, p. 150, note (t).

[A] Rector of Mundesley in Norfolk.] He was ejected from this living, as his son informs us (1), for his adherence to King Charles I, and a disguised Papist put into his room. Dr. Kennet tells us (2), he became Rector of Bracon-Ash, March 9, 1662, and died there in 1671. Mr. Masters apprehends, that he was Rector of Topcroft in Norfolk in 1646 (3). And we are assured by another hand, that, in 1712, his son, our Archbishop, at the expence of 340l. rebuilt the chancel of Topcroft church, where his father and mother are buried (4).

[B] He discharged his duty during the plague.] It broke out with such violence, that no body ventured to continue in the college but our Author, two scholars, and a few servants; for whom a preservative powder was bought, and administered in wine, whilst charcoal, pitch, and brimstone, were kept constantly burning in the Gate-house. Mr. Tenison continued in the college, and attended his cure with perfect safety to himself during the whole time (5). Here then we have an example set to the Bishop of Marseilles in France, so worthily celebrated by Mr. Pope (6), who might, it seems, have found a subject no less worthy of his muse among his own countrymen, though a Protestant. The piece of plate presented him, was a large silver tankard, and upon it St Andrew's cross, with this inscription; Gift of St Andrew's parishioners in Cambridge, Thomas Wiseman, Nicholas Settle, Churchwardens, 1667. In remembrance of his former relation to this parish, a little before his death, in the same year, our minister on the other hand gave the parishioners fifty pounds towards repairing their church and steeple (7).

[C] He married a daughter of Dr Love, &c.] The relation which this Divine bore to our Archbishop, entitles him to some further notice in these memoirs, especially as his story is of itself not unentertaining. He was the son of Richard Love, Apothecary in Cambridge, where he was born in 1596; after his education, probably at the Free-school there, he was admitted, about the year 1612 (8), of Clare-Hall, where he became Fellow in 1618, being then A. B. after which he proceeded to that of A. M. (9), and in 1628 was Proctor of the University. In 1631, he was collated to the Prebend of Tachbrock, in the church of Litchfield; and about the same time, became Rector of Ekyngton in Derbyshire. In 1632, he was created D. D. by virtue of a mandate from the King (10), to whom he was then Chaplain; and, by another royal mandate the same year, he was made Master of Bennet-College. In 1633, he was chosen Vicechancellor of the University, to which he greatly endeared himself by a successful encounter at the commencement with Franciscus de Sancta Clara (11), who had lately published a book at Doway, wherein he had endeavoured to reconcile our articles of religion with the decrees of the council of Trent. At the breaking out of the civil wars the Doctor sided with the Parliament (a), and was so well esteemed by his party, that, in 1649, he was chosen by the University, Margaret-Professor of Divinity (12), and soon after presented to the Rectory of Terington in Norfolk, which had been given by King James for the augmentation thereof. It was not long however before he was in danger of losing both this and all his other preferments, by refusing to subscribe the Engagement, when the Independents were uppermost (13), although he had subscribed to live peaceably and quietly, and give no disturbance to the public. He found means to extricate himself from these difficulties, (but whether by submitting to the subscription or not is uncertain) and so continued in his Mastership, and, after the Restoration, obtained the Deanery of Ely, into which he was installed in September, 1660; whence it is probable, that though he had been a member of the Assembly of Divines, had taken the protestation, and complied with the changes of the times, yet, as he either withdrew, or seldom appeared there, so he was not over zealous in promoting the measures pursued by the Puritans in opposition to the King and Royal Family. It is certain that, upon the King's return, he published two orations (14); in one of which he compliments his Majesty in a high strain, expatiates upon the calamities of the late times, and appeals to his brethren, who had often heard him, to bear testimony that he had frequently complained of them within those walls (15); although he thought it not prudent to provoke a tyrant's rage to his own undoing, when it could be of no service to the public; for which he would at any time have offered his life a sacrifice. — He adds moreover, that so far was he from approving the measures of the Regicides, that he laboured all he could to persuade the University to protest against taking away the King's life for their own justification, and offered to be the bearer of it himself to the military council, who then governed. And what opinion the University had of him may be collected from the Grace, whereby having agreed to restore to his Majesty the fee-farm rents they had been obliged to purchase, in order to secure their yearly

(a) In this disposition it is intimated, that he forbore to use his interest for the saving of the monuments in St Benedict's church, where many of his predecessors, masters of the college, were interred, from being demolished by one William Dowsing, who, in 1643, was authorized by the then prevailing powers to go through Cambridgeshire, and eradicate all the relicts of superstition in the parish-churches (†); in which progress he not only defaced all the painted glass he met with in the windows, but destroyed all those inscriptions in brass or stone which had the precatory form [in use till the reformation] before them. He kept a journal of the reformation he made in each church, which was published from the original manuscript by Zachary Grey, LL. D. in 1739. See an account of Dowsing in p. 17, 18, of Querela Cantab. by Dean Berwick.

by publiſhing a piece, in 8vo, intituled, The Creed of Mr Hobbes examined, in a feigned Conference between him and a Student in Divinity; apparently written to obviate a calumny that had been caſt upon him of being a favourer of Mr Hobbes's opinion (h). In 1674, the Pariſhioners of St Peter's Manſcroft, in Norwich, choſe him their upper Miniſter, and gave him a ſalary of 100 l. per ann. (i). In 1678 came out his Diſcourſe of Idolatry, and his Baconiana (k) the year following. He took his degree of D. D. in 1680, and on the 8th of October, the ſame year, was preſented by King Charles II, being then one of his Majeſty's Chaplains, to the Vicarage of St Martin's in the Fields, upon the promotion of Dr William Lloyd to the See of St Aſaph [D]. This large and important cure extending to Whitehall, and the whole Court, ſet him in the front of the battle againſt the Papiſts, both in the latter end of this, and the whole ſubſequent reign; and he maintained the dangerous poſt with undaunted, and exemplary courage. In that ſpirit, he preached and publiſhed, in 1681, A Sermon of Diſcretion in giving Alms, which being attacked by Andrew Pulton, who was at the head of the Jeſuits in the Savoy, the Doctor wrote a defence of it [E]. Upon the 10th of June, 1684, he was abuſed from the ſame quarter with a pretended information concerning the murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey [F]. This year he alſo publiſhed, The Difference between the Proteſtant and Socinian Methods: in anſwer to a book written by a Romaniſt, entitled, The Proteſtants Plea for a Socinian. In the mean time he had rivalled the beſt diſpoſed zealots of the Romiſh Church in their much boaſted grace of Charity; having diſburſed upwards of 300 l. in alms for the relief of the poor of his pariſh, during the ſeverity of the hard froſt in 1683; he alſo laid the plan for endowing a Charity-ſchool, and ſetting up a public library, both which he afterwards completed [G]. Theſe amiable qualities yearly penſions from the Crown in the late unhappy times, they commiſſioned the Doctor, who had been inſtrumental in buying them, to wait upon the King at the public expence, and make a tender of them. Lloyd calls him (16) The natural wit and orator; and adds, that, when Margaret-Profeſſor of Divinity, he was ſure to affront any man, that put up queſtions againſt the doctrine or diſcipline of the church of England in the worſt of times, which may ſerve to ſupport the following character of him. That he preſerved the ſame good conſcience, which a prudent and honeſt man, without party zeal and attachments, might do in thoſe times of civil and eccleſiaſtical confuſion; and that he ſteered as well and wiſely through thoſe ſtorms as any pilot could to ſave his ſhip (his college and univerſity) from an abſolute wreck, till Providence ſhould ſee good to calm them, and open that ſafe and happy paſſage into the harbour it found in the Reſtoration, to which he contributed all that was in his power, and may be ranked among thoſe moderate Divines, who, for their tenderneſs towards Diſſenters, came under the denomination of Latitudinarians. In which reſpect we ſhall ſee he was copied by his ſon-in-law, our Archbiſhop, who bequeathed to the college an excellent picture of him, which is ſtill remaining in the Maſter's lodge. He lived not long to enjoy his new preferment, departing this life in January, 1660 (17). His remains were depoſited in his own chapel. Beſides the orations already mentioned, he publiſhed a ſermon, preached at Whitehall on the monthly faſt, March 30, intitled, The Watchman's watchword, which was printed at Cambridge, 1642, 4to: there is alſo a long copy of Latin verſes by the Doctor, printed in the congratulations of the Univerſity upon the King's return, called ΣΩΣΤΡΑ. He gave fifty pounds in his life-time towards rebuilding Clare-Hall, and left a legacy of ten pounds, with the polyglot Bible, to Bennet-College. The Doctor, as is implied above, was a married man: but all that we know of his wife is, that her Chriſtian name was Grace, which gave birth to the following copy of verſes upon their marriage, which may ſerve for a ſpecimen of the humour of thoſe times.

Is Love, that conquers all, o'ercome? muſt He,
That all doth tye, now himſelf tyed be?
Who is't that hath this Pow'r? this Art? let's know,
That we to him a Sovereignty may owe?
Who is't that conquers Love, doſt aſk? 'Tis Grace;
For to none elſe did Love e'er yet give place.
Let Love then be the Knot, and Grace the Tye;
Give Love the Onſet, Grace the Victory.

Live always, like yourſelves, in Love and Grace (18).

[D] He ſucceeded Dr Lloyd in the vicarage of St Martin's.] Biſhop Burnet declares (19), that Biſhop Lloyd did, upon his promotion, find a very worthy ſucceſſor in his cure, Dr Teniſon, who carried on and advanced all thoſe good methods that he had begun in the management of that cure, that he endowed ſuch ſchools, ſet up a public library, and kept many curates to aſſiſt him in his indefatigable labours among them. Dr Kennet tells us (20), that in this office he had done as much good as perhaps it was poſſible for one man to do. And the writer of his life aſſures us (21), there was not above two perſons in the pariſh who turned Roman catholics while he was Vicar.

[E] He wrote a defence of it.] The Doctor's ſermon being alſo attacked by the Author of Good Advice to the Pulpits, he annexed it to a piece, intitled, An Apology for the Pulpits, publiſhed in 1688, 4to, by Dr. John Williams, Rector of St Mildred's in the Poultry, who was afterwards, by Dr Teniſon's intereſt, raiſed to the See of Chicheſter, during the time that the bill of attainder againſt Sir John Fenwick was depending in the Houſe of Lords, and, being completed Biſhop juſt before the third reading of that bill there, he haſtened, on the day appointed for it, to the Houſe, and being in an extraordinary hurry to get himſelf robed, his patron, then Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was putting on his robes at the ſame time, obſerved it, and ſaid to him, Brother, brother, you'll overheat yourſelf; what's the reaſon of all this pother? Nothing, may it pleaſe your Grace, replied the Suffragan, but I was fearful leſt the bill againſt Sir John Fenwick ſhould be read before I could take my place in the houſe. Fye, my Lord, ſays the honeſt Metropolitan, you might have ſpared yourſelf that labour, ſince you had no opportunity of hearing the merits of the caſe at the firſt and ſecond reading; but ſince, as I perceive, you are come to give your vote, pray, Brother, come in with me, that you may hear it once read before you do it (22).

(22) Life of Dr. Teniſon, p. 63.

[F] He was abuſed by a pretended information, &c.] There was brought to him, directed in a counterfeit hand, an anonymous letter in the following terms: 'This is from an unknown hand, but it is to let you 'underſtand that one ſerjeant Ramſay lies a dying, de- 'ſires ſome Divine to come to him, to unburden his 'conſcience about the murder of Sir Edmond Godfrey. 'He lives in your pariſh, in Yorke-buildings: Juſtice 'Dew can tell you more; he lives in Suffolk-ſtreet. 'If you have courage to own the Proteſtant cauſe, 'ſhew it; do your duty; viſit him.' On the backſide of the letter Dr Teniſon wrote thus with his own hand: 'I received this letter June 10, 84, by the penny-poſt 'in the evening. This morning I ſent Thomas Wickens, 'my chancel-keeper, to Yorke-buildings, that I might 'be informed whether Mr Serjeant Ramſay was in the 'houſe he had uſually lived in there. He brought me 'word, that the people of the houſe told him, that he 'had long left that houſe, and was gone into the coun- 'try; and that, if at any time he came to town, he came 'not thither (23).'

[G] Both which he afterwards completed.] The buildings are under the ſame roof, and are ſituated oppoſite the Upper Mews, at the lower end of Caſtle-ſtreet. Having endowed the free-ſchool, and ſettled a ſalary for the qualities being accompanied with a grave and moderate deportment, brought him into general eſteem, ſo much, that, in 1685, the Duke of Monmouth choſe particularly to be attended by him, both before, and at the time of his execution; and we are told (l), that he ſpoke to his Grace very plainly, and with a freedom becoming a Miniſter of the Goſpel, in relation both to his public actings, and the courſe of his private life, yet in ſo prudent and ſoft a manner, as not to diſpleaſe him [H]. In 1687, our Vicar held a conference with Doctor (as he was generally called) Andrew Pulton, above mentioned, in defence of the Proteſtant Religion [I]; ſoon after which, he publiſhed A Guide in Matters of Faith, with reſpect eſpecially to the Romiſh Practice of ſuch a one as is infallible; and another piece the ſame year, intitled, Mr Pulton conſidered in his Sincerity, Reaſonings, and Authorities: or, A juſt Anſwer to what he has hitherto publiſhed in his true and full Account of a Conference, &c. his Remarks, and in them his pretended Confutation of what he calls Dr T's [Dr Tillotſon's] Rule of Faith. Not long before this, our Vicar had preached a ſermon at the funeral of the famous Mrs Eleanor Gwynn, one of King Charles II's Miſtreſſes, whoſe Character, according to the great moderation and charity of his temper, he had repreſented (as that of a dying Penitent) in no unfavourable light: this drew upon him the cenſure of ſeveral of his enemies, eſpecially thoſe of the Romiſh Church; and an abuſive counterfeit piece being actually cried about the ſtreets, under the title of his Sermon; in anſwer to it, he put the following advertiſement, at the end of this treatiſe, againſt Pulton: 'Whereas, there has 'been a Paper cried by ſome Hawkers, as a Sermon preached by Dr T. at the funeral of Mrs E. 'Gwynn; this may certifie, that that Paper is the forgery of ſome mercenary people.' In 1680 he had, jointly with Dr Simon Patrick, a conſiderable ſum of money depoſited in his hands, to be laid out in works of Charity, according to their diſcretion [K]. He continued this year to publiſh other tracts againſt the Popiſh Religion [L]; yet, at the ſame time, was ſo much reſpected at Court, that we are aſſured King James II. was induced, chiefly (m) in regard to him, to take off the ſuſpenſion which two years before had been laid on Dr John Sharp, then Rector of St Giles in the Fields. This conceſſion, however, was undoubtedly more extorted by the exigence of the juncture, than obtained by any perſonal intereſt of Dr Teniſon (n). But, in the ſucceeding reign, his moderation to the Diſſenters brought him into higher favour with the Crown. He had been employed, with other eminent Divines, by Archbiſhop Sancroft, to review the Liturgy, upon the long projected ſcheme of a comprehenſion with the Diſſenters, before the Revolution; and preſently after it, being promoted to the Archdeaconry of London, and appointed one of the twenty Commiſſioners to prepare matters for the Convocation in the ſame view, he was very active in this Commiſſion [M] while

[H] He ſpoke to the Duke ſo as not to diſpleaſe him.] Having referred the Reader to the preſent article (24), for a further account of Biſhop Hooper's behaviour on this occaſion, we ſhall perform that promiſe here, as follows: In the evening before the Duke's execution, Dr Hooper received, by the Earl of Rocheſter, a meſſage from the King, immediately to attend the Duke. When he came to the Tower, and acquainted the Duke with his Majeſty's order, his Grace received it with ſome confuſion and ſurprize; but the Doctor aſſuring him that he was charged with no particular commiſſion, the Duke told him he was very welcome and acceptable to him, and, after much free converſation with him, told him, he would ſee him in the morning as ſoon as he was up. The Doctor ſat up all night, and in the morning the Duke told him, that he was ſure he had made his peace with God. Much time was ſpent to deſire his Grace to conſider the nature and foundation of ſuch a full perſuaſion, which the Doctor very faithfully laid before him with as great plainneſs and decency, as the Duke's firm adherence to this belief would admit of, in which he perſiſted to his laſt moment. The Doctor afterwards attended him to the ſcaffold, with Dr Teniſon, and the Biſhops of Bath and Wells, and Ely, where this laſt Prelate chiefly diſcourſed him, preſſing him to own the truth of the doctrine of non-reſiſtance, and confeſs himſelf guilty of rebellion (25).

The ſame year came out ſix conferences concerning the Euchariſt, wherein is ſhewed, that the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation overthrows the proofs of the Chriſtian religion. Tranſlated from the French of Mr de la Placette by Dr Teniſon, and printed at London, 1687, 4to. Our Author publiſhed likewiſe this year the two following pieces in 4to: 1. The difference between the church of England and the church of Rome; in anſwer to a book written by a Romaniſt, intitled, The agreement between them, Oxon. 2. An examination of Bellarmine's tenth note of Holineſs of life.

And accordingly, for ſeveral years, they diſtributed the ſum of 100l. among twenty ſuch Vicars; one half of the dioceſe of Canterbury, the other of Ely, in equal portions of 5l. to each Vicar. And to provide for the ſecurity and continual fund of the ſaid Charity, they did, in 1697, aſſign over the principal ſtock in mortgages and money, amounting in the whole to 2400l. to Sir Nathan Wright, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, and other Truſtees, to diſpoſe the mean profits yearly to the ſaid relief, and better (26) ſupport of poor Vicars.

[M] He was active in this Commiſſion.] His province was to collect the words and expreſſions excepted againſt throughout the Liturgy, and to propoſe others more clear and plain in their room, and leſs liable to objections. The original Papers of all the alterations propoſed by the Commiſſioners, reſted in his hands; and he was always cautious in truſting them out of his own keeping, alledging, that if they came to be public, they would give no ſatisfaction on either ſide, but be rather a handle for mutual reproaches, as one ſide would upbraid their brethren for having given up ſo much, while the other would juſtify their nonconformity, becauſe thoſe conceſſions were too little, or, however, not yet paſſed into a law (27). while it continued, and wrote a defence of it (o); and his diſtinguiſhed zeal in this cauſe, is ſaid to have merited a particular ſollicitation from Queen Mary for the Biſhopric of Lincoln [N] (p), to which he was nominated on the 25th of November, 1691, and conſecrated at Lambeth on the 10th of January following (q). He had not been ſeated in this See above two years, when, upon the death of Dr Francis Marſh, he was offered the Archbiſhopric of Dublin; but requeſted this favour as a motive to his acceptance of it, that the impropriations belonging to the eſtates then forfeited to the Crown, might be all reſtored to the reſpective Pariſh Churches. The motion was approved reaſonable by the King, but the difficulties were found ſo great, that it never could be carried into execution (r); and inſtead of being tranſlated into Ireland, the Biſhop of Lincoln was raiſed the following year to the Primacy of England, in the See of Canterbury [O]. Soon after this advancement, Queen Mary being ſeized with the ſmall-pox, the new Archbiſhop was choſen by her Majeſty to attend her, which he did to the moment of her death, and afterwards preached her Funeral Sermon, which, being printed, gave offence to ſeveral, and was ſeverely cenſured in a Letter to his Grace by Dr Ken, the deprived Biſhop of Bath and Wells [P]. [N] He was made Biſhop of Lincoln at the ſollicitation of Queen Mary.] The Writer of his Life tells us (29), that this Biſhopric was deſigned for Dr John Scott, Rector of St Giles's in the Fields, by the Earl of Jerſey, then Maſter of the Horſe to his Majeſty, who therefore, in oppoſition to Dr Teniſon, endeavoured to prejudice him in her opinion. In which view, he repreſented to her, as ſhe was ſpeaking in reſpectful terms of the Doctor, that he had preached a funeral ſermon, wherein he had ſpoken favourably of Mrs Eleanor Gwynn, one of King Charles the Second's Miſtreſſes. What then? ſaid the Queen, *I have heard as much. [O] He was raiſed to the See of Canterbury.] Biſhop Burnet inſinuates (30), that in his opinion, our Prelate was hardly equal in all reſpects to this Poſt. Many, ſays he, wiſhed Stillingfleet might have ſucceeded, he being not only ſo eminently learned, but judged a man in all reſpects fit for the Poſt. The Queen was inclined to him; ſhe ſpoke with ſome earneſtneſs oftener than once to the Duke of Shrewſbury on that ſubject; ſhe thought he would fill that Poſt with great dignity. She alſo preſſed the King earneſtly for him. But as his health made him not capable of the fatigue that belonged to that province, ſo the Whigs did generally apprehend, that both his notions, and his temper, were too high, and all concurred to deſire Teniſon, who had a firmer health, with a more active temper; and was univerſally well liked, for having ſerved the cure of St Martin's, in the worſt times, with ſo much courage and reſolution. So that at this time, he had many friends, and no enemies.

[P] Was animadverted on by Dr Ken, the deprived Biſhop of Bath and Wells.] This he publiſhed by way of a Letter, dated March 29, 1695, to the Archbiſhop. The whole is too long to be inſerted here: we ſhall content ourſelves with ſome paſſages, that more directly ſtrike at our Author's character. Dr Ken's cenſure turns wholly upon a ſuppoſed want of Duty, in not having repreſented to her Majeſty at this time, the great guilt ſhe lay under by her conduct at the Revolution. To aggravate the Archbiſhop's offence, he takes notice, that he had not only frequent opportunities, but ſingular encouragements to have done it. As to the firſt, he obſerves, from the Archbiſhop's own account, her Majeſty preſerved her ſenſes intire for the greateſt part of her illneſs. As to the ſecond, he addreſſes himſelf in theſe words: ‘ You had to deal with a perſon, whoſe ‘ knowledge and wiſdom you juſtly commend, p. 3. and ‘ who might eaſily have been convinced, if in any one ‘ inſtance ſhe had miſtaken her duty; you had to deal ‘ with one, whoſe piety and humility you, in many re‘ ſpects, deſervedly magnify. I only wiſh you had ‘ added her juſtice alſo, to have made her character ‘ compleat. However, theſe three virtues were powerful ‘ inducements to have uſed a conſcientious freedom with ‘ her. You had, as appears by the character you give ‘ of her, a pious, charitable, humble ſoul, under your ‘ care, a ſubject moſt happily diſpoſed to work on, who ‘ had always been very reverent and attentive at ſermons, ‘ p. 9. who had an averſeneſs to flattery, p. 12. and ‘ who would thankfully have received any piece of cha‘ ritable or humble admonition you had given her. I ‘ now beſeech you, Sir, ſpend a few thoughtful mo‘ ments in comparing your performance, as you your‘ ſelf repreſent it in your own Sermon, with your ‘ knowledge, with the opportunities and encourage‘ ments you had, and with the rubrick of the Church. ‘ You mention a very religious ſaying that fell from her, ‘ that ſhe had learned from her youth a true doctrine, ‘ that repentance was not to be put off to a death-bed, ‘ p. 26. But it was your duty, conſidering the deceit‘ fulneſs of all hearts, and the uſual infirmities and ‘ forgetfulneſs, and indiſpoſition of ſick perſons, to have ‘ ſupplied all her overſights and omiſſions, and to ‘ have examined the truth of her repentance, whether ‘ ſhe truly repented of her ſins; and where you knew any ‘ thing of moment, which had eſcaped her obſervation, ‘ you ought to have been her Remembrancer. I there‘ fore challenge you to anſwer before God and the ‘ world: Did you know of no weighty matter which ‘ ought to have troubled this Princeſs's Conſcience, ‘ though at preſent ſhe ſeemed not to have felt it, and ‘ for which you ought to have moved her to a ſpecial ‘ confeſſion, in order to abſolution? Were you aſſured, ‘ that ſhe was in charity with all the world? Did you ‘ know of no enmity between her and her Father, no ‘ variation between her and her ſiſter? Was the whole ‘ Revolution managed with that purity of intention, ‘ that perfect innocence and exact juſtice, that tender ‘ charity and that irreproachable equity, that there was ‘ nothing amiſs in it, no remarkable failings that might ‘ deſerve one penitent reflection? You cannot, you ‘ dare not ſay it, and if you ſhould, out of your own ‘ mouth I can condemn you; for you yourſelf, in your ‘ ſerious intervals, have paſſed as ſevere a cenſure on ‘ the Revolution, as any of thoſe they call Jacobites ‘ could do. You have ſaid more than once, that it was ‘ all an unrighteous thing. Why did not you deal then ſin‘ cerely with this dying Princeſs, and tell her ſo? when ‘ you muſt be ſenſible, that in ſteering her conſcience ‘ wrong, you ſhipwricked your own. What was it, ‘ Sir, that moved you to act thus notoriouſly againſt ‘ your own conſcience? was it the fear you had of loſing ‘ the favour of the Court, which made you rather ven‘ ture the indignation of Heaven? Even that fear was ‘ vain, for it had been no offence againſt the govern‘ ment to have perſuaded a dying daughter to have be‘ ſtowed one compaſſionate prayer on her afflicted Fa‘ ther, had he been never ſo unnatural. Though the ‘ caſe was here quite contrary; for he was one of the ‘ tendereſt Fathers in the world. Beſides, her illuſtrious ‘ Conſort, who manifeſted ſo very great and worthy a ‘ paſſion for her, would, I dare ſay, have had nothing ‘ omitted, which might have been conducible to her ‘ eternal happineſs; and a conſcientious Confeſſor, eſpe‘ cially on the death-bed, is one of a thouſand, who will ‘ always be deſired, and followed, and revered. Believe ‘ me, Sir, you have given the world reaſon to conclude, ‘ that your own conſcience miſgave you, being ſenſible, ‘ that in reproving her, you muſt have reproached your‘ ſelf. You ſay ſhe was ſo judicious and devout a Saint, ‘ as that degenerate Church of Rome can by no means ‘ ſhew us, p. 9; but ſurely it had been prudence in ‘ you, to have waved that compariſon, for ſhould you ‘ chance hereafter to blame that Church for canonizing ‘ Thomas a Becket, (for which ſhe is really blame‘ worthy) it is obvious for her to make this in reply to ‘ you, that it is as juſtifiable in her to ſaint ſuch a ſubject, ‘ as in you to ſaint ſuch a daughter. You tell us, ſhe ‘ was one, whom You are well aſſured had all the duty ‘ in the world for other relations [beſides her huſband] ‘ which, after long and laborious conſiderations, ſhe ‘ judged the Princeſs Ann of Denmark's Letter of Condolence to King William (*), on occaſion of her ſiſter's death, the Archbiſhop laid hold of that favourable opportunity of reconciling the Family [Q], and was principally concerned in making up the difference between them about the Princeſs's ſettlement (s). The ſeveral injunctions and circular letters to his Clergy for preſerving the order and diſcipline of the Church, and for healing the animoſities that aroſe in his time about the Trinity, and the diſtinct powers of the two Houſes of Convocation (†), are the ſubject of general hiſtory, as is alſo his being appointed firſt of the Lords Juſtices for the Adminiſtration of the Government in his Majeſty's abſence, every year, during the war, a truſt which is naturally incident to the firſt ſubject after the blood royal, and as ſuch, is now by cuſtom annexed in a manner to the Primacy (t). But the following particulars are ſtrikingly characteriſtic of the perſon, and therefore come indiſpenſibly within the plan of theſe Memoirs. In 1696, our Archbiſhop gave a ſignal proof of his zeal for the Revolution in the caſe of Sir John Fenwick's attainder: when the pious Mr Nelſon, who was a particular friend, came to pay him a viſit, in order to obtain his vote, if poſſible, againſt that bill, he received this anſwer: My very good friend, give me leave to tell you, that I know not what ſpirit this man, nor I, am of; I wiſh for his, nor no man's blood; but how can I do my duty to God and the King, ſhould I declare a man innocent (for my not being on the ſide of the bill will convince the world that I think him ſo) when I am ſatisfied in my conſcience, not only from Goodman's evidence, but all the convincing teſtimonies in the world, that he is guilty. Laws EX POST FACTO may indeed carry the face of rigour with them; but if ever a law was neceſſary, this is (u). Such a conduct muſt needs gain the heart of King William; and, accordingly, we find his Grace in ſo much reputation at Court, in 1700, that he obtained a commiſſion, authorizing him, jointly with the Archbiſhop of York, and four other Biſhops (w), to recommend to his Majeſty, proper perſons for all the Eccleſiaſtical preferments in his gift, above the value of 20 l. per ann. in the book of firſt fruits and tenths. He continued in the ſame favour till the death of this King, whom he conſtantly attended in his illneſs, and prevailed with him to put the laſt hand to a bill for the better ſecurity of the Proteſtant ſucceſſion (x). In conſequence of his ſtation, he had the honour of crowning Queen Ann; but held no degree of favour in the Court of that Sovereign. He continued the ſame charitable diſpoſition towards the Diſſenters, as he had done before; and in the three firſt years of her Majeſty's reign, he ſteadily oppoſed the bill to prevent occaſional conformity, and ſpoke with ſome warmth in the Houſe of Lords upon that ſubject, in > judged conſiſtent with her obligations to God, and to her Country, p. 15: the conſideration then, which ſhe uſed to reconcile her judgment to the Revolution, was, it ſeems, long and laborious, notwithſtanding the aſſiſtance of her new aſſociates; it being no eaſy matter to overcome the contrary remonſtrances of nature, and of her own conſcience, and to unlearn thoſe evangelical maxims, which were carefully taught her by the faithful guides of her youth. Others might begin to inſtil oppoſite principles into her, others might confirm her, but the finiſhing ſtroke was reſerved for you. But who do you mean, Sir, by other relations? we may gueſs that you mean her Royal Father, her Mother-in-law, and her Brother; but you are at liberty to ſay you mean any other relations, if you pleaſe. You give us ambiguous and general words only, when you ſhould have given us moſt expreſs and particular. All the duty in the world is a comprehenſive term; but wherein, Sir, did any part of that duty appear? why are you not ſo juſt to her, and to yourſelf, as to give us ſome of thoſe compaſſionate and melting expreſſions of filial duty, which fell from her on that ſubject? why do you not produce ſome inſtances of her mildneſs and mercifulneſs to her enemies, p. 16. who, you know, ſhe treated as ſuch, though their crime was their being her Father's friends? It would have been much for her honour, would have given great ſatisfaction to all good people, would have convinced the world, that the manner of her death had been in all reſpects truly Chriſtian, p. 23. would have been much for your own reputation, and much for the credit of the Revolution, in which you are as great a zealot, as a gainer. If you were ſo well aſſured of all that duty, what dreadful negligence were you guilty of in not putting her in mind of it on her death-bed? Methinks, Sir, you are not juſt to her, when you give us inſtances of her charity to ſeveral ſorts of indigent people, and to ſtrangers, which all the world knew, and give no inſtances of even her natural affection to her own Royal Father, of which all the world doubted (31). When, had you ſuggeſted that doubt to her, as you ought to have done, ſhe would have ſhewed herſelf a tender-hearted daughter, and would have been extremely afflicted for having been inſtrumental in her Father's calamity. It is far from my intention here to diſpute the lawfulneſs of the Revolution; yet I may ſay, that I never met with any ſo bigotted to it, who would undertake to juſtify all the part which ſhe, as a daughter, had in it; and, I am perſuaded, that it would mightily puzzle you to tell us what thoſe obligations were, which ſhe had to God, and to her Country, which were inconſiſtent with her filial duty.' —The Archbiſhop never took any notice of this Letter in print (32), and, indeed, few I believe will blame his conduct therein. The reflections too plainly indicate the Author of them to be, on this occaſion, carried out of his natural temper, under the influence of ſpleen and peeviſhneſs; the demands were ſuch as could not, in prudence, be complied with; the Queen had ſatisfied him, as her Confeſſor, and it was not his buſineſs to reveal any particulars of the confeſſion (‡). With regard to the Queen, I ſay, his ſilence ſeems to have been highly commendable, and an exemplary inſtance of the ſoundneſs of his judgment. But his cenſure of the Revolution is of another nature; the truth of the charge is aſſerted in the moſt ſolemn manner; the piety and integrity of the accuſer in great eſteem among all parties; the words are challenged to be ſpoken more than once, and conſequently the opinion declared by them, could not but be ordinarily deemed the reſult of a mature deliberation. What could hinder him then from clearing up this matter, which ſeemed to be of ſo much importance to his character? Surely it muſt be attended with ſome particular paltry circumſtances, that were beſt treated with diſregard. No doubt, he gave his friends all the ſatisfaction they could deſire therein. But any notice he ſhould take of it in public, would have given his Antagoniſt a clear right to publiſh an anſwer, and ſo have furniſhed a vehicle for carrying fuel to feed the ſpirits of the Jacobite party all over the nation; whereas, it was the great policy of thoſe times, to let that cauſe gradually die away, by a cold neglect of thoſe who were quiet, and putting the laws ſtrictly in execution againſt ſuch as incurred them.

(*) Biſhop Burnet having told us, that the King upon this loſs turned himſelf much to the meditations of religion, and to ſecret prayer, obſerves, that the new Archbiſhop [Teniſon] was often and long with him, and that he entered into ſolemn and ſerious reſolutions of becoming in all things an exact and exemplary Chriſtian. (‡) For this reaſon, it is not known whether ſhe mentioned her concern at the King's criminal converſe with Lady Villiers; but the Archbiſhop, it is ſaid, took the freedom to repreſent to his Majeſty the great injury done therein to his excellent wife. The King took it well, did not deny his crime, and promiſed never to ſee that Lady more. Whiſton's Memoirs of himſelf, p. 100. Edit. 1757. from the information of Biſhop More, who added, that his Grace's Sermon concerning holy reſolution, preached at the King's lodgings at Kenſington before he appeared in public, was deſigned particularly to confirm his Majeſty in this reſolution.

[Q] To reconcile the Royal Family.] Upon this occaſion, among other arguments, he repreſented to his Majeſty, both her Royal Highneſs's, and her Conſort's prudent and loyal conduct, during their receſs from Court; urging, that by their intereſt they might have given his Majeſty conſiderable diſturbance; but that they were ſo far from any ſuch deſign, that thoſe Members of either Houſe of Parliament, who had places under their Highneſſes, had always appeared foremoſt in promoting his Majeſty's intereſt (33).

1704 [R]. At the same time, he testified a true regard for the welfare of the established Church, by engaging Dr White Kennet, afterwards Bishop of Peterborough, to write The Case of Impropriations, &c. upon the Queen's having graciously given the first fruits for augmenting the maintenance of the poor Clergy (y). In 1705, he wrote a Letter to the Princess Sophia, acquainting her with his own zeal in particular, as also that of her friends, for the security of the Hanover succession; to which he received an answer from that Electress, wherein her Highness gave some intimations of her desire to come into England at that juncture [S]. Notwithstanding this part of his conduct must needs have been very disagreeable to her Majesty, who was always extremely averse to such a step (z); yet April 10, the following year, he was nominated first Commissioner in the treaty of Union between England and Scotland (aa). The same year, he heartily concurred with the majority of the Lords in their resolution against those who insinuated, that the Church was in danger. This brought upon him the imputation of being no good Churchman; and, as he observed, a chief brother rising into that honour upon a much less bottom, in his opinion, for it, he said to him, Brother, you know I was always a greater Churchman than you(*); but e'en take the name of the Church, whilst I keep to the Constitution of it (bb). During the severe winter, which happened in 1709, he gave a fresh instance of his charitable disposition, by an extraordinary liberality to the poor, especially those of his parish at Lambeth (cc), where he then kept his residence, being much afflicted with the gout. He had laboured many years under that distemper, and from this time was so much confined by it, that he could not give such attendance in the Convocation, as the great difference between the two Houses necessarily required (†). Upon which occasion, her Majesty joined some other Bishops with

(†) During the controversy about Greenshields, the Episcopal Church in Scotland being in a manner thence, as was said, by persecution, came hither, and petitioned the Archbishop to subscribe to an intended Edition of the English Liturgy for the use of that Church. But his Grace suspected the design, and having brought the man to confess, that there was not above ten such Churches in Scotland, Then, said he, I see no necessity for printing a new Edition of the Liturgy; I will supply them with ten books at my own expence.

[R] He opposed the bill to prevent occasional conformity.] The last time this bill was brought into the House, in 1704 (34), he made the following speech upon the occasion. 'The noble Peer that spoke last, has considered the reasons that are given for the occasional bill itself; but, I must confess, I can see none that can satisfy me of the necessity of it. I think the practice of occasional conformity, as used by the Dissenters, so far from deserving the title of a vile hipocrisy, that I think it the duty of all moderate Dissenters, upon their own principles, to do it. I think, that however it may be disapproved by some rigid Dissenters, it ought to be encouraged by all good Churchmen, as a likely means to bring them over. The allowing persons of a different Religion from the established, has been practised in all countries, where Liberty of Conscience has been allowed; and we have gone farther already, in excluding Dissenters, than any other country has done; and whatever reasons there were to apprehend our Religion in danger from Papists, when the Test Act was made, yet there does not seem the least danger to it from the Dissenters now. But, on the other hand, I can see very great inconveniencies from this bill at present. As it is brought in this last time, indeed, they have added a plausible clause, which, though it was in the first draught of the bill, was left out in the second, that the Act for Toleration should be always kept inviolable; but the Toleration Act being to take away all the penalties that a man may incur by going to a separate congregation, and the occasional bill being to lay new penalties upon those that do it, how they can say that this is not a violation of the other, I cannot very easily comprehend. I doubt it will put people in mind of what passed in France, where every edict against the Protestants begun with a protestation, that the edict of Nantz ought to be always kept inviolable, till that very edict, in which it was in express words repealed. At a time that all England is engaged in a bloody, and expensive war; at a time that these nations have not only such considerable foreign enemies to deal withal, but has a party in her own bowels ready, upon all occasions, to bring in a Popish Pretender, and involve us all in the same, or rather worse calamities, than those from which, with so much blood and treasure, we have been freed; at a time that the Protestant Dissenters (however they may be in the wrong by separating from us, yet) are heartily united with us against the common foes of our Religion; what advantage is proposed by those, who are in earnest for advancing these things by lessening the number of such as are firmly united in the common cause, I cannot for my life imagine. Therefore I am for throwing out the bill, without giving it another reading (35)'

(34) It was said by a noble Lord, in the debates upon this bill, the preceding year, that the Archbishop being asked, what reason he had against the bill, replied, he had not well considered the bill; but that my Lord Somers told him, it ought not to pass: however that be, it is certain he left that Lord, in his will, a fine picture of St Sebastian.

[S] That Electress intimated her desire to come to England.] This will be seen by reading the letter, as follows:

'My Lord,

'I received your Grace's letter. You have no reason 'to make any excuse, that you have not writ to me 'more often, for I do not judge of people's friendship 'for me by the good words they give; but I depend 'upon your integrity, and what you tell me of the honest men in England. I desire no farther assurance of 'their good-will and affection to me, unless they think 'it necessary, for the good of the Protestant Religion, 'the public liberties of Europe, and the people of 'England.

'I thank God I am in good health, and live in quiet 'and content here, therefore I have no reason to desire 'to change my way of living, on the account of any 'personal satisfaction I can propose to myself. However, I am ready and willing to comply with whatever 'can be desired of me by my friends, in case that the 'Parliament think that it is for the good of the kingdom to invite me into England. But I suppose they 'will do this in such a manner, as will make my coming 'agreeable to the Queen, whom I shall ever honour, 'and endeavour to deserve her favour, of which she 'hath given me many public demonstrations, by what 'she has done for me both in England and Scotland, 'which you can judge of more particularly. And I 'must remember that she ordered me to be prayed for 'in the churches. I doubt not but her Majesty is as 'much inclined at present to establish the safety of the 'three kingdoms upon such a foot, that they may be 'exposed to the least hazard that is possible, and that 'she will begin with England. Mr How has acquainted 'me with her Majesty's good inclinations for my family, 'which makes me think, that her Majesty sees this is a 'proper time for her to express herself in our favour. 'But whether I am right in this point or no, my friends 'in England can best judge. It is but reasonable that 'I should submit myself to their opinions and advice, 'and I depend most upon what your Grace shall advise, 'which will ever have the greatest weight with me. 'Therefore I write the more plainly to you, and tell 'you my thoughts, that you may communicate them to 'all you think fit. For they will then see, that I have 'a great zeal for the good of England, and a most sincere respect for the Queen. This is the best proof I 'can give at present of my esteem for your Grace; but 'I shall be glad of further opportunities to assure you, 'that I am, and shall ever be, most sincerely, My Lord,

'Votre tres affectionnée

'A vous servir,

'Sophie Electrice.'

This letter was published sometime after, together with one from Sir Rowland Gwynn to the Earl of Stamford, upon the same subject of the Princess's coming over, the latter being voted by both Houses to be a scandalous libel, tending to create misunderstandings between her Majesty and the Princess Sophia; and the Publisher, Mr Charles Gildon, was fined 100l. by the court of Queen's bench, May 12, 1707 (36).

with him, in a Commiſſion for executing the office of Preſident in that Aſſembly. This was thought a little derogatory to his Grace's title (dd), and though he continued to diſtinguiſh himſelf in the moſt memorable debates in Parliament, till the great change of the Miniſtry, in 1710 (ee), yet that change of the public affairs, together with his growing infirmities, induced him to live in a more retired manner at Lambeth. And, indeed, he had no farther ſhare in the Adminiſtration of affairs, either eccleſiaſtical, or civil, than what was purely due to his Poſt, during the reign of Queen Ann. But her deceaſe brought him again to Court. He was one of the three State Officers, in whoſe hands were lodged, by authority of Parliament, one of thoſe inſtruments, empowering her ſucceſſor, if abroad at the time of her demiſe, to appoint ſuch Regents as he ſhould think proper to continue the Adminiſtration in his name, till his arrival. His Grace, therefore, notwithſtanding his ill ſtate of health, went himſelf to the Council with this inſtrument (ff). He had alſo, afterwards, the ſatisfaction of crowning King George I, and of being admitted to a private conference with him; when his Majeſty was highly pleaſed with the plainneſs and ſincerity of his converſation, and took an opportunity of expreſſing his ſenſe particularly of the Archbiſhop's modeſty, in the moſt ſtriking manner, to one of his Courtiers [T]. This was the laſt, and only time of our Primate's attendance upon that Prince: whence, after recommending Dr Wake, Biſhop of Lincoln, for his ſucceſſor at Canterbury, and his Chaplain, Dr Gibſon, for the See of Lincoln, as he had done with great zeal before, Biſhop Fleetwood for the See of Ely, he returned to his Palace at Lambeth, where he continued till his death, which happened on the 14th of December, 1715, in the ſeventy-ninth year of his age (gg). He was interred privately in the chancel of the Church at Lambeth, and in the ſame vault with his wife, who died the preceding year (hh), leaving him without iſſue. He gave very particular directions concerning his funeral, in his will. By which, beſides ſeveral benefactions beſtowed in his life-time, he left an uncommon number of legacies, and he bequeathed ſeveral charities, the moſt remarkable of which, we ſhall mention in note [U]. The reſidue of his fortune, which was very conſiderable, he ordered to be equally divided to the children of his kinſmen, Dr Edward Teniſon (*)[W], Mr Richard Tubby, and Mr George Fage(†). Here lyeth
the Body of THOMAS TENISON, late Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who departed this life in peace on the 14th day of December, MDCCXV (39).

(39) It is upon his grave-ſtone of black marble.

Beſides the donations already mentioned in his life-time, he founded a charity-ſchool at Lambeth for the education of twelve poor girls; and another at Croyden. He built, anno 1706, the epiſcopal throne in the church of Canterbury, at the expence of 244 l. 8 s. 2 d. In 1707, he gave books to the library of St Paul's cathedral, London, to the value of 256 l. 17 s. In 1709, he gave ſeventy guineas to the poor Palatines. In 1710, he gave 30 l. towards beautifying the chancel of the pariſh-church of Cranbrook in Kent. In 1713, he preſented to the church of Lambeth a velvet pall, which coſt him 46 l. (40), and he had before been a great encourager of Strype in writing his life of Archbiſhop Parker, beſides bearing the expence of the plate of his Grace's figure prefixed thereto. To theſe muſt be added his benefactions to Bennet-College in Cambridge, to the amount of about 3000 l. (41), and to the Univerſity 50 l. to advance printing there, beſides the copy of Dr Spencer's book De Legibus Hebræorum. By his will he gave to the Society for propagation of the goſpel, 1000 l. toward the ſettlement of two Proteſtant Biſhops; one on the continent, the other on one of the iſles in North America. The intereſt of which ſum to be given in the mean time to ſuch diſabled miſſionaries of the province of Canterbury as have diſcharged their truſts faithfully. To the Governors of Queen Ann's bounty for the augmentation of five ſmall livings in Kent, 1000 l. (42). To the corporation for the relief of clergymen's widows and children, 500 l. To Bromley-College, fifty guineas toward repairing the houſe, and the like ſum to the poor widows thereof. To the French Proteſtant refugree, 100 l. To the pariſh of Lambeth, a piece of ground for a burying-place, whereon his ſchool was erected. To Archbiſhop Whitgift's hoſpital at Croyden, 100 l. with 400 l. to the ſchool founded there in his life-time. To ten poor Rectors or Vicars in the dioceſe of Canterbury, 10 l. each. To the poor of Canterbury, Lambeth, and Croyden, 40 l. each. To thoſe of St Martin's in the Fields, London, and St James's, Weſtminſter, 30 l. each. And to thoſe of Topcroft, Tharſton, and Bracon-Aſh in Norfolk, Cottenham in Cambridgeſhire, and Holywell in Huntingtonſhire, 10 l. each. He gave his fire-engine, maps, and pictures, in Lambeth-houſe, to the uſe of his ſucceſſors; and many books and papers to the library there. To his chaplains, relations, and ſervants, &c. he made handſome bequeſts; and to Dr Lilly Butler, miniſter of Aldermanbury, who had many children, 50 l.

[W] Dr. Edward Teniſon.] As this relation of our Archbiſhop made ſome noiſe in his life-time, we ſhall give the following account of him. He was a native of Norwich, and ſon of the Regiſter to the Archdeacon of Norfolk, and nephew to the Lady Dorothy Browne, widow of the famous Sir Thomas Browne the phyſician. After going through St Paul's ſchool, under Dr Gale, he was admitted of Bennet-College, Cambridge, in 1690, and ſoon after became a ſcholar of the houſe, upon Archbiſhop Parker's foundation. In 1694, he took the degree of A. B. at Cambridge; but proceeded to that of LL. B. (43) probably at Lambeth, where he was afterwards created D. D. He was ordained both Deacon and Prieſt by Biſhop Sprat in 1697, and collated by our Archbiſhop the ſame year to the Rectory of Witterſham in the iſle of Oxney in Kent, which he quitted, in 1698, for that of Sundrich, a peculiar of the Archbiſhop's in the dioceſe of Rocheſter, to which the ſame patron afterwards added the adjoining Rectory of Chidingſtone, which he held together for many years. In 1704, he had the Prebend of Tarvin in the church of Litchfield, but reſigned this to his kinſman, Mr George Fage, upon his inſtalment to a Canonry in that of Canterbury in 1708, and to the Archdeaconry of Carmaerthen the ſame year. Upon the firſt arrival of his late Majeſty King George II, then Prince of Wales, in England, the Doctor was appointed one of his Chaplains, and ſo continued after his advancement to the throne. He had married a lady, whoſe name was Searle, more nearly related to the Archbiſhop than himſelf, ſhe being his niece; he had by her one ſon and five daughters, to each of whom his Grace bequeathed 1600 l. and made him one of his Executors (44). His Uncle, who had been Steward to the Archbiſhop, left him all his ſubſtance, to the amount of 12000 l. With which, and a great part of his children's fortunes, he embarked in the South-Sea, in 1720; and, when ſtocks were at the higheſt, bought an eſtate of Lord Bulkeley's, in the iſle of Angleſea, which lived in the times of the ſevereſt trial, ſo his character has been variouſly repreſented. The following ſketch of it being taken from the Writer of his Memoirs (ii), with ſome alterations, is ſubmitted to the readers cenſure. He was a Prelate who ordinarily, through the whole courſe of his life, practiſed that integrity and reſolution he firſt ſet out with: nor was he influenced by the changes of the age he lived in, to act contrary to the pure and peaceable ſpirit of the Goſpel. He adorned his high ſtation with an exemplary Piety, and a munificent Charity, and was happily endued with ſuch a hardineſs of temper, as enabled him to ſteer the Church with ſteadineſs through thoſe violent ſtorms of party, the rage of which too much affected the too tender ſpirit of his Predeceſſor. The Primate's character, as a writer, is ſeen in his performances of that kind. He had the misfortune to be given by Burnet (kk) for a very learned man, who maintained the Proteſtant cauſe againſt Popery, not only with courage, but judgment too. This high-charged colouring, provoked another Writer to darken it, by repreſenting him as loſing ground in the controverſy with the Church of Rome, maintaining that he was foiled in his conference with Pulton the Jeſuit, for want of capacity to defend ſo good a cauſe; and had committed too many blunders in his writings, to be reckoned, either a man of good ſenſe, or extraordinary learning (ll). Upon the whole, it cannot be denied, that the Archbiſhop's writings ſet his character as a ſcholar far enough above contempt; and though we ſhould allow, that his manner is rather heavy and clumſy, than elegant or accurate; yet that bitter ſarcaſm upon him, which is commonly fathered upon Dean Swift, cannot be treated with too much indignation, that he was hot and heavy like a Taylor's Gooſe. Beſides what has been already mentioned, the Archbiſhop publiſhed ſeveral other pieces, a liſt of which is inſerted below [X].

which purchaſe was made void by act of Parliament (45). He retired however to that iſland, with all his family, in 1723, to which he had a ſtrong attachment (46); but on trial, finding it by no means anſwerable to his expectations, he was glad to return again to his prebendal houſe at Canterbury, for which Church he was choſen Proctor in Convocation, in 1727. Where, after reſigning Sundrich to Dr Lynch (47), and Chidingſtone to his ſon, he reſided till 1730, when he went firſt Chaplain to the Duke of Dorſet, as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who gave him the Biſhopric of Oſſory in that Kingdom. Upon which he reſided the reſt of his life, which was not long, being cut off by a pleuriſy (48), in 1735. He died at Dublin, and was buried in St Mary's Church in that city. His wife ſurvived him, and has not been dead many years (49). By will he bequeathed 40 l. per ann. during life, to Michael Stephenſon, a Deacon, to catechiſe the children of Papiſts in the pariſh of Kilkeaſy (a wild and mountainous part of his Dioceſe) where he obliged him to reſidence, under the penalty of forfeiting the penſion.—To the Incorporated Society for promoting Engliſh Proteſtant ſchools, 20 l.—To every Incumbent, and Reſident Curate in his Dioceſe, a copy of the lateſt edition of Chillingſworth's Religion of Proteſtants. To the poor of Kilkenny, Canterbury, Sundrich, and Chidingſtone, 20 l. each. To the pariſhes of Aghamacart, Roſconnell, Kildemogh, Kilbeacon, Liſterling, and Kilkeaſy, 10 l. each, for building and enlarging ſmall oratories within the ruined walls of thoſe Churches. And to Bennet-College in Cambridge, beſides a legacy of 200 l. for the encouragement of the ſtudy of agriculture, he bequeathed 40 l. per ann. for founding a lecture on huſbandry (50). The Biſhop being ever of a generous hoſpitable diſpoſition, was likewiſe liberal in his charities while living; and no man had the propagation of the Proteſtant Religion more at heart, than himſelf; but he has been thought, by ſome, in great meaſure to have defeated his own good intentions, by too intemperate a zeal, by too unhappy an obſtinacy in his temper, and by too inflexible an adherence to his own ſchemes and ways. In public life, he was indefatigably reſolute in the ſupport of the preſent eſtabliſhment; and in carrying forward any work of common utility: in private, no one was more loved as a friend, nor dreaded as an enemy; ſo that nothing could better characterize him, than the motto he made choice of, Petra immobilior (51). Beſides his Proteſt, mentioned in the margin, he publiſhed two Letters to the Prolocutor [Dr Stanhope], in 1718; and two Sermons, one called, The Excellency and Uſefulneſs of a Public Spirit, preached before the Gentlemen educated at St Paul's School, January 25, 1710; and the other preached before the Lords at Chriſt-Church, Dublin, November 5, 1733.

His only ſon, Thomas, who was born in Kent, in 1700, and bred at the Schools of Croyden and Sevenoak, was admitted, by proxy, at Bennet-College, in May, 1711; but being then of an unſtatutable age, that admiſſion was ſuperſeded, which his father, for other reaſons, ſo reſented, as afterwards to enter him at Clare-Hall, where he reſided when he came to the Univerſity; but after taking the degree of LL. B. there, in 1724, he removed to Trinity-Hall, being put into a Fellowſhip by Sir Nathaniel Lloyd, the Maſter, upon a lapſe incurred by the Fellows, and proceeded LL. D. in 1726. His father being uncertain what profeſſion he might make choice of, and that no qualification for any might be wanting, admitted him both at the Temple and Doctor's Commons, at the ſame time that he did at the Univerſity: however, he had like to have eluded all theſe precautions, and defeated all his father's views, by an imprudent conduct. Provoked by a gentle, though juſt correction, at Sevenoak School, to which he was removed againſt his will, he ſtole away to Briſtol, and embarked there on board a veſſel in the ſlave trade, bound to Guinea, where, by his good behaviour, he roſe to be Superintendant of the ſlaves, during their voyage to Barbadoes. Great offers were made him there, on account of his ſkill in writing and accompts, if he would have ſtaid, and become a Schoolmaſter; but being, by this time, deſirous of returning to his native country, he rejected theſe, and after eighteen months abſence, and being obliged to work his paſſage home, as a common ſailor, he came to his family and friends, who, having heard nothing of him during all that time, received him gladly, though his habit and complexion, at firſt, diſguiſed him from their knowledge. After his return, his father grew exceedingly fond of him, and upon his leaving the Univerſity, reſigned to him, in April 1727, firſt the Archdeaconry of Carmaerthen, and then the Rectory of Chidingſtone, which he held with the Vicarage of Lydd in Kent, and the Sinecure of Llandrillo in Wales. He was appointed Chancellor of the Dioceſe of Oxford, 1734 (*), after having been Commiſſary in that of Canterbury, of which Cathedral he was inſtalled a Prebendary, February 10, 1738, where, May 7, 1742, he died (52), and was buried, not living to finiſh the new prebendal houſe he had begun. His firſt wife was the eldeſt daughter of Dr Potter, then Biſhop of Oxford, who died in 1729 (53). His ſecond wife, who ſurvived him, was the daughter of Mr Smith of Nottingham, by whom he had one ſon living, in 1757, and a daughter. The Doctor, from his youth, was of an open, generous, good-natured diſpoſition, but mixed with ſuch a warmth and impetuoſity of temper, and that inflamed by a party zeal, as made him impatient of any control, and inclined him to be ſelf-opinionated and wayward (54).

THORESBY [RALPH], (a) an eminent Antiquarian, who flouriſhed in the latter end of the laſt, and the beginning of the preſent Century; was deſcended from a family, whoſe origin is carried up as high as to the time of King Canute, the Dane [A]; and at the Norman conqueſt, was ſeated at Thoreſby in Yorkſhire. But that branch, from which our Author ſprung, having been ſettled for ſeveral generations at Leedes, in the Weſt Riding of that County, where they lived in good reputation as merchants, he was born there on the 16th of Auguſt, 1658, and after going through the Grammar-ſchool of that town, was carried, in 1677, for further improvement, to London, and placed in the family of a worthy relation by his Father; who, though a merchant by profeſſion, had a particular turn to the knowledge of Antiquities (b), which being inherited by this his eldeſt ſon, he employed his leiſure hours in viſiting the moſt remarkable places in and near the great Metropolis, copying the monumental inſcriptions, ſtudying their hiſtory, and particularly collecting accounts of Proteſtant benefactions (c). However, his Father deſigning him for his own buſineſs, ſent him the next ſpring, 1678, to Rotterdam, in order to learn the Dutch and French languages, and to be perfected in mercantile accompliſhments. The young Gentleman made a good progreſs in the languages, ſtudying them grammatically: and in the interim, joined in company with ſome other Gentlemen, (who underſtood them) in a tour that ſummer through the principal towns in Holland, when he made ſeveral ingenious obſervations on the manners of the people, and the curioſities of the country. But his ſtay there happened to be much ſhorter than was intended; for being ſeized with a dangerous ague, he was obliged to return in December, the ſame year, to his native air. The diſtemper proving ſtill obſtinate after his return, he made ſeveral ſmall excurſions the enſuing ſummer, in order to clear off the remains of it. Theſe exerciſes, though undertaken for the ſake of his health, furniſhed him with an opportunity (which he did not let ſlip) of improving his knowledge in local antiquities. But ſcarce was he recovered from this diſorder, before it pleaſed God to viſit him with another ſevere affliction in the ſudden death of his father [B], on the 31ſt of October this year, 1679. This melancholy event devolved

(a) The chief particulars of this article were communicated by the eldeſt ſon of Mr Thoreſby.

(b) He was alſo poſſeſſed of a good ſhare of learning, and ſuperintended every part of his ſon's education.

(c) Here he alſo began by the direction, and after the example of his Father, to keep a Diary of his Life, which he continued till near the time of his death.

[A] Whoſe origin is carried up to the time of Canute.] The pedigree of this family, which is one of the moſt complete that we have (1), begins with Aykfith, or Aykfrith, a noble Baron, who in the time of King Kneut, the Dane, was Lord of Dent, Sudbergh, and twelve other ſeignories, which, in the time of King Edward the Confeſſor, deſcended to his ſon Arkill, whoſe ſon, Goſpatrick, was Lord of Thoreſby at the Conqueſt; whence the family from that time took the name of Thoreſby. From Goſpatrick, in the fifth lineal deſcent, ſprung Sir Adam Thoreſby, Knight, of Thoreſby near Middleham, in the North Riding of Yorkſhire, one of whoſe great grandſons, was the famous Cardinal John Thoreſby, who being bred at Oxford, was much eſteemed both as a Divine and Canoniſt (2), and in September, 1347, was conſecrated Biſhop of St David's, having been made, on the 2d of July preceding, Keeper of the Great-Seal, by Edward III, whom he attended the ſame year at the ſiege and taking of Calais, with a retinue of one Banneret, two Knights, thirty Eſquires, thirty Archers on horſe-back, and thirty-ſix on foot (3). In 1349, he was tranſlated to the Biſhoprick of Worceſter, and the ſame year made Lord Chancellor of England. After which he was created Cardinal of St Peter ad Vincula, and in 1352, nominated Archbiſhop of York, and being enthronized in 1353, he then reſigned the Great Seal, devoting himſelf intirely to the duties of his ſpiritual function with exemplary humility and charity (4). In this ſpirit, he made an accord with the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, whereby he waved the right of bearing the croſs in his province, a diſpute which had long ſubſiſted, to the great ſcandal of the Church. In 1361, he began the foundation of the choir in York Minſter, and, laying the firſt ſtone himſelf, gave 100 l. then, and 200 l. per ann. afterwards, till it was finiſhed. He alſo beautified the Lady's-Chapel at the eaſt end with images and pictures of coſtly, and excellent workmanſhip, and removing the bodies of diverſe of his Predeceſſors, that lay diſperſed about the Church, he had them entombed there at his own expence, leaving a place for himſelf in the middle: he likewiſe founded a Chantry therein, with a ſalary of 40 s. per ann. Laſtly, he gave this Church two mitres of conſiderable value. Beſides theſe benefactions, he gave the Rectory of Roxby to the Monks of Drax, erected Vicarages in ſome impropriate Churches ill ſerved before, and enlarged the endowment of others. Some of which Vicars he defended in an expreſs treatiſe againſt the Friars Mendicants in Latin (5). But his principal glory is his Engliſh Expoſition of the Ten Commandments, Lord's Prayer, Creed, Sacrament (6), &c. which he ordered all the Clergy to read diligently to their pariſhioners, a reform juſtly to be admired for the courage ſhewn in it in the time of Edward III; and in the ſame ſpirit, he was a great favourer of Wickliffe, and is juſtly named the firſt of that firſt Reformer's friends (7) He died November 6, 1373, at his manor of Thorp, and was interred in the middle of his Chapel aforementioned (8). This Archbiſhop's elder brother, Hugh Thoreſby, was father of John Thoreſby, who flouriſhed in 25 Edward III, and was Anceſtor to three families of his name, ſeated in Yorkſhire, Eſſex, and Norfolk; from the firſt of which deſcended Henry Thoreſby, who, removing to London, became one of the firſt Governors of Charter-houſe (9), and having no male iſſue, the abovementioned manor of Thoreſby came into the poſſeſſion of Sir Thomas Hardreſſe of Great Hardreſſe in Kent, who married Elinor, ſole daughter and heir of the ſaid Henry (10); whoſe younger brother, Ralph Thoreſby of Woolham near Barnard-Caſtle, was father to George Thoreſby of Weſt Cottingwith, Com. Ebor. and George's eldeſt ſon, John Thoreſby, Merchant and Alderman of Leedes, was grandfather to Ralph Thoreſby, the ſubject of the preſent article, to whom we owe this account of his family (11).

[B] His father died ſuddenly.] The manner of his death muſt needs have greatly ſurprized his family. In the evening of the 30th, he went in good health to bed, and in the morning was found dead on his knees and face. It was ſomewhat remarkable, that in the evening, after reading a portion of Scripture as uſual, he inſiſted in his explication much longer than his ordinary cuſtom, and prayed with the greateſt fervency imaginable. In his cloſet alſo was found a ſhort pious hymn, written with his own hand, and, no doubt, his own compoſition (12), beginning with the following lines:

Remember, Mortal, that unlook'd for death
Oft in deep ſleep ſurprizes vital breath;
Then ſlumber not, for often the moſt ſound,
When he thinks leaſt, next morning dead is found.

(12) He ſometimes diverted himſelf with writing as well as reading poetry. A copy of recommendatory verſes by him is prefixed to Scarborough Spaw, ſpagyrically anatomized by G. Tonſtal, M. D. edit. 1670.

Such

devolved on him the care of a brother and ſiſter (d); whoſe education and ſettlement in the world, he conducted with a paternal tenderneſs and prudence: In the mean time, he entered into his father's buſineſs of a Merchant; and becauſe the foreign woollen trade from Leedes had fallen to decay before the old Gentleman's death, he endeavoured to make up that defect by the linnen trade, in which view he purchaſed his freedom in the incorporated Society of Merchant-Adventurers, trading to Hamburgh. Being now ſettled in buſineſs, he began to think of entering into the nuptial ſtate, and accordingly, on the 25th of February, 1684-5, he married Anna, the third daughter, and coheireſs of Richard Sykes of Leedes, Gent. [C]. He was extremely happy in his choice; but this domeſtic happineſs was ſoon diſturbed by the infelicity of the times under James II. He had been bred among the Preſbyterians, but never imbibing any of their rigid principles, he had always occaſionally conformed (e) to the eſtabliſhed Church; and now that Popery began to threaten the ruin of that Church, he more frequently attended its worſhip, in the view of promoting ſuch an union of the Proteſtants, as was in this juncture thought neceſſary on both ſides, for their mutual preſervation. All this while, though merchandize was his profeſſion, yet learning and antiquities were his great delight, and they took ſo firm a poſſeſſion of his heart, that contenting himſelf with a moderate patrimony, he made thoſe reſearches the great employment of his life. He had been initiated into theſe ſtudies by his Father, and the old Gentleman's learned friends (particularly the Fairfax family (‡)) obſerving the ſon's inclination and genius, turned the ſame way, transferred their reſpect to him. But the number was much increaſed by himſelf. Two of the earlieſt and moſt intimate of theſe, were Mr Thornton, the Recorder of Leedes, and the celebrated Biſhop Nicolſon [D], to whom muſt be added, Biſhop

(d) Jeremiah and Abigail.

(e) In this too he was trained up by, and followed the example of, his Father.

(‡) Mr John Thoreſby has merited the Patronage of this family, firſt by entering into the army under the General in the Parliament's ſervice, and afterwards, in 1659, againſt the remains of the ſame Parliament, then called the Rump, and in favour of the King's Reſtoration; when Mr Thoreſby not only engaged himſelf, but brought a large party along with him. Mr R. Thoreſby's Diary.

Such an extraordinary caſe may ſerve to confirm the opinion of ſome Divines and Philoſophers, that the ſoul of man, when near its ſeparation from the body, acts with an extraordinary vigour, and becomes receptive of a kind of prophetic influence: an obſervation which was remembered on this occaſion by his ſon, who pioufly added his own aſſent to it (13). The old gentleman was buried in St Peter's church (14), where there is a decent monument erected to his memory, with an elegant Latin inſcription, which, becauſe of the great reſemblance it bears to the character of the ſon, we ſhall inſert as follows:

He was the founder of the Muſæum Thoreſbeianum, by purchaſing the Lord Fairfax's valuable collection of coins and medals of his Lordſhip's executors, after it had been enriched with the coins and medals collected by Mr Stonehouſe, Rector of Darfield in Yorkſhire.

(†) This Gentleman wrote an excellent anſwer to Prieſtcraft in Perfection; as alſo Reaſons for taking the Oaths to Queen Anne: both in Muſ. Thoreſb. MSS. in 4to. No. 178.

[C] Daughter and co-heir of Richard Sykes.] This gentleman was deſcended from a family of his name at Sykes-dike near Carliſle, whence William Sykes, a younger brother, coming into this country, improved his fortune conſiderably by the cloathing trade: his grandſon, Richard Sykes, was Alderman of Leedes when firſt incorporated, and one of the moſt eminent merchants in theſe parts, whoſe ſon, Richard Sykes, Mrs Thoreſby's great grandfather, was alſo Alderman (*) of the town in 1629 and 1636, and firſt purchaſed the manor from the crown. But, at the requeſt of Mr Harriſon, a grand benefactor to the place (16), let him and half a dozen more come in as joint purchaſers with him, on this conſideration, that the Lordſhip, if veſted in a ſingle perſon, would have given him too great a ſuperiority; which the good old gentleman not being ambitious of, reſerved only one ſhare for himſelf, and another for his ſon, William Sykes, merchant, admitting the reſt as he had contracted for it. The old gentleman, as is ſaid, being great grandfather to Mrs Thoreſby, our Author in her right became poſſeſſed of his ſhare (17).

[D] Mr Thornton, Biſhop Nicolſon, Gibſon, Kennet, &c.] To begin with the firſt of theſe, Mr Thornton (†). This moſt intimate and uſeful friend was poſſeſſed of a curious library, in which were many valuable manuſcripts, and gave Mr Thoreſby the liberty of taking copies of whatever he pleaſed, who, among other things, tranſcribed a folio volume of the pedigrees of the gentry of the Weſt-riding of Yorkſhire, written by Mr Hopkinſon, with which he enriched the Muſæum Thoreſbeianum. To this eminent Recorder is joined Biſhop Nicolſon, with whom our Author held a conſtant correſpondence, and their mutual communications were free and frequent, and ended not till death (18). What gives this learned Biſhop a title to a prime place among our Author's correſpondents is, that he firſt of all diſcovered the value of that famous ſilver Runic coin, or medal, which is the diſtinguiſhing ornament and glory of the Muſæum Thoreſbeianum. This moſt curious piece had lain in the father's collection unnoticed, as being unknown till the ſon ſent it, being not bigger than a ſilver groat, under the ſeal of a letter to his friend, Dr Nicolſon, then Archdeacon of Carliſle, who returned it with a reading and interpretation of the inſcription, as follows, Thur Gut Luetis, i. e. Thoris Dei facies, The Effigies of the God Thor (19). This is literally the greateſt curioſity of the kind in the world. This ſingle medal being the only one known to be in any Muſæum in Europe, with the true Runic letters upon it. On one ſide it repreſents the figure of the God Thor, with a glory incircling his head, and a ſceptre or golden mallet in his hand; on the reverſe two creſcents, &c. A learned Foreigner has printed a treatiſe upon it, intituled, De argento Runis ſeu literis Gothicis inſignito, quod dilucidatum in Camdeni Britannia Anglice nunc loquente, & ampliata literato exhibetur orbi, ſententia Nicolai Kederi, Regii antiquitatum collegii, quod Holmiæ eſt, Aſſeſſoris Lipſiæ 1703, 4to (20). This otherwiſe invaluable piece is more particularly ſo to the family who poſſeſſes it, by bearing the God Thor (21), whence the name of Thoreſby is derived. The word bye in the Saxon language ſignifying habitation; ſo that Thoreſby intends the habitation or ſeat of Thor. In our Author's Muſæum is a coin of King Edward ſenior, an. 901 (22), with this inſcription, EDW*ARD. REX. round the King's head, with a crown and a ſort of arched ſcepter. On the reverſe theſe words, ÐORR. ON EOFERPIC, i. e. Thorr of York (23); and another of King Edward the Confeſſor, an. 1042, with the ſame words on the reverſe (24). Whence he concludes, that this Thorr was probably the very ſame perſon who is frequently mentioned in Domeſday-book, as having had a vaſt eſtate in the Northern parts of England. However, being diſpoſſeſſed thereof by the Conqueror, moſt of it lay waſte at the time of that memorable ſurvey. But to proceed,

The new edition of Camden's Britannia in 1695 introduced our Author to Dr Gibſon, at whoſe requeſt he wrote notes and additional obſervations on the Weſt-riding of Yorkſhire, and, for the uſe of this edition, he tranſmitted above a hundred of his coins to Mr Obadiah Walker (25), who undertook that province which related to the Roman, Britiſh, and Saxon monies. And, when the Biſhop was preparing that work for another and more complete impreſſion, Mr Thoreſby ſent a great (19) The ſubſtance of his deſcription is inſerted in Dr Gibſon's edition of Camden's Britannia, p. 814.

(20) Moſt Daniſh Antiquaries being of opinion, that no current monies were ever minted in theſe Northern kingdoms before the Runic characters were laid aſide, therefore Mr Keder, differing from all others, will have the image, which has a glory round it's head, on the face of this coin, to be that of our Saviour.

ſhop Gibſon, Dr Gale, Dean of York, and his two ſons, Dr Hickes, Sir Andrew Fountaine, Mr Wanley, Mr Hearne, Dr Richardſon, Mr Ray, Mr Strype, Biſhop Kennet [D], and above all, Archbiſhop Sharp, his Dioceſan: who, to his knowledge in Theology, added a good taſte for coins and medals, and collected a curious cabinet of them. Their converſation frequently turned upon ſubjects of that nature, and his Grace preſented to him a copy of his Remarks on Engliſh, Scotch, and Iriſh money (f), requeſting his additions to them, with his opinion of ſome particular Saxon coins, which it was difficult to determine to what King they belonged [E]. But, in the interim, there aroſe an affair more immediately intereſting to Mr Thoreſby, in which he conſulted the Archbiſhop, and received from him a moſt affectionate treatment, as well by letters, as perſonal converſation. We have already obſerved, that our Author, in the time of King James, frequently attended the worſhip of the Church of England, in the view of ſtrengthening the Proteſtant bulwark againſt the Papiſts. This compliance, though done with ſo good a deſign, happened highly to diſpleaſe his Preſbyterian Paſtor, who, how worthy ſoever in other reſpects, behaved on this occaſion with ſuch an indiſcreet zeal, as turned to the prejudice of his own cauſe. Mr Thoreſby was thereby prompted to enter into a cloſer examination of the arguments on both ſides, and, adviſing with the Archbiſhop, was ſettled by his Grace in full communion with the Church eſtabliſhed (g). In the mean time, the circle of his acquaintance, already large, kept continually ſpreading [F], an advantage which naturally grew

(f) See a particular account of the Contents of this treatiſe in Muſ. Thoreſb. No. 95. of the MSS. in folio, Ducat. Leod. p. 528.

(g) Beſides the Archbiſhop, he conſulted other judicious friends on this important occaſion, particularly Mr Thornton, the Recorder above mentioned. He was alſo more inclined to the Church by the miniſtry of the Vicar of his pariſh, Mr Killingbeck, a Clergyman of ſo excellent a character, that Archbiſhop Sharp, in his ſpeech at a viſitation, propoſed him to his Clergy as an example, both for preaching, and practice. Vic. Leod. p. 725.

many queries to Mr Thoreſby, which were anſwered with alacrity, and the deſired expedition accompanied with other miſcellaneous obſervations, entirely to his Lordſhip's ſatisfaction.

The particulars of the mutual communication between our Author and Dr Gale, Dean of York, and his two ſons, eſpecially his ſon, Roger Gale, Eſq; are too numerous to inſert here (26), but frequently and gratefully acknowledged in the Ducatus Leodienſis. Our Author, ſpeaking of the Armitage family, and their chief ſeat called Kirklees, obſerves that it was of old a Benedictine nunnery. Near which the noted Robin Hood lies buried under a grave-ſtone, that yet remains near the Park, but the inſcription ſcarce legible (27). But he afterwards gives us, from the papers of Dr Gale, Dean of York, the following epitaph:

Hear undernead dis laitl ſtean
laiz robert earl of Huntingtun nea arcir ver az hiz ſa geud an pipl hauld im robin heud ſick utlawz az hi an iz men wil england nivr ſi agen.

(26) In the Index to the Ducatus Leod. are no leſs than forty-four references to this family.

(27) Ducatus Leod. p. 92.

Mr Thoreſby's correſpondence with Dr Hickes was alſo for ſome time very frequent. Among other things, the Doctor favoured him with his thoughts upon the inſcription of the abovementioned Runic medal. Concerning which he varies a little from Biſhop Nicolſon, rendering it, Thor Deus Populi, ſeu Thor Nationis Deus, vel Deus Patrius. Thor the God of the People, Nation, or Country. The reaſon whereof may be ſeen in Sir Andrew Fountaine's Diſſertatio Epiſtolaris to Thomas Earl of Pembroke, where it is very well engraved (29).

Mr. Thomas Hearne requeſted our Author's correſpondence, the favour of which he acknowledged often in print. For inſtance, in his edition of Livy's Roman hiſtory, Vol. 6, p. 181, for an inſcription relating to the ninth legion (30). Mr Hearne alſo publiſhed a letter of Mr Thoreſby at the end of the firſt volume of Leland's Itinerary, concerning ſome antiquities found in Yorkſhire, with a diſcourſe of his own upon them (31). And to his Sylloge Epiſtolarum a variis Angliæ Principibus ſcriptarum, at the end of Titi Livii Foro Julienſis Vita Henrici Quinti, he has ſubjoined Auctarium Epiſtolarum ex Autographis in Muſeo Thoreſbeiano (*). This celebrated Antiquary publiſhed likewiſe a letter of Mr Thoreſby's to Dr Richardſon of North Bierly in Yorkſhire, giving an account of the hoſpital of St Mary Magdalen at Bautre, in the Weſt riding of Yorkſhire (32). Mr Strype thought himſelf obliged to our Author for communicating ſome original letters in his collection (33). Mr Ray, among other things, received from our Author a collection of Local words (34), with which he promiſed to enrich the next edition of that book, if there ſhould be a call for another. Biſhop Kennet, in his correſpondence with our Author, thankfully acknowledges the receipt of ſome accounts of benefactions, &c. from him. Beſides theſe perſons mentioned above, Mr Thoreſby imparted to Dr Edmund Calamy memoirs of ſeveral Northern Divines for his abridgment of Baxter's life and times, as he did alſo of ſome of the worthy Royaliſts to Mr Walker for his Sufferings of the Clergy, which was publiſhed as an antidote to Dr Calamy's book: eſteeming good men of all parties worthy to have their names and characters tranſmitted to poſterity.

[E] The Archbiſhop deſired his opinion of ſome particular coins, &c.] His Grace had begun a moſt uſeful work, of collecting the endowments and benefactions belonging to the churches and chapels in his extenſive dioceſe, and deſired Mr Thoreſby to give him an account of what things had been done of that kind in the pariſh of Leedes. A more agreeable taſk could not have been enjoined him; and from the commiſſions of pious uſes, and other manuſcripts, he returned ſo ample and ſatisfactory an hiſtory, that he not only received his Grace's thanks for it, but the thanks alſo of his ſucceſſor, Sir William Dawes.

[F] His acquaintance, already large, kept ſpreading.] It would be injurious to the memory of Mr Thoreſby, in whoſe compoſition gratitude was a moſt rich and lovely ingredient, to omit mentioning, among his principal friends, his obligations to Mr Boulter, of Gawthorp-hall, a gentleman of ample fortune, and as great munificence; a conſiderable patron of learning and learned men; the nobleſt benefactor to his Muſæum, and for whom he drew up the antiquities of his ſeat and pariſh of Harwood. To Mr Boulter muſt be added that noble benefactreſs, Lady Elizabeth Haſtings, to whom he was indebted for many acts of favour and reſpect. And to his friends among the Antiquaries muſt be ſubjoined Dr Benjamin Longwith, firſt Fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge, and afterwards Rector of Petworth in Suſſex, and Mr Smith, Rector of Melſonby in Yorkſhire. To the former of whom Mr Thoreſby's collection was helpful in ſettling the true ſtandard of the Roman ounce (35) by a very curious Denarius, deſcribed in a treatiſe written by the latter (36), for the uſe of which, among the reſt of his Roman coins, it had been furniſhed by our Author. In general, Mr Thoreſby was well reſpected by the clergy and gentry of his town and neighbourhood, who had any taſte for learning or regard for piety. But it is in particular due to the memory of Mr John Lucas, to acknowledge how kind, affectionate, and ſerviceable a friend he was to our Author and his family, as well after as before his death, for many years; and though his buſineſs was teaching young people to read and write, yet he was a good maſter of the learned languages, was an excellent hiſtorian, and left behind him, in writing, many good collections, and eſpecially a large folio hiſtory of Warton (where he was born), and parts adjacent in the county of Lancaſter, which, by interſperſing a great variety of obſervations, eccleſiaſtical, civil, and natural, he has rendered a uſeful work (37). Moreover, Mr Thoreſby's ſkill in heraldry and genealogy rendered him a very ſerviceable correſpondent to Mr Arthur Collins in his Peerage of England, and an acceptable one to the principal perſons of the college of arms at London, eſpecially Mr Anſtis, Garter Principal King at Arms, Mr Le Neve Norroy, Mr Dale, and others. His judicious ſkill in coins and medals procured him a hearty welcome to the cabinets of other Virtuoſos in that way, particularly to that of the famous Earl of Pembroke, who regarded him with an extraordinary condeſcenſion and affectionate familiarity, and his knowledge in coins was greatly improved by the Earl's curious collection.

out of the felicity of his diſpoſition. He was not more diligent to encreaſe his learned treaſure, than communicative of it to others. It would be almoſt endleſs to enumerate the aſſiſtances which Mr Thoreſby gave, in one way or other, to the works of the learned. By theſe kindneſſes, ſweetened with the eaſineſs of acceſs to his own Cabinet, he always found the like eaſy acceſs to thoſe of other Virtuoſoes, which gave him frequent opportunities of enlarging his collection far beyond what could have been expected from a private perſon, not wealthy. And perhaps no private gentleman, beſide himſelf, had ſo general, and ſo reſpectable an acquaintance among perſons of the firſt reputation in the literary republic (b). This, as it did him great honour, ſo was it a mighty ſupport to him under the ſeveral vexations, and ſome great loſſes, which he met with in the courſe of his life. Among other Virtuoſoes, he commenced an early friendſhip with the celebrated Naturaliſt, Dr Martin Liſter. It was to this friend, that he ſent an account of ſome Roman antiquities he had diſcovered in Yorkſhire, which being communicated by him, and Dr Gale, Dean of York, to the Royal Society (i), obtained our Author a Fellowſhip of that learned body, into which he was unanimouſly choſen at their anniverſary meeting on St Andrew's day, 1697; and the great number of his papers, which appear in their Tranſactions, ſhew how deſerving he was of that honour [G]. At the ſame time, this connexion was of uſe, by enlarging the number of his friends, and gave riſe to his correſpondence with Sir Hans Sloane, Mr Evelyn, Mr Chamberlayne, and others. He was likewiſe well known to, and reſpected by, Mr Folkes (k), Dr Woodward, Dr Mead, Dr Stukeley, and many of thoſe Gentlemen who were afterwards incorporated by the title of The Society of Antiquaries. He had, of a long time, formed a deſign of doing honour to his native town and its environs, by writing the hiſtory thereof, and with this view had accumulated a vaſt quantity of materials for the work, which came out under the title of Ducatus Leodienſis: or, the Topography of Leedes, and Parts adjacent (l). In this piece, he frequently refers to the hiſtorical part intended for giving a view of the ſtate of the northern parts of the kingdom, during the dark, and more remote ages of the Britons and Romans; and of the alterations afterwards made by the Saxons, Danes, and Normans; and he proceeded ſo far, as to bring his narration, in a fair copy, nearly to the end of the ſixth Century, illuſtrating and confirming his hiſtory by his coins [H]. The reaſon of his leaving off there, may be eaſily conjectured from his advancement

(b) Out of regard to the memory of Mr Thoreſby's modeſty, we forbear to enumerate the many Nobility and Gentry, both of our own country, and foreigners, who viſited his Muſæum, and honoured his Album with their names and mottoes.

(k) This Gentleman, in the catalogue of his own collection of coins, occaſionally mentions ſeveral of our Author's, and particularly extols one as a great curioſity, that obſidional piece, which was coined by the Governor of Pontefract for the King, after the death of Charles I, and has this inſcription round the Caſtle, Carolus Secundus, 1648; and on the reverſe, a Crown with C. R. Dum Spiro, Spero; being the firſt monier that bore the name of Charles II.

(i) He was recommended by them for a candidate.

Leod. in 1714. There is an account of both in Phil. Tranſ. No. 344.

[G] The great number of his papers in the Phil. Tranſ.] The following is a complete liſt of them: No. 222, 231, 234, 241, 244, 249, 256, 264, 277, 279, 282, 289, 291, 296, 297, 303, 304, 305, 306, 310, 316, 319, 320, 322, 331, 335, 336, 344, 372, and 377. They relate chiefly to Roman and Saxon monuments of antiquity in the North of England, with notes upon them, and the inſcriptions of coins, &c. The reſt containing accounts of uncommon accidents, &c.

[H] His Manuſcript was left unfiniſhed.] This curious piece, which conſiſts of thirty-three pages in quarto, being communicated by the preſent poſſeſſor, was carefully peruſed, and being found well prepared for the preſs as far as it extends, and very worthy of the public acceptance, we have obtained his conſent to inſert it here, in hopes that it may excite ſome able hand to carry it on and compleat the noble deſign of its Author in it. In the firſt leaf is this paſſage, apparently deſigned for a motto in the title-page.

Poli Synopſis Critic. in locum.

Hiſtorical part of the Ducatus Leodienſis.

Though my deſign be chiefly to collect the memoirs of perſons eminent for learning and piety, beneficence and valour, who have adorned theſe Northern parts in later ages, wherein we have the advantage of more certain and expreſs authorities, yet I ſhall endeavour to give a view of the ſtate thereof, during the darker and more remote ages of the Britons and Romans, together with the Saxons, Danes, and Normans, only reſolving to be more ſhort where poſitive authorities cannot be had, as none are to be expected in parochial affairs during the firſt epocha.

For though Jeffery of Monmouth and his followers boaſt not only of twenty-eight cities, but of twenty-five flamins and three arch-flamins in thoſe cities, in whoſe places King Lucius, upon the converſion of the nation, appointed the like number of biſhops and archbiſhops; yet it is evident from Cæſar, that, though the Britons were populous, yet their habitations were like thoſe in Gallia (1), woods fortified with ditches and rampires. Nay, the very learned Biſhop Stillingfleet argues, that Cæſar takes not a city for a place, but for a people under one government, and that civitas is not once uſed by him in any other ſenſe (2). This was reſented ſo heinouſly by the Cambro-Britanni, that the learned Mr James Owen writ an anſwer thereto, ſtiled Vindiciæ Britannicæ, which he favoured me with a ſight of in manuſcript. And upon the whole I am of opinion, that, tho' the cities had their improvement from the Romans, yet their original, even as cities, were from the Britons.

Amongſt the twenty-eight cities, which are expreſsly mentioned by Nennius, a Britiſh hiſtorian, who flouriſhed eleven hundred years ago, is Caer-Loidcoit or Caer-Luyt-coit, as Archbiſhop Uſher found it writ in ſome of the ancient manuſcripts (3), of which he had the opportunity of conſulting nine. Geoffrey indeed writes it Lindcoit, and applies it to Lincoln. But the learned Dr Gale, who firſt publiſhed Nennius, in his emendations of that ancient hiſtorian, thinks it rather applicable to Leedes, [Leedes in Elmeto (4)] and adds further in a letter to myſelf, it might be your town, but by no means Lincoln. There are two reaſons that, in my opinion, do abundantly confirm the learned Dean's opinion, that it is rather to be applied to Leedes than Lincoln. 1. The name of the place itſelf, Caer-Loidcoit; now Coit, ſignifies wood, and, being taken appellatively, what reference can the monoſyllable Loid or Luit (and it is never writ Lind by any of the ancient hiſtorians) have to Lincoln, but it manifeſtly has to Leedes, or Loidis, as it is called by Bede, and King Alfred in his Saxon verſion of that venerable Author (5). So that Caer-Loidcoit ſignifies, in our modern dialect, the city of Loid in the wood. 2. The circumſtances of the actions, wherein the place is mentioned, which I believe any one, who impartially conſiders them, will acknowledge do more genuinely ſuit this than that city. The Britons having driven the Saxons out of Lincolnſhire northward, we find mention of Caer-Loidcoit as a place further north than Lincoln; and ſo Caer Coit Celedon, which in the Britiſh tongue ſignifies Haſſels, now both Haſſelwood, and Bede's Sylva Elmetæ being in this tract, it might well be ſtiled Loid in the wood. I would not herein argue as a party man, ſuch being apt ſometimes to force an argument where it comes not in voluntarily, and as an evidence do freely relinquiſh what a learned Author hath lately granted concerning the rencounter, anno 1091, betwixt the two Kings of England and Scotland, which he ſays was in the province of Leedes in Yorkſhire; becauſe in truth (which is always to be preferred) it was Lothian in Scotland.

As to the ſignification of the Britiſh name Loid or Luyt, Mr Owen beforementioned writes to me that 'it 'ſignifies Grey, and is a famous name amongſt the Bri-'tons to this day (as Gray amongſt the Engliſh). One 'of advancement in years; he therefore contented himself with committing to the press, his Vicaria Leodiensis: or, the History of the Church of Leedes, &c. which was published at London

' of them I know, says he (6), to be the eldest house ' descending from the British Kings; and adds, most ' of the families of eminency in that his native country ' were in those ages deduced from colours. When it is ' writ Lind, it is a corruption of Luyt or Llwyd, which ' is the original word; but, because Ll cannot be well ' pronounced by the English, Fl, being something near ' it in sound, is substituted in its place, and corruptly ' writ Floyd or Loid or Lud. It is certain that Coit or ' Coet signifieth a wood in British, and Kaer a city, and ' it might be called Caer-Lud or Loidcoit [the city of Lud, ' or Lud in the wood] to distinguish it from another ' Caer-Lud, or London: both so called from some great ' man or men, who built the cities that bear their names, ' corruptly Lud or Loid, but more regularly Llwyd.' To what my deceased friend has writ let me add, that a place in this town is called Lid-gate to this day, the same which, in some ancient charts belonging to the Lords of this manor, is called the Tower-hill, from some such fabrick built there in former ages, as is probable not only from its situation in the highest part of the town, but from some very large stones, and foundations of such a building, at a considerable depth below those of the late houses (7); but whether of British antiquity, from Tûr a pile, L. Turris (8), or later ages, will be hard to determine at this distance of time.

My Lord Almoner obliged me with a curious remark, which cannot be better expressed than in his Lordship's own words, where, having spoken of the Saxon etymology, from Leod populus, (which was my first thoughts) he adds, verum altius (puto) quærenda est origo vocis. Britannicum LLWYD *(inter alia ejus significata) statum denotat rebus undique prosperis amœnum. (9) Epist. D. D. W. Nicolson, Episc. Carliol. Dec. 8, 1694.

I have formerly observed (10), that, though the names of the towns and villages in these parts, being of later erection, are generally Saxon, as Hunsworth, Holbec, Fennley, &c. yet the rivers and the woods, into which the natives retired, retain the British names. As to Are, the learned Clarencieux has long since informed us (11), that it is deduced from the British word Ara, which signifies slow, easy, as Araris (Saone) in France, and is very suitably applied to the calm and smooth course of this river Are; whereas the very next river, Wherfe, is swift and violent, fretful and angry, as the same historian expresseth it, which he inclines therefore to deduce from the British Guer, swift, the Roman Verbeia; for, as the industrious Mr Lhuyd truly observes (12), Gu is common to the Britons, with the French, Spaniards, and Italians, and that the Romans began such words with an V consonant. But we need not go five miles for another instance; there is a nameless water near the town of Leedes, which is of British original from Dour, water, whence the bridge over it is called Dow-brig, for Dour-bridge, as Dow-gate at London for Dour-gate. For an example of woods we have Cat-Beeston in this parish, which, in the language of those ages, signifies the Woody Beeston, from Coit Sylva, as the vale of Catmore (13), or the Woody field or ground. I was at a loss for the Etymon of Cad-Beeston, as it is sometimes called in ancient writings, till Mr Owen informed me, that Coed as well as Coit doth in the British signify a Wood. Archæologia Britannica, since published, has also Koed Sylva, p. 160. So also the saltus, or Sylva Andred, was by the Britons called Coid-Andred. (14). I shall only give one instance more that relates to those times, and it is Bardsey by Rigton near Harewood, which seems to be denominated by the ancient Bards, the historians and poets of those ages when the ancient festivals were little esteemed without the Carmina Bardi chanted to the harp. It is said King Arthur's sepulture at Glastonbury was discovered by one of their historical ballads, and it is certain that Mr Neile, the late Bishop Hopkins's steward, found some gold by a particular description of the place given in another of them (15).

While the government of the Britons lasted, the Brigantes, a people stout and numerous, possessed not these parts only, but almost the whole tract between the east and west sea, containing Yorkshire, Lancashire, Westmoreland, Cumberland, and the Bishoprick of Durham, as Sir Henry Savile enumerates them in his Edition of Julius Agricola's Life by Tacitus. These struggled hard with the Romans to maintain their ancient freedom, which brings me to the next Dynastic.

The Brigantes.

That Julius Cæsar made an expedition into Britain fifty-five years before the incarnation of the blessed Jesus, is evident beyond contradiction, but must be omitted here, because he never penetrated thus far. Augustus was not ambitious of extending the bounds of the Empire. Tiberius followed his example. Caligula indeed, sollicited by Admimus (Cunobaline's son) made a ridiculous expedition, of which nothing remains, but the ruins of a Pharus upon the coast of Holland, and called there Britenbuis. But Claudius, in the third year of his reign, ann. Dom. 44, came in person, and having taken Camelodunum, the King's seat, reduced the fourth part of Britain into the form of a province, which gave a mighty turn to affairs here, where he was four times saluted emperor, and upon his return to Rome, had a glorious triumph, and to perpetuate the memory thereof, called his son Britannicus. London, that noble Emporium, was built in his time, saith the learned Bishop Stillingfleet (16). Aulus Plautius was the first Legatus, or Proprætor; for those provinces that were under the immediate care of the Emperor (as Britain was) had a Governor in chief over the whole province sent among them, whose title commonly was Legatus Aug. Proprætor Prov. who had his chief residence in the Metropolis. He had power of life and death, which the Procurator Cæsaris had not, except in smaller provinces (as Pilate in Judæa, under the President of Syria.) As the capital causes belonged to the Legatus, so those of the Exchequer belonged to Cæsar's Procurator; whence the Britons complain in Tacitus, that whereas, before they had one King of their own, they had now two put upon them, the Legate, who disposed of their blood, and the Procurator of their estates.

The Roman invasion.

(16) The Antiq. of London, P. 535.

Claudius was the first of all the Romans, who made an attempt upon our Brigantes, and that these very parts were full of men and actions in those times, is evident from the plentiful remains of that nation, which are yet to be met with. Of these, none can be more remarkable, than the great military road upon Bramham-moor; Leland himself confessing, "I never saw yn any parte of England so manyfest a token as heere, of the large high crest of the waie of Watelyng streate, made yn hand, as I found it in a transcript of his Itinerary for Lancashire and Yorkshire, lent me by his Grace, the late excellent Archbishop Sharp, with liberty to transcribe both, which I gladly undertook: but the whole Itinerary is since most accurately printed, in nine volumes, with many learned and curious additions by my kind friend, the ingenious and industrious Mr Thomas Hearne, at Oxford. In the sixth volume of which, is published a most judicious account of the four great Roman ways. I formerly intimated (17), that I supposed it to be the performance of the very learned Roger Gale, Esq; and can now assure the Reader that it is so. By which essay it is manifest, that those Authors who called this way Watling-street, are mistaken, and that it is the Erming-street, the course whereof through these parts, I shall give in his own words.

Erming-street.

' As soon as you are out of Doncaster, it rises with a ' high bank, and carries you to Adwick in the Street, ' and is again visible a little to the west of the Park by ' Pontfract. Thence it crosses the Are at Castleford, ' and goes by Ollerton and Ledston to Aberford, and ap' pears on several places of Bramham-moor. It is cut ' by the river Wherfe, at St Helensford, a little below ' Wetherby, but the Agger shews itself again immediately ' on the north side of it, and proceeds in a direct line ' to Aldborough. It is frequently visible in the way ' thither; but is not the great road now generally used, ' which lies to the west of it; nevertheless it is well ' enough known in those parts by the name of the ' Road-gate, or Road-way. Near Burrowbridge it passed ' the Eure, and a mile north from that river you have ' it again, as soon as you are out of Kirby-hill, from ' whence it scarce ever disappears for near twenty miles ' together, having been paved, as is still evident. From ' this place to Catterick, in a straight line, and about ' fourteen miles of it being hedged in on both sides, ' is now called Leeming-lane, from a town of that name ' standing upon it, and the High-street.' Besides this grand road, there were several Viæ Vicinales from one station to another, particularly one from the great Consular-way upon Bramham-moor, by Thorner and Shadwel, through Street-lane in this parish (so called from the Roman Stratum) by Haw-Caster-rig (so denominated from their Castrum) to Adle-moor, where the the veſtigia of a Roman town were diſcovered, ann. 1702. Some funeral monuments, and other antiquities diſcovered there, are now depoſited in this Muſæum by the kindneſs of Cyril Arthington, Eſq; F. R. S. Lord of the Manor (18); thence through the grounds of Thomas Kirk, Eſq; F. R. S. (an ingenious virtuoſo, ſince deceaſed) at Cookridge, over the moors to Ilkly, a known Roman ſtation. Another of theſe Viæ Minores, (though theſe alſo were large and publick, compared with the more private Agrarian ways) brancheth from another part of the ſaid Erming-ſtreet to Berwick in Elmet, where the great Agger, that Camden ſuppoſeth to have been the walls of the town, when the Saxon Kings reſided there, ſeems to have been a Roman work, and particularly raiſed by the Vandals (and from them called Wendal-hill) of whoſe expedition into theſe parts more anon. Thence over Whitkirk-moor by Thorp Stapleton (19) to Leedes; where this very year, 1717, in digging for clay for re-edifying a new Vicarage-houſe, the labourers found a paved cauſeway, a yard below the preſent ſurface of the ground; it was twelve feet in breadth, for this part, being low and moiſt in thoſe ages, was ſet with ſtones, as is another (juſt as broad) in the pariſh of Bringley, lately diſcovered by the learned Dr Richardſon, which doubtleſs, as he ſays, was a Roman way (20). Upon the aſcent of the hill, on the other ſide of the rivulet here called Sheeps-car-beck, are the remains of a large camp, the Agger, conſidering its nearneſs to the town, and the interpoſition of ſo many ages, is very great; this, from the ſingle Vallum, and the convenience of water (a thing the Romans always made ſure of,) may, I think, be ſafely pronounced one of the many camps they had in theſe parts. At the head of the very ſame beck, is another of them, which being upon the moors, and four miles diſtant from hence, is intire to this day. It is near the Roman town upon Adle-moor, before mentioned. This camp at Leedes retains ſomewhat of the Vallum in its preſent name, Walſtat; for it is plain from all Authors who write upon that ſubject, that the Romans pronounced V conſonant as we do W, and Caſaubon (21) particularly inſtanceth in Wall, Vallum; the termination ſignifies Area, a plat of ground; Area-belli, Barle-ground. Mr Gale, in his curious treatiſe before mentioned (22), ſuppoſeth Walm-gate in York, ſo denominated from its leading to the Vallum of that City.

That theſe parts were in thoſe ages of the world full of men and money, may be argued from the great quantities of Roman coins found here. I ſhall inſtance only in ſome diſcovered ſince Camden's time, that I may not actum agere. The Right Hon. the Lord Moleſworth, obliged me with an account of thoſe that, ann. 1705, were accidentally found near his ſeat at Edlington, by his own ſervant's ſtriking his pick-ax into an urn that contained about two gallons; upon further ſearch, another Theca Nummaria was diſcovered, full of the like money (23), of which his Lordſhip ſent me above a hundred: the probable reaſon of their concealment will be mentioned in the ſequel. Theſe are all of the Baſſe-Empire: but I have from other places, of an elder date, a Trajan from Peckfield; another Trajan, with a Severus, from Pontefract; a Geta formerly found at Caſtleford: but though plenty in old time, not one is to be met with now at the ſtation. Of thoſe found at Cookridge, ann. 1708, an account is already publiſhed, Phil. Tranſ. No. 316; they were moſtly of Domitian, Nerva, Trajan, and Hadrian, though I have a rare one of Vitellius, and another of Titus, from the ſame place; a Domitian from Tadcaſter, not that with CALCAPAVC, which Dr N. J. very inconſiderately got inſerted in a late noted book, as coined at Calcaria, or Tadcaſter: I have the original MS. which led him into the miſtake; for it is CAESAR. AVG. upon the coin itſelf. If it was really deſigned for the name of a place, it would have been upon the reverſe, as LON. for London in the later Emperors, but never round his head, with his name and titles. That many Roman coins were found at this ſtation, as alſo at York and Aldborough, is evident from Camden, ſo not to be repeated here; but the ingenious Dr Richardſon mentions (24) ſeveral places in this Weſt-riding, not taken notice of by any preceding Author; viz. at Sowerby near Halifax, at Hoveledge in the townſhip of Hipperholm, found in a thick glaſs veſſel, others were fallen from a precipice at Stainland, and ſome nigh Heaton in Burſtal pariſh; to which I ſhall only add thoſe diſcovered ann. 1695, upon the moors that bound in Yorkſhire, towards Burnley in Lancaſhire, of which Mr Charles Townley of Townley ſent me a ſcore, ſome of which being conſular, and none later than Nerva, argue that theſe places were frequented in thoſe more early times, when the Roman Empire was in its glory.

Under Claudius, before mentioned, Veſpaſian laid the foundation of his future glory here in Britain tricies cum hoſte conſixit, &c. (25), ſubduing two of the moſt potent nations; he fought the enemy thirty times, took above twenty towns, and ſubdued the Iſle of Wight. Here alſo Titus fought as a Tribune under his father. Oſtoſius Scapula ſucceeded A. Plautius as Proprætor in Britain, ann. Dom. 50, and behaved himſelf ſo fortunately, that Claudius was the twenty-firſt time ſaluted Emperor. He is ſaid to have ſubdued the Brigantes, whoſe Queen, Cartiſmandua delivered to the Romans Caraćtacus, the valiant King of the Silures, whom Tacitus (26) makes the greateſt glory of Claudius's triumph, in the year 52 (27); but, as Camden and Lipſius have noted, that is an Anticroniſma in that excellent author; for the Brigantes rather ſurrendered than were ſubdued; and Tacitus himſelf owns, that Oſtorius after this, having new conqueſts in his eye, was forced to return, becauſe of the mutinies among the Brigantes, who at beſt were very impatient of reſtraint, but at this juncture had an additional provocation; Venutius their King, being ſupplanted by Vellocatus his armour-bearer, whom Caſtimandua had married, was neceſſitated to war upon the Romans, becauſe they aſſiſted her and her paramour with their garriſons, wings, and cohorts; the Brigantes, taking part with the lawful huſband, under the conduct of Venutius, reduced the faithleſs Queen to the utmoſt extremity.

For theſe and other provocations, the Brigantes may be ſafely concluded to have made up a conſiderable part of the enraged Boadicea's army, with which ſhe ſlew ſeventy thouſand Romans and their confederates (28), ſacked Camelodunum, burnt London, deſtroyed Verulam, and cut off moſt of the ninth legion, which came to their reſcue under Petilius Cerealis, ſlaying the foot, and putting the horſe to flight. This was in the ſeventh year of Nero, an. Dom. 62. An. D. 62.

(28) Tacitus, Annals, XIV. 20.

So that, for any thing which appears to the contrary, the Brigantes were not ſubjugated till the reign of Veſpaſian, who, with the reſt of the world, recovered Britain alſo by his great captains and good ſoldiers. In the year 73 he ſent, as his Proprætor, into Britain, Petilius Cerealis, who, on Boadicea's revolt, neither fled into Gallia, as did Catus the Procurator, nor through cowardice diſobeyed the general's order, as the camp-maſter of the ſecond legion did, only was overpowered in the common calamity; but now ſtruck a terror into the Britons by invading, upon his firſt entry, the Brigantes, the moſt populous (to uſe the very words of that ancient hiſtorian) ſtate of the whole province. Many battles were fought, and ſome bloody, and the greateſt part of them either conquered or waſted (29). An. D. 73.

(29) Life of Agricola, by Tacitus, Edit. Savil. p. 191.

Where this victorious ninth legion reſided, or that it was ſtiled Victrix, we cannot learn from any of the ancient hiſtorians that have written about the Roman legions, who ſay nothing about this, but leave us quite in the dark; only from this paſſage in Tacitus it is concluded, that it muſt be ſomewhere in Britain. But both are now evident from two inſcriptions found of late years in the very ancient city of York, where it was certainly quartered: the former is a funeral monument for the ſtandard-bearer, which need not here be repeated, having been already thrice printed (30). It was diſcovered in Trinity-yard, and happily reſcued by my honoured friend, Dr Bryan Fairfax, from the bruiſh workmen, who had broken it in the middle, and were going to make uſe of it for two Throughs, as they call them, in the wall; but, by that worthy gentleman's directions, it was placed upright, with the inſcription, and his ſtatue in baſſe-relieve placed outwards, and was ſo juſtly valued by the proprietor of the place, that it was removed to his ſeat at Ribſton, where the very courteous Sir Henry Goodrick, Bart. ſhewed it me in his gardens. That this 9th legion was alſo ſtiled Victrix (perhaps for its victories over the ſtout Brigantes) is evident from a Roman brick, upon which is inſcribed LEG. IX. VIC. This was found by an ingenious artiſt, Mr Samuel Smith, the bell-founder, near the ſame place, in Micklegate, York, and is now in my poſſeſſion. By theſe and many other inſcriptions, and noble remains of the Roman glory, the great antiquity of that celebrated city is evident; and if we ſhould, with Biſhop Stillingfleet, caſt aſide the Britiſh hiſtory, yet theſe would ſhew it to have been eminent when Rome was in its flouriſhing ſtate; and there are yet more evident tokens of it's glory in Severus's reign; of which anon.

preſſed than in the words of our late excellent Primate (31). 'Of all the iſles of the Gentiles, if any 'one above the reſt hath felt the benign and gracious 'influences of the Lord's being our King, certainly 'ours is that iſland. How wonderfully bountiful has 'God been to us in a continued ſucceſſion of publick 'bleſſings, even from the firſt beginning of time that 'we have had any memorials of events among us? We 'had the happineſs to be early made a province of the 'Roman empire, and by that means were trained up 'to civility, and arts, and good manners. That made 'way for the greateſt bleſſing Heaven could beſtow 'upon us, even the receiving Chriſtianity: and that 'bleſſing we had with the moſt early, being the firſt 'among the Nations that embraced it. When, through 'the juſt judgment of God, barbariſm and ignorance 'overſpread the face of Europe, and by the occaſion there-'of ſuperſtition and idolatry made their way, and all 'the Weſtern kingdoms gave up their power to a foreign 'uſurper, even then this iſland made the longeſt ſtand; 'nay, and was never ſo perfectly ſubdued, but that Po-'pery was here a different thing from what it was in 'the Southern climates. When the happy time came, 'that God thought fit to ſet on foot the Reformation, 'having firſt made way for it by the reſtoring of learning, 'ſuch was his particular care of us, that this was one of 'the firſt kingdoms that was brought over to it.'

(31) Archbiſhop Sharp's Sermons, Vol. I. f. 450.

But I am tranſported beyond my preſent bounds, which concern only the firſt planting of Chriſtianity. That it was here very early, is acknowledged by all; but by whom firſt planted, is much controverted. Sanders the Jeſuit, and others, contend earneſtly for St Peter, that our engagement to the Roman church might become more viſible. Others plead for St James, Simon Zelotes, St Philip, and Ariſtobulus; but the tradition of Joſeph of Arimathea and his brethren coming to Glaſſenbury having met with better entertainment, the learned Biſhop Stillingfleet hath at large examined it (32), and ſhews how much more probable it is, that St Paul himſelf was the firſt founder of a church here (33), and evinceth that there was a Chriſtian church in Britain even in the Apoſtle's time, which he proveth from Theodoret, Clemens Romanus, and alſo from Euſebius, whoſe teſtimony is the more convincing, being not only a learned and inquiſitive perſon, but a favourite of Conſtantine, the firſt Chriſtian Emperor, and preſent at the council of Nice, whither Biſhops were ſummoned from all parts of the empire; and one who, deſigning an eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, had a particular curioſity to enquire into the original of all churches.

(32) Biſhop Stillingfleet's Origines Brit. p. 6.

(33) Idem, p. 39.

The two moſt noted converts to Chriſtianity in this age, were Pomponia Græcina, the wife of Aulus Plautius, the Roman Lieutenant in Britain (which put her in a capacity to be a happy inſtrument of propagating the Chriſtian faith in this country) and Claudia Ruffina, ſo much celebrated by Martial for her wit and beauty. She was certainly a Briton by birth, and wife of Pudens, a Roman Senator, and both rationally concluded to be the ſame perſons mentioned by St Paul (34) himſelf. The reſt of the kindred of this noble family, who were baptized with her, might be the occaſion of diſperſing Chriſtianity in the Britiſh nation, and were probably ſome of the Saints in Cæſar's houſhold mentioned by the ſame Apoſtle (35).

Petilius Cerealis before mentioned was ſucceeded by Julius Frontinus, and he by Cn. Julius Agricola, ann. Dom. 79, who, as he carried his conqueſts by ſea as well as land, to the utmoſt extent of Britain, the iſles of the Orcades, ſo, by a notable policy, he ſought to induce the natives by pleaſures to quietneſs and reſt, exhorting them in private, and aſſiſting them in publick, to build temples and houſes; and inſtructed the noblemen's ſons in the liberal ſciences, preferring the wits of the Britons before the ſtudents of France (36); ſo that they became curious to attain the eloquence of the Roman language, as well as their habit, ſumptuous buildings, and too ſoon even their luxuries.

Agricola, being recalled by Domitian, delivered up the province in a peaceable condition to his ſucceſſor, Salluſtius Lucullus, who had the hard fate to be put to death for no other cauſe but that, having deviſed certain ſpears or launces, he cauſed them to be called Lucullians. Much cannot be expected concerning theſe affairs in the ſhort reign of Nerva; but his ſucceſſor, Trajan, as he brought the empire to its utmoſt extent, power, and glory, ſo he is particularly famous for repairing the Roman ways here in Britain (37), which, being toilſome to the labourers therein, might perhaps be one occaſion of the revolt in his reign; for it was the general complaint of the natives, as Tacitus confeſſes, that the Romans put their hands and bodies to the drudgery of ridding out [clearing] woods and paving fens, with a great many ſtripes and indignities: and the Brigantes are eſpecially noted as impatient of ſervitude: inſomuch that Julius Severus, Hadrian's Lieutenant, being recalled upon an inſurrection in Judea, the Britons had certainly freed themſelves from the Roman yoke, had not the Emperor himſelf come in perſon, an. Dom. 123. But he reduced them, and built that noted wall, eighty miles in length, (not eight only as miſprinted in Speed) (38), between Tyne and Solway Frith.

In this revolt it is probable that Adellocum or Burgdunum, the Roman ſtation upon Adel-moor near Leedes, was burnt by the Brigantes in their zeal to retrieve their native freedom. As that ſtation flouriſhed during the height of the Roman glory, ſo that it was burnt, ſeems evident by the ſlag, or aduſt colour I obſerved in my ſurvey thereof; and that it was in this very revolt is probable, becauſe that, amongſt the Roman coins found in that neighbourhood, ſince the diſcovery of the veſtigia of that town and the monuments were firſt publiſhed in Phil. Tranſ. No. 282, there was not one of a later Emperor than Hadrian; not to repeat other reaſons, from the form of the letters, which are elſewhere aſſigned (39).

Upon this expedition of Hadrian, and his ſucceſs here, the ſenate ordered medals to be ſtruck, one of which is in this collection, and was probably found in theſe parts, being paid me in the fee-farm rents belonging to the Lords of the manor of Leedes; but the ſimple fellow had ſlipt away, fearing, it is likely, he ſhould have been obliged to exchange it. Upon it is the Emperor's head, inſcribed Trajanus Hadrianus Aug. . . . . . and upon the reverſe, Britain, or perhaps Rome triumphant upon this occaſion, ſitting upon a ſhield, with a ſpear in her right hand, Pont. Max. Tr. POT. COS. III. S. C. Exergue BRITANNIA, which is the more rare, becauſe it has eſcaped the induſtrious Occo.

The war broke out again in the reign of his ſucceſſor, Antoninus Pius, in the year 139; but Lollius Urbicus, his Lieutenant, repulſed the Barbarians, and repaired the wall. In the mean time, a new inſurrection was kindled amongſt the Brigantes (40), but quaſhed by the ſame Legate, who, for his ſucceſſes here, obtained the ſirname of Britannicus. He took away ſome part of their country from the Brigantes, becauſe they had made incurſions into Genounia, and recovered the former wall between the two Friths of Bodobria and Glotta (41), (now called Edinburgh and Dunbritton) that had been firſt built by Agricola, in Veſpaſian's time, and rebuilt the wall there, to ſecure it againſt the Picts.

Notwithſtanding the barbarous Britons were thus driven 100 miles Northward, for ſo much is the diſtance between the walls of Hadrian and Antoninus; yet the old grudge at the Roman oppreſſion, made them revolt again with ſo much violence, in the beginning of Antoninus Philoſophus's reign, that Calphurnius Agricola was ſent againſt them with freſh ſupplies, amongſt which was Helvius Pertinax, afterwards Emperor. The very name of Agricola reminding them of their former overthrows, ſtruck ſuch a terror into the Britons, that we read of no diſturbance here till the time of Commodus. But there is a matter of greater concernment, not to be omitted in this interval. Though Chriſtianity was planted here, as is before mentioned, very early; yet was there not a crowned head that ever embraced the true faith till the reign of Antoninus Pius, under whom flouriſhed Lucius, ultimus in Britannia regum Paganorum & primus Chriſtianorum, to uſe the words of our countryman Alured of Beverly, lately publiſhed with notes by the moſt induſtrious Mr Hearne (44). There are diſputes about the preciſe year, and other circumſtances of his reign; but that there was ſuch a one, and that he was alſo the firſt Chriſtian King in the world, is owned by all, and fully evinced by the incomparable Archbiſhop Uſher (45), and acknowledged by the learned Biſhop Stillingfleet (46). In the reign of Commodus, there was nothing but wars and ſeditions throughout Britain: for the barbarous Britains having got over the Wall, waſted the country, and cut off the Roman General. So that Ulpius Marcellus was ſent againſt them, who ſucceeded ſo well, that the jealous Emperor envied and recalled him, aſſuming to himſelf the title of Britannicus, as he is ſtiled in ſeveral of his coins in this Muſæum; upon one of which is Victory with laurel in the right, and a palm in the left hand (50). After this, weaker Commanders were ſent hither by his favourite Perennius, who not only had a deſign to uſurp the Empire, but, as Herodian tells us) had actually coined monies with his own image. Theſe brought all into confuſion, inſomuch that 1500 ſoldiers went to complain at Rome; whereupon Perennius was beheaded, and Helv. Pertinax was again ſent into Britain. He quieted theſe broils, but not without great danger, being himſelf almoſt ſlain in appeaſing them. He ſucceeded Commodus in the Empire, but reigned only eighty-ſeven days, which was more by twenty-one than his ſucceſſor, Didius Julianus, who purchaſed the Empire, quod tunc primum venale fuit. For the coins of theſe ſhort-lived Emperors, ſee the Catalogue (51): as alſo of Clodius Albinus, who refuſing to reſign his government in Britain, which had been committed to him by Pertinax, was at firſt flattered by Severus with the title of Cæſar, till he had defeated Peſc. Niger (52), and then overcome in battle at Lyons (53) in Gaul, whither Albinus had drawn the flower of his Britiſh army; and when they fought ſo ſtoutly, that Severus threw off his purple, and was put to the rout, with his whole army, except Lætus, who hearing that Severus was ſlain, renewed the battle, with his own men that were freſh and untouched, in expectation of attaining the Empire to himſelf: Severus ſeeing this, rallied his men, reſumed his purple, purſued eagerly, ſlew Albinus, and became ſole Emperor of the world. Hereupon he ſent into Britain, as Proprætor, Virius Lupus, who not only reſided in theſe parts, but, as appears by an inſcription found at Ilkley, in this Weſt-riding, re-edified that place (54). He ſtrengthened the northern parts of the province with many ſtrong caſtles, reſtoring ſeveral places that had been ruined, either by fire, or the fury of the borderers, particularly the bath at Lavatris, or Lavatra, now Bowes, under Stainmoor in Richmondſhire, which having been burnt, he reſtored for the uſe of the firſt cohort of the Thracians, which was quartered there, as appears by an Altar dedicated Deæ Fortunæ: the name of Lavatris, or Lavatrā, but by no means Lavat. Ror (as miſprinted in Speed, p. 140.) may be deduced from Lavacrum, which the learned Roger Gale, Eſq; in his accurate edition of the Itinerary, p. 41, proves from Eutropius to be uſed for a bath by the Romans in thoſe ages.

But at laſt Virius Lupus was ſo overpowered by the Britons, that he was forced to ſend to Rome for freſh ſupplies. This ſo affected Severus, that though aged and gouty, he undertook the journey in perſon, and arriving ſafe, he left his ſon Geta at York to govern the civilized Britons, and marched to reduce the northern Britons and Caledonians, taking his other ſon, Caracalla, along with him. In this expedition he, with exceeding bravery, encountered great difficulties from the ambuſcades of the enemy, who retiring into woods, ſallied thence, intercepting their proviſions, deſtroying their carriages, killing their allies, and paſſengers, and diſturbing their garriſons, that he was conſtrained, with incredible labour, to deſtroy their woods, drain meers, &c. wherein he loſt fifty thouſand men. Whether the moſſes in this pariſh (55) were occaſioned by this, or rather ſome preceding actions, cannot be poſitively aſcertained; but that the woods there were deſtroyed (more Romano) by fire and axe, is evident from the burnt wood found in the turf-pits, and the marks upon others of the very tools that cut down the remainder. His vigorous proſecution forced the enemy to a peace, and the delivery of a conſiderable part of their country, with all their arms and weapons. And for the better ſecurity, he built a famous wall of ſtone thirty-two (56) miles in length, from ſea to ſea, upon Adrian's frontier, anſwerable to the grandeur of the Roman Empire, with a tower at the end of each mile, and pipes of braſs in the wall (57) from tower to tower, which ſpeedily conveyed the news of any approach of the enemy over all the borders. Nennius, the ancient Britiſh Hiſtorian (58), with Speed and others of the moderns, make this wall to be 132 miles in length, but the Scala Mundi (a rare MS in this Muſæum) hath it expreſsly thirty-two. Noviſſimum bellum in Britannia habuit, et ut Provincias adquiſitas omni ſecuritate muniret; vallum per xxxii°. miliaria a mari uſque ad mare perduxit (59), which agrees with the beſt editions of Eutropius, and other Roman Authors. Upon theſe ſucceſſes, he aſſumed the title of Britannicus Maximus, and is ſtiled Fundator Pacis upon a medal in my collection, which is juſtly aſcribed to theſe tranſactions in Britain (60), though by ſome to his conqueſts in the Eaſt: upon another (61), which was found at Pontefract in this neighbourhood, he is inſcribed SEVERVS PIVS AVG. BRIT. reverſe, P. M. TR. P. XVIII. COS. III. P. P. (which was ann. Dom. 211.) This has upon it Jupiter cum puerulis; another hath Mars ſiniſtra haſtam. After his ſucceſſes in the North, he retired to York, which ſeems then to have been in its chiefeſt glory. Severus had here his Royal Palace, which was honoured with his conſtant reſidence, with his Empreſs and two ſons: and here that oracle of the law, Æmilius Paulus Papirianus, happily adminiſtered juſtice. Bellona, the ſiſter and companion of Mars, had here alſo a temple, by the ſame token that Severus, through the Augur's miſtake, was conducted thereto.

It makes not the leaſt for the fame and glory of York, that this maſter of the world, Severus, one deſervedly equalled with the greateſt Martialiſts of any age, not only had his palace and reſidence here, but alſo here breathed his laſt, not ſlain by Fulgentius (as the Britiſh hiſtory affirms) but rather worn out with age and travail, and partly with grief for the irreclaimable conduct of his ſon Caracalla, who with his own hands had made two attempts upon his life: which Caracalla, being his ſon by Martia a Britiſh lady, was favoured by the Britons, and declared Emperor by the ſoldiers; the other ſon Geta, his mother was of Rome (62). His dying ſpeeches are memorable, and full of brave ſpirit. I have been all that a man can be, but it is of no uſe to me now. The empire was declining and languiſhing in all parts when I received it, yet I leave it in peace even to the Britons, firm and laſting to my ſons if they prove good, if otherwiſe, feeble and ſinking; and calling for his urn, wherein his aſhes were to be incloſed: Little Urn, ſaid he, thou ſhalt now contain what the whole world could not before. His corpſe was carried out in a military manner to a place near Akeham, which is called Severs-hill to this day, and there committed to the flames. Victor, in his account of this matter, calls York (which is known by all to be a colony) a municipium (63), or free city, which (if the terms be not promiſcuouſly uſed by the Roman authors) ſhews ſomewhat of the old ſpirit of the Bigentes, the inhabitants having a greater value for their own municipal laws than all the other privileges of Rome.

After Severus there is no expreſs mention of Eboracum for about a hundred years; only that the ſixth legion continued their abode there. It is true, that Caracalla is ſaid to be ſlain by Carauſius, an obſcure Briton (64), and it is probable he might receive ſome wounds in the wars here which might occaſion that error; but from the Roman hiſtory it is certain, that, as he had ſlain his brother Geta, he met with the ſame fate from Macrinus, who, ſucceeding him in the empire, aſſociated his ſon Diadumenianus, but both were ſlain after a ſhort reign of fourteen months and three days, for whoſe coins ſee the Catalogue, p. 309 and 627. Heliogabalus,

An. D. 220. Heliogabalus, the ſucceſſor of Macrinus, exceeding all his predeceſſors in wickedneſs, it is the leſs wonder we have no memorial of his tranſactions in theſe parts of the world, further than that his boundleſs prodigality conſumed all the revenues of Britain, Gaul, Italy, Spain, Germany, Dacia, Illyrium, Greece, Africk, Aſia, Syria, Egypt, and Arabia, with thoſe of other provinces and iſlands. Of his medals, upon ſome of which he is ſtiled SACERDos DEI SOLIS ELAGABALUS, and repreſented as ſacrificing to his God, the Sun, ſee the Catalogue (65), and a learned Diſſertation upon the curious writing of his name in Selden de DIS SYRIS (66), wherein he mentions alſo (as proceeding from the ſame original Bel or Baal) the Britiſh deity Belatucadrus, which was adored in theſe Northern parts of Britain. Camden mentions one altar dedicated to this topical God, and Selden another, to which may be added a third, found in the river Irdin, not far from Scaleby, communicated to me by the ingenious Dr Jabez Cay, of Newcaſtle upon Tyne; there is a rough draught of it in the additions to the Britannia (67), which is to be read thus, Deo Sancto Belatucadro Aulus Decius Camillinus vovit ſacravit. By which we ſee the Romans of later ages had the ſame notions that the Aſſyrians had in the former, who, having led away captive the ten tribes, deſired the prieſts of Iſrael to teach their Aſſyrian colony the manner of the God of the land. Beſides thoſe of Baſſianus, with ſummus ſacerdos, &c. here are thoſe of his wives, Julia Cornelia Paula, and Julia Aquilia Severa (once a veſtal virgin) with Julia Mæſa his grandmother; to which the learned Dr Ben. Languith, Chaplain to his Grace the Duke of Somerſet, added a very rare medal of Julia Socennias's, his unhappy mother, who not only ruined her ſon by the moſt infamous laſciviouſneſs, but endeavoured by all means to deſtroy her ſiſter's ſon, Alexander Severus, who, notwithſtanding all her malice, ſucceeded him in the empire. This repairer of the almoſt ruined Commonwealth was baſely murthered, though not in Britain (as ſome pretend) (68), but in Gaul (as the judicious Camden (69) has it) at the inſtigation of the gigantic Maximinus, who, with his ſon Maximus, had the like fate two years after.

This Emperor being taken priſoner by Sapor King of Perſia, was by that ſavage monarch made his footſtool, whenever he was diſpoſed to take horſe; a juſt puniſhment for his moſt barbarous perſecution of the Chriſtians. Heaven and earth ſeemed to threaten the ruin of the Roman empire, Gallienus his ſon's reign being the moſt confuſed and calamitous of all that were before him, not only by the invaſion of the barbarous nations, but by its own inteſtine diviſions: the ſoldiers, in all parts, electing their own generals, advanced no leſs than thirty at once, who aſſumed the title of Emperors, but are generally recorded by the name of the thirty tyrants.

And now we have too much of the Britiſh affairs; for Poſthumus, Victorinus, Marius, and Tetricus, both father and ſon, uſurped and reigned here, as appears both by the Roman hiſtorians, and the great quantity of their monies found in Yorkſhire, and elſewhere in Britain. Poſthumus, the moſt illuſtrious of all the thirty, was called the Gallick Hercules: I have a medal of his, with a galley upon it, inſcribed LÆTITIA AUG. which an author, curious enough in theſe matters, takes to relate particularly to Britain for ſome naval victory (70). He aſſociated Victorinus, an excellent commander; but he was ſlain, together with his ſon L Aurelius Victorinus: whereupon his mother Victoria, or Victorina, who for her maſculine courage was ſtiled mother of armies (and is ſuppoſed to be deſigned by VICTORIA upon the reverſe of ſome of his medals) to ſupport herſelf, procured Tetricus, a Senator of Rome, who had a command in Gaul, to proclaim himſelf Emperor, and to make his ſon, C. Piveſus Tetricus, his Cæſar: of all whoſe monies found in theſe parts, ſee the Catalogue (71). As alſo for Marius, who ſome ſay was born in Britain; he was originally a ſmith, and, after a ſhort reign of three, or, as others ſay, ſeven, days, was ſlain by a ſword of his own making, having firſt obtained a victory in Britain, as appears by VICTORIA AUG. upon his monies; ſo that it is rationally ſuppoſed, that he reigned a longer time than is aſſigned him.

Claudius, ſirnamed Gothicus, for his memorable victories over the Goths, was a mighty ſupport to the declining empire during theſe confuſions. He generouſly reſolved to march firſt againſt the Goths, as enemies to the Commonwealth, rather than againſt Tetricus and the other Uſurpers, who were only enemies to himſelf; a public wrong, as he ſaid, being to be revenged before a private injury. This Emperor, after a ſhort but glorious reign, died a natural death, which was rare in thoſe times. His brother Quintillus was proclaimed Emperor by the ſenate; but, after ſeventeen days, was conſtrained to give place to Aurelianus, whom the Senate had advanced to that dignity.

Tacitus's ſhort reign of ſix months, and Florianus's of two, will admit of no enlargement in this Breviary. Though, about this time, Bonoſus, a Briton, uſurping the government, occaſioned a diſturbance to Probus the Emperor; but being overcome, and deſpairing ever again to make head, put his own into a halter, of whom it is ſaid, he being an inſatiable vaſſal to Bacchus, there hangs a barrel, not a man. Probus, having ſubdued the Germans, Vandals, and Burgundians, &c. had nine kings priſoners at the ſame time. The Vandals he ſent to inhabit this country, who, being deſirous to leave their names at the place of their ſettlement, were very probably the raiſers of the fortifications at Berwick in Elmet, called to this day Wendall-hill for Vandal-hill (72). The Vandals, though invaders and enemies in Gaul, were ſerviceable and auxiliaries in Britain. Other places in this neighbourhood ſeem to have received their names upon the like occaſions. So Almonbury is much more probably deduced from the Almanes (who were auxiliaries to the Romans) than from St Albans; and the learned Dr Gale was of opinion, that Mexburgh, Banburgh, and Duiſburgh, &c. received their names from other auxiliaries, the ſixth legion having many camps in theſe parts of Yorkſhire.

(72) I need not repeat, that the Romans pronounced their V as our W, as Vallum, Wallum,

I ſhall only add, that the great quantities of Roman coins, found of late years near Doncaſter in Yorkſhire, and at South Holland in Lincolnſhire, were probably concealed upon the arrival of the Vandals, by thoſe that had made the inſurrection, who being ſlain in the conflict, their treaſure lay hid above 1400 years. There were no leſs than thirty-ſix pound weight of theſe found in the midſt of the vaſteſt flat, or level, in England (73); and one of the pots found near Edlington (74), contained about two gallons. I bought ſixty of the former, and the Right Honourable the Lord Moleſworth ſent me a preſent of near 200 of the latter, and there was not in either parcel one elder than Gallienus, or later than Quintillus; ſo that they ſeem to have been concealed in one common calamity about Probus's time.

Caraufius, an Iriſhman, being deputed by Maximian to guard the coaſt, became rich by the ſpoils of the Pirates, which he never returned to the owners, nor accounted for to the Emperor; but aſſuming that title himſelf, became ſo powerful, that Maximian was glad to make peace with him, leaving him the command of the iſland, upon condition, he ſhould defend it againſt the Barbarians, which he did for ſeven years together. Upon this ſucceſs, he ſtampt money with PAX. AVG. one of which I have, it was found at Aldburgh in this Weſt-riding. Upon others are ML. Moneta Londinenſis, and SPC. for ſignata pecunia Cumeloduni. He recovered the outer boundary, and there erected a wall of ſtone, fortified it with ſeven caſtles, and upon the bank of the river Carun, ſo called from him, built a round houſe of hewn ſtone (probably a temple to Terminus) with a triumphal arch in memory of his Victory; but, in the concluſion, was expelled by Conſtantius, and ſlain by his own familiar friend, Allectus, perhaps at Caraufield (75), now Caverſfield, two miles from Allchester, ſo denominated from this Allectus, upon ſome of whoſe coins are ML. upon others QL. for Moneta Londinenſis, and a Quartarius coined at London, or Quæſtor (Treaſurer) of London.

Allectus having retained the government three years, was ſlain by Conſtantius Chlorus, who ſcoured the Britiſh ſeas, which had been infeſted by the Saxons and Gauls, and ſettled the Kingdom in peace. a little for the honour of York, that this pious Emperor, endowed with all moral and christian virtues, had there his Royal Seat. The remains of many valuable Roman monuments are scattered up and down that ancient city, which it is a pity that none of the many learned men thereof have illustrated, as Dr Lister has done the mult-angular tower and Roman wall there (76), of which I have the original drawing by the ingenious Mr Lodge, a native of Leedes. Here also Constantius died, and was deified (77), as appears by his medals in this Musæum, inscribed DIVO. CONSTANTIO. PIO. round his veiled head. Reverse, MEMORIA FELIX Exergue PLN. Pecunia Londini Notata. A noted Antiquary observes, in respect of this coin, that Rome, in the height of its greatness, had not a more glorious shew to exhibit (78), than the apotheosis of their Emperors hereby represented. At the dissolution of Religious Houses, there was found always burning a lamp in a kind of grot, or vault, where constant fame reported the reliques of Constantius were laid (79). Monies were also coined in honour of his wife, the celebrated St Helen: Camden mentions one that was minted at Triers; but I have one more valuable, as coined at London, which, at her request, was surrounded with a wall by her son Constantine, if not by herself, as Henry of Huntington affirms (80). Of this fabric, and the composition of this ancient Roman wall, there is an accurate description by the learned and ingenious Dr Woodward (81). This medal has her head inscribed FL. HELENA. AVGVSTA. Reverse, SECVRITAS REIPVBLICAE. Exergue P. LON. This excellent Princess was born at Colchester in Essex, which she also walled, and which has for the arms thereof a Cross between four Crowns, in memory of the Cross, which she found at Jerusalem, where she built a Church in the place where our blessed Saviour suffered: she also founded another Church, where the Inn had stood that he was born in. So that in old inscriptions, she is stiled Piissima & Venerabilis Augusta. St Helensford near Tadcaster is generally supposed to be denominated from her, though the learned Dr Gale, late Dean of York, told me he rather inclined to deduce it from the goddess Nehalennia, who was Præses artis calcariæ, seu erectariæ; and I am apt to think it might be so, by the Calcarienses, or heathen Romans employed in burning the lime-stone, wherewith this tract abounds to this day; but by the Christian Romans be afterwards applied to St Helen.

That her son Constantine the Great was born in Britain, is not only affirmed by our own Historians (82), but acknowledged by Baronius himself, and the generality of learned Authors; and though a very few Writers would have it at Colchester or London, yet the most, and most considerable, do assign the honour to York; and to use the words of a very learned man, lately deceased, all those who assert Britain to have been the place of his birth, must needs acknowledge him to have been born at York (83). And that this was the current opinion, not only of private persons, whose works are particularly enumerated by the judicious Bishop Usher (84), but the public also, is evident, because the Embassadors of England asserted it in the hearing of the learned world, both at the Council of Constance, and at Basil: where they condescend to mention the very particular place in York, where he was born. Peternæ natum in Eboracensi civitate, by which is indisputably meant Bedern, which is verily thought to have been part of the Imperial Palace in old time, as in after ages it was a College of Vicars; the Saxon name may be deduced either from Boc-ærne Refectorium, or from Bead oratio and ærne locus, their place of prayer; and Trinity, or Christ's Church, in that part of the city, is in his Grace the Lord Archbishop's register, stiled Ecclesia Sæ Trinitatis in Curia Regis. But to proceed, Constantine, who had been many years detained in the Court of Diocletian, and after of Galerius, as an honourable pledge, finding treachery intended against him, made his escape from Rome, and arrived safe at York, to the great joy of his dying father, who shortly after expired in his arms. By his father's will, and consent of the army, he was unanimously saluted Emperor, which his modesty refused, till prevailed on by their importunity, and especially by Erocus, King of the Alemains (85), who had accompanied him in his flight from Court, whose auxiliary forces lay, no doubt, at Almanbury, in this West-riding of the county of York, as is before intimated.

From all this it may justly be inferred, what figure York made in the secular affairs of the world, it being the seat of the Roman Emperors; I shall now add, for the Ecclesiastical glory of Eboracum, that it was adorned with an Episcopal See by Constantine, and that Eborius, the Bishop thereof, was present at the Council of Arles, called to take notice of the cause of the Donatists, wherein were present, to represent the British Churches, Eborius, Bishop of York; Restitutus, Bishop of London; and Adelfius de civitate Colonia Londinensium; Sacerdos, a Priest both by name and office; and Arminius, a Deacon: of what place the third Bishop was, hath been much controverted by learned men; Archbishop Usher thought it was Colchester, Mr Selden, and Sir Henry Spelman, took it for Camelodunum [Malden in Essex]; but Bishop Stillingfleet fixes it most probably at Caerleon in Monmouthshire, from the way of summoning Bishops to Councils at that time, viz. one out of a Province (86); and therefore, that as the other two Bishops were out of the other two Provinces, Maxima Cæsariensis and Britannia Prima, the third Bishop was out of the third Province, Britannia Secunda; his arguments from thence to prove the great antiquity of Episcopal Government in Britain, and that the Pagan Hierarchy was rather in imitation of the Christian, than that the Christians borrowed it from them, may be seen in that very learned Author's Origines Britannicæ, Chap. II. What more immediately appertains to this county, is the note of a Critic upon the name Arminius, the Deacon. 'It is worth taking notice of, says he, that 'the name remaineth still intire in Yorkshire in a very 'noble and religious family, after so many ages (87),' of which I shall, in the sequel of this History, give an instance in the Memoirs of the no less pious, than Right Honourable Lady, the Lady Mary Armine, whose benefactions to these parts were considerable.

The British Bishops being summoned, and appearing at this Council of Arles before, and at those of Sardica and Arminum afterwards, it is more than probable, that they, and the Bishop of York at the head of them, (as before) were present at the famous, and indeed the first general Council of Nice, which this pious Emperor called to suppress the Arians and Quartodecimani, ann. Dom. 325. It being very unlikely, that Constantine should omit those of his native country; though Athanasius's Synodicon (wherein all their names were set down) being long since lost, we are forced to make use of probabilities, but such as are very convincing, as managed by the learned Bishop of Worcester (88).

When Constantine went against Maxentius, he took divers of the nobles and others with him, who, planting themselves in the West sea-coast of France, called it Britain. He was victorious over the Franks, as well as over Maxentius, and as he had formerly been over the Sarmatians, against whom he was sent by Galerius with a few men on purpose to be destroyed; but he overcame them, and in person drew a fierce young Sarmate by the hair of the head before Galerius: I have a medal, struck upon this occasion, inscribed SARMATIA DEVICTA, whereupon is represented victory, with a palm, carrying a trophy, and a captive at her feet (89). But as to the affairs of our own country, Octavius, taking advantage of his absence, caused the Britons to revolt, and assumed the kingdom; whereupon, saith Alured of Beverley (90), Constantine sent Trahern against him; but it is evident from Eusebius (91), that himself came again in person to Britain, surrounded by the sea, and became Victor. The joyful memorial of this expedition is registered to posterity upon a medal exhibited by Speed (92). In this Musæum is one somewhat different, though coined at the same place in London, trampling an enemy under the horse's feet, CONSTANTINUS. P. F. AUG. reverse, ADVENTUS AUG. Exergue P. LN. (93). In this his head has a laurel; upon another (94) he is represented with a helmet, and a spear in his right hand; whereby it appears there were two different mints at the same city; upon a third, whereon he has a sceptre, it is expressly P. LON.

When Constantine new modelled the empire, Britain was governed by a Lord Deputy, whose blazonry was a book shut with a green cover (95): he was honoured with the title of Spectabilis. The other officers may be seen in Camden's Britannia (96), to which we refer; it may suffice, that these parts, called Maxima Cæsariensis, were under the Dux Britannicus, as the Southern were under the Comes Britanniarum.

Upon the death of this ever famous Emperor, May 22, 337, and division of the empire amongst his three sons, Britain (together with Spain, Gallia, and Germany) fell to the share of his eldest son, Constantius Junior, who enjoyed it but three years, being slain, anno 340, by his brother Constans; yet are there four distinct medals of his, all minted at London (97). His death was much lamented by his brother brother Conſtantius, to whom Britain ſubmitted itſelf; and I have of his money alſo coined at London (98). Julian the Apoſtate was made his ſucceſſor, having diſſembled his religion, but afterwards publickly reſtored the Pagan altars and temples: while he reſided at Paris (99), he heard of the incurſions of the Scots and Picts into the province; but, not daring to come himſelf, he ſent Lupicinus to repreſs the troubles (100). Jovian, his ſucceſſor, was an orthodox Chriſtian, and refuſed to act, except he had liberty of his religion, and, when Emperor, ſeverely puniſhed idolatry; but his ſhort reign affords nothing relating to theſe parts. Valentinian ſucceeded, in whoſe time the Scots, Picts, and Attacoſts, deſtroyed the North, as the Saxons and Francs did the South; but theſe being ſubdued by the forces he ſent over under Theodoſius, learning and arts began a little to revive; and in the Theodoſian code there is an edict of Gratian, who ſucceeded in the empire, anno 376 (101), requiring all the chief cities in theſe parts of the Roman empire to ſettle and maintain in them profeſſors of learning, both of the Greek and Roman languages, amongſt which cities Biſhop Stillingfleet expreſsly mentions London, York, and Caerleon (102); ſo that theſe parts, as long as the Roman power continued, had the ſame advantages for learning as the other provinces. This brave general Theodoſius, having thus happily reduced theſe Northern parts to their priſtine ſtate, obtained leave to have them named another province, and it was thenceforward called Valentia in honour of the Emperor (103).

Maximus, a commander in thoſe parts, having by his affability won the hearts of the Britons, ſet up himſelf for Emperor in the year 381, according to Sir Henry Savile (104), whoſe chronology I entirely follow. Some would make Maximus a Spaniard; but the Saxon annals, publiſhed by the learned Biſhop of Lincoln (105), ſay expreſsly, he; æ; on Bꝛexen londe zebopen. With this agrees Wheloc's edition of the Saxon chronology, ſave that, being leſs correct, the Emperor is called Maximianus (106). With this agrees alſo Fabius Ethelwerdus (107), and Henry of Huntington (108); and all authors acknowledge he was declared Emperor in Britain, and that he was a man juſt and valiant, and worthy of the honour, if he had not come to it by uſurpation. After his victory over the Picts and Scots, he tranſported the flower of the Britiſh troops, and fixed his court at Triers, and, by the meer terror of his name, raiſed taxes among the barbarous nations. After Gratian was ſlain, he made his ſon Victor, Cæſar, and entered Italy with ſo great terror, that Valentinian fled, and the cities opened their gates: there is yet extant at Bononia an inſcription in honour of him (109); but after five years reign he was ſlain at Aquileia: his coins, and thoſe of his ſon Victor, are very rare; yet of both are found in theſe Northern parts, where he performed his moſt noble acts againſt the Caledonians. I have of his, coined both at Triers and Aquileia (110); and, ſince the Catalogue was printed, Edward Thompſon, jun. Eſq; ſent me a moſt rare one of Victor, whereon he is ſtiled Auguſtus, which, with many others of the later Emperors, were found, anno 1720, at Richmond in Yorkſhire.

The Britiſh hiſtorians ſet this matter in a different light, and ſay, that, after Conſtantine the Great, one Octavius reigned, and that he gave his daughter to Maximus, cum regno Britannico (111). Some hiſtorians miſapply the peopling of Armorica from this iſland to him; for Biſhop Stillingfleet proves it was called by the old name, and not Britannia, near fourſcore years after this time (112).

But what more immediately relates to theſe times and parts of Britain is, that, by reaſon of theſe inroads of the Picts and Scots, who continually infeſted the Northern parts, Fraomarius, King of the Almains (113), (who at that time were eminent for their ſtrength and number) was ſent here to check the Barbarians. And that they not only reſided in theſe parts of Yorkſhire, but left their name to a noted camp at Cambodunum, is evident from the name of a place which is called Almanbury to this day, which is far more probably deduced from the Almans than from the pretended St. Alban; and to this opinion I have the ſanction of Dr Gale, the late learned Dean of York. St Alban reminds me of St Urſula and the 11000 martyred virgins, whoſe ſtory is generally placed in the reign of this Maximus, though Ser. Creſſy makes it to be anno 453: but the thing is not material; I ſhould not have thought it worth the mentioning at all, but that a worthy gentleman brought me from Colen one of the antique arrows that are there expoſed as the inſtruments of that barbarous ſlaughter; the Monk that attends there told him, that, though many are given away, the number is [miraculouſly] made up again in a ſmall time, which, one word excepted, is, I believe, the trueſt part of the legend.

The Emperors Gratian and Valentinian, to oblige Maximus to withdraw his forces out of Gaul, are ſaid by the author of the Eulogium, as cited by Biſhop Uſher (114), to enter into a league with the Gothic Picts, and help them with ſhips to convey them into the Northern parts of Britain, who coming hither in greater numbers, and finding the country naked and without defence, ſettled themſelves with greater encouragement than ever. The Britons, in this diſtreſs, choſe Marcus for their Emperor, and after him ſet up Gratian, a native of Britain, anno 409; but, falling into a diſlike of him too, after a reign of four months they dethroned him, and choſe Conſtantine, one of the common ſoldiers, upon the ſole account of his name, which they took for a good omen. He defended Valentia with great bravery; and I have one of his coins minted in Britain (115). But he afterwards fixed the ſeat of his empire at Arles, and was preſented with an imperial robe by Honorius (116); but was ſlain anno 414 (*). Britain was now again happy for a while under the gallant and wiſe conduct of Victorinus, who put a ſtop to the inroads of the Scots and Picts: and perhaps we may add the happineſs of theſe parts in Faſtidius, as Archbiſhop of York, who flouriſhed anno 420, and was not only a man of wit and eloquence, but, which is infinitely preferable, of great piety, and an excellent preacher. He, being ſtiled Britanniarum Epiſcopus, is by many concluded Archbiſhop of London, which they ſuppoſe the metropolis of Britain; but the famous Archbiſhop Uſher rather inclines to the opinion of Bertarius, that York was then the metropolis of Britain, not only becauſe it was a Roman colony, but becauſe the Prætorium and Emperor's palace were there. However this ſhall not be inſiſted on, becauſe the generality of hiſtorians place Faſtidius among the Biſhops of London. What we are more concerned for is, that Honorius was conſtrained to recall the brave Victorinus to maintain the heart of the empire, Rome the head of it being taken and ſacked by Alaric the Goth (117).

Miſerable was the ſtate of the Britons thus forſaken; their earneſt ſupplications to the Romans for aſſiſtance, and what ſupplies were granted, may be read in our general hiſtories. I ſhall here only add in brief, that under Valentinian III, the laſt wall for their defence againſt the Barbarians, was built not of Turf, but ſolid ſtone twelve feet high, and eight broad, now known by the name of the Picts wall. Afterwards the Romans intirely abandoned the nation, about 476 years after Cæſar's landing. Thus the natives being forced to it, ſtood in their own defence, and were awakened to that degree, that they made their enemy quiet for ſome time.

But as their own Hiſtorian, Gildas (118), complains, though their foes left our people, our people left not their iniquities, exceſſive drinking, treats, oppreſſion, diviſions, &c.; ſo that their old enemies obſerving their inteſtine diviſions, did again invade the land, and reduced them to that extremity, which was aggravated by a ſevere famine and plague, that it was finally reſolved by Vortigern, to ſend for the Saxons. Theſe arrived ann. Dom. 449, under the conduct of Hengiſt and Horſa; but having overcome the common enemy, the Saxons turn againſt the Britons, and make a miſerable deſtruction: all the cities and churches were burnt to the ground from the eaſt to the weſtern ocean, the inhabitants deſtroyed with horrible devaſtation (119), ſome eſcaped to the mountains, or hid themſelves in caves, and others went over into foreign parts, which was the foundation of the Armorican colony in Little Britain. This Hengiſt deſcended from their idolized Woden, was the founder of the Kingdom of Kent, the firſt of the Saxon Heptarchy. There were for many years bloody wars betwixt the Britons and Saxons; but I ſhall chiefly confine myſelf to the northern tranſactions.

Hengiſt was ſo ſucceſsful, that he not only erected for himſelf a Kingdom in the South, but gave to his brother Otho, and his eldeſt ſon Ebuſa, all Northumberland, by which is to be underſtood, not only the county that bears the name, but all the land north of Humber, afterwards divided into two Kingdoms; Deira, from the Humber to Tine; and Bernicia, from thence to the Frith of Edinburgh: all this was conquered under Hengiſt's Commiſſion, by Otho and his ſon, and held as feudatory Earldoms, and tranſmitted to their ſucceſſors, who, for ninety-nine years, uſed no other title than Ealderman, Dux, or Comes, which words, in thoſe days, were ſynonimous (120).

Among the Britains that firſt oppoſed Hengiſt, the Kentiſh, none more ſtout than Vortimer, who was ſo ſucceſsful in four battles, that he expelled the Saxons into the iſle of Thanet; but upon his death (by treachery and poiſon), and the arrival of more forces, they return, and are victorious, till reſtrained by Aurelius Ambroſius, and his brother Uter Pendragon, who coming from Little Britain, infuſed new life into the Britons, who at the battle of Maiſbelly (121), routed the Saxons, and put them to a diſorderly flight; upon which Hengiſt retired to Conniſborow, near Doncaſter, to ſecure himſelf, and a few days after took the field a ſecond time againſt the Britons, who purſued him; but it proved fatal to himſelf and his army, which was intirely defeated, and himſelf beheaded, if, ſaith a noted Hiſtorian (122), the authority of the Britiſh Hiſtory is to be preferred in this matter before that of the Saxon Annals, which report him to have died a natural death, being worn out with fatigue and buſineſs. But to this may be appoſitely replied, what the learned Editor of the Saxon Annals affirms, that not any of them do ſay ſo; but on the contrary, thoſe Hiſtorians, who ſeem beſt acquainted with ſuch ancient records, aſſert plainly, that he was ſlain, (as Matthew of Weſtminſter expreſſeth it) captus amputato capite ad Tarcara deſtinabatur: to which may be added that of Polydore Virgil, Hengiſto primo impetu cæſo (123), and ſaith the memory of the victory was freſh among the neighbouring inhabitants, even to his time, which was above a thouſand years after: and we are further told, that before the gate is an agger that tradition ſaith is the burying-place of Hengiſt (124).

After this victory, Aurelius Ambroſius called the Princes and great men together at York, and gave orders for repairing the churches, which the Saxons had deſtroyed. For though the Hiſtorians of thoſe contending nations differ very much as to the battles, it is agreed on all hands, that Ambroſius was very zealous in repairing the Britiſh churches, ſetting up divine worſhip, and giving great encouragement to the Clergy to perform divine offices. In a ſolemn Council of the Britons, ann. 490, he appointed two Metropolitans for the two vacant Sees at that time, viz. Sampſon, one of eminent piety, for York; and Dubritius for Caerleon. Sampſon was afterwards driven over to Armorica, or Little Britain (125).

Before his death, there was a pitched battle between Cerdic and Natanleod, whom ſome make Uter's General, others a mighty King; Henry Huntington ſaith expreſsly (127), he was Rex Maximus Britannorum; and then it implies, that the Britons, as well as the Saxons, had ſeveral Kings at the ſame time: but of as great fame and pride as he was, Cerdic ſlew him and 5000 men, at a place which bore his name. Camden ſays, he had been very curious in ſearch of the place, but could not find the leaſt footſteps of that name (128). If this county was not too much northward for the other circumſtances of that engagement, why might not Natland put in for it? ſome indeed call him Nazaleod; but the Saxon Annals ſay expreſsly Natanleob (129).

The celebrated King Arthur ſucceeded Uter, ann. 517, whoſe mighty feats are moſt amply related by the Britiſh Hiſtorians. But in reſpect of this Prince, I am much of Biſhop Stillingfleet's opinion, that both parties are to blame; thoſe who tell ſuch incredible tales of him as are utterly inconſiſtent with the circumſtances of the Britiſh affairs at that time; and thoſe, who on the other hand deny there was any ſuch perſon, or of any conſiderable power; for doubtleſs he was a valiant Prince, and victorious in many battles againſt the Saxons. Of the twelve battles ſo much celebrated, I ſhall only mention ſuch as we have moſt certainty of, and do alſo relate to theſe northern parts. As that Arthur having defeated the Saxons in Northumberland, beſieged Colgrin in York, which yielded to him ann. 521, this is indiſputable; but there are other tranſactions that are commonly ſuppoſed to be more Southward, which yet do more ſtrictly, I preſume, appertain to theſe northern parts, and particularly the ſeventh battle, wherein he ſlew 6000 Saxons. This is expreſsly ſaid to be at Cair Loid Coit, or Cair Luit Coit, which later Writers frequently miſapply to Lincoln; but not in my opinion only, but that alſo of Dr Gale, the late Dean of York, is more applicable to Leedes, that the very name imports as much, appears by the etimology (of which before) and all the circumſtances countenance it. The Britons having driven the Saxons out of Lincolnſhire northward, we find mention of Cair Loid Coit as a place further north. That Holinſhed, and other Writers, ſhould herein be miſled by Alured Beverlacenſis, is no great wonder in affairs tranſacted 1200 years ago, when in a matter ſo late as King Edward the Third's reign, the nativity of a Prince of the Royal Blood, is almoſt univerſally placed at Hatfield in Hertfordſhire, and even by ſuch, as writing the genealogy of the Kings of England, might have been preſumed more knowing in thoſe affairs (130); whereas, undeniable evidence from records, manifeſt that it was at Hatfield in Yorkſhire (131). It is the leſs wonder that later Authors miſtake in an affair of ſo great intricacy, when the Archdeacon of Huntington, who writ his Hiſtory 500 years ago, owns fairly, that as to the places of the twelve battles, loca noſtræ ætati incognita ſunt (132). I am apt to ſuſpect that the expreſs mention of the Sylva Celydonis, with reſpect of this very tranſaction, has induced ſome to place it at Lincoln, leaſt it ſhould be referred to the Scotch Caledonian woods, quo Saxones nunquam penetrarunt; but this very paſſage of the wood, that ſhould be Celydon, may be juſtly improved as an argument, that it was in theſe parts of Yorkſhire; Celidon in Britiſh ſignifying Haſſel, and Haſſel wood is adjoining to Bede's Sylva Elmetæ: which the very learned Dean Gale, in his Emendations of Nennius, acquaints us is territoriolum agri Ebor. prope Leedes (133).

This famous King Arthur was ſlain in the year 542. Perſons of greateſt repute in his time for learning and ſanctity were St David and Kentigern. The memory of the firſt continues famous to this day in Wales, and of the other in Scotland and theſe parts, by reaſon of a noted ſpring that bears his Noriſh name, St Mungo. An eminent Phyſician, that writ of the four famous medicinal wells near Knaresburgh (134), confeſſes himſelf at a loſs for the meaning of the true name Magnus or Mugnus; but Archbiſhop Spotſwood has ſince told us, it is Mongah or Mungo, that ſignifies a dear friend (135). The cures wrought there are juſtly aſcribed to the activity of the coldneſs, rather than the interceſſion of the Saint, though by the credulous believed to be the ſon of a pure virgin. The legend may be ſeen in the Romiſh authors (136), formerly belonging to New-Abbey (or St Mary de dulci corde) in Galloway. The learned Biſhop Nicolſon has obſerved, from a rare manuſcript breviary now in this Muſeum, that this Saint's day was January 14; but the Engliſh martyrology (137) ſays, that at Glaſcow, the depoſition of St Kentigern, for to Eugenius, ſon third King of Scotland, is the 13th. The author of this book (which is a great curioſity) is not commonly known, but a learned Vicar of Leedes acquaints us (138) that it was one Wilſon; it is remarkable that, in the annexed catalogue of the late Martyrs in England, Richard Oldcorne, Prieſt, and Henry Garnet, Superior of the Jeſuits, are both recorded as ſuch, though executed for the Gunpowder treaſon.

What more immediately appertains to this place is, that the northern Britons, after ſome time, came to an agreement with the Saxons, and by their permiſſion enjoyed the Chriſtian religion; and that Ida and Alla from Aldermen (of which before) became now Kings of Northumberland, in which new erected kingdom there was a ſucceſſion of twenty-one Kings, of whom four were Pagans, and ſeventeen Chriſtians, ſome of whom were chief monarchs of the whole iſland, and had their royal ſeat at Leedes when Cambodunum was burnt down by the enemy (139). It continued 245 years, from anno 547 to 792. This, as was intimated before, being divided into the kingdoms of Deira and Bernicia, was ſometimes under one monarch, and ſometimes had two diſtinct Kings. Ida reigned over both for twelve years, Adda ſucceeded him, and reigned five years in Bernicia; but in Deira, Ælla, the ſon of Yffus, ruled thirty years. This Alla was father to the famous Edwin, the firſt Chriſtian King of Northumberland. In his time was Careticus, the fifth Britiſh King from Arthur, who began his unfortunate reign anno 586; he was unwilling to God and to Saynts (140), which the Saxons perceiving, began to war upon him, and in fine drove him to the mountains of Wales. Near Aburford, in this neighbourhood, is the foundation of an old caſtle ſtill viſible, ſuppoſed to be called from him Caſtle-Cary; this, with all the territory called Elmet, was conquered and taken from him by the ſaid Edwin. If it be objected, that it is very uncertain whether this was the monarch, or another of the ſame name, that was only King of Elmet, I muſt anſwer with Father Creſſy, that the records of thoſe times afford us ſo ſmall light, that it is extremely difficult to determine whether they were monarchs of the Britons, London in 1724. 8vo. [I]. He did not long ſurvive this publication. He was always inclined to a thickneſs of blood (m), which ſubjected him to a pain and numbneſs in the back part of his head, accompanied ſometimes with faintings to the loſs of his ſenſes, and other apoplective ſymptoms. Theſe he looked upon as ſo many prognoſtics of his death: nor was he miſtaken, though he lived long beyond his expected period. In October this year, 1724, he was ſtruck with a violent palſy, from which ſtroke, however, he ſo far recovered, as to ſpeak intelligibly, and walk with help: but the following year, he was attacked again by the ſame diſtemper, on the 10th of the ſame month, under which, after languiſhing ſix days, he departed this life, October 16, 1725, in the ſixty eighth year of his age. His corpſe was interred among his Anceſtors, in the chancel of St Peter's [the Pariſh] Church of Leedes. His character for learning is ſeen in the books he publiſhed, which ſhew him to have been a great Maſter of the Hiſtory and Antiquities of his own Country; to attain which, it became neceſſary for him to be thoroughly ſkilled, as he was, in Genealogy and Heraldry. He appears, from theſe books, to have been alſo an induſtrious Biographer. However, that which ſets his reputation the higheſt as a Scholar, was his judicious ſkill and knowledge in Coins and Medals. But Mr Thoreſby may be ſaid juſtly to have been a great man, becauſe he was truly a good man. How diligent ſoever he was in cultivating the laudable accompliſhments of the Gentleman and the ſcholar, yet he never ſuffered his beloved ſtudies to interfere with his religion (n); but managed all his affairs in ſubſerviency to it. In his principles, after his converſion, he was orthodox; in his affections catholic, comprehending therein all denominations of Chriſtians [K]. He read the Scriptures many times over, with the beſt Commentators; nor was he unacquainted with the intricate controverſies of Religion; but books of warm practical Divinity were the joy of his heart. He was modeſt and pure, temperate and abſtemious to an uncommon degree: though, being one of the Lords of the Manor, and a governing member of the Corporation (o), he could not always avoid public meetings and feſtivities, yet he was a ſparing partaker, even of innocent diverſions. He was conſtant and regular at his private devotions, which were invigorated with an unuſual degree of fervency. Exemplary in the government of his family, he called them together morning and evening to prayer, and reading the Scripture. Extremely careful of the religious inſtructions of his children, he was not unmindful of the moral behaviour of his ſervants. He was a kind relation, compromiſing the diſtreſſed affairs of ſome that were very near to him, by expenſive journeys, irkſome applications, and money almoſt beyond his abilities. He was charitable to the utmoſt of his power, not ſeldom ſollicited others, and was always a faithful diſpenſer of whatever was entruſted to his care. He was conſtitutionally ſlow to reſent, and, upon Chriſtian principles, ready to forgive, great injuries; and, being of a pacific temper himſelf, he often had the ſatisfaction of compoſing differences among contending friends. He left behind him a mournful widow, ſincerely pious, and remarkably humble. She was an affectionate wife, a tender parent, and diſcharged the ſeveral duties of her ſtation, with unblemiſhed fidelity and prudence. She ſurvived him near fifteen years, and was buried in the ſame grave with him, having brought him ten children, of whom three ſurvived him, two ſons, and a daughter named Grace, who was born in 1694, and was diſpoſed of by her parents in marriage to Mr John Wood of Leedes. His ſons were both bred to the Church; the elder, Ralph, was born March 24, 1697-8 (p), bred at Queen's College in Cambridge, where he took the degree of A. M. His father had the ſatisfaction to ſee him collated to the Vicarage of Rickmanſworth in Hertfordſhire, by Dr Gibſon, Biſhop of London; he is now, by the recommendation of the ſame Patron, Rector of Stoke-Newington in Middleſex. His Lordſhip likewiſe preferred the younger ſon, Richard, born in 1702, and a graduate of Catharine-Hall in Cambridge, to the Rectory of St Catharine Coleman, in Fenchurch-ſtreet, London; which he ſtill enjoys. They are both worthy Clergymen, and well reſpected in their ſeveral pariſhes.

(m) This was peculiar in his conſtitution, that he had not the uſual quantity of ſpittle; and though he could ſpit upon ſome very extraordinary occaſion, yet it was a force upon nature, and in his uſual courſe he did neither hawk nor ſpit in many years: but found no inconvenience from it, there being ſpittle enough to ſuffice for moiſtening the larynx, and aſſiſt digeſtion. Ducat. Leod. In the Appendix. p. 61.

(n) He often lamented the great conſumption of time, occaſioned by the numerous viſitants to ſee his Muſæum, but took care they ſhould not hinder him private, or public worſhip.

(o) Upon his conforming to the Church, he was choſen into the Common-Council. On the occaſion, he objected to the oaths always taken againſt the ſolemn League and Covenant, as an antiquated affair; and it was laid aſide from this time. He paid his fine, and reſigned this office ſome years before he died.

(p) He had a ſon born before Ralph, but he died of the ſmall-pox in Novemb. 1689. Ducat. Leod. p. 612. where is related an inſtance of an extraordinary memory in a young woman, who repeated her Minister's, Mr Sharp's, Sermons, though compoſed in long ſentences, and a lofty ſtile, once a fortnight, to a conſiderable number of her own ſex, more perfectly than moſt could take them in ſhort-hand; which, conſidering her ſex, is more remarkable than that of Dr Fuller (omitted in his article) who was able to make uſe of any man's Sermon that he had but once read, or heard. Britons, or Princes that lived in ſeveral Provinces, and reigned at the ſame time (141). Here ends the manuſcript.

[I] Vicaria Leodienſis.] This work was undertaken by him purely out of a hearty love to his native place; but the ſubject being narrow and confined, he has enriched it with obſervations on the original of parochial churches, and the ancient manner of building them, as alſo on the old way of paſſing eſtates by delivery of pledges, ſubſcription of golden croſſes, and pendant ſeals, &c. And beſides the memoirs of many worthy Divines, ſucceſſively Vicars of Leedes, he has added the lives of the Doctors Matthew Hutton, Edwin Sandys, Tobie Matthew, John Thoreſby, Archbiſhops of York, and of Henry, Earl of Huntington; to which he has likewiſe added a liſt of the Lords Preſidents of the King's council at York, from the firſt erection of that court to its diſſolution: with an appendix of original records and manuſcripts, concluding with an account of Trinity church, which was then building at Leedes (†).

(†) This church has been ſince finiſhed and endowed by the Benefactors mentioned in the concluſion.

[K] His benevolence extended to all denominations of Chriſtians.] For inſtance, when the pious Philip Lord Wharton begun his charity of diſtributing Bibles among the poor, on condition of repeating memoriter a few Pſalms, and the aſſembly's catechiſm, he deſired Mr Thoreſby's aſſiſtance at Leedes, which he chearfully embraced, and, for many years, painfully executed. In the ſame ſpirit, he was from his youth a promoter of private aſſemblies for prayer and holy conferences, and ſome good was done in that method. In the latter part of his life, a number of well-diſpoſed young men applied to him for his advice and countenance, and he attempted, with the approbation of the Vicar, to ſettle them upon Dr Woodward's plan of a religious ſociety. But this laudable deſign was defeated by the extravagant enthuſiaſm of one of them, who was too opinionated to be convinced, and not contented with his own ideal perfection, was continually impoſing it upon others, as a neceſſary article of ſalvation. In the like ſpirit, when a Charity-ſchool was firſt erected at Leedes, Mr Thoreſby was a zealous Advocate for it, and was named for Treaſurer, which, though he out of modeſty declined, yet he voluntarily offered to be one of their Collectors, and performed the office with fidelity and activity. Laſtly, the pious Robert Nelſon, Eſq; recommended him for a correſponding member of the Society in London for promoting Chriſtian Knowledge; and he took a great deal of pains to effectuate their deſign, by recommending ſubſcribers, and diſperſing many pious books among the poor; whereupon, at his death, Mr Newman, their Secretary, wrote a letter to the Reverend Mr Robinſon, lamenting the loſs of ſo ſerviceable a correſpondent.

TILLOTSON [JOHN], Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was deſcended from the Tilſons of Tilſon in Cheſhire [A]. The name of that branch of the family, to which we owe our Archbiſhop, being changed by his great grandfather, Thomas Wookliff, in the pariſh of Carlton, in that part of Yorkſhire called Craven, from whom it was derived to his ſon George, who by his wife Eleanor, daughter of Ellis Natter of Pendleforeſt, in Lancaſhire, had Robert, his heir, who became a conſiderable Clothier at Sowerby, in the pariſh of Halifax in Yorkſhire (a); where John, his eldeſt ſon, the ſubject of this Memoir, was born, at a houſe called Haugh-end, about Michaelmas-day, 1630, being baptized on the 3d of Octob. following (b). His father being a very rigid Puritan and Calviniſt (c), was particularly careful to breed up his ſon in the ſame principles, and finding that he made an extraordinary progreſs at ſchool, he kept him there till he was fit for the Univerſity, and then ſent him to Cambridge, where he was admitted Penſioner of Clare-Hall, under the tuition of Mr David Clarkſon [B], an eminent Preſbyterian Divine, April 28, 1647, being matriculated in the Univerſity on the firſt of July following. Here (d) he followed his ſtudies with a commendable diligence, but not ſo as to have the character of a hard or plodding ſtudent [C], and declined appearing in public exerciſes as much as he could, but performed them very well when required (e). Midſummer 1650, he took the degree of A. B. and on the 27th of November the following year, was admitted Fellow of the College (f), having about half a year before (g) begun to take pupils, of whoſe behaviour and manners he was very careful [D], being himſelf of a ſerious and religious turn: he had a very good gift of performing extempore prayers, then much in uſe, and was a great frequenter of ſermons [E]. In 1654, he proceeded A. M. and at the public commencement the following year, being appointed to keep the Philoſophy Act, he performed it with great applauſe, and beyond expectation (h). In the latter end of 1656, he left the College, where he had met with extraordinary reſpect from his firſt admiſſion, and after he became Fellow, the Seniors did nothing in public affairs of the Society without conſulting him (i). Some time before he quitted Cambridge, having met with Chillingworth's book, intitled The Religion of Proteſtants a ſafe way to Salvation, the reaſoning of that excellent Author had opened his mind ſo far, as to releaſe him from the narrow notions of his education: in which he had always found ſomething not agreeable to the natural ſweetneſs of his temper (k) [F]. However, he ſtill

[A] Deſcended from the Tilſons in Cheſhire.] The firſt known anceſtor of this family was Nicholas de Tilſton, Lord of the manor of Tilſton, from whom deſcended Nicholas de Tilſton in the 9th year of Edward III, whoſe grandſon and heir, Roger Tilſton, Eſq; in the reign of Henry V, married Catharine, ſecond daughter of Sir John Leigh of Baguley in Cheſhire, Knt. His ſon and heir, Thomas Tilſton, married the daughter and heireſs of Hugh Heath of Huxley in the ſame county, whoſe ſecond ſon, Richard, marrying Maud, daughter of Richard Boſtock, had ſeveral ſons, of whom the third, Ralph of Newport in Shropſhire, had by his wife (daughter of William, ſecond ſon of Sir Thomas Leighton, Knt. of Wattleſborough in the ſame county) Thomas of Wookliff, his third ſon, in the pariſh of Carlton in Craven in Yorkſhire, who changed the name from Tilſton to Tillotſon, and was great grandfather to our Archbiſhop (1).

[B] Mr David Clarkſon.] The Oxford Antiquary ſtiles him a learned Nonconformiſt, ſays he was one of thoſe who, with Dr John Owen and ſeveral others in 1682, undertook the continuation of Poole's Engliſh annotations on the Bible; but that he diſowned the piece againſt Dr Stillingfleet, aſcribed to him, entituled, No evidence of Dioceſan Epiſcopacy, or any Biſhops, without the choice and conſent of the people, in the Primitive times, publiſhed in 1681, 4to; though he was the author of another, entitled, Primitive Epiſcopacy (2). According to Mr Baxter, he was a man of moderate healing principles (3). Upon reſigning his fellowſhip, he put his pupils under the care of Mr Tillotſon.

[C] He was no plodding ſtudent.] His method of ſtudy was not to note, or pick out by way of common place, or otherwiſe, paſſages out of the books he read; but only marked thoſe that he meant to familiarize with a black lead pencil (4). He read Tully well, and not improbably Twiſſe's Vindiciæ Gratiæ, an author in great vogue at that time (5); yet it was not his principles which pleaſed our ſtudent, but his acuteneſs in diſputation. This we have from Mr Beardmore, who obſerves, that he was a perſon of a very good wit, ſharp and acute, pleaſant in converſation, but with much decorum and gravity for his years (6).

[D] He was very careful of his pupils.] He was at theſe years a very good ſcholar, an acute logician and philoſopher, a quick diſputant, of a ſolid judgment, and no way unqualified, though ſo young, for the truſt and charge of a tutor. He ſpoke Latin exceeding well, read lectures in Burgerdicius's (7) logic with great ſmartneſs and judgment; and, continues Mr Beardmore, when we went to take a new lecture, he examined us about the former, according to the author's and his own explanations. When he went to prayers in his chamber at night, he put us for ſome time at firſt upon conſtruing or reading into Latin a chapter in the Greek teſtament, in which he was a very great critic, and afterwards he uſed to put ſome one or other promiſcuouſly upon giving an account of the day's reading, and then required him to defend his author, which was always done in Latin. He ſometimes had them to diſpute or declaim before him in his chamber in the afternoons. We alſo, continues Mr Beardmore, went to him to prayers for the moſt part duly on Sunday nights, when he examined ſome or other of us about the ſermons heard that day; this was done in Engliſh; for that was the only day when he ſpoke to us, and we gave him our account, in Engliſh. His prayers were, according to the uſe of thoſe times, of that ſort which are called conceived prayers, in which he had a very great facility; but always performed them with gravity and fervour, as he did alſo when it was his courſe to perform prayer in the chapel. In the week days, when he had done his prayer, as we were going out of his chamber, he uſually recalled ſome one of us, and then would uſe thoſe he called with a fair freedom, diſcourſe them kindly, encourage them to ſtudiouſneſs, ſeriouſneſs, and diligence; or tell them of any fault he either obſerved or heard of in them, and thoſe that deſerved it, he would reprove very ſharply. The ſame Writer proceeds to obſerve as follows; he prayed much in ſecret in his bed-chamber, uſing his voice, but ſo as none could hear him, as I think, except myſelf, who kept juſt over him. He ſeemed to be much contrite in his devotions (8).

(7) An author ſtill read by tutors in that Univerſity.

(8) Beardmore, p. 382, 383.

[E] A great frequenter of ſermons.] He generally heard four ſermons every Sunday, beſides the weekly lecture at Trinity church on Wedneſdays, which was preached by a combination of the worthieſt and beſt preachers in the Univerſity, all of them fellows of colleges. At that time the prevailing men, being generally Contra-remonſtants [Calviniſts] uſed to preach much upon thoſe ſubjects, eſpecially Dr Hill (9). Him Mr Tillotſon heard conſtantly on Sunday mornings at St Michael's church, and in the afternoons often at Trinity (10).

(9) He was bred at Emanuel college, but then was Maſter of Trinity, in the room of Dr Comber, ejected by the parliament, before whom Hill was a frequent preacher. He died in 1653. Wood's Faſti, Vol. I. col. 224.

[F] The natural ſweetneſs of his temper.] We ſhould not have inſerted this in the text upon the authority of Biſhop Burnet's panegyric, had not we found it confirmed by Mr Beardmore. This more impartial and no leſs friendly writer to Tillotſon's memory, having informed ſtill perſevered in aſſerting the Preſbyterian form of Church Government, as well as the Protector's Supremacy, continued ſteady in his allegiance to the covenant and the engagement, according to the oaths he had taken [G]; and being in great favour with that party, he was now called from the Univerſity to be Tutor to the ſon of Edmund Prideaux, Eſq; of Ford-Abbey in Devonſhire, Oliver's Attorney General, in whoſe family he likewiſe officiated as Chaplain, but without any ordination (l), agreeable to the principles of thoſe times. As this employment brought him to London, he was there at the death of his Patron's Maſter, the Protector, in 1658; and about a week after, was preſent at a ſcene in Whitehall, which gave him a diſguſt to ſome leading Divines of his own perſuaſion (m). At the ſame time, he likewiſe fell into the acquaintance of ſome worthy Clergymen of another character, by which he was much improved (n). And ſoon after the Reſtoration, in 1669, he took the opportunity that offered of being epiſcopally ordained, without any oaths or ſubſcriptions, by Dr Thomas Sidſerf, Biſhop of Galloway in Scotland [H], who was then in London, and where, by this practice, he gave great offence to the Engliſh Biſhops. Notwithſtanding this ordination, Mr Tillotſon ſtill adhered to the Preſbyterians, and the ſame year was removed from his Fellowſhip [I] at Clare-Hall, by the Fellows of the College, at the inſtance of Dr Peter Gunning, who had been ejected by the Parliament, in 1643, to make way for Mr David Clarkſon, Tutor and immediate Predeceſſor in that Fellowſhip to Mr Tillotſon, who had given the profits to the College during all the time he was poſſeſſed of it. About this time, he made a viſit to his friends in Yorkſhire, and there preached his firſt ſermon in the Church of Oſwaldkirk, near Helmſley, which living was then held by his fellow pupil in the College, Mr John Denton [K]. In July 1661, he attended the Preſbyterian formed us how fond his tutor was of Dr Hill's [the Preſbyterian's] preaching, intimates that he did not imbibe thoſe principles. Diverſe young preachers, ſays he, came up in thoſe times, who were of a freer temper and genius; ſuch were Mr Samuel Jacomb (11), Mr Bright of Emanuel-college (12), Mr Patrick, now Biſhop of Ely, and others who went not that way. Mr Tillotſon ſeemed to be an eclectic man, and not to bind himſelf by opinions. The ſame writer obſerves alſo, that his tutor did not appear to be hotly biaſſed to the preſbyterian government after he came under him. Dr Birch obſerves (13), that there was then a ſet of as extraordinary perſons in the Univerſity as perhaps any age has produced; Dr Ralph Cudworth, Maſter of Chriſt's college; Dr Benjamin Whichcot, Provoſt of King's; Dr Henry More, and Dr George Ruſt [14], Fellows of Chriſt's; Dr *J. [G] The oaths which he had taken.] This is collected from the following obſervation of Mr Beardmore: 'There was a kind of feud, ſays he, in the college 'betwixt the old and the new fellows; for it is well 'known what differences in opinion and affection the 'civil wars created in the nation; which extended to 'the Univerſities, and the particular colleges and ſocie-'ties therein, as well as to other places. The old fel-'lows that then remained in the college had indeed ſo 'far diſpenſed with their judgments, as to have either 'taken the covenant, and after that the engagement as 'it was called, or otherwiſe to have complied ſo far 'with the prevalent powers of thoſe times, as to have 'kept their fellowſhips; but yet ſtill very likely in their 'inward thoughts and inclinations to lean to the ancient 'government both in church and ſtate. I believe Mr 'Tillotſon then, according to the prejudices of his 'education, might be ſomething biaſſed the other way, '(though not very hotly after I came under him) and 'ſo was one of thoſe who lay rather under the diſguſt 'of the ſenior fellows (16).'

[H] He was ordained by the Biſhop of Galloway.] This remarkable fact we owe to the ingenuity of Mr Beardmore, who aſſures us, that he had it from the Archbiſhop's own mouth (17); I mean that he was ordained by this Biſhop in 1660, and the ordination paſſed without any oaths or ſubſcriptions, as appears from the following remarks made by Dr Burnet upon the conduct of this Prelate at that time. 'Dr Thomas Sidſerf, 'ſays he, the only Scots Biſhop who was living at the 'Reſtoration, came up then to London, not doubt-'ing but that he ſhould be advanced to the primacy of 'Scotland; though he failed of his expectations, having 'given offence to the Engliſh Biſhops by his promiſcu-'ous ordinations when he firſt came to England. For, 'when the act of Uniformity required all men, who held 'any benefices there, to be epiſcopally ordained, he 'who, by obſerving the ill effects of the former vio-'lence of the Scots Biſhops, was become very moderate 'with others of the Scots clergy, who gathered about 'him, ordained all thoſe of the Engliſh clergy who 'came to him, without demanding either oaths or ſub-'ſcriptions of them (18).'

[I] He was ejected from his fellowſhip.] This whole affair, ſo much bandied on both ſides, ſeems to be cleared up by Mr Beardmore in the following account. He, Tillotſon, was a probationer to a fellowſhip in 1651, which I think was by mandamus from the higher powers; yet he was not actually admitted into a fellowſhip of ſome conſiderable time, but lived at his own charge. At length, two fellowſhips being declared void, he was received into one of them; and one Mr Newce, who had alſo lived as probationer, was taken into the other. I have heard him ſay, continues Mr Beardmore, the ſociety dealt not fairly with him about that matter. For when, after the Reſtoration in the year 1660, thoſe fellows, who had been turned out upon account of their not taking the Covenant, came to be admitted into their fellowſhips, and, among the reſt, the famous Dr Peter Gunning, he being then a man of intereſt and power, would needs have it, that the fellowſhip, into which Mr Tillotſon had been admitted, was formerly his, though the latter told me he was ſure it was not, but one that was fairly and legally void upon a fellow's leaving it by ceſſion. But the aforeſaid Dr Gunning, having ſome perſonal pique againſt Mr Tillotſon (though at the ſame time he ſaid he could ſcarcely tell wherein he had diſobliged him); yet, I ſay, Dr Gunning ſo wrought with the ſociety, as that they complied with his pretences, and ſo put Mr Tillotſon out of his fellowſhip. This, I have heard him ſay, he had reaſon to take amiſs from the ſociety, as not having done him right, but dealing unkindly with him, who, if there had been nothing elſe in it, deſerved to be eſteemed a benefactor to the College. For inſtance, while he was Tutor to Prideaux's ſons, he obtained, by the Attorney's means, 1000l. to be paid out of the Exchequer to the College for wood and ſtone prepared for carrying on its building (19). Moreover, while he reſided at London, he fell into the acquaintance of an old gentleman, one Mr Diggons, who had formerly been fellow commoner of Clare-hall, and, being a very humourſome perſon, had taken diſguſt againſt ſome of his own relations. In this temper he was prevailed upon to leave 300l. per annum to the College by Mr Tillotſon, who alſo let the profits of his fellowſhip go to the College. As for Dr Gunning, he was very hot and earneſt to put this diſreſpect upon him; for though he knew that he was to be choſen Maſter of Bennet college the very next day (20), and though Mr Tillotſon's merits to the College were inſiſted on and pleaded by ſome at leaſt of the ſociety, yet he was ſo vehement in the buſineſs as to ſay, Let Juſtice be done firſt; and then, if they were minded to do Mr Tillotſon a favour, they might do that afterwards (21).

[K] Mr Denton.] This gentleman contracted a moſt intimate friendſhip at the College with Mr Tillotſon, to whom he was then particularly ſerviceable during a dangerous ſickneſs, attended for ſome time after with a very uncommon kind of intermittent delirium, and a conſtant terian Commiſſioners as an Auditor, in the conference at the Savoy for the review of the Liturgy (o); and in September following, he ſupplied the turn of Dr Bates in preaching at the morning exerciſe at Cripplegate Church, London, undertaken by ſeveral eminent Preſbyterian Divines in the city [L]. The ſame year he complied with the Act of Uniformity, and was appointed Curate to Dr Thomas Hacket, Vicar of Cheſhunt in Hertfordſhire, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his perſuaſive eloquence (p), and as the ſhort diſtance of that place from London allowed him opportunities of viſiting his friends in the city, he was frequently invited into the pulpits there (q), and being preſently taken notice of for his excellent talent at preaching, he was elected Miniſter of St Mary Aldermanbury by the Pariſhioners on the 10th of December, 1662; but declined it, becauſe the vacancy had been made by the refuſal of Mr Edmund Calamy [M] to comply with the Act (r). However, being preſented in June the following year to the Rectory of Ketton, or Kedington in Suffolk, worth 200l. per ann.; he accepted it, though vacated by the ejection of another nonconforming Miniſter (s), in purſuance of the ſame Act of Uniformity. He had been poſſeſſed of this living but a ſhort time, when happening to be in London, he performed the duty of the ſtated Tueſday's Lecture at St Laurence Jury (t). That Sermon procured him the place of Preacher to the Society of Lincoln's-Inn [N], into which he was elected on the 20th of November, 1663, having the appointment of a chamber, and a ſalary of 100 l. per ann. payable by equal portions at the end of every term, with commons for himſelf and a ſervant in term-time, beſides 24 l. allowed him for vacation commons (u). This remove bringing him back among his friends, he made no heſitation in preferring it to his Living in Suffolk, where he was not at all liked [O]. He therefore now willingly reſigned it, having engaged himſelf to reſide conſtantly at Lincoln's-Inn. Soon after his ſettlement in this conſpicuous ſtation, he was deſired to appear in the pulpit before the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London, at St Paul's, where, in March 1663-4, he preached his famous Sermon againſt atheiſm and infidelity, which at their requeſt was afterwards publiſhed with great additions (w), under the title of The Wiſdom of being religious [P]. A little before this, viz. on the 23d of February preceding, he had married Mrs Elizabeth French, Oliver Cromwell's niece, and now daughter-in-law to Dr John Wilkins, Rector of St Laurence Jewry (x), where Mr Tillotſon was elected Tueſday-Lecturer the following year. About this time, the [L] The exerciſe at Cripplegate by ſeveral preſbyterian Divines.] The chief promoter of this exerciſe was Samuel Aneley or Aneſley, then Paſtor of that church, and LL. D. which degree he took on account of his then holding the rich living of Cliffe in Kent (a peculiar, with a juriſdiction belonging to the Incumbent). His contemporaries looked upon the conferring of this degree upon him as a ſcandalous thing. Nay, ſays Mr Wood, ſome of the grave fellows there, particularly Dr Barlow, have ſaid it diverſe times in my hearing, that, if the ſaid Samuel Aneley could have told the meaning or definition of the word Pandectæ, he ſhould have freely had their votes for that degree. On the 26th of July the ſame year, 1648, he preached before the Houſe of Commons, perſuading them to do juſtice upon the King, and not to treat with him any more, yet highly extolled and affirmed the obligation of the Covenant. He afterwards took the Engagement, and was appointed one of the commiſſioners for the approbation and admiſſion of miniſters by the act of March 14, 1659: and after the Reſtoration he refuſed to conform. Among other things he publiſhed, The Morning Exerciſe at Cripplegate, or ſeveral Caſes of Conſcience practically reſolved by ſundry Miniſters, Lond. 1661, 4to. The firſt ſermon is his; and the tenth, entitled, Wherein lies that exact righteouſneſs that is required between man and man, was preached by Mr Tillotſon (24), then a Nonconformiſt (25).

[M] On the refuſal of Mr Edmund Calamy to comply with the act.] Mr Beardmore gives us the following curious anecdote relating to Mr Calamy's refuſal. Mr Tillotſon, ſays he, in the year 1661, told me, that the good old man [Mr Calamy] deliberated about it ſome conſiderable time, profeſſing to ſee the great inconvenience of the preſbyterian parity of miniſters. And ſaid, if Mr Calamy had accepted of the Biſhoprick of Litchfield, which was offered him, Dr Bates had been Dean, and Mr Miles and himſelf were deſigned for two of the Canons. But, as he added alſo, though Mr Calamy was in a manner induced to a willingneſs to have embraced the King's offer, yet Mrs Calamy, being againſt it, over-ruled her huſband, and ſo the matter went off (26).

(26) Beardmore's memorials, p. 388. See what is ſaid of this matter in Mr Calamy's article, rem. [L].

[N] This ſermon procured him the preacher's place at Lincoln's-Inn.] Mr Atkyns, afterwards Lord chief Baron of the Exchequer, then Bencher of that Inn, being preſent at this ſermon, was ſo pleaſed with it, that, going to him in the veſtry, he offered him his intereſt for the place at Lincoln's-Inn, which would be ſoon vacant. The offer being accepted by the preacher, he was accordingly elected upon the ſalary above mentioned, which had been allowed to his predeceſſor (27). Five Maſters of the Bench were appointed to acquaint him with his election, and to inform him of the duty expected from him, that he ſhould preach twice every Lord's day in term-time, and next before and after term, and in reading time, and in every Lord's day in the vacation, and as other occaſions ſhould require, and adminiſter the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper together with the Chaplain of the houſe every term and vacation, and reſide conſtantly in the Society, not abſenting himſelf thence without the leave of the Maſters of the Bench in Council (28).

[O] Where he was not at all liked.] It ſeems the people there, being generally infected with the Soliſidian and Antinomial doctrines, prevalent in that age, had been deliciouſly fed by their former Paſtor with thoſe ſavoury expreſſions of recumbing and reſting and rolling upon Chriſt. Thus pampered, they took great offence at his ſucceſſor's more rational diſcourſes from the pulpit. This being ſoon diſcovered by the preacher, he communicated to his patron his deſign of quitting them upon that account. Sir Thomas, with great civility, endeavoured to perſuade him that he was miſtaken in his ſuſpicion: but his lady, more open, being deſired to ſpeak her mind, acknowledged ingenuouſly, that neither herſelf nor even Sir Thomas, however he might affect to diſguiſe his ſentiments, were at all of a different opinion from the reſt of the pariſh, who univerſally complained, that Jeſus Chriſt had not been preached amongſt them (29) ſince Mr Tillotſon had been ſettled there (30).

(29) He ſeems to allude to this in his ſermon againſt Evil-ſpeaking. I foreſee, ſays he, what will be, becauſe I have heard it ſo often ſaid in the like caſe, that there is not one word of Jeſus Chriſt in all this.

[P] The wiſdom of being religious.] Upon this occaſion he incurred the juſt reproach of having more zeal than knowledge. In the dedication he calls Mr Hobbes a dabbler in mathematics, a cenſure which was neither juſt in itſelf, nor at all becoming the character of the cenſurer, who was no competent judge of what he here aſſerted, and it was very imprudent in him as a Divine, ſince it might be eaſily foreſeen, that this ſingle ſlip might be ſufficient to defeat, if any thing could defeat, all the good intentions of this diſcourſe, excellent as it is, in the front of which it appeared. Mr Hobbes, as was well known, had been the King's Preceptor in Mathematics, and was confeſſedly an able Mathematician, as well as Dr Wilkins: though both fell into notorious paralogiſms in ſome parts of that ſcience.

ſincerity of his affection for the legal eſtabliſhment of the Church began to be ſuſpected by ſome of his old friends and admirers [Q]. However, this Lecture ſuited ſo particularly with his talents, and was ſo agreeable to his humour, that he preſently became the moſt popular Preacher of that time, and his manner was obſerved to be ſo uncommonly prevalent and perſuaſive, that we are told his Lectures were attended by a great concourſe of perſons of quality and diſtinction, and likewiſe of the Clergy, who came thither to form their minds (y). But Mr Tillotſon's labours were not confined to the pulpit alone; his early zeal againſt Popery engaged him in a controverſy with the Author of Sure Footing, &c. againſt which he wrote his Rule of Faith, and publiſhed it in 1668, 8vo. [R]. At the ſame time, he was one of the firſt encouragers of that laborious Work, the Synopſis Criticorum, &c. (z), undertaken this year by Mr Matthew Pool, an ejected nonconformiſt Miniſter, who joined in the controverſy againſt the Papiſts (aa). This year, 1666, likewiſe Mr Tillotſon proceeded D. D. (bb): and in January the next year, entered into the deſign of forming a comprehenſion with the Diſſenters, then propoſed by Sir Orlando Bridgeman, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, and countenanced by Judge Hales (cc), Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer; and though the ſcheme then plainly appeared to be againſt the general bent of the nation [S], yet our Doctor kept it ſtill upon his mind, and even continued to puſh it till his death, whenever he thought the times were favourable (dd). On the 15th of November, 1668, he preached the Sermon at the Conſecration of his father-in-law, Dr Wilkins, to the Biſhopric of Cheſter (ee). This diſcourſe gave general ſatisfaction, and the Preacher's merit began now to be taken notice of at Court. So that in the following year, the King made him one of his Chaplains, and gave him a Prebend in the Cathedral of Canterbury, into which he was admitted March 14, 1669 (ff); but quitted it in Octob. 1672, when he was advanced to the Deanery of that Church by his Majeſty (gg), notwithſtanding he had a little before this intimated his apprehenſions of the King's tendency to the Romiſh Religion [T], and preached that noted Sermon at Whitehall in the beginning of the year, upon the hazard of being ſaved in that Church [U]. In 1674, he joined in a ſecond attempt to bring about his much deſired accommodation with the Nonconformiſts; but having yielded to many articles that were diſapproved by the Biſhops, he was again diſappointed therein [W]: However, this year, by the intereſt of Dr John Sharp, with Lord Chancellor Finch,

[Q] He began to be ſuſpected by ſome of his old friends.] Mr Beardmore, having given Dr Wilkins his juſt character, proceeds thus (31); 'I remember that, about 'May, 1665, being at Coventry, I went to wait upon 'Biſhop Hacket, as he was returning from London to 'Litchfield, who ſpoke much to the commendation of 'Mr Tillotſon as to his learning and preaching, and 'particularly praiſed his ſermon, then newly printed, 'called, The wiſdom of being religious, as the beſt thing 'that ever he ſaw againſt Atheiſm in the compaſs of a 'ſermon. But, ſays he, he is now fallen in with Dr 'Wilkins, and is become a preſbyterian, and an enemy of the 'church of England, or to that purpoſe; and, ſays he, 'he never came to ſee me all this time I have been at 'London; whereas formerly I have converſed with him 'with great familiarity. I did, continues Mr Beardmore, by letter acquaint him of the importance of the 'Biſhop's complaint of him, who returned to me, that 'the opinion which I myſelf had expreſſed of Dr Wilkins's worth was true and juſt; that the Biſhop's fears 'of himſelf being become a preſbyterian were cauſeleſs 'and groundleſs; for that he had long before fixed his 'principles about church-government, and was in no 'likelihood of altering them; and that it was by reaſon 'of his much buſineſs that he had not waited on his 'Lordſhip when in town.'

[R] His rule of faith.] In return to this, Mr Serjeant (whoſe true name was Smith) publiſhed A letter of thanks from the author of ſure footing to his anſwerer, Mr J. T. (32), and this was ſeconded the following year by Faith vindicated from the poſſibility of falſehood; or The immoveable certainty and firmneſs of the motives to the Chriſtian religion aſſerted againſt that tenet, which, denying infallibility of authority, ſubverts its foundation, and renders it uncertain (33). In this piece he attacked a paſſage in p. 31 of Dr Tillotſon's ſermon on the wiſdom of being religious. The Doctor replied to his exceptions to that, and to his Rule of Faith, in the preface to the firſt volume of his ſermons, printed in 1671, 8vo. To this there came out a Rejoinder the following year, entitled Reaſon againſt Raillery, or a full anſwer to Dr Tillotſon's preface againſt J. Serjeant.

(32) According to the title printed at Paris, but really at London.

(33) This too was printed at London, though ſaid, in the title-page, at Louvain.

[S] Plainly appeared to be againſt the general bent of the nation.] Dr Stillingfleet and Mr Hezekiah Burton alſo joined in this project, which was to bring in as many as they could to the communion of the church, and procure a toleration for the reſt; Dr Bates, Dr Manton, and Mr Baxter, being called on the ſide of the preſbyterians. The ſcheme conſiſted chiefly of thoſe things which the King had promiſed in his declaration from Breda in 1660. But the great point of reordination being given up, it was propoſed, that thoſe who had preſbyterian ordination ſhould be received to ſerve in the church by an impoſition of hands, accompanied with words importing, that the perſon ſo ordained ſhould be received to ſerve as a miniſter in the church of England (34). When this treaty came to be publickly known, it was univerſally condemned, inſomuch that when a bill, drawn up by Lord chief Baron Hale, was to be preſented to the parliament, a reſolution paſſed againſt admitting any bill of that nature (35). This is the plain fact, ſtript of the colouring given to it by Biſhop Burnet from his zealous attachment to this ſcheme, and under that caution the following remark of his upon it in another place is to be read. "But this treaty, ſays he, becoming the ſubject of common diſcourſe, a clamour was raiſed, eſpecially by the friends of the Earl of Clarendon, diſgraced in Auguſt, 1667, and now in baniſhment, that the church was undermined and betrayed (36)."

[T] His apprehenſions of the King's inclination to popery.] Upon his Majeſty's proclamation for liberty of conſcience, March 15, 1671, the Biſhops in general, and my Lord of London in particular, charged the clergy to preach againſt popery. The King complaining to Archbiſhop Sheldon of this, as done on purpoſe to inflame the people, and alienate them from himſelf and his government, that prelate called together ſome of the clergy to conſider what he ſhould ſay to his Majeſty, if he preſſed him any further on that head; when Dr Tillotſon, who was one of theſe, ſuggeſted this anſwer, that, ſince his Majeſty profeſſed the proteſtant religion, it would be a thing without precedent that he ſhould forbid his clergy to preach in defence of a religion which they believed, while he declared himſelf of it. But there was no occaſion for this or any other anſwer, his Majeſty never renewing the motion (37).

[U] A ſermon on the hazard of ſalvation in the church of Rome.] This, they ſay, ſays Mr Beardmore, ſo nettled the duke of York, who was preſent, having to this time concealed himſelf, and, being a Papiſt in maſquerade, frequented the King's chapel, that he forſook it afterwards, and never more appeared there (38).

[W] He was again diſappointed.] This attempt was in conjunction with the ſame perſons as the former, Tillotſon and Stillingfleet declaring they had encouragement of ſeveral Lords both ſpiritual and temporal. They were at firſt met by Mr Baxter alone, with whom having conſidered and canvaſſed various draughts, one was at length fixed on in which they agreed, and, being communicated to the other Nonconformiſts, was

Finch, afterwards Earl of Nottingham, the Dean was preſented, December 18, 1675, to the Prebend of Ealdland, in the Church of St Paul's (bb); and the ſame year, he publiſhed Dr Wilkins's Principles of Natural Religion (ii), with a recommendatory Preface. The year 1617 was lucky to him, in preſenting the opportunity he had of ſhewing a particular regard for the Prince and Princeſs of Orange at Canterbury, in their way to Holland, after their marriage [X]. On the 14th of February the ſame year, 1667-8, reſigning his Prebend of Ealdland, aforementioned, he obtained that of Oxgate, together with a Reſidentiaryſhip of the ſame Church (kk). In 1678, the Dean publiſhed Dr Barrow's Treatiſe of the Pope's Supremacy, in purſuance of the Author's dying requeſt to him (ll). The ſame year he loſt his brother, Joſhua Tillotſon, who died on the 16th of September, of a vomiting of blood [Y]. But this month was more remarkably diſtinguiſhed by the diſcovery of the problematical Popiſh Plot, and the Parliament meeting on the 21ſt of October, a few days after the murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, the Dean was appointed to preach before the Commons on the 5th of November following. As from the whole tenor of his Sermons and other writings, his thoughts appear to be continually agitated with the apprehenſions of Popery, ſo this appointment furniſhed him with the fitteſt occaſion that could be of opening all his mind upon that ſubject, and he even excelled himſelf therein [Z]. Yet this excellence was preſently tarniſhed, by his Sermon preached on the 3d of December following, at the Yorkſhire feaſt, when the high tide of his zeal for a comprehenſion, drove him foul againſt that rock upon which he had ſo often run before, to the no ſmall damage of his reputation [AA]. This damage ſeems however to be ſufficiently repaired, by the great ſhare he had in bringing the Earl of Shrewſbury to the Church of England (mm), in 1679 (n). But the heat of his zeal againſt Popery, betrayed him into ſuch an exceſs, as laid him open to the cenſures of all parties [BB]; and upon the death of Wilmot, ſatisfactory to them; but, the Biſhops refuſing their conſent to many particulars in it, the treaty was ſoon at an end. Mr Baxter ſent to Dr Tillotſon to know whether he might have leave to ſpeak of it, in order to the promoting concord, and to ſignify how far they were agreed, that their names might be ſome advantage to the work. Upon which the Doctor returned him an anſwer, April 11, 1675, informing him, that he had taken the firſt opportunity to ſpeak to the Biſhop of Sarum [Dr Seth Ward] who promiſed to keep the matter private, and only to acquaint the Biſhop of Cheſter [Dr Pearſon] with it, in order to a meeting. But, upon ſome general diſcourſe, he plainly perceived ſeveral things could not be obtained. That however the Biſhop of Sarum had promiſed to appoint a time of meeting; and that he had not heard from his Lordſhip ſince. For his own part he was unwilling that his name ſhould be uſed in this matter; not but that he did moſt heartily deſire an accommodation, and ſhould always endeavour it; but that he was ſure it would be a prejudice to him, and ſignify nothing to the effecting of the thing, which, as circumſtances were, could not paſs in either houſe without the concurrence of a conſiderable part of the Biſhops, and the countenance of his Majeſty, which, for the preſent, he ſaw little reaſon to expect (39).

[Y] He loſt his brother Joſhua.] This brother was an oilman in London [41], and, being frequently viſited by the Dean, happened to be there, when Mr Sharp, afterwards Archbiſhop of York, coming in upon buſineſs with the brother, that incident gave riſe to the acquaintance and friendſhip that ever after ſubſiſted between the two Archbiſhops (42). Mr Joſhua Tillotſon (43) left a ſmall proviſion for his ſon, who was taken care of by the Archbiſhop during his life, and afterwards Mrs Tillotſon ſent him to Clare-hall, where he ſupported him till he became Fellow; and, during the courſe of his education, was honoured with the favour of Lord Somers, out of regard to his uncle's memory, which was acknowledged by him in a Latin letter ſtill extant. Upon entering into orders he was preſented to the Sinecure of Elme, of conſiderable value, in the iſle of Ely, by the Executors of the Archbiſhop, to whoſe diſpoſal that option was left (44). Upon this preferment he reſigned his Fellowſhip; but, continuing unmarried, lived in lodgings at Cambridge, where I knew him ſometime between the years 1722 and 1728.

[Z] He excelled himſelf therein.] The following paſſage is ſo extremely beautiful, and beſides ſo perfectly characteriſtic of him, that I cannot forbear laying it before the Reader. 'I can truly ſay, as the Roman Orator 'did of himſelf upon another occaſion, me natura miſericordem, patria tenerum, crudelem nec patria nec natura eſſe voluit; my nature inclines me to be tender and 'compaſſionate: a hearty zeal for our religion, and 'concernment for the public welfare of my country, 'may perhaps have made me a little ſevere; but neither 'my natural diſpoſition, nor the genius of the proteſtant, that is, the true Chriſtian, religion, will allow 'me to be cruel.'

[AA] His ſermon at the Yorkſhire feaſt hurt his reputation.] The obnoxious paſſage is as follows: 'It is not 'for private perſons to undertake in matters of public 'concernment: but I think we have no cauſe to doubt 'but the governors of our church, notwithſtanding all 'the advantages of authority, and we think of reaſon 'too, on our ſide, are perſons of that piety and prudence, 'that, for peace ſake, and in order to a firm union 'among Proteſtants, they would be content, if that 'would do the buſineſs, not to inſiſt upon little things, 'but to yield them up, whether to the infirmity or 'importunity, or perhaps, in ſome things, to the 'plauſible exceptions of thoſe who differ from us.' Mr Beardmore, having cited this paſſage, tells us, a Doctor that he was in company with expreſſed himſelf very much diſſatisfied with it, ſaying, what had he to do, being but a private Doctor, to undertake this without the conſent of his ſuperiors; a cenſure which is left without any particular anſwer by this friend (45).

(45) In his memorials, p. 402, 403.

[BB] A ſermon which laid him open to the cenſures of all parties.] It was intitled, The Proteſtant religion vindicated from the charge of ſingularity and novelty; where he has theſe words: 'I cannot think, till I be better informed, 'which I am always ready to be, that any pretence of 'conſcience warrants any man, that is not extraordinarily commiſſioned, as the Apoſtles and firſt Publiſhers 'of the Goſpel were, and cannot juſtify that commiſſion 'by miracles as they did, to affront the eſtabliſhed religion of a nation, though it be falſe, and openly to 'draw men off from the profeſſion of it, in contempt 'of the magiſtrate and the law. All that perſons of a 'different religion can in ſuch a caſe reaſonably pretend 'to, is to enjoy the private liberty and exerciſe of their 'own conſcience and religion, for which they ought 'to be very thankful, and to forbear the open making 'of proſelytes to their own religion (though they be never 'ſo ſure that they are in the right) till they have either 'an extraordinary commiſſion from God to that purpoſe, 'or the providence of God make way for it by the permiſſion of the magiſtrate.' Dr Hickes obſerves (46), that a witty Lord, ſtanding at the King's elbow when this was delivered, ſaid, Sir, Sir, do you hear Mr Hobbes in the pulpit? which is confirmed by Dr Calamy, who tells a long ſtory of the Dean's being catechized by Mr Howe ſo ſeverely as to draw tears from him, and a confeſſion of his miſtake (47). Dr Hickes further ſays, that not only Dr Gunning, then Biſhop of Ely, complained of this ſermon in the Houſe of Lords, as containining a doctrine that would ſerve the cauſe of Popery, but

Wilmot, Earl of Rochester, attended with a signal repentance the following year, the Dean made a remark in favour of the opinion, espoused afterwards by Mr Bayle, that idolatry is worse than atheism [CC]. In the mean time, he appeared warmly this year on the side of the Bill of Exclusion against the Duke of York, and employed his interest with Lord Hallifax to divert him from opposing it (mm). He likewise refused to sign the address of the Clergy of London to his Majesty, upon his declaration that he could not consent to such a bill (*); before the end of the year, he censured the Bishops for opposing the two bills, then in agitation, for an indulgence and union with the Dissenters [DD]. In the summer of 1681, he lost the younger of his two daughters (nn); and in 1682, he wrote an admirable letter to the Lady Henrietta, daughter to the Lord Berkeley, on her yielding to a criminal conversation with Ford Lord Grey of Werke, who had married her sister (oo). This year he also published Dr Wilkins's Sermons, with a Preface, which shews how capable he was of being carried to excesses upon some occasions [EE]. In 1683, he published Dr Barrow's Sermons, in three volumes folio, with a criticism upon them, under the title of an Advertisement (pp) [FF]; and the same year he preached the Funeral Sermon of Dr Benjamin Whichecot, successor to Dr Wilkins in the Vicarage of St Laurence Jewry, in which church the Dean still held the Tuesday's Lecture. This proved a melancholy year for the Dean, by the discovery of the Rye-house and Fanatic Plot, wherein some of his intimate friends were engaged, especially the Lord John Russel, for whom he appeared as a witness at his trial, and attended him after his condemnation. During this attendance, he was greatly abused by a misrepresentation of that Lord, given to him by Dr Burnet, which occasioned the writing of his much canvassed letter in vindication of the principle of non-

(pp) This task had employed the Dean for several years, and cost him as much pains as would have produced many more of his own. The Sermons chiefly commended by him, are those upon the vices of the tongue, and the two against pragmaticalness.

but cites an extract of a letter from Dr Patrick to Dr Samuel Parker, then Archdeacon of Canterbury, full of the sharpest animadversions upon it. But Dr Calamy's story does not agree with what the Dean wrote to Mr Nelson on this occasion on the 27th of July the same year, that these animadversions did not seem to him very considerable: 'However, I am sorry, continues 'he, that any thing of mine should occasion so much 'talk and noise.' Accordingly he republished the sermon the same year, without taking notice of a new edition in the title-page, in which, after the word permission, he added, or connivance of the Magistrate (48). All the subsequent separate editions passed without any more alterations: but in the third volume of his sermons (49), in 1686, 8vo, he added a paragraph of near a page, after the words permission or connivance of the magistrate, beginning thus; not but that every man hath a right, &c. and ending with the word sufferings.

(48) There was also this passage in the sermon: Religion is the band of human society, and God so necessary to the welfare and happiness of mankind, as he could not have been more, &c. which he altered thus: Religion is the band &c. and so necessary &c. that it could could not have been more, &c.

(49) It is in the 9th Sermon, and in that Volume.

[CC] Idolatry is worse than Atheism.] Among some other reflections entered into his common-place book on this occasion, Dr Birch has given (50) us the following: 'Atheism and Infidelity do not bind up the senses 'of men strongly enough, but they may be awakened 'by the apprehensions of death, or some great calamity 'coming upon them. A false religion, if a man be 'sincere in it, will bear up a man's spirits against tor-'ments and death, because every man's conscience is a 'kind of God to him. And the strongest opiates in 'this world are Enthusiasm and Popery. These may 'lock up men's senses against the power of truth to 'awaken them, as we see in the murderers of our late 'Sovereign, and in our present Romish conspirators.' These remarks are dated October 1: and in a letter to Mr Nelson, wrote August 1st preceding, the Dean expresses himself on the same occasion thus: 'I am sorry 'that an example, which might have been of so much 'use and advantage to the world, is soon taken from us. 'But God had pity on him, and would not venture him 'again in such circumstances of temptation as were 'perhaps too hard for human frailty (51).' This diving into the secrets of God's moral government (so far as is signified in these last words) above what he has given us to know, is not peculiar to Dr Tillotson. It is a faculty which we see too frequently assumed by God's spiritual ministers. Though it would be hard to prove any except a prescriptive right, obtained by immemorial custom, that they have to it.

(50) Tillotson's Life, P. 71.

(51) The same remark, in almost the same words, is inserted into the account of Lord Rochester's death by Burnet, p. 117. edit. 1724.

[DD] He censures the Bishops.] It is in a letter to Mr Nelson, then at Paris, dated March 7, 1680-1, where he acquaints that friend, that 'there was little 'progress made the last parliament towards a reconcilia-'tion of Dissenters. Two bills were brought into the 'House of Commons for that purpose: the one called 'a bill of Indulgence, to mitigate the severity of the 'laws towards those who would not come into the 'national constitution; the other of Union, by which 'the new subscriptions were to be taken away, and the 'ceremonies left indifferent. I never saw the bills, 'but this was the substance of them, which, so far as 'I can learn, pleased neither side. The Bishops thought 'this too much, and the Dissenters too little. I have 'no great hopes of any good issue of this matter, till 'the minds of men become more calm (52).'

(52) Birch, p. 81, 82. See Bishop Burnet's Hist. of his own time, Vol. I.

[EE] A preface which shews him capable of being carried to excesses.] In defending the Bishop against a character given of him in the Historia & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. he avoids mentioning any author. 'This, he says, he was 'not curious to know.' And indeed Mr Wood was as obnoxious to him as Bishop Fell, or any others concerned in that book, being hearty against his comprehension project, and besides under the displeasure of Dr Burnet, who had dignified him with the title of a Scribbler, and one that had no reputation to lose (53). However, Dr Birch has ventured to fix the drawing of this character of Dr Wilkins upon Bishop Fell (54), proper notice of which has been already taken in the course of this work (55). But we have an undeniable authority, that this was not any of the insertions complained of by Mr Wood, from his remark under Dr Wilkins's article in the Athen. Oxon. where, having given that Bishop a very high character, he concludes thus: 'To pass by 'the character given of him in discourse by the great 'men of the church, Archbishop Sheldon, Bishop Fell, 'and Archbishop Dolben, who did malign him for his 'wavering and unconstant mind in religion, which I 'know will be displeasing to many (56), &c.' This being wrote after Dean Tillotson's censure, now in question, it is much more than probable, that the Historian would in this place have taken notice of any alteration in the article mentioned in his former book, had he entertained the least suspicion of it. On the contrary, we find he was not without some suspicion of Tillotson's having altered the Athen. Oxon. and expressly charges him with revising his manuscript without his privity or consent (57). After all, great allowances ought to be made for an Author's life, written to be prefixed to his works, which is therefore very excusable in this now before us, and the more so on account of the relation between them. But this made it more necessary, upon the plan of our work, impartially to set the fact as far as might be in its true light. Neither does Archbishop Tillotson's character stand in need of being set off by a foil made at the expence of Bishop Fell, which will unluckily prompt a remark in his favour, that, not long before the publication of this preface, he had preached his celebrated sermon before the House of Commons (58), wherein he warmly and smartly exposes Tillotson's comprehension scheme, and where, at the same time, he shewed himself such a perfect master in the gift of rebuking with authority, as naturally leads to a reflection upon Tillotson's remarkable defect in that most useful talent of a Preacher.

[FF] He published Dr Barrow's sermons.] It was suggested, that great part of the Dean's excellence as a preacher was owing to his use of the works of this friend. But this reflection is inconsistent with the chronology of their lives. Dr Tillotson was eminent in his profession in the year 1663, and had given the public the first volume of his sermons in 1671. In which year appeared the first and only sermon published by Dr Barrow.

reſiſtance and paſſive obedience (qq). All ſucceſsleſs plots are obſerved to ſtrengthen the hands of the Crown, and invigorate thoſe meaſures in the Adminiſtration, which it is their aim to overſet; ſo after the defeat of this plot, that was conducted by the proteſtant party, the Papiſts, as was natural, triumphed more boldly, and grew more daring than before. By this means our Dean being ill at eaſe in town, purchaſed a houſe at Edmonton (rr), whither he retired about this time; and as the Papiſts became the prevaling power in the ſucceeding reign, he kept his reſidence ſtill in this country-houſe till the Revolution. However, all the time he continued his preaching, both at Lincoln's-Inn, and St Laurence, with his uſual freedom, or rather with more zeal and fervency againſt Popery. His Diſcourſe on Tranſubſtantiation (ss), printed towards the end of King Charles the Second's Life, begun the debate with that doctrine, and led the way into the controverſy with the Papiſts, which was kept up as long as King James II. kept his ſeat on the Throne; and in 1685, the Dean ſhewed himſelf warmly in the cauſe of the French Refugees [GG], who had fled into England on the repeal of the Edict of Nantes. In the latter end of this year, he gave great offence to the famous William Penn, the Quaker, by confirming the reflection that was then thrown upon him, of being a Jeſuit; but being afterwards convinced that his ſuſpicions were groundleſs, he aſked that Gentleman's pardon, and at his requeſt gave him all the ſatisfaction that he required, in juſtice to his character (tt). In 1687, the Dean loſt his eldeſt daughter, and laſt ſurviving of his children (uu), and not long after, was himſelf ſeized with an apoplectic fit, which, however, went off at this time without any fatal conſequences (ww). Under theſe impreſſions, he wrote a conſolatory letter to a friend, then ill of an incurable cancer (x). In the ſeaſon next year, 1688, he went to Tunbridge wells for the re-eſtabliſhment of his health, where he had the honour of converſing frequently with the Princeſs Ann of Denmark, and having preached before her againſt Popery (y), on the 2d of September, he went immediately to Canterbury, whence he wrote two letters to Lady Ruſſel, declaring his opinion, that the nation was more inclined to his darling ſcheme of a comprehenſion, than it had been. Upon the Revolution, his ſhare was one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed in the national good fortune. As ſoon as the Prince of Orange had ſettled himſelf at St James's, the Dean was deſired to preach before him, on Sunday January the 6th, being Twelfth Day, and upon the thankſgiving day on the 31ſt of that month, in a Sermon at Lincoln's-Inn, he laboured to prove that deliverance to be wrought by an immediate divine agency. His ſituation, with reſpect to the Court, was ſo much improved, that he became a ſucceſsful Interceſſor on this change for others (zz), who had occaſion for his kindneſs, and he was ſo zealous a friend to King William, that he prevailed with the Princeſs Ann, much againſt her inclination, to reſign her eventual claim to the Crown upon her ſiſter's death (aaa); though he muſt needs be ſenſible, that it was likely in the iſſue to prove, as it actually did, more than a ſingle injury to that Princeſs. On the 27th of March, 1689, he was appointed Clerk of the Cloſet to his Majeſty (bbb), and eaſily obtained the Deanery of St Paul's from the King; who then communicated to him his intention to promote him to the See of Canterbury, if Dr Sancroft, as he ſeemed determined, ſhould incur a ſentence of deprivation (ccc). This the Dean took pains to avoid, as being very diſagreeable to his temper. Notwithſtanding the Act of Toleration paſſed this year (ddd), yet that not ſatisfying the Diſſenters, their friends made another attempt for a comprehenſion, which was laid before the Parliament, under the title of A bill for uniting all Proteſtant Diſſenters. But the Dean obſerving the unlikelihood of ſucceeding in the deſign that way (eee), perſuaded the King to take another method, which was to lay it before the Convocation, to be paſſed there (fff). In purſuance of this advice, a Commiſſion was iſſued out by the King, on the 13th of September, to ten Biſhops, and twenty Divines, among whom was our Dean. They opened their Commiſſion at the Jeruſalem-chamber, on the 10th of October following; but ſo greatly was this affair diſliked, that ſome of theſe Commiſſioners declined to aſſiſt at their meetings, and upon the aſſembling of the Convocation on the 21ſt of the next month, when thoſe members of the lower houſe who were friends to the Dean's deſign, put him up for the place of Prolocutor, he was rejected by a majority of two to one in favour of Dr Jane, Regius Profeſſor of Divinity at Oxford, who, upon his preſentation to the upper houſe, in order to ſhew their fixt reſolution to oppoſe it, concluded his ſpeech by way of triumph with thoſe famous words, Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari; and to make this ſcheme for carrying that deſign the more odious, it was branded with the title of a new Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion (ggg). Notwithſtanding this ſpirit againſt any alteration at all, yet on the miſcarriage of his new deſign, the Dean formed another, of a new book of homilies, to be added to that already eſtabliſhed. About the ſame time their Majeſties having publiſhed proclamations againſt profane ſwearing, ſabbath-breaking, lewdneſs and drunkenneſs; the Dean deſired Biſhop Burnet to draw, for an eſſay, homilies on thoſe ſubjects, promiſing to take a large ſhare of the reſt of the work on himſelf (hhh). On the 7th of March this year, he preached before the Queen at Whitehall his remarkable Sermon againſt the abſolute eternity of hell torments, which being publiſhed ſoon after, helped to render him more unpopular to the Clergy than before (iii). In 1690, being appointed to preach on ſeveral public occaſions caſions before the Houſe of Commons, the Lord Mayor, and the Queen, he performed each in a ſtrain intirely devoted to the Court, and the See of Canterbury becoming vacant, by the deprivation of Archbiſhop Sancroft on the firſt of February (kkk) the laſt year, though he ſtill endeavoured to avoid that dignity, notwithſtanding the King's repeated importunities for his acceptance of it then, and for ſeveral months after (lll); yet he yielded at length, about the month of October, having obtained a promiſe from his Majeſty to provide for his wife if ſhe ſhould happen to ſurvive him, which promiſe in a few days was likewiſe confirmed to him by the Queen (mmm): who having received a MS. tract from Dr Frederic Spanheim, Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden, tending to promote the comprehenſion, put it into the Dean's hands, to whom the Profeſſor had likewiſe ſent a Latin letter on the ſame ſubject; in his anſwer to which, the Dean diſſuades this foreigner from intermeddling with the diſputes in England, and charges the Diſſenters, as well as the Churchmen, with too much ſtiffneſs upon that point. This letter is dated February 6, 1690-1 (nnn); and upon the King's return from Flanders in April following, the Dean was nominated to the Archbiſhopric on the 23d of that month. The Conge d'elire was made out on the 1ſt of May, and he was elected on the 10th, confirmed on the 28th, and conſecrated at Bow-Church on the 31ſt. He was ſworn of the Privy-Council on the 4th of June, and on the 11th of July had a reſtitution of the temporalities belonging to his See. The Queen likewiſe granted him all the profits of it from the Michaelmas preceding, amounting to upwards of 2500l. (ooo). However, he continued at the Deanery-houſe of St Paul's, till he had built a large apartment for his wife at Lambeth; he alſo repaired the whole palace, altered the windows and lights of the Archbiſhop's lodgings, wainſcotted ſeveral rooms, and made other improvements, which being finiſhed, he removed thither on the 26th of November, 1691 (ppp). Upon this promotion, he experienced the truth of what he conſtantly apprehended, and indeed might eaſily be foreſeen in the then preſent temper of the nation, ſome very ſevere cenſures that were thrown out againſt him (qqq) in print. But, when the King, who was much intereſted in his reputation, ordered ſome of the publiſhers and diſperſers of the papers to be apprehended, he uſed all his power to ſtop the proſecution (rrr) [HH]: and the year was not expired, when he began to write down for his own uſe, ſuch reflections as the ſeveral occurrences of his new ſtation ſuggeſted to him. In the beginning of the next year, 1692, the Archbiſhop having drawn up a circular letter for his Province, in the proſecution of his project for a comprehenſion, communicated it on the 11th of April to eight Biſhops, who unanimouſly approved the deſign (sss). The ſame month, he was found to be excluded the offer of pardon in King James the Second's declaration (ttt), ſent over to England previouſly to his ſucceſsleſs attempt to recover the throne. The ſame year he had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing how highly pleaſing his favourite ſcheme of an union with the Diſſenters at home was to the Proteſtants abroad (uuu). October 27 this year, he preached a thankſgiving Sermon before their Majeſties, in which the ardor of his devotion for the King, laid the Preacher open to the ſevere laſhes of his enemies [II]; whoſe heat, on the other hand, betrayed them into ſome unwarranted aſperſions upon his conduct, with regard to the Epiſcopal Church of Scotland [KK]. (ttt) This declaration is ſaid to be drawn up by Sir James Montgomery, Author of a very ſevere pamphlet againſt the Government, intitled, Great Britain's juſt Complaint, printed in 1692.

[HH] He endeavoured to ſtop the proſecution.] viz. on his own account: but this having given ſome uneaſineſs to the Lady Ruſſel, at whoſe inſtance this proſecution was begun in defence of her Lord's memory, his Grace wrote to her Ladyſhip as follows: 'I intreat you to give 'my very humble ſervice to my Lord of Bedford, and 'to let his Lordſhip know how far I have been concerned 'in this affair. I had notice firſt from Mr Attorney-'General and Mr Sollicitor, and then from my Lord —, 'that ſeveral perſons, upon the account of publiſhing 'and diſperſing ſeveral libels againſt me, were ſecured 'in order for proſecution: upon which I went to wait 'upon them ſeverally, and earneſtly deſired of them 'that no body might be puniſhed on my account; that 'this was not the firſt time I had experience of this kind 'of malice, which, how unpleaſant ſoever to me, I 'thought it the wiſeſt way to neglect, and the beſt to 'forgive it. None of them ſaid any thing to me of my 'Lord Ruſſel, nor did it ever enter into my thoughts 'to hinder any proſecution on his account, &c. (60).' One of theſe pamphlets was a letter, firſt ſent to the Archbiſhop's Lady for him, and alſo a copy to the Counteſs of Derby for the Queen, and then publiſhed in print. In this his Grace's letter to Lord John Ruſſel was reprinted, with ſeveral animadverſions, ſuggeſting his inſincerity, or his apoſtacy, as it is there called, from what he had formerly preached and written (61); and to the ſame purpoſe, ſoon after his promotion, while a gentleman was with him who came to pay his compliments upon it, a packet was brought in, ſealed, and directed to his Grace, upon opening of which there appeared a maſk incloſed, but nothing written. The Archbiſhop, without any ſigns of emotion, threw it careleſsly among his papers on the table; and, on the gentleman's expreſſing great ſurprize and indignation at the affront, his Grace only ſmiled, and ſaid, that this was a gentle rebuke, if compared with ſome others that lay there in black and white, pointing to the papers on the table (62). We have another ſtory to the ſame effect, told by Dr Sherlock, that, after the Archbiſhop's death, there was found in his ſtudy a bundle of papers, on which was written by his Grace; Theſe are libels; pray God forgive them; I do (63). We muſt not however from hence infer, that he ſat ſo tamely under theſe abuſes as to make no kind of repriſals. On the contrary we are aſſured, that, in a ſermon which is loſt, he took occaſion to complain of the uſage he had received from the Nonjuring party, and to expoſe in return the inconſiſtency of their own conduct, remarking particularly, that, upon a juſt compariſon of their principle of non-reſiſtance with their actual non-aſſiſtance to King James II, they had little reaſon to boaſt of their loyalty to him (64).

A piece of falſe eloquence, which, though not uſual in his Grace's writing, was ſeverely handled by Dr Hickes (65), and rallied by Dr South as a peculiar ſtrain of rhetoric (66).

[KK] His conduct with regard to the epiſcopal church of Scotland.] In a letter from Mr Robert Pearſe, Vice-principal of Edmund-hall in Oxford, dated January 11, 1715, and printed in the life of our Archbiſhop in 1717 (67). We are told, that there was found in the ſtudy of Mr Creech of All-Souls College, when his books were ſold by auction at Oxford, the following memorandum: That whatever ſteps were taken, and all that was done for the aboliſhing of Epiſcopacy and ſubverſion of the Church of Scotland, was done by the contrivance, advice, and approbation of Dr Tillotſon.

This

mons preached many years before, on the Divinity and Incarnation of Chriſt [LL], with a view of clearing himſelf from the charge of Socinianiſm, which he managed ſo impolitickly, as ſerved to aggravate the charge [MM]. This undeſerved malice of his oppoſers, joined to the defection of his friends, who now began to look more cooly upon him than before, made ſo deep an impreſſion upon the ſenſibility of his temper, as ſunk him into a degree of melancholy [NN]. In 1694, he publiſhed ſix Sermons upon the advantage of an early piety; and towards the end of June this year, he drew up a prayer of interceſſion for Lady Ruſſel, then afflicted with the loſs of her eye-ſight, wherein the execution of Lord Ruſſel is ſignified to be unjuſt (wwww). After this, he aſſembled another meeting of ſeveral of the Biſhops at Lambeth, who concurred with him in many regulations concerning the Church. Theſe he at firſt deſigned to inforce by his own authority in conjunction with thoſe Biſhops; but upon more mature conſideration, he thought it better, upon the ſuggeſtion of Dr Burnet, they ſhould appear under that of their Majeſties in the form of royal injunctions, to which purpoſe he made a draught then in a letter intended to be ſigned by their Majeſties, and communicated them to the Biſhops Stillingfleet and Burnet for their correction and approbation (xxx). This being done in the King's abſence, he laid them before the Queen, by whom the execution was deferred to the King's return from Flanders (yyy). In the interim, he reviſed and altered in ſeveral places, Biſhop Burnet's Expoſition of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, which had been undertaken by that Prelate, at the requeſt of the Queen, with the concurrence of the Archbiſhop (zzz), who in a letter, dated October 23, to the Author on this occaſion, declared himſelf unſatisfied with the account given therein of Athanaſius's Creed, and wiſhed it might be expunged out of the Liturgy (aaaa). He did not long ſurvive the writing of this letter, for on Sunday the 18th of November following, he was ſeized the ſecond time with an apoplectic diſorder, in the Chapel at Whitehall. The fit coming on ſlowly, he bore it ſo well as not to interrupt the ſervice; but it ſeemed to be fatal, and ſoon turned to a dead palſy, which deprived him, in a great meaſure, of the uſe of his ſpeech; but his underſtanding was ſtill clear (bbbb): he continued ſerene and calm, and in broken words ſaid to this effect, that he thanked God he was quiet within, and had nothing then to do but to wait the will of Heaven (cccc). The two laſt nights of his illneſs, he was attended by his friend, Mr Robert Nelſon, in whoſe arms he

This I had from Johnſon, who was certain of it, and knew the whole matter when I was in the North. In anſwer to this Dr Birch obſerves, that, as the Epiſcopal party, after the Revolution, ſtill continued to adhere to King James, it was not poſſible for King William to preſerve Epiſcopacy, which was aboliſhed by an act of the Scots parliament on July 22, 1689 (68), but ſo as that the Epiſcopalians ſhould ſubmit to the Preſbyterian form of church-government then [in 1693] eſtabliſhed, viz. by Preſbyteries, Provincial Synods, and a General Aſſembly: and after this, though it appears that his Grace was ſometimes conſulted with regard to the terms of a comprehenſion between the Epiſcopal and Preſbyterian miniſters, yet he endeavoured to moderate the terms inſiſted on by the latter (69). In reality there ſeems to be no more in this charge, but that he uſed no means either to preſerve or reſtore Epiſcopacy, to which the King in this affair ſhewed no inclination. And this is all that ought to be underſtood by the memorandum here cited. For it has been already obſerved (70), that the Author of this cenſure, Mr Johnſon, was a moſt inveterate enemy to the Archbiſhop, whoſe friendſhip to him was at the ſame time equally inextinguiſhable.

[LL] His ſermons on the Incarnation and Divinity of Chriſt.] He ſent a copy (one of the firſt) from the preſs to Mr Firmin (71), who publiſhed an anſwer to them, and gave it himſelf to his Grace (72), who, having read it over, ſaid to him, My Lord of Sarum ſhall humble you. Mr John Williams wrote a rejoinder (73) to Mr Firmin's piece, and to it is ſubjoined a letter to the Author from Dr Burnet, Biſhop of Sarum, in which he ſpeaks with great contempt and ſeverity of the late pieces publiſhed in England in defence of the Unitarian principles.

[MM] He increaſed the load of that charge.] This may be ſeen in a piece already cited (74), entitled, The charge of Socinianiſm againſt Dr Tillotſon conſidered, &c. Edinburgh, 1695, 4to, which the Author declares to be written before the Archbiſhop's death. But it is worth while to ſee what Mr Jortin ſays of this and other aſperſions of the Archbiſhop on this account. 'Tillotſon, 'ſays that ſmart Writer, publiſhed theſe ſermons on the 'Divinity of Chriſt, to vindicate himſelf from the 'charge of Socinianiſm, that is, from an accuſation 'entirely groundleſs. I have been told that Crellius, 'a Socinian, (and a deſcendant from the more celebrated 'Crellius) who uſed, when he came over hither, to viſit 'the Archbiſhop and converſe with him, juſtified him 'on this head, and declared, that Tillotſon had often 'diſputed with him in a friendly way upon the ſubject 'of the Trinity, and that he was the beſt reaſoner, 'and had the moſt to ſay for himſelf, of any adverſary 'he had ever encountered.

'But then Tillotſon had made ſome conceſſions concerning the Socinians, which never were nor ever will 'be forgiven him (75), and hath broken an ancient and 'fundamental rule of theological controverſy, allow not 'an adverſary to have either common ſenſe or common ho-'neſty (76).'

[NN] He grew melancholy.] In a letter to Lady Ruſſel, dated October 19, 1693, he writes thus: 'The King's 'return is now only hindered by contrary winds; pray 'God to ſend him ſafe to us, and to direct him what 'to do when he is come. I was never ſo much at my 'wit's end concerning the public. God only can 'bring us out of the labyrinth we are in, and I truſt 'he will. Never, ſince I knew the world, had I ſo 'much reaſon to value my friends. In the condition 'I now am, I can have no new ones; or, if I could, 'I can have no aſſurance that they are ſo. I could not 'at a diſtance believe the upper end of the world was 'ſo hollow as I find it. I except a very few, of whom 'I can believe no ill, till I plainly ſee it (77).' Agreeably to this Biſhop Burnet tells us, that, as his Grace did not enter into any cloſe correſpondence, or the concerting meaſures with the miniſtry, but lived much abſtracted from them, they likewiſe (as well as the clergy) endeavoured to depreſs him all they could. This made a conſiderable impreſſion upon him, and he grew very uneaſy in his great poſt (78). We find this dejection ſtill encreaſed; for, in the preface to his ſermons upon the advantage of an early piety, publiſhed the next year, 1694, he expreſſes his hope that he ſhould be releaſed for the remainder of his life from the irkſome and unpleaſant taſk of controverſy and wrangling about religion, and his reſolution of turning his thoughts to ſomething more agreeable to his temper, being ſenſible how faſt the infirmities of age were coming upon him. I knew very well, continues he, before I entered upon this great and weighty charge, my own manifold defects, and how unequal my beſt abilities were to the due diſcharge of it. But I did not feel this ſo ſenſibly as I now do every day more and more.

expired on the fifth day of it, Thurſday November 22, 1694 (dddd), in the ſixty-fifth year of his age (eeee). His death was univerſally lamented, and his funeral was attended by a numerous train of coaches, filled with perſons of rank and condition, who aſſiſted at that ſolemnity from Lambeth to the Church of St Laurence Jewry, where his corpſe was interred on the 30th of that month, and a neat monument, with his buſt, afterwards erected to his memory by his widow [OO]. His Funeral Sermon was preached by Biſhop Burnet, in the courſe whereof he was interrupted by a ſhort flow of ſighs and tears, which, we are told, forced their way, as was viſible to the audience, who accompanied it with a general groan. The Sermon, however, being publiſhed ſoon after, was animadverted on by Dr Hickes, which being anſwered by the Biſhop, a rejoinder was ſoon after wrote by the Doctor, but never printed. In reality, Archbiſhop Tillotſon's character may be truſted to poſterity upon the facts related of him, and the teſtimony of his own writings, both private and public. His charity and generoſity, with the expence of coming into the See, and the repairs and improvements of his palace, had ſo exhauſted his fortune, that if his firſt fruits had not been forgiven, his debts could not have been paid. He left nothing to his family but the copy of his Poſthumous Sermons, which was afterwards ſold for twenty-five hundred guineas. The King therefore, according to his promiſe, granted to his widow on the 2d of May, 1695, an annuity of 400 l. for her life, which, upon ſome unforeſeen loſſes ſuffered by her afterwards, he augmented with another annuity on the 8th of Auguſt, 1698, of 200 l. more (‡). They were both continued till her death, on the 20th of January, 1301-2; and his Majeſty was ſo ſollicitous for the regular payment of her penſion, without any deduction, that he always called for the money quarterly, and ſent it to her himſelf (fffff). Such are the teſtimonies given of his reſpect to the memory of our Archbiſhop by that Prince, who attributed his ſafety on the throne, in a great meaſure, to this moſt loyal ſubject; and he has been thought of ſuch importance to the nation, and ſo great an honour to it, that his character is become deſervedly the ſubject of General Hiſtory, to which, added to the diſplay of it in his Funeral Sermon by Biſhop Burnet, we refer the reader. But we muſt not conclude without giving him a ſketch of the Archbiſhop's perſon, as follows: His countenance was fair and very amiable, his face round, his eyes vivid, and his air and aſpect quick and ingenuous, his hair brown and buſhy: he was moderately tall; very ſlender and thin in his youth; his conſtitution tender and frail to outward appearance. He became corpulent, when grown in age, which encreaſed more and more as long as he lived, but yet was neither a burden to himſelf, nor in the leaſt unſeemly to others. This is the picture of his perſon, as drawn by his Pupil Mr Beardmore (gggg), who very appoſitely to that connexion, has ſet his Tutor's character in the moſt affecting light, by propoſing the pattern of his temper and life to his own imitation, as that which, next to that of his Saviour and his bleſſed Apoſtles, he hoped would moſt ſenſibly affect him. 'Let me, ſays he, 'imitate his great wiſdom, his blameleſs and unſpotted life; his humility, his meekneſs, 'his ſweetneſs of temper, his obligingneſs, and readineſs to do good, his excellent preach-'ing ſo far as I am able; his conſtancy to good principles, his moderation and candour; 'his looſeneſs from the love of the world and earthly riches; his unwearied diligence in 'preaching, and that from ſuch principles, by ſuch rules, and to ſuch ends, as he did (hhhh).' At the ſame time, this moſt affectionately grateful Pupil did not believe his Tutor to be abſolutely perfect; on the contrary, he expreſsly intimates, that he had his faults and blemiſhes. The Readers therefore may juſtly expect our mentioning ſome, at leaſt, of theſe. The blemiſh which ſtands foremoſt in the Archbiſhop's frame, was his obſtinate attachment to the comprehenſion. In labouring which, though others were equally, and perhaps Biſhop Burnet more concerned, yet the odium of that exploded project, is generally thrown upon him. Indeed the exceſs of his complaiſance for the Preſbyterians (iiii), apparently had its root in his education among them, whence his natural tenderneſs ſucked in an inbred fellow-feeling of all their complaints. Add to this what has been before obſerved, that he had a very extraordinary talent at conceived, or extempore prayers, which muſt needs ſtrengthen his inclination to their way of worſhip; however it had this good effect, that after his own converſion, he converted more Diſſenters, whether Preſbyterians, Independents, or Anabaptiſts, to the eſtabliſhed Church, than any other Divine of his time, beſides his preſerving others, eſpecially non-conforming Miniſters, from being troubleſome to the Church, bringing them to ſome temper and moderation: for the reſt, he was ſenſible of their perverſeneſs, and has frequently rebuked their hypocriſy, and confuted their peculiar tenets. The ſame prejudice of education gave him an antipathy to Popery, which coming upon the tenderneſs of his nature, rendered him too apt to be affrighted with any ſhadow of that Doctrine; whence he was ſometimes betrayed even into ridiculous cenſures that way [PP]. This ſeems to be the greateſt blemiſh in his Sermons (kkkk); the ſtile of which has been

One of which deſerves particular notice; it is in that diſcourſe on the 5th of Nov. 1678, where he obſerves, that thoſe remarkable letters of ſir Everard Digby (mentioned in Remark [E] of that Conſpirator's Article) were then in his hands. been ſelected as a pattern to our politeſt Writers (llll.) And as a Preacher, he is univerſally allowed to carry the firſt prize. In which character it has been well obſerved, that his moſt diſtinguiſhing excellence lay in teaching ſo, as at once both to enable and incline men to teach themſelves. And in this he followed the natural complexion of his temper, which was ſweetly gentle and tender; but on that very account, not ſo well adapted for public buſineſs (mmmm), as the more hardy conſtitution, the Socratiſm [QQ] and Stoiciſm, of his Succeſſors (nnnn), who for this reaſon, is ſaid to have been more agreeable to King William (oooo).

'being of his mind, that wanted not only difficulties, 'but even impoſſibilities, in the Chriſtian religion, to 'exerciſe his faith upon.' The perſon, ſays Mr Jortin, whom Tillotſon had in view, was the Author of Religio Medici. But by impoſſibilities Sir Thomas Brown, as well as Tertullian, meant ſeeming not real impoſſibilities (80), and what he ſays ſhould be looked on as a verbum ardens, a rhetorical flouriſh, and a trial of ſkill with Tertullian. Our Critic proceeds to cite Sir Thomas Brown's words, and then makes this candid and jeſt remark: 'Tillot-'ſon, judging that the Papiſts would make an ill uſe 'of this, and ſuch paſſages as this in Proteſtant writers, 'was willing to paſs a gentle animadverſion upon it.' Afterwards, to evince the propriety of that animadverſion, it is obſerved, that Sir Kenelm Digby, a Roman catholic, who criticiſes ſeveral things in the Religio Medici, yet gives his loud approbation to theſe pious ſallies: I am extremely pleaſed with him when he ſaith, there are not impoſſibilities enough in religion for an active faith, &c. Extremely pleaſed, continues our Critic, without queſtion, and full of hopes, that this young Author might at laſt unreaſon himſelf into implicit belief, and go over to a church which would feed his hungry faith with a ſufficient quantity of impoſſibilities.

Among many things which may be mentioned in favour of Tillotſon this ſhould not be forgotten, that, of thoſe who have paſſed their judgments upon him, there never was a ſon of abſurdity that did not diſlike, or a ſenſible Reader who did not approve, his writings (81).

[QQ] Socratiſm he wanted.] If a perſon, ſays the laſt mentioned writer, were to offer himſelf a candidate for honeſt reputation, what could he wiſh and hope more than to ſhare Tillotſon's fate, and to find the ſame Cenſurers and the ſame Defenders? Yet it has been ſaid of this great and good man, that his ſpirits were in ſome degree broken, and his health impaired, by the inſolence and calumnies of petulant adverſaries. If it be true, it is a melancholy inſtance of human infirmity, and a proof that a little Stoiciſm and Socratiſm is a deſirable poſſeſſion. To forgive enemies, though difficult to many, was eaſy to him, aſſiſted as he was by good-nature and by religion; but to deſpiſe their attacks, was a taſk rather too hard for his gentle temper and ſenſibility; ſo that in this reſpect, and under theſe diſadvantages, he was not a match for men who could neither bluſh nor feel. 'A man's good name, ſays 'he (82), is a tender thing, and a wound there ſinks 'deep into the ſpirit even of a wiſe and good man; 'and the more innocent any one is in this kind, the 'more ſenſible he is of this hard uſage; becauſe he 'never treats others ſo, nor is he conſcious to himſelf 'that he hath deſerved it.' Every thing, continues this ingenious author, they ſay, hath two handles. When Socrates was under ſentence of death, Xantippe took on bitterly, and, refuſing comfort, cried, 'O my 'huſband, what grieves me moſt is, that theſe wicked 'Judges ſhould treat an Innocent man thus, and con-'demn thee unjuſtly and for nothing at all.' 'Wife, 'ſaid he, why ſhould that grieve thee? Hadſt thou 'rather then that they had condemned me juſtly (83)?'

TINDALE, or TYNDALE [WILLIAM], otherwiſe ſurnamed Hitchins, the firſt Publiſher of the Holy Scriptures in Engliſh, was born about the borders of Wales (a); in what county is not mentioned; but the family ſeems to have ſprung from Robert Tindall, of Tanſover in the county of Northampton, who was living the 16th of Edward I. and deſcended from Adam de Tindale, Baron of Langley in South-Tindale in Northumberland (b). He was brought up from a child in grammar, logic, and philoſophy in Oxford, particularly for the moſt part in St Mary Magdalen's-Hall [A]; where having imbibed the doctrine of Luther, he privately inſtructed in it ſome of the junior Fellows of Magdalen-College, and other Scholars. His behaviour, at the ſame time, was ſuch, as made him be looked upon as a man of a moſt virtuous diſpoſition, and unſpotted life (c). So that, on account of his merit (d), he was admitted a Canon of the College newly founded by Cardinal Wolſey (e), now better known by the name of Chriſt's-Church. But, for eſpouſing too openly Luther's opinions, being obliged to quit it [B], he retired to Cambridge, where he diligently applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Holy Scriptures, and Divinity, and took a degree (f): having taken his degrees before at Oxford [C]. After a convenient ſtay at Cambridge, he went and lived, at Little Sodbury in Glouceſterſhire, with Sir John Welch, Knt. who had a good reſpect and eſteem for him; and was Tutor to Sir John's children (g). Moreover, to be as uſeful as poſſible, and to plant true Chriſtianity in that neighbourhood, he frequently preached in and about Briſtol. And, in order to give the Knight and his Lady good impreſſions of Religion, and to confirm them in the truth, he put into their hands Eraſmus's Manual of a Chriſtian Soldier (h), tranſlated by him into Engliſh. converſe, and often to diſpute, with them upon the moſt important points of Religion; and he appealed to the Scriptures, to confute their errors, and eſtabliſh his opinions [D]; a method not much then practiſed among the rigid Catholics. His frequent victories over them [E], cauſed them to look upon him with an evil eye, revile him, count him no better than a heretic [F], and endeavour to have him puniſhed as ſuch. Accordingly, they preferred articles againſt him to the Chancellor of the Dioceſe, before whom he appeared, and was ſeverely reprimanded and threatened, but no further proceeded againſt, at preſent. However, obſerving that he could no longer ſtay in the country with any quiet and comfort, and that his Patron, Sir John Welch, could not protect him without bringing himſelf into great dangers and difficulties, they mutually parted by common conſent (i). Mr Tindale thereupon came to London, and preached for ſome time in the Church of St Dunſtan's in the Weſt. At length, having conceived a great opinion of Dr Cuthbert Tonſtall, promoted to the Biſhopric of London in 1522; on account of the great commendations given him by the much admired Eraſmus, he imagined that he would be a happy man, if he could but be admitted into his ſervice, as one of his Chaplains. For that purpoſe, he applied to Sir Henry Guildeford [G], Maſter of the Horſe, and Controller to King Henry VIII. who was a great Patron of learned men, a particular friend to Eraſmus, and an acquaintance of Sir John Welch's: And he preſented to him an Oration of Iſocrates, which he had tranſlated from the Greek; an undoubted proof of our Author's being uncommonly learned, ſince Greek at that time was a language underſtood by very few here in England. Sir Henry readily complying with Mr Tindale's requeſt, not only recommended him to the Biſhop of London, but adviſed him to write an Epiſtle to his Lordſhip, and carry it himſelf. This he did, and delivered the Epiſtle to an old acquaintance of his, a ſervant of the Biſhop. But the Biſhop's anſwer was, 'That his houſe was full; he had 'more than he could well provide for; and therefore adviſed our Author to ſeek out in 'London, where, he ſaid, he could not well miſs of employment (k).' Not being able to obtain any, he was ſupported by Mr Humfrey Monmouth, Alderman of London [H], a favourer of Luther's opinions; who took him into his houſe for half a year, where he behaved in the moſt ſober and temperate manner (l), ſtudying night and day. His thoughts were then bent upon tranſlating the New Teſtament into Engliſh, as the only means to root out Popery, and eſtabliſh the true Doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt [I]. But being ſenſible

[D] And he appealed to the Scriptures, to confute their errors, and eſtabliſh his opinions.] As he was learned, and well acquainted with the Old and New Teſtament, he ſcrupled not to ſhew unto them ſimply and plainly his judgment in moſt points, as he thought: and when they at any time varied from him in opinion and judgment, he would lay plainly before them the open and manifeſt places of the Scriptures, to confute their errors, and confirm his ſayings. And thus they continued for a while, reaſoning and contending together, till at length his opponents grew weary, and not being able to anſwer or convince him, bore a ſecret grudge in their hearts againſt him (5). He complains, in his Prologue to the firſt book of Moſes, of their ill uſage towards him; teſtifying that he ſuffered much in that country by a ſort of unlearned Prieſts: being full rude and ignorant (ſayth he) God knoweth; which have ſeen no more Latin than that only which they read in their Porteſſes and Miſſals, which yet many of them can ſcarcely read.

[E] His frequent victories over them.] In one of his Diſputes, he preſſed his antagoniſt ſo hard, that the latter burſt out in theſe words: 'We were better to be 'without God's Laws than the Pope's.' But Tindale zealouſly and warmly replied, 'I defy the Pope and all 'his Laws: adding, that if God ſpared him life, e'er 'many years, he would cauſe a boy that driveth the 'plough to know more of the Scripture, than he [his 'antagoniſt] did (6).'

[F] Count him no better than a heretic.] He was ſo much ſuperior, and too ſtrong for them in all Diſputes, that they called him a heretic in Sophiſtry, a heretic in Logic, a heretic in Divinity. And told him, that he mightily depended upon the Gentlemen in that country; but, notwithſtanding, he ſhould ſhortly be otherwiſe dealt withal. He replied, that he was contented they ſhould bring him to any country in all England, giving him Ten pounds a year to live with, and binding him to no more than to teach children and preach (7).

[G] Sir Henry Guildeford.] This noble perſon was an acquaintance of the celebrated Eraſmus, and his great favorite, as appears from ſeveral letters of Eraſmus to him. He was deſcended from a very ancient family, famous for conſiderable ſervices to the public. In his younger years he went into Spain, and engaged himſelf in the ſervice of Ferdinand and Iſabella in their wars againſt the Moors, where he behaved with that exemplary reſolution, that upon the reduction of Granada, the abovementioned Prince added to his paternal coat, an augmentation of a pomegranate ſlipped upon a canton, which were the arms of that regained Province, and likewiſe dignified him with the order of Knighthood. Upon the reputation of his martial abilities, he was ſent with the fleet againſt the French, under the command of Sir Charles Brandon. He carried the royal ſtandard at the ſiege of Terouenne; and at Tournay was created a Banneret. In the 7th of Henry VIII. he was conſtituted Maſter of the Horſe for life, and had an annuity of 50l. during the like term for executing the office of Eſquire of the King's body. In the 14th he was appointed to attend on the Emperor at his coming hither. He was one of the Knights who in parliament ſubſcribed the letter to the Pope. The 24th of April, 1526, he was elected a Knight of the Garter, and inſtalled on St George's feaſt following. He died in June 1531, being about forty years old: Though he was twice married, he left no iſſue (8).

[I] And eſtabliſh the true Doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt.] He thought no way more conducive thereto, than if the Scriptures were tranſlated into the Vulgar Tongue, that the poor people might alſo read and ſee the pure and plain word of God. For, firſt, reflecting with himſelf, he perceived by experience, that it was not poſſible to eſtabliſh the laity in any truth, except the Scripture were ſo plainly laid before their eyes in their mother tongue, that they might ſee the proceſs, order, and meaning of the text. For elſe whatſoever truth ſhould be taught them, theſe enemies of the Truth would quench it again; either with apparent reaſons of ſophiſtry, and Traditions of their own making, no way founded in Scripture; or elſe, juggling with the text, expound it in ſuch a ſenſe, that it would be impoſſible to perceive the right proceſs, order, and meaning of any particular paſſage. Again, he well perceived and conſidered, that the only or chief cauſe of all Miſchief in the Church, was, 'That 'the Scriptures of God were hidden from the people's 'eyes. For, ſo long the abominable doings and idola'tries maintained by the Phariſaical [Popiſh] clergy, 'could not be eſpied; and therefore all their labour was, 'with might and main to keep it down: ſo that either 'it ſhould not be read at all, or if it were, they would 'darken the right ſenſe with the miſt of their ſophiſtry, 'and ſenſible he could not ſafely do it in England, he reſolved to go abroad into Germany, as a place of greater ſecurity, and more liberty. This he was enabled to do by the aſſiſtance of Mr Monmouth, and other well-diſpoſed perſons; who gave him an annuity of ten pounds a year (m), then a ſufficient maintenance for a ſingle man, and which would go as far as a hundred pounds a year now. At his firſt leaving England, he went as far as Saxony, where he conferred with Luther, and other learned men in thoſe parts. Then he came back into the Netherlands, and ſettled at Antwerp, where was then a very conſiderable Factory of Engliſh Merchants, many of which were zealous profeſſors of Luther's doctrine. Here he immediately ſet himſelf about his favorite work, the Engliſh Tranſlation of the New Teſtament, in which he had the aſſiſtance of the learned John Fry, and a Frier named William Roye (n), who wrote for him, and helped him to compare the texts together (o). It was printed in 1526, in octavo, without a name [K]: and Mr Tindale added at the end

Halle, our Author's contemporary, gives much the ſame account of his deſign——' Luther, ſays he, ſettyng foorth cer- ' taine workes againſt the Byſhop of Rome, Tyndale ' occaſioned by them to ſearche the Scriptures whether ' Luther ſayd the trueth or no, did therby not onely ' himſelfe attaine the knowlege of the uſurped autho- ' ritie of the Byſhop of Rome, and his ſuperſticious and ' damnable doctrynes that he had taught and publiſhed ' through all Chriſtendome, but alſo lamentyng the ' ignoraunt ſtate that his native country of England was ' in, who altogether were wrapped in errours, thought ' it his dutie, for that God had reveled the light of his ' Goſpell to him, to beſtowe his talent to the honour of ' God and proffite of his countrey, and thought no waye ' ſo good to reduce the people from their errour as fyrſt ' to make them acquainted with Goddes woorde, that ' they might know what Goddes will was that we ſhould ' do, and what the Byſhop of Rome ſaid that we muſt ' do: and therefore fyrſt, as is aforeſayd, he tranſlated into ' Engliſhe the Newe Teſtament, a woorke no doubt ' very notable, and to him verye paynefull, for that ' he was forced to flye his owne native countrey, and ' to lyve in a ſtraunge lande among people that as well ' varyed from his manners as the perſones to him were ' unknowen (11)'.—So that it was pure Love for Truth, and an earneſt deſire of Benefiting his Country, that ſet Mr Tindale upon this arduous undertaking, amidſt a thouſand difficulties and dangers, and for which he was at laſt crowned with Martyrdom.

[K] It was printed in 1526, in octavo.] Some have placed the firſt publication of it under the year 1527 (12), and ſome later. But, that it was publiſhed as early as the year 1526, is demonſtrable from Biſhop Tonſtal's Commiſſion in the next note, which was dated Oct. 23, 1526. As there were only 1500 printed, and that all the Copies which could poſſibly be got in England, were committed to the flames, this firſt edition is therefore very difficult to be met with. The late induſtrious Mr Wanley hath ſet down the following memorandum, in the margin of his Wood's Athenæ, now in our poſſeſſion: ' I never yet, notwithſtanding all my ſearches, ' ſaw any one copie of this edition, which ought to ' anſwer to Sir Thomas More's Remarks.' But there was one in the ingenious Mr Joſ. Ames's collection (13). W. Tindale acknowledged, in the Preface to his ſubſequent Edition, that there were in this ' many fautes ' whyche lacke of helpe at the beginnyng and overfyght ' dyd ſow therein.' Therefore he ſet himſelf about looking over and correcting it again, though his own ſecond Edition did not come out till 1534.——But the Dutch Printers, finding it was a book in great requeſt, publiſhed a new edition of it in 1527, 12mo, and, about a year after, another, in a larger letter and volume, with figures in the apocalypſe; in all about 5000 copies: ſo that theſe Teſtaments became plentier and cheaper than ever they were, or than they could be afforded by W. Tindale. The price of theſe was ſeven or eight groats a-piece; but the Dutchmen ſold them at the rate of thirteen pence each, or three hundred for 16l. 5s. But the Printers not underſtanding Engliſh, committed a great many faults. However they printed a third edition in 1529, which went off ſo well, that this; as well as the two former, were all ſold before 1530. In which year, they proceeded to a fourth edition, of about 2000, in a ſmall volume and letter; more incorrect than even the former: which however were ſoon all diſpoſed of. And in 1534, the Dutch printed a fifth edition, which they got George Joye to correct. [He was a Bedfordſhire man, educated at Peterhouſe in Cambridge, where he took the degree of Batchelor of Arts 1512-13, that of Maſter 1517, and April 27, the ſame year, was admitted Fellow. But being accuſed of hereſy, he was forced to fly beyond ſea, and retire to Straſburg in Germany.] Not contented with correcting the typographical errors, he ventured to alter, and amend as he thought, the former tranſlation of W. Tindale. But Tindale reſented that Joye ſhould take that liberty, and likewiſe foreſtall his Second Edition of the New Teſtament which was juſt ready to come out; therefore, at the end of his Epiſtle to the Chriſtian reader, he added another Epiſtle, which begins thus: ' W. Tindale yet once more to the Chriſten reader:' wherein he has theſe words: ' Wherfore if he [Joye] ' wold have altered the Text, he ſhould have put it ' forth for his own tranſlation and not for myne.' And expreſſes otherwiſe a great deal too much paſſion and reſentment. This occaſioned Joye to publiſh ' An ' Apology . . . to ſatisfy, if it may be, W. Tyndale, ' to pourge and defende himſelf agaynſt ſo manye ' ſlaunderouſe Lies fained upon him in Tyndale's un- ' charitable and unſober Piſtle, ſo well worthye to be ' præfixed for the Reader to induce him into the under- ' ſtandyng of his New Teſtament, diligently corrected ' and printed in the yeare of oure Lorde MCCCCC ' and XXXIII, in November.'

W. Tindale's own Second Edition of his New Teſtament was ' Imprinted at Antwerp by Martin Emperour, ' Anno M. D. XXXIV.' 8vo.——In 1536, there came out another edition, with this title, ' The Newe Teſta- ' ment yet once agayne corrected by William Tyndale. ' Printed in the yere of oure Lorde God, M. D. and ' XXXVI. in a broad 4to.'—And, the ſame year, another edition, printed very probably in Scotland, in a large 4to. Likewiſe one in a leſſer 4to, and a ſmall 8vo, and ſome others in 8vo, 12mo, and 16mo (14).

For a ſpecimen of this tranſlation, we ſhall give here a few paſſages in it, out of the Epiſtle to the Romans.—Ch. i. ver. 16, 17. ' For I am not aſhamed of the ' goſpel of Chriſt, becauſe it is the power of God unto ' Salvacion to all that beleve, namely to the Jewe and ' alſo to the gentyle. ' Sonne, end an Epiſtle, wherein he 'deſyred them that were learned to amende, if ought were founde 'amyſſe.' There were but fifteen hundred copies printed of this firſt impreſſion (p), and moſt of them being imported into England, were very induſtriouſly diſperſed, and as greedily bought up and read. At this, the great ſupporters of Popery were extremely diſturbed and alarmed. Conſcious that Ignorance was the mother of their ſpurious Devotion; they well ſaw, that a fair tranſlation of the Scripture would make men wiſer than they wiſhed them to be, and enable them to diſcern the groundleſſneſs and abſurdity of their moſt gainful and favourite Tenets. They cried out therefore, that there were a thouſand hereſies in this tranſlation; that it was not to be corrected, but utterly to be ſuppreſſed. Some ſaid, it was not poſſible to tranſlate the Scripture into Engliſh; ſome, that it was not lawful for the laity to have it in their mother tongue; ſome, that it would make them all Heretics. And, in order to draw the temporal rulers into the quarrel, they ſurmiſed and affirmed, that it would make the people rebel and riſe againſt the King (q). William Warham, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Cuthbert Tonſtall, Biſhop of London, both great and learned men, except where ſuperſtition had diſtorted their minds, iſſued out immediately their ſeveral orders and monitions, to bring in all the New Teſtaments tranſlated into the vulgar tongue, that they might be burnt, and to prohibit the reading of them (r). Biſhop Tonſtall's Commiſſion was dated October 23, 1526 [L]. Not ſatisfied with that, he preached publickly againſt theſe books at St Paul's, and told the people, there were no fewer than 2000 texts in the tranſlation wrong tranſlated. To deſtroy the books more effectually, the Biſhop being at Antwerp in 1526 or 1527, procured Auguſtin Packington, an Engliſh Merchant (s), to buy up all the copies of the Engliſh Teſtament which remained unſold, and they being brought to England, were publickly burnt at Paul's croſs. But this ill-judged policy only took off many copies which lay dead upon Tindale's hands, and put a good ſum of money into his pocket. So that he was enabled to prepare another Edition, more correct than the former; which however was not printed till 1534. But of the firſt Edition, about 5000 copies were reprinted in 1527, and 1528: This made the books plentier and cheaper than ever they were. At which Biſhop Tonſtall being amazed, he ſent for Packington, and aſked him, how there came to be ſo many Teſtaments about, when he had promiſed him he would buy them all? Packington anſwered, ſurely he had bought all that were to be had, but he perceived they had printed more ſince: and he could not ſee how they could be kept from doing that, unleſs his Lordſhip would likewiſe buy the types and preſſes. About the ſame time, George Conſtantine, who was ſuſpected of hereſy, being examined by Sir Thomas More, and aſked, by whom Tindale, Joye, and others beyond ſea, were furniſhed with money from hence; he ſaid, it was the Biſhop of London who had helped them, for he had beſtowed among them a great deal of money upon New Teſtaments to burn them; and that had been, and yet was, their only ſuccour and comfort (t). The above order for bringing the Teſtaments in, being but imperfectly and ſlowly complied with, ſtrict ſearch was made among thoſe who were ſuſpected of importing and concealing them; of whom John Tindale, our Author's brother, was proſecuted, and condemned to do penance (u). nefactor, was imprisoned in the Tower, and almost ruined (w). But all these rigorous measures not having the intended effect, and burning the Word of God being looked upon among the people as a shocking profanation; the great Patrons of Popery endeavoured to ridicule what they could not suppress. They employed for that purpose the noted Sir Thomas More (x), who, like all other witty men, suffered his wit to out-run his judgment, and had so devoted himself to the blindest corruptions of the Church of Rome, that he was then ready to swallow and defend them without examination, and was as severe a persecutor as any ignorant Monk. He published in 1529, a Dyaloge, wherein he treated of the pestilent sect of Luther and Tyndale, &c. [M], and in which, among other things, he says, 'That whoso called these books which were burnt, New Testaments, gave them a 'wrong name, since they were rather Tyndal's or Luther's Testament, it being so cor-'rupted and changed from the good and wholesome doctrine of Christ to their own deviliſh 'heresies, as to be quite another thing.' Mr Tindale, in 1530, published An Answer to this Dialogue of Sir Thomas More (y). But all the methods used for destroying William Tindale's Translation having continued hitherto ineffectual and unsuccessful, the secular arm was called in. For at the instance of some zealots, on the 24th of May, 1531, King Henry VIII. came into the Star-Chamber, and there, by one whole advice and assent of the Prelates and Clerks, as well of the Universities as all other there assembled together, ordered all the books containing several great errors and pestilent heresies, contagious and damnable, then set down; and all the books containing the same, with the Translation also of Scripture corrupted by William Tyndall, as well in the Old Testament as in the New, and all other books in English containing such errors; to be utterly expelled, rejected, and put away out of the hands of his people, and not to be suffered to go abroad among his subjects (z). And a Proclamation was issued out to the same purpose (aa) [N]. The Old Testament here mentioned to have been translated by William Tindale, was the Five Books of Moses, which he translated from the Hebrew into English, as soon as he had finished his New Testament. But going by sea to Hamburgh, to have it printed there, the vessel in which he went was wrecked on the coast of Holland, so that he lost all his money, books, writings, and copies; and was forced to begin anew. However, he came in another ship to Hamburgh, where, by his appointment, Miles Coverdale waited for him, and assisted him in translating the Pentateuch, from Easter to December, 1529, in the house of Mrs Margaret Van Emmerson, widow: It was printed in 1530 [O]. And he afterwards made an English version of the Prophecy of Jonas, with a large Prologue, which was published in 1531 (bb); but he translated no more books of the Scripture, as some have asserted [P]. [M] A Dyaloge, &c.] We shall give the whole title, which may perhaps divert the reader with the manner of Spelling in those days. 'A Dyaloge of Syr Thomas 'More knyghte: one of the counsayll of oure Soverayne 'lorde the Kyng and Chauncellour of hys duchy of 'Lancaster: wherin be treatyd dyvers matters, as of 'the veneration and worshyp of ymagys and relyques, 'prayng to Sayntys and going on Pylgrymage, with 'many othere thyngys touchyng the Pestylent Sect of 'Luther and Tyndale, by the tone bygone in Saxony, 'and by the tother laboryd to be brought into England. 'Emprynted at London at the Sygne of the Meremayd 'at Powlys gate next to Chepe-syde in the moneth of 'June the yere of our Lord 1529.'——W. Tindale, in 1530, published, An Aunswere unto Syr Thomas More's dyaloge.——And Sir Thomas replied, in his 'Confuta-'tion of Tyndale's Aunswere to his Dyaloge, in nine 'books.' 1532.

[N] And a Proclamation was issued out to the same purpose.] In that proclamation, are these very weak reasons given why the Scriptures should not be in English .... 'Forasmuch as it is come to the hering of our 'said Soveraigne lord the king, that report is made by 'divers and many of his Subjects, that it were to all 'men not only expedient, but also necessary, to have in 'the English tonge both the New Testament and the 'Old, and that his highness, his noblemen, and pre-'lates were bounden to suffer them so to have it; his 'highness hath therefore semblably thereupon consulted 'with the said primates, and vertuous, discrete, and 'well learned personages in divinity forsaid; and by 'them all it is thought, that it is not necessary the said 'Scripture to be in the English tonge, and in the hands 'of the common people; but that the distribution of 'the said Scripture, and the permitting or denieing 'thereof, dependeth only upon the discretion of the 'Superiours, as they shall think it convenient. And 'that having respect to the malignity of this present 'tyme, with the inclination of people to erroneous 'opinions; the translation of the New Testament and 'the Old into the vulgar tonge of English should rather 'be the occasion of continuance or increase of errours 'amonge the said people, than any benefyce or com-'modity towards the weale of their soules. And that 'it shall now be more convenient, that the same 'people have the holy Scripture expounded to them by 'preachers in their sermons, according as it hath ben 'of old time accustomed before this time. Albeit yf it 'shall hereafter appeare to the king's highness, that his 'said people do utterly abandon and forsake all perverse, 'erroneous, and seditious opinions, with the New Testa-'ment and the Old corruptly translated into the English 'tonge nowe being in printe; and that the same bokes 'and all other bokes of heresie, as well in the French 'tonge, as in the Dutch tonge, be clearly exterminate, 'and exiled out of this realme of England for ever; 'his highness intendeth to provide, that the holy Scrip-'ture shall be by great, learned, and catholique persons 'translated into the English tonge, yf it shall then seeme 'to his grace convenient to be.' ..... (17).——The whole tenor of this proclamation does but too well justify the Character given by W. Tindale of his oppofers and persecutors; whom he calls 'fleshly minded Hypocrites, 'as making the Scripture theire own possession and 'merchandise, and so shutting up the Kingdom of hea-'ven, which is God's word, neither entring themselves, 'nor suffering them that would (18).'

Genesis and Numbers are in the Dutch letter, and contain the one 76 leaves, and the other 67. Exodus, Leviticus, and Deuteronomy, are printed in the Roman letter, with now and then a capital of the black letter intermixed, as was done in books printed about this time at Zurich. Exodus contains 76 leaves, Leviticus 52, and Deuteronomy 63. To every one of these five books is prefixed a Prologue; and at the end of Genesis, Exodus, and Deuteronomy, and at the beginning of Numbers, are Tables expounding certain words. In the margin are some notes: and it is adorned with ten wooden cuts (19).

From Hamburgh he returned to Antwerp, and lodged, in 1534, in the houſe of Mr Thomas Pointz, an Engliſh Merchant. We might think in our days, that the life of ſo innocent a man as Mr Tindale, could be in no danger. But in the hight of Popery, that envehomed ſet of people, one of whoſe properties is never to forgive, could not reſt as long as ſo dangerous a Heretic, as they counted him, was ſuffered to live. To take him off therefore, King Henry VIII. and his Counſel ſuborned and employed one Henry Philips (cc), who inſinuating himſelf both into Tindale's and Pointz's acquaintance, was treated by both as a friend. At length, when Philips found his opportunity, he got the Procurator General of the Emperor's Court at Bruſſels, and other Officers, to come and ſeize poor unhappy Tindale, though they could not but pity and admire at the time his plain honeſt ſimplicity; and to convey him priſoner to the Caſtle of Vilvorden, eighteen Engliſh miles from Antwerp, where he remained a priſoner about a year and a half. His friend Pointz, and the body of the Engliſh Merchants, procured Letters from Secretary Cromwell to the Court at Bruſſels, for the releaſe of Tindale. But treacherous Philips invented a falſe accuſation againſt Pointz, in order to render all his applications ineffectual; ſo that he was proſecuted and impriſoned, but eſcaped in the night (dd). Tindale's deſtruction being now reſolved, he was brought to his trial, and offered an Advocate and a Proctor: but he refuſed to have any, ſaying, he would anſwer for himſelf; and ſo he did. But none of his reaſons being admitted, he was condemned by virtue of the Emperor's Decree made in the aſſembly at Augſburg. And being brought to execution, in 1536, he was by the hangman firſt ſtrangled, calling out in his laſt moments, 'Lord, open the King of England's 'eyes:' after which, his body was reduced to aſhes (ee). Such was the tragical end of one of the learneſt men in his time: a man of the moſt unblemiſhed character; whoſe only crime was, Tranſlating into Engliſh, for the Benefit of his Countrymen, the Holy Scriptures [Q], which all Chriſtians do and ought to look upon, as the only Rule of their Faith and Practice; and which conſequently they cannot be too well acquainted with. Time it was therefore, that ſuch a Tyranny as he fell a ſacrifice to, ſhould be aboliſhed; as it was very ſoon: The meaſure of their Iniquities was then fulfilled. Beſides his Tranſlations of part of the Bible, and other pieces already mentioned, William Tindale was Author of other things [R], of which ſome account is given below.

We have ſeen, that he publiſhed no more than the Pentateuch, or Five Books of Moſes; the prophecy of Jonas; and the New Teſtament. He might poſſibly have tranſlated afterwards the other Books above mentioned. But as, upon his apprehenſion, his lodgings were ſearched by the officers that had apprehended him (23); if any of his manuſcript tranſlations of Scripture were there, and fell into ſuch hands, we may be ſure they would not be permitted to ſee any other light than that of the flames. The tranſlation of the Old Teſtament, from Joſhua to Nehemiah, in the firſt Edition of the Engliſh Bible printed in 1535, was done by Myles Coverdale.

TINDAL [MATTHEW], was born about the year 1657, at Beer-Ferres in Devonshire, where his father, Mr John Tindal, was Minister (a). His son was first put to school in the Country (b), and after he had made a sufficient progress in grammar learning, was sent to Oxford, where he was first admitted of Lincoln-College, under the tuition of Dr Hickes, in 1672; but removed thence to that of Exeter (c). Having taken the degree of Batchelor of Arts, October 17, 1676 (d), he was from thence chosen into a Law Fellowship at All-Souls College (e). In 1679, he proceeded Batchelor of Laws (f), and was created Doctor in the same faculty in 1685 (gg). Not long afterwards, our Author became a Proselyte to the Popish Emissaries employed in the University by King James II, publickly declared himself a Roman Catholic, and openly frequented the Mass-houses during the greatest part of that King's reign. In this interval he went to London (h), and was admitted an advocate in Doctors Commons (i). While he was in town, he fell into the acquaintance of some persons, whose conversation led him into a dislike of Popery. He therefore renounced that Religion in the latter end of the year 1687, and returned to Oxford; he received the Sacrament publickly in his College Chapel from the hands of the Warden on Easter-day, April 15, 1688 (k) [A]. From this time, he grew a warm opposer of some of the powers and authority claimed by the Church of England, and falling in with the Revolution, it was not long before he became a zealous Writer in defence of it. In November, 1693, he published An Essay concerning Obedience to the Supreme Powers, and the Duty of Subjects in all Revolutions, with some Considerations concerning the present Juncture of Affairs. The same year Count Palëoti, an Italian, having killed one of his own domesticks, who was a native likewise of Italy, protested against the power of any English Court of Law to bring him to trial for that fact (l). The case was referred by his Majesty to the consideration of proper Delegates, consisting of some of the most eminent persons both in Church and State, as well as Common Lawyers as Civilians. Dr Tindal was put into this Commission, where he gave some distinguishing proofs of his abilities in his profession. After this, he sat frequently as Judge in the Court of Delegates (though he rarely, if ever, practised as an Advocate in the Courts of Civil or Ecclesiastical Law) and had a pension of 200 l. per annum granted to him by the Crown (m). In the beginning of March, 1693, he published an Essay concerning the Law of Nations, and the Rights of Sovereigns [B]. As there had been a design on foot from the time of Dr

[A] Easter-day, April 15, 1688.] Our Author alledges this renunciation of Popery at this juncture as a certain proof of his sincerity upon the point of religion. He could not, he says, but apprehend it would be his certain ruin, since the Papists had not only an army here, which the King was modelling for their purpose, but they were sure of the assistance of the great Champion of Popery, who, the Empire being engaged in a war with the Turks, might assist his dear ally with as many troops as he pleased for the extirpation of the Northern Heresy; and all things were like to go here according to their wishes; the Queen, as might be foreseen without the gift of Prophecy, was to be brought to-bed of a son; so that there was nothing to screen a Relapsed Heretic from their utmost fury. Yet this did not so much trouble him, as he was pleased with the opportunity of satisfying the world that he acted out of principles, and that, as he would not scruple to sacrifice his reputation in joining with the Papists when he thought they were in the right, so he was willing to run any hazard in quitting them as soon as he was made sensible of his error (1). This account of our Author's lapse and recovery from the Popish religion by himself, is inserted here in justice to his memory; nor indeed can the truth of it be candidly or fairly controverted. However, the same regard to truth obliges us not to suppress some instances relating to the moral part of his conduct, which shew him to have been no credit to any religion. We are assured, that his debaucheries with women became so notorious, that he was publickly reprimanded by his College as an Egregious Fornicator. To this purpose, the following fact is related upon the credit of a Canon Residentiary, who was one of the ejected Demys of Magdalen-College in King James the Second's time. The Doctor, it is said, got a wench to swear one of his children to a Gentleman of that College, altogether as infamous at that time as himself. The Gentleman was obliged to submit, and maintain the child: nevertheless, after some time, he got into the company of the mother, and asked her how she came to use him so, since she could not be ignorant, that he was never concerned with her in the manner that she had sworn. Her answer was, that Dr Tindal had got her with child, and prevailed on her to swear as she had done: Well then, my dear, replies the pious Reprover, I desire you to be so just to me, as to let me get another, and that you would swear it to him, which was immediately a bargain, and strictly executed in all its branches (2).

[B] An Essay concerning the Law of Nations, and the Rights of Sovereigns, &c.] A Second Edition of this Treatise was published in the same year, to which he added, 'An Account of what was said at the Council board 'by the Civilians, upon the Question, whether their Ma'jesties subjects taken at sea acting by the late King's 'Commission, might not be looked upon as Pirates? 'With Reflections on the Arguments of Sir T. P. [Thomas 'Pinfold], and Dr Ol. [Oldys].' These Civilians were both of opinion they could not, and Dr Oldys, in support of his opinion, cited the case of Antonio, King of Portugal, who after he had lost his Kingdom, commissioned privateers to seize upon all Spanish vessels, whom, as the Spaniards met with, they hanged indeed like Pirates. But his Author gave it as an acknowledged opinion, that if Antonio had ever been a rightful King (as King James had been) then the Spaniards ought not to have treated those acting under his Commission, as they might such as acted by none (3). On the other hand, Dr Littleton said, that King James now was a private person; we had no war with him, nor he with us; or if he designed to have any, Æratium non habet, he is not in a capacity of making war; he can neither send nor receive Ambassadors, and those who adhere to him are not enemies, but rogues, and consequently these persons are not Privateers, but Pirates. Dr Tindal was of the same opinion with Dr Littleton, and among other arguments to confirm it, observes, that this was a foreign Kingdom in respect to King James, now deposed and deprived of it, and was properly indeed of no nation. 'Why may he not (asks 'our Civilian) be punished without violation of the laws 'of nations, or injury to any nation whatever, since 'no nation owns him so much as to be of their body? 'Therefore the King, in whose dominions he is, may, 'if his crimes deserve it, punish him with loss of life, 'as Queen Elizabeth, of blessed memory, did Mary 'Queen of Scotland.' It is true, the justice of this last case has been so much controverted, as may be thought to exclude it from the place, either of a governing, or even a persuasive precedent. But our Author will be strongly defended in making use of it as a just precedent, by some new light which is thrown upon the conduct of Mary Queen of Scots, in a Collection of Papers containing the Examinations and Confessions of Thomas Duke of Norfolk, John Leslie Bishop of Ross, and their dependants; as also by the correspondencies between her and Thomas Morgan, her Agent in France, laying open, from a series of intercepted letters, the various schemes and designs which were carried on, both at home and abroad, in her favour, and for the destruction of the government, and even the person of Queen Elizabeth (4).

Tillotson's

Tillotſon's promotion to the See of Canterbury, to make ſome alterations in the Liturgy, particularly with regard to the Trinity and Athanaſian Creed (n), our Author, following the humour of the times, addreſſed A Letter to the Clergy of both Univerſities concerning theſe two Articles, which was publiſhed in the year 1694, and the following year he printed a Defence of it under this title: The Reflections on the Twenty-eight Propoſitions, &c. in the Letter maintained againſt the Third Defence of the ſaid Propoſitions. In 1706, he made himſelf remarkable, by publiſhing a treatiſe in 8vo, intitled, The Rights of the Chriſtian Church aſſerted againſt the Romiſh, and all other Prieſts who claim an independent power over it: With a Preface concerning the Government of the Church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed. The Clergy in general being alarmed at this book, ſeveral Anſwers appeared to it, the foremoſt of which were written by Mr Wotton, Chaplain to the Earl of Nottingham, and by the celebrated Dr Hickes [C]. A Bookſeller and his ſervant were likewiſe both indicted for ſelling it. Theſe proceedings engaged our Author to enter into the defence of his Doctrine [D], and the diſpute was kept up with great warmth on each ſide, till the year 1709, when Mr Oldiſworth publiſhed, in three volumes 8vo, his ingenious Piece, intitled, Timothy and Philatheus, in which the Principles and Projects of a late whimſical Book, intitled, The Rights of the Chriſtian Church, are fairly ſtated and anſwered in their kinds. Written by a Layman. From this time, the noiſe about the Rights was intirely drowned in the much greater cry of High-Church, occaſioned by Dr Sacheverel's Sermons. Accordingly our Author at that time publiſhed a pamphlet under the title of New High-Church turned old Preſbyterian. But having likewiſe publiſhed the ſame year, a ſecond edition of his Defence, both this and the Rights &c. were ordered by a vote of the Houſe of Commons to be burnt in the ſame flames with that famous Doctor's Sermons, upon March 25, 1710 (o). This occaſioned our Author to put out a pamphlet that year, intitled, A High-Church Catechiſm; as alſo another called, The Jacobitiſm, Perjury, and Popery of the High-Church Prieſts, and a third, which he named, The Merciful Judgments of High-Church Triumphant on offending Clergymen and Others in the Reign of King Charles I. The next year, the Lower Houſe of Convocation (where Dr Atterbury was choſen Prolocutor) having, in purſuance to a letter to that aſſembly from the Queen, drawn up a Repreſentation of the preſent State of Religion, with regard to the late exceſſive growth of Infidelity, Hereſy, and Profaneneſs, wherein it was obſerved, that the aſſerting the neceſſity of human actions, overturns the foundation of all Religion, both Natural and Revealed, and renders all notions of good or evil, of rewards and puniſhments, vain and groundleſs; Dr Tindal, in anſwer to this, publiſhed a Pamphlet [E], wherein he

He alſo the ſame year printed a Second Edition of his Defence, in which he put both Parts into one Volume, with this title, A Defence of the Rights of the Chriſtian Church, in two Parts: Part the firſt againſt Mr Wotton's Viſitation Sermon, preached at Newport Pagnel: Part the ſecond, occaſioned by two late Indictments againſt a Bookſeller and his ſervant, for ſelling one of the ſaid Books; with ſome Tracts of Hugo Grotius and Mr John Hales of Eton. (5) Boyer's Hiſt. of the Reign of Queen Ann, fol. 1735. p. 446.

[E] He publiſhed a pamphlet.] The title runs thus: The Nation vindicated from the Aſperſions caſt on it in a late Pamphlet, intitled, 'A Repreſentation of the pre-'ſent State of Religion, with regard to the late exceſ-'ſive growth of Infidelity, Hereſy, and Profaneneſs, 'as it paſſed the Lower Houſe of Convocation; in two 'Parts.' In the Second Part of this Treatiſe, our Author lays it down for an undoubted maxim, that men are neceſſarily determined to love themſelves: 'Whence,' ſays he, the deſire of getting pleaſure and avoiding 'pain muſt as neceſſarily govern their actions; that 'the difference between men and angels is not that 'both alike do not neceſſarily love their own good; 'but that the latter, by having their judgments ſo much he maintained, on the contrary, the neceſſity of human actions to be the true foundation of all Religion, without which, rewards and puniſhments would be vain and groundleſs. —In 1713, our Author turned his thoughts from Religious to Civil Concerns, and begun to try the force of his pen upon the ſubjects of State Politicks. He obſerved many people poſſeſſed with Jealouſies about the Pretender; his firſt eſſay therefore of this kind, was intitled, A Diſſuaſive from Jacobitiſm; ſhewing, in general, what the Nation is to expect from a Popiſh King, and in particular from the Pretender. This was preſently followed by a Second Diſſuaſive from Jacobitiſm, wherein the Intereſt of the Clergy and the Univerſities is conſidered (p); and the next year he wrote an anſwer to Mr Bedford's Hereditary Right of the Crown of England (q) aſſerted. In the ſame ſpirit, after the death of Queen Ann, when her Miniſtry came under examination, in 1715, the Doctor publiſhed a pamphlet, intitled, Juſtice done to the late Miniſtry, or the Charge of their deſigning to make the Pretender King of Great Britain proved from their Conduct to be groundleſs, and the Reaſons for a Parliamentary Enquiry conſidered. In 1716, he wrote a vindication of the Septennial Act, in defence of the Miniſtry then in being. We muſt not omit to obſerve, that our Author, as well as Mr Toland, had, from the time of King George the Firſt's acceſſion to the throne, occaſionally entertained his thoughts with the view of getting the Univerſities reformed by a Royal Viſitation. In the proſecution of this ſcheme, at the requeſt of Mr Walpole, who was now in the Adminiſtration, he drew up an account in writing, which he gave to that Gentleman, of the methods that were taken in the ſeveral Viſitations of the Univerſities in the Reign of King James II: and the Miniſtry happening to run into diviſions at the ſame time, our Author being deſired by the ſame Patron, gave him a rough draught of the Characters of the leading men in it (r). However, affairs took ſuch a turn, that preſently after he publiſhed a pamphlet in 1717, with this title: Defection conſidered [F], and the deſigns of thoſe who divided the friends of the Government ſet in a true light, wherein, among others, the Character of Mr Walpole (who, contrary to our Author's expectation, had reſigned all his poſts) was moſt rudely handled. To this, an anſwer, in 1718, was returned, in which that Gentleman declared it was plain by a manuſcript in his cuſtody, that the laſt mentioned pamphlet was written againſt another perſon; but that upon the change of the Miniſtry, that name was ſtruck out, and his put in, and that through a deteſtation of the calumny, he gave the Author a ſum of money not to publiſh it. This provoked Dr Tindal to publiſh in 8vo, the ſame year, an account of a manuſcript [G], intitled, Deſtruction the certain conſequence of Diviſion; or the Neceſſity of a ſtrict

(p) Mr Toland alſo publiſhed his famous pamphlet, intitled, The Art of Reſtoring, at the ſame time. See his article.

(q) The Hereditary Right was publiſhed in October, 1715, in the Gazette: One Harbin was the real Author; but Mr Hilkiah Bedford took it upon himſelf, and was ſentenced May the 4th, following, to ſuffer a ſevere puniſhment. See the article SMITH [GEORGE], Remark [B].

'the better informed, cannot commit ſuch miſtakes as 'men do. Nay, God himſelf, by the excellency of 'his nature, is neceſſarily determined to will the beſt; 'and that does not hinder, but that he is abſolutely 'free; becauſe nothing can prevent his acting as he 'pleaſes. And man is a free agent, when he is not 'hindered from putting his will in execution, though 'his will is the neceſſary reſult of his judgment (6).' It may not be amiſs to take notice here, that Anthony Collins, Eſq; in the year 1717, publiſhed A Philoſophical Enquiry concerning Human Liberty, where he had reaſoned in much the ſame manner as our Author does in this above mentioned paſſage; that Mr Collins's book was anſwered by Dr Samuel Clarke, in ſome Remarks ſubjoined to a Collection of Papers, which paſſed between the late learned Mr Leibnitz and Dr Clarke, relating to the Principles of Natural Philoſophy and Religion, 1717, in 8vo. to which the former found it not proper to make any reply (7).

[F] Defection conſidered.] It was anſwered in two pamphlets: 1. The Reſigners vindicated, or the Defection reconſidered; in which the deſigns of all Parties are ſet in a true light: by a Gentleman. London, 1718, in 8vo. 2. The Reſigners vindicated: Part II, and laſt: Containing, 1. An Account of the Authors of the Defection; 2. Their falſification of Facts; 3. Reaſons againſt aboliſhing the 30th of January, and the 29th of May; 4. Characters of the Reſigners. The Author, in the entrance of this laſt piece, obſerves, that 'it is now no ſecret 'from what hands the Defection conſidered, &c. came, 'though it was of the firſt conſequence to thoſe, for 'whoſe intereſt thoſe papers were publiſhed, to have 'let the Authors continue in darkneſs. Infamy ought 'to be ſurrounded with a thick cloud, when it attacks 'reputations of a ſtanding, and experienced merit. 'The arrow ſhould fly by night, when the diſcovery of 'the archer will blunt the edge of the weapon; or at 'leaſt bring a cure after the wounds it makes. Deſpe'rate indeed muſt be the cauſe that employs ſuch foul 'hands for a halter. The taſte muſt be vitiated to the 'laſt degree, that weeds a wilderneſs of poiſons for a 'noſegay, and ſends to the Fens of Ireland for per'fumers. When a man has made it the employment 'of his life, and all the ſtudy that a mean capacity, ill 'furniſhed with the helps of languages, can attain to, 'to pick up all the little objections againſt Chriſtianity 'itſelf, to ſtrike boldly at the Religion of his Country, 'deſpiſe its Worſhip, and ridicule its Worſhippers, 'what a grimace is it to ſee ſuch a one turn Champion 'for the Rights and Privileges of a Chriſtian Commu'nity, and pretend to defend that, in which he never 'believed? Serpens niſi ſerpentem comederit non erit Draco. 'How many venomous Writers has this wretch ſwal'lowed, to qualify him to become the formidable 'Enemy of Religion, and the Protector of a ſet of 'men, whoſe cauſe he now ſo ſtrongly ſupports? Is it 'not enough to prejudice truth itſelf, when it comes 'from ſuch a quarter? Or, what is worſe, does it not 'give ſtrong ſuſpicions, that no truth can be there? 'ſince this Author has been ſo often proved guilty of 'falſifying matters of fact, quotations induſtriouſly 'miſrepreſented, or for want of knowledge, vilely tran'ſlated.' He concludes as follows: 'Thus have I run 'through the Defection conſidered, without offending; 'I hope, againſt truth; and if I have taken ſome pains 'to vindicate merit from reproaches, I have performed 'a more laudable part, than the man who drudged in 'the poor work of calumny and detraction. If there 'appears any where ſomething warm and paſſionate, I 'own it the effect of contempt and indignation; when 'I ſee a wretch, who neither can write Engliſh, nor 'conſtrue Latin, make an attempt upon the good 'names of his fellow ſubjects, under the falſe colour 'of a love for his country, at the ſame time diſtating 'ſchemes of politicks to his ſuperiors; and under the 'diſguiſe of a zealot, impoſing ſcandalous notions of 'Religion on the world: All this I could not bear. 'And I profeſs, that neither a view of intereſt, nor any 'hopes of pleaſing or diſpleaſing the great, made me 'expoſe, in this manner, the numerous falſities and ab'ſurdities in his book (8).'

(8) At the end of this piece is the following advertiſement: Speedily will be publiſhed, An Account of the Learned and Political Qualifications of Dr M—w T-nd-l, from Memoirs of his Club, with a faithful Catalogue of the Pamphlets he has written, and thoſe he intends to write; dedicated to A. C. Eſq;

[G] An Account of a Manuſcript.] In this Account, page 2, our Author informs us, that he wrote a paper in the form of a Dialogue between two Scholars; whereof one was to perſonate a Whig, and the other a Tory. The Whig being ſuppoſed to know what reaſons would moſt affect the Tory, endeavours to prove it his intereſt to change ſides; the other, by arguments drawn from the wretched management, and weak conduct of ſome then in power, ſhewing they took no ſtep but what was to the prejudice of their own ſide, pretends to prove, that the Government, if other meaſures were not taken, could not long ſubſiſt; or, what was next to it, muſt throw itſelf into Tory hands for protection.

ſtrict Union between all who love the Proteſtant Government and Proteſtant Religion: written at the deſire of R—— W——, Eſq; and left with him, at his requeſt; but ſince expoſed, contrary to his promiſe, with Aſperſions on the Author of the Defection. In this pamphlet the Doctor denies the fact of having changed the perſon characterized, and charges this antagoniſt with the baſeſt treachery in betraying a ſecret, which, from the narrative he here gives of that tranſaction, was the effect of former mutual confidence and friendſhip (s). Notwithſtanding this, in 1721, and the two following years, he entered the liſts in defence of Mr Walpole's meaſures (who was then at the head of the Miniſtry) againſt the attacks of the Author of Cato's Letters in the London Journal [H]; and 1727 he publiſhed a pamphlet, with this title, Corah and Moſes: being the ſubſtance of a Diſcourſe on thoſe words, I have not taken one aſs from them, neither have I hurt one of them; where he gives the higheſt encomiums to the ſame Gentleman, under the character of Moſes, 'whoſe perſonal accompliſhments, he obſerves, were ſo great, that the Rabbies ſay, even the Egyptian faction, who hated the Miniſter, yet loved the Man; and it is plain from Scripture, his poſt did not elevate him, but he preſerved his humility, being eaſy of acceſs to all, and treating the meaneſt with the greateſt affability; and therefore he is called meek above all men which are upon the face of the earth.' Mr Anthony Collins, Eſq; having publiſhed, the year following, his ſcheme of Literal Prophecy conſidered, the Biſhop of London, Dr Gibſon, wrote his firſt Paſtoral Letter to the people of his Dioceſe, occaſioned (as the Author expreſsly declares) by ſome late writings in favour of Infidelity. In return to this, Dr Tindal publiſhed, in 1728, An Addreſs to the Inhabitants of the two great Cities of London and Weſtminſter, in relation to a Paſtoral Letter, ſaid to be written by the Biſhop of London to the people of his Dioceſe, &c.; and upon the Biſhop's writing a ſecond Paſtoral Letter, our Author publiſhed a Second Addreſs (t) ——. In 1730 came out his grand Work, intitled, Chriſtianity as old as the Creation: or the Goſpel a Republication of the Religion of Nature; which being immediately attacked by Dr Waterland, our Author the ſame year publiſhed a Second Edition of his Second Addreſs to the Inhabitants &c. with Remarks on [Dr Waterland's book, intitled] Scripture Vindicated [I], and ſome other late writings. Not long after (t) It was reprinted with alterations and additions the ſame year, in 8vo.

'The Dialogue (which at firſt had not near ſo many 'things in it, and yet had been ſeen by ſome great men) 'when it was enlarged, I ſent, ſays he, to Mr W—— 'with this compliment, that he might ſee what his ene'mies ſaid of him, and what his friends expected from him.' After this, at Mr W——'s invitation, he waited upon him, when that Gentleman, he ſays, having expreſſed himſelf upon the ſubject of occaſional conformity, and the reformation of the Univerſities, much to our Author's mind, told him, that if he was at leiſure, he would have him put his thoughts, with relation to the deficiencies among the great men, in writing, and ſhew it him; ſaying, it would be for his private ſatisfaction, or to that purpoſe. 'Upon which, continues he, I 'drew up an incorrect, unfiniſhed piece, intitled, De'ſtruction &c. and the firſt opportunity I had, put it 'into Mr W——'s hands, who neither read it before 'me, nor ever returned it. What ſhews, that he 'thought when he had got this manuſcript he had 'wherewith to hinder me from printing the Dialogue, 'is, that as ſoon as it was in his poſſeſſion, though a 'conſiderable while before he quitted his poſts, all the 'correſpondence I had with him, was wholly loſt; he 'dropped me with this cold compliment: that I need 'not give myſelf the trouble to come to him till he ſent for 'me. Thus, ſays our Author, have I given the ſecret 'hiſtory of a correſpondence which did not laſt long, 'it not beginning till ſome months after the King went 'abroad, and ending as before mentioned.'

[H] He defended Sir Robert Walpole's meaſures againſt Cato's letters in the London Journal.] The titles of the Pamphlets he wrote on this occaſion are: 1. The Judgment of Dr Prideaux in condemning the murder of Julius Cæſar, by the conſpirators, as a moſt villainous act, maintained, and the ſophiſtry of the London Journal of December the 2d and 9th expoſed, with ſome political remarks on the Roman government. Lond. 1721, in 8vo. 2. A defence of our preſent Happy Eſtabliſhment, and the Adminiſtration, vindicated from the falſehood and malice of ſeveral late treaſonable Libels, viz. Cato's letters in the London Journal, and the Hiſtorical Account of the advantages of the Hanover Succeſſion, &c. Lond. 1722, in 8vo. 3. An Enquiry into the Cauſes of the preſent diſaffection; as alſo into the neceſſity of ſome ſtanding forces; the power of Judges and Juries in relation to Libels; and the Juſtice of the Additional tax on the Papiſts and Popiſh Recuſants; with Remarks on the diſcourſe on ſtanding armies, and other Papers of Cato the Journaliſt. London, 1723, in 8vo.

[I] Remarks on Dr Waterland's book, entitled, Scripture Vindicated.] That Chriſtianity as old as the Creation was at leaſt artfully wrote, is inconteſtibly evident from the foils which many of its Oppugners ſuffered in attacking it. For inſtance, Dr Waterland ſets out thus, in his Introduction: 'His [Dr Tindal's] attacks are fee'ble, his artillery contemptible; he has no genius or 'taſte for literature, no acquaintance with the original 'languages, nor ſo much as with common criticks or 'commentators; ſeveral of his objections are pure Eng'liſh objections, ſuch as affect only our tranſlation: 'the reſt are of the loweſt and moſt trifling ſort.' And in the body of the book he calls him fool and idiot, who had neither wit, judgment, learning, or any thing elſe but dull malice, p. 31, 95. 'If this be really 'the caſe, ſays another Aſſailant (9), what is all this 'buſtle about, why all this Apparatus to foil ſo feeble, 'ſo contemptible an Adverſary. Why muſt two Emi'nent Scholars be picked out from (10) Oxford and 'Cambridge to divide the taſk between them, and re'pel, with united force, the deſpicable attacks of a 'poor Engliſh blunderer. All this Apparatus muſt 'needs perſuade us, that you have a different notion 'of his ability from what you think proper to declare: 'and, in fact, as all who talk extravagantly or infin'cerely are apt to betray themſelves, ſo you in many 'places confute yourſelf, and ſhew, that theſe pure 'Engliſh objections, which owe their riſe, as you would 'inſinuate, to the blunders of our tranſlation, deſerve 'to be conſidered in another light; ſince at ſome times 'you exclaim againſt them as being ſtale, or borrowed 'from antiquity, from the ancient enemies of religion, 'Celſus and Julian; at other times from our learned 'moderns, Marſham and Burnet, &c. and do not ſo much 'as in one ſingle inſtance prove them to be grounded 'on the miſtaken ſenſe of the original. For my own 'part, continues he, to obſerve our Engliſh proverb, 'and give the Devil his due, I cannot for my life diſ'cover any ſuch want of literature as you object to him; 'but, on the contrary, ſee plainly, that his work has 'been the effect of much ſtudy and reading; his mate'rials collected from a great variety of the beſt writers; 'his pages decently crowded with citations; and his 'index of authors as numerous as that of moſt books 'which have lately appeared: and, to tell you the truth, 'were it my taſk to anſwer him in the method you have 'choſen, by undertaking to vindicate every ſingle text 'of Scripture from all the exceptions that may be made 'to it, I ſhould be tempted to wiſh that he had leſs 'learning rather than more; ſince, with the ſmall ſhare 'he has, one may eaſily foreſee, by the ſpecimen you 'give us, that he will in many caſes be at leaſt a full 'match for you.' This he proceeds to confirm in ſeveral inſtances, as in the hiſtory of the fall of man, of circumciſion, and the confuſion of tongues at Babel. But here he ſuffered a like foil to that of his immediate Antagoniſt, and

Beſides this by Dr Waterland, another anſwer was publiſhed to Dr Tindal's book by Dr John Conybeare, Dean of Chriſt-church in Oxford, intitled, A Defence of Revealed Religion againſt the Exceptions of a late Writer, in his book, intitled, Chriſtianity as old as the Creation. after this, the Doctor began to ſink under the infirmities of old age, and a few days before his death, being prevailed upon to remove from his chambers in Gray's-Inn to lodgings in Cold-Bath Fields (u), he expired there on the 16th of Auguſt, 1733, being then Senior Fellow of All-Soul's College; which was the only preferment he ever had. He had been long afflicted with the ſtone, and his body being opened (w), according to his own requeſt, there was found in the gall-bladder, a ſtone of the ſize of a cheſnut, and in the ductus choledochus another ſtone, which, though of a ſmaller ſize, was big enough to prevent the paſſage of any gall, and thereby became the immediate cauſe of his diſſolution. After the opening, his body was wrapt in a ſheet of fine lead, and preſerved for a week, during which, two molds were taken from his face by Mr Rieſbrach, the Statuary, to make a buſt of him. On Thurſday, Auguſt 23, his remains were conveyed from Cold-Bath Fields in a herſe, attended by three mourning coaches, to Clerkenwell Church, and interred, according to his deſire, near thoſe of Dr Burnet, late Biſhop of Saliſbury. The corpſe was followed only by Euſtace Budgell, Eſq; (x), who, by the tenor of the Doctor's laſt will [K], was appointed and run into ſome unwarranted interpretations of Scripture, which drew him into further diſputes, that ended not to his reputation (†). It is pleaſant enough to hear Mr Warburton, the preſent Biſhop of Glouceſter, upon this ſubject. Having mentioned the controverſy between Dr Waterland and Mr Jackſon upon the Trinity, he proceeds thus: 'The worſt is, that ſuch kind of 'Writers ſeldom know when to have done. For, 'writing themſelves up into the ſame deluſion with their 'Readers, they are apt to venture out into the more open 'paths of literature, where their reputation, made out 'of that ſtuff which Lucan calls Σκότῳ ὁλόχροος*; pre- 'ſently falls from them; and their nakedneſs appears; 'and thus it fared with our two worthies. The world, 'which muſt have always ſomething to amuſe it, was 'now in good time grown weary of its play-thing, and 'catched at a new object that promiſed them more agree- 'able entertainment. Tindal, a kind of baſtard Socrates, 'had brought our ſpeculations from heaven to earth, 'and, under pretence of advancing the antiquity of 'Chriſtianity, laboured to undermine its original. 'This was a controverſy that required another manage- 'ment. Clear ſenſe, ſevere reaſoning, a thorough 'knowledge of profane and ſacred antiquity, and an 'intimate acquaintance with human nature, were the 'qualities proper for ſuch as engaged on this ſubject: 'a very unpromiſing adventure for theſe metaphyſical 'nurſlings, bred up under the ſhade of chimæras. 'Yet they would needs venture out. What they got 'by it was only to be once laughed at, and then for- 'gotten. But one odd circumſtance deſerves to be 'remembered, that though they wrote not, we may 'be ſure, in concert, yet each attacked his adverſary 'at the ſame time, faſtened upon him in the ſame 'place, and mumbled him with juſt the ſame toothleſs 'rage (11).'

Mr Tindal, upon reading this paper, which was delivered to him by Mrs Lucy Price (15) in the preſence of Mr Budgell, ſuſpected it on many accounts; namely, for the ſtile, ſo different from his Uncle's; for the ſtrange expreſſion concerning Mr Budgell; for the omiſſion of a word; for being all writ with Mrs Price's own hand, and witneſſed by Mr Budgell's footman and the woman of the houſe, whoſe lodgings were recommended and hired for the Doctor by Mr Budgell; but more particularly for the extravagant legacy, ſo contrary to what his Uncle had lately told him, to his frequent and expreſs declarations to him and his friends, and to his real will, witneſſed by Gentlemen who were ready to atteſt it, and peruſed by a friend of the Doctor's about ſix weeks before. As Mr Tindal was expreſſing his ſurprize at this legacy, Mr Budgell ſteps up and tells him, he muſt not think he had all this money to pay; for the Doctor had lent him 1000l. upon bond and judgment. Accordingly, upon opening his Uncle's ſtrong box, (which was alſo delivered to him by Mrs Price) he found Mr Budgell's ſingle bond of 1000l. but all the other things in it amounted to no more than about the value of 60l. (16). This put him upon further ſearch after the Doctor's effects; to which purpoſe going to Meſſ. Snow and Pultocks, the Doctor's bankers, he was told, that the Doctor had not been poſſeſſed, at leaſt for many years, of more than 100l. Bank ſtock, and 1800l. South-ſea ſtock. That on June 2, 1732, Mr Snow ſold for him 1000l. South-ſea ſtock, and paid him in Bank notes; and on June 20, 1733, he ſold for him the remaining 800l. South-ſea ſtock, and heard him ſay afterwards, he had lent his money upon bond. Theſe circumſtances increaſed Mr Tindal's ſuſpicions of foul play. He could not believe that his Uncle would in his ſenſes give more than he was worth in one legacy, and then formally appoint him a reſiduary Legatee, as well as Executor. Wherefore he reſolved to conteſt the will; but however would firſt ſee what was become of the 1000l. received by the Doctor of Mr Snow the 2d of June, 1732; for as to the other 800l. ſtock, ſold June 20, 1733, Mr Budgell's bond being of the ſame date, it was plain he had received it, as indeed he confeſſed. In this further ſearch at the Bank he found there the aforeſaid notes, all endorſed with theſe words, Budgell, June 3, BB; which BB appeared to be the mark of a ſervant of Sir Francis Child and Company, to whom the Bank notes were paid by Mr Budgell the 3d of June, 1732, and for which he took promiſſory notes of Sir Francis Child and Company, payable to Euſtace Budgell, Eſq; or order. When Mr Tindal acquainted Mr Budgell, at Mrs Price's, that the Doctor was never poſſeſſed of more than 1900l. ſtock, they both ſhewed ſome concern, but ſaid they knew nothing of the 1000l. ſtock, ſold by the Doctor, June 2, 1732, nor had ever ſeen, or heard the Doctor ſpeak of, any Bank notes relating to the ſame, nor knew any thing of his lending ſuch a ſum, upon bond or other ſecurity. However, upon Mr Tindal's propoſing to renounce the will, if Budgell would agree to give him the Doctor's goods (17) and the 100l. Bank ſtock, it was agreed, upon articles, that he ſhould have immediate poſſeſſion of the goods, and alſo 145l. on condition he could trace the loſt 1000l. Mr Tindal, having ſecured the goods, told Mr Budgell he had traced the 1000l. in the manner above mentioned into his pocket, and therefore demanded performance of the articles. And, upon telling him the particulars, Budgell, after many other baffled ſubterfuges, owned that he had borrowed the money of the Doctor upon bond, but had repaid it, and torn the bond (18). And at laſt, at the inſtance of Mrs Price (19), he transferred the ſtock to Mr Tindal, as ſoon as the will was proved. Budgell, at the proving of it, took the uſual

(16) As Mr Tindal knew the Doctor's true will was kept in the ſtrong box, he aſked them if they had ſeen it, or knew what was become of it; Mrs Price anſwered, ſhe knew nothing of it.

(17) They were appraiſed at 51l. beſides the remainder of a bond from Mr Tindal's father to the Doctor, amounting to 261. which Mr Budgell gave up, p. 16.

(18) Mr Tindal intimated that this was not probable, and inſiſted, ſince Budgell had owned the receipt of the money, upon his proving how he was diſcharged of it.

appointed his teſtamentary heir, having before got poſſeſſion of his fortune (y), in prejudice of his nephew, and heir at law, the Reverend Mr Nicholas Tindal, the Tranſlator and Continuator of Rapin's Hiſtory of England.

(y) Thus our Deiſt's vanity, and conceit of his own parts, delivered him up a prey to the greater vanity and villany of Mr Budgell.

uſual oath; but Mr Tindal, in renouncing it, refuſed to ſwear he believed it to be the Doctor's will; and afterwards conteſting it at Law, the will was ſet aſide. But he never recovered the 1000l. or any part of it, notwithſtanding Mr Curl aſſured him (20), that Lord Orrery was an Obligee in the bond with Mr Budgell. But this information, which was not made till 1734, happened, if true, to come a little too late, his Lordſhip having expired on the 28th of Auguſt the preceding year (21). P

TOLAND [JANUS JUNIUS]. This was his true name, though he loſt it at ſchool, where his Maſter (a) firſt ordered him to be called John, which he himſelf retained ever after, the other being only uſed by him as a diſguiſe (b). He was born November the 30th, 1678 (c), upon a peninſula, vulgarly called Eniſowen (d), in the province of Ulſter in Ireland, and deſcended of an ancient family in that Kingdom (e). He was put to ſchool at Redcaſtle near Londonderry (f), and bred in the Roman Catholic Faith (g), all his relations being in that Communion; but as he was a boy of forward parts, he early ſhook off the ſuperſtition of his anceſtors, and even before he was ſixteen years of age, had grown into a warm zeal againſt Popery. Wherefore, having acquired a competent ſtock of grammar learning at ſchool, he went from thence, in 1681, to Glaſcow in Scotland, where he continued three years (h), after which he made a viſit to the Univerſity of Edinburgh; and having gone through the ſtatutable examinations with great applauſe there, on the 30th of June, 1690, he was created Maſter of Arts. Upon the 22d of July following he received the uſual diploma (i), with which he returned to Glaſcow, where he ſtaid only a few days, till he could procure a proper teſtimonial of his Religion and Loyalty (i) from the Magiſtrates of that town, as he had before done of his learning and morals from the Profeſſors of Edinburgh [A]. Thus furniſhed, after ſome ſmall deliberation (k), he determined to go to England. Here joining with the Diſſenters, he recommended himſelf to ſome good families of that perſuaſion, in which he lived about two years. During his reſidence amongſt them, a remarkable book, intitled, Goſpel Truth ſtated and vindicated, was publiſhed in 1692, by Mr Daniel Williams, a celebrated Diſſenting Miniſter. This piece being greatly liked by our young Student in Divinity, he ſent it to the Author of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle (l), whom he deſired to give an abſtract of it, acquainting him with the hiſtory of the diſpute which had occaſioned it to be wrote [B]. That from Glaſcow is as follows:

We the Magiſtrates of Glaſcow underſubſcribing, do hereby teſtifie and declare to all whom theſe preſents may concern, that the bearer, John Toland, Maſter of Arts, did reſide here for ſome years as a Student at the Univerſitie in this citie, dureing which tyme, he behaved himſelf as one trew Proteſtant, and loyal ſubject; as witneſs our hands, at Glaſcow, the penult day of July, one thouſand ſix hundred and ninetie yeares. [B] Acquainting him with the hiſtory of the diſpute which occaſioned it.] The whole title of Mr Williams's (2) book runs thus: Goſpel Truth ſtated and vindicated; wherein ſome of Dr Criſp's notions are conſidered, and the oppoſite truths plainly ſtated and confirmed. It was occaſioned by the republication of Dr Criſp's Works, about two years before, which had revived a controverſy that Mr Williams had made himſelf famous for managing againſt the Antinomian Principles, which then were breaking in, with great impetuoſity, among the Preſbyterians. This new impreſſion of ſermons appearing (at a time when the Socinian Controverſy was very hotly agitated) with additions, and twelve names of the Preſbyterian and Independent Miniſters prefixt to honour it, ſpread the Antinomian Principles to ſuch a degree, that the more ſober of the Preſbyterian Miniſters were not able to preach a ſermon, wherein either hope was aſſerted by conditional promiſes, or the fear of ſin preſſed by the divine threatnings, but they were immediately cenſured and condemned as enemies of Chriſt, and of free grace; and eſpecially were cried out upon violently by many of the Anabaptiſts and Independents: nay, one of them preaching at Pinners-Hall that repentance was neceſſary to the remiſſion of ſins, that pulpit was ſoon filled with the hardeſt cenſures againſt the Preſbyterians. Theſe proceedings incited ſome of the moſt zealous among them, called the United Brethren, to conſider of ſome proper expedient to obviate the growth of thoſe errors, the revival whereof, they concluded, would make their Miniſtry uſeleſs, and unity impoſſible. And Dr Criſp's book being found to be the chief ſource of this evil, at their requeſt Mr Williams undertook therefore to confute it. This he did, firſt, in a ſermon at Pinners-Hall, and afterwards in the treatiſe above mentioned, which was publiſhed in May, 1692, with the approbation of Dr Bates, Mr Howe, Mr Aſſop, Mr Shower (3), and a dozen more of the Diſſenting Miniſters, wherein they did not only atteſt the right ſtating of truth and errors therein, but recommended it as a conſiderable ſervice to the Church of Chriſt, and as a means for the reclaiming of thoſe who have been miſled into ſuch dangerous opinions, and for the eſtabliſhing any that waver in any of thoſe truths. But upon the coming forth of this treatiſe, it was obſerved, that ſuch a furious zeal againſt the Author and his book broke out, as had almoſt overſet the United Brethren, with their union: for in October following, a paper was delivered unto the ſaid Brethren, ſubſcribed by ſix Diſſenting Miniſters, importing a high and heavy charge againſt the Author and his work. However, the objections being looked upon, either as frivolous, or groundleſs, and ſome of the citations to be quite contrary to the letter of his expreſſions pretended to be cited, were

(2) This Mr Daniel Williams may be ſaid to have ſucceeded Mr Baxter in the management of this diſpute.

(3) This Gentleman was a particular friend of Mr Toland, both now, and long after he left the Diſſenters. He ſent the Memorial of the State of England, in 1705, to him for his approbation, which Mr Toland ſet a great value upon. See Miſcellaneous Works, ubi ſupra, Vol. II. p. 356.

About this time, ſeveral of the moſt eminent of theſe Proteſtants conceiving great hopes from his uncommon parts, he went, by their encouragement, to perfect his ſtudies at Leyden, where he was ſupported by them near two years (m). After his return to England, he preſently went to Oxford (n), having procured letters of recommendation [C] to Mr Creech of All-Souls College, Dr Mill, Principal of Edmund-Hall, Mr White Kennet, then a Member of that Hall, afterwards Biſhop of Peterborough, and ſeveral other learned Members of that Univerſity. Upon the credit of theſe Gentlemen, he got ſworn and admitted in the regular form into the Bodleian Library, in January 1693-4 (o). Having procured this favour, he did not neglect to make his own uſe of it, and proſecuted his intended ſtudies very induſtriouſly [D]. But he had not been here long before ſome religious notions, openly advanced, and warmly maintained by him in the coffee-houſes, were taken notice [E] of; whereupon he drew up a formal Confeſſion of his Faith [F], which giving ſome ſatisfaction, he thought not deſerving to be taken notice of. Notwithſtanding, Dr Chauncey, one of the Subſcribers, in a meeting of the United Miniſters, declared, that he would break off from their Union, becauſe they had taken no cognizance of this Paper of Objections; and the oppoſition was carried on ſo far by that party, particularly by Mather and Lob, two Independents, that when other ways, as that of writing againſt Williams, were found unſucceſsful, a perſon was appointed more narrowly to examine his books, and to collect out of them what errors he could diſcover; and accordingly another Paper of Objections was drawn up againſt him: and whereas, in the former paper there was not one word tending to the charge of Socinianiſm; upon this freſh examination, that was now thought proper to be added to the weight of other exceptions againſt him. After ſome time, the matter was referred, by both ſides, to Dr Stillingfleet, Biſhop of Worceſter, who gave the world a true ſtate of both theſe controverſies; wherein he cleared Mr Williams (as well as Mr Baxter) from the charge of Socinianiſm. After this Mr Lob and his brethren being better reconciled to Mr Williams, he, at their requeſt, printed a ſmall pamphlet, repreſenting the true ſtate of the Principles of the more ſober Independents, intitled, An End of Diſcord. And thus ended this controverſy among the Diſſenters (4), of which we thought it not amiſs to give this account, as it ſerves to let us ſee by what means Mr Toland procured thoſe recommendations, mentioned in the text, which he at this time carried to Oxford.

[C] He carried letters of recommendation.] In a letter (5) which he wrote ſoon after his arrival to a Gentleman who was concerned in procuring theſe recommendations, he writes thus: 'I lie under great obligations to the Gentlemen who recommended me, both for the advantageous character they were pleaſed to beſtow upon me, and the ſuitable reception I met with. Mr Creech, in particular, has been extraordinary civil to me, and did me the honour to recommend three or four of the moſt ingenious men in the Univerſity to my acquaintance, who accordingly viſited me. The like did Dr Mill and Mr Kennet——I beg you to acquaint Mr Freke with the contents, whoſe care and favour I ſhall always endeavour to deſerve, looking upon him as the primum mobile of my happineſs. I forget to tell you Mr Creech is publiſhing Lucretius in Latin, with a paraphraſe (6) and commentary, and Manilius in Engliſh verſe, which will be nothing inferior to Lucretius. Dr Mill has already communicated his Teſtament to me, and others have already ſent me ſeveral books I only enquired after, without any deſign of making bold ſo ſoon to borrow; all which I attribute to the reſpect they owe their friends. I am conveniently and pretty reaſonably lodged at Mr Bodington's, over-againſt All-Souls College.'

(6) It was not publiſhed till 1695, and the Manilius came out ſome time after.

[D] He followed his ſtudies induſtriouſly.] He collected materials upon various ſubjects, and compoſed ſome ſmall pieces. To the end of his Specimen of a Hiſtory of the Druids is ſubjoined a catalogue of ſome old Armorican Britiſh words, which he ſuppoſes to be Iriſh, chiefly from their affinity in pronunciation, at the head of which he has theſe words: 'Catalogus vocum quarundam Armoricarum quas Hibernicas eſſe deprehendi, quaſque ex libello, quem mihi mutuo dedit Cl. & Rev. Dominus Dominus Jo. Millius, S. S. T. in Academia Oxonienſi P. ibidemque Aulæ Sanctæ Edmundanæ Principalis, collegi & deſumpſi.' This is followed with a ſhort introduction, which is dated thus: 'Oxoniæ 19 Decembris anno a Chriſto nato 1693 (7).' In this Specimen, p. 4, he ſays he formed the deſign of writing that hiſtory at Oxford, and he mentions Mr Aubrey (afterwards Author of the Natural Hiſtory and Antiquities of Surrey) as one of his acquaintance there, who was of great aſſiſtance to him, p. 112. In his Miſcellaneous Works, Vol. II. p. 28, et ſeq. there is a piece intitled, The Fabulous Death of Attilius Regulus: or a Diſſertation proving the received Hiſtory of the Tragical Death of Marcus Attilius Regulus, the Roman Conſul, to be a Fable (8). This is dated Oxon. Aug. 6, 1694; and Mr Toland owns, that the hint for enquiring into this ſubject was, though undeſignedly, given him by an acquaintance there. He was led to the diſcovery by a note in Palmerius upon the ſame ſubject in a note upon Appion (9).

(7) See Specimen of the Hiſtory of the Druids, in the firſt volume of his Miſcellaneous Works, p. 204, 205.

[E] Some religious notions were taken notice of.] He received a letter, dated May 4, 1694 (10), from an unknown hand, which begins thus: 'Mr Toland, The character you bear in Oxford is this; that you are a man of fine parts, great learning, and little Religion. Whether or no this be your juſt character, I cannot ſay; but this I can ſay, and am aſſured of, that if it be, it is your higheſt intereſt to reflect ſeriouſly upon the matter, and to endeavour betimes to deſerve a better. This is the whole occaſion of my writing to you, and I intreat you to receive it as it is meant——Popular eſteem, the applauſes of a coffee-houſe, or a club of prophane wits, are mean unworthy ends——Believe me, I am concerned for your ſake: methinks it is ten thouſand pities, that any one ſhould freely chooſe to be eternally wretched, or but moderately happy, into whoſe hands God hath put the means of purchaſing an exceeding weight of glory; and whom he ſeems to have deſigned to be a veſſel of honour.'——The ſame perſon, in another (11) letter, dated May 30, has theſe words: 'It is ſaid, that you are now publiſhing a piece with an intent to ſhew, that there is no ſuch thing as a myſtery in our Religion.'

(11) Ibid. p. 372.

[F] He drew up a ſyſtem of his Faith.] After having declared his belief of the immortality of the ſoul, and a future retribution, he goes on, 'I muſt therefore be 'neceſſarily of ſome Religion, and I preſume you will 'readily acknowledge it to be the Chriſtian, when I 'aſſure you, that, I. I firmly believe the exiſtence of 'an infinitely good, wiſe, and powerful Being, which 'in our language we call God, ſubſtantially different 'from the univerſe he created, and continues to govern 'by his Providence, of whom, through whom, and to 'whom are all things. II. Concerning Chriſt in particular, 'that he is God manifeſt in the Fleſh, or True God 'and Man, perfectly united, without contrariety of 'will, or confuſion of eſſence. As to his human na'ture, that according to the Prophets, he was born of 'a pure virgin, conceived by virtue of the Divine 'Spirit, and therefore ever free from all the ſinful diſ'orders of fallen man. That he roſe from the dead the 'third day after he was crucified by the Jews, and forty 'days after aſcended into heaven, from whence I ex'pect his coming at the laſt day to judge me and all the 'world: and that when he was on earth, he not only 'by his life gave us a perfect example, and by his 'doctrine an infallible rule of all that we are to do, 'ſuffer, and hope; but alſo by the ſacrifice of his death, 'reconciled to Mercy, all ſuch as do the will of his 'Father, particularly thoſe that believe his word, imi'tate his works, and accept his interceſſion. That as 'well the holy adult, deceaſed before his paſſion, as 'children dying before the uſe of reaſon, are delivered 'from death by his merits; ſo that none can be ſaved 'without a Mediator. And laſtly, that he is the only 'Ruler and Legiſlator of the Church. III. I believe 'we are ſanctified by the Divine Spirit, who worketh 'in us and with us, who directs and perfects us. I 'acknowledge the purity, excellence, and obligation 'of all the evangelical precepts, as they are com'prehended under theſe three heads, to live tempe'rately, juſtly, and piouſly; to love God above all 'things, and my neighbour as myſelf. This is the he proceeded in compoſing his grand Work againſt 'the Chriſtian Myſteries.' However, he did not ſtay at the Univerſity till he had compleated his deſign, but going to London the following year, he finiſhed and publiſhed it there in 1696, under the title of Chriſtianity not Myſterious: or a Treatiſe ſhewing that there is nothing in the Goſpel contrary to reaſon, nor above it, and that no Chriſtian Doctrine can be properly called a Myſtery. Every body was alarmed at the boldneſs of this attempt: our Author thereby raiſed himſelf a crowd of adverſaries among Chriſtians of all denominations [G], and his book was even preſented by the Grand Jury of Middleſex (p). In the midſt of this clamour againſt him in England, our Author took a trip into his native country, where he arrived in the beginning of April the enſuing year (q). But here he met with much worſe fare; for his book being got to Dublin before him, he had ſcarcely ſet his foot there, when he heard himſelf warmly attacked from the pulpit, and in a little time it became ſo popular a ſubject, that it was even expected of courſe, as much as if it had been preſcribed by the Rubric (r). In the mean time, his own indiſcreet behaviour did not a little contribute to exaſperate the people [H]. Soon after his arrival, he made a viſit to Mr William Molyneux, who received him with great politeneſs, and was much pleaſed with his converſation (s). But the general cry ran ſo ſtrong againſt his book [I], that the [G] Raiſed himſelf antagoniſts among Chriſtians of all denominations.] For inſtance, Mr Beverly, a Preſbyterian Miniſter, put out a pamphlet, intitled, Chriſtianity the great myſtery, in anſwer to a late treatiſe, intitled, Chriſtianity not myſterious, that is, not above nor contrary to reaſon. In oppoſition to which it is aſſerted, Chriſtianity is above created reaſon in its pure eſtate, and contrary to human reaſon as fallen and corrupted, and therefore, in a proper ſenſe, myſtery. Another came out, intitled The Chriſtian belief, &c. in anſwer to a book, intitled, Chriſtianity not myſterious. Mr Norris likewiſe, in his Account of Reaſon and Faith in relation to the myſteries of Chriſtianity, and Mr Elys, in a letter to Sir Robert Howard; Dr Payne, in ſome ſermons preached at Cambridge; Dr Stillingfleet, Biſhop of Worceſter, in his Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity, &c. the Author of the Occaſional Paper, No. III. Mr Miller, in his diſcourſe of conſcience; Mr Gailhard, in his book againſt the Socinians; Mr Synge, in his Appendix to The Gentleman's Religion; all animadverted upon it. We have the remarks alſo of the celebrated Mr Leibnitz, intitled, Annotatiunculæ Subitaneæ ad librum de Chriſtianiſmo myſteriis carente conſcriptæ, 8 Auguſti, 1701 (13). On the other ſide Mr Des Maizeaux appears in our Author's defence. 'To affirm indeed, ſays he, that 'the Chriſtian religion has no myſteries, or nothing 'above reaſon, muſt needs appear a ſtrange paradox; 'but, as we ought not to be prejudiced, or frightned 'with words, let us examine our Author's intent and 'meaning. The word myſtery is always uſed in the 'New Teſtament for a thing intelligible in itſelf, but 'which could not be known without ſpecial revelation. 'And, to prove this aſſertion, he examines all the 'paſſages of the New Teſtament where the word myſtery 'occurs, and ſhews, firſt, that myſtery is read for the 'Goſpel, or Chriſtian religion in general, as it was a 'diſpenſation totally hid from the Gentiles, and but 'very imperfectly known to the Jews: ſecondly, that 'ſome peculiar doctrines, occaſionally revealed by the 'Apoſtles, are ſaid to be manifeſted myſteries, that is, 'unfolded ſecrets: and thirdly, that myſtery is put for 'any thing under parables or enigmatical forms of 'ſpeech. And, to ſet this matter in a clearer light, 'he obſerves, that, as in the phænomena of nature we 'neither call myſteries thoſe things which are perfectly 'unknown to us, nor thoſe whereof we can have no 'adequate idea, the ſame way of ſpeaking ought to be 'uſed in religious matters; ſince all the revealed truths 'of the Chriſtian religion, which it is neceſſary and 'beneficial for us to know, can be made as clear and 'intelligible as natural things which come within our 'knowledge and comprehenſion; and that the caſe is 'parallel, he [Mr Toland] promiſed to ſhew in another 'work, and to give a particular and rational explication 'of the reputed myſteries of the Goſpel. But he de'clares at the ſame time, that, if his Adverſaries think 'fit to call a myſtery whatever is either abſolutely unintelligible to us, or whereof we have but inadequate 'ideas, he is ready to admit as many myſteries in religion as they pleaſe. So far you will ſay there is no 'great harm done: it is only a diſpute about words. 'Indeed he pretends that he can give as clear an expla-

'nation of the myſteries of the Goſpel as it is poſſible 'to give of the phænomena of nature; but do not our 'Divines do the ſame thing, in attempting to give a 'rational explanation of the Trinity, the greateſt myſtery of the Chriſtian religion? Such explanations are 'the teſt of the ſoundneſs of their doctrine; and who 'knows but Mr Toland's explanation, had he given 'one, might have been orthodox?' To all this it may be eaſily anſwered in a few words, that our Orthodox Divines (to uſe his own term) never pretend to give ſuch a rational explanation of the Trinity as does not imply in it ſomething above human reaſon: what then could hinder Mr Des Maizeaux from knowing, that Mr Toland's explanation, had he given one, could not have been orthodox? One would be apt to think, from this remark of Mr Des Maizeaux, that he had ſome reaſons to know Mr Toland either was not thoroughly convinced himſelf, or elſe was capable, upon a proper occaſion (14), of explaining away his own words, and conſtruing above reaſon in a different ſenſe to what he knew the Orthodox Divines underſtood by them. In this light indeed the diſpute would be merely Verbal. But any ſuch ſuppoſition ſinks Mr Toland from a formidable Opponent into an idle inſignificant Trifler; which is not what he deſerves. In this treatiſe, chapter the third, he expreſsly aſſerts, that many miracles were wrought by Chriſt; therefore there could be nothing above reaſon in his ſenſe of the words, that is, above what reaſon teaches us concerning the force of the Divine power to controul the ordinary laws of nature by an extraordinary agency. In any explanation then that we can ſuppoſe him to have given of the reputed myſteries of Chriſtianity, as in the inſtance now before us of the Trinity, ſo as not to be above reaſon, he muſt have repreſented it in ſuch a manner, as to imply nothing which reaſon does not teach us concerning the nature and attributes of the Divine Being: whereas, if I am not much miſtaken, the Orthodox Divines (to keep to the ſame expreſſion) maintain, that we are not able to conclude, from any thing which reaſon teaches, whether, what is revealed in the Goſpel concerning this myſtery, be compatible to the nature of the Deity or no.

(14) In a letter, wherein Mr Toland is making his court to Mr Harley and Lord Godolphin, he has theſe words, You will wonder all this time that I have not mentioned the Church, which is ſo much exaſperated againſt me; but as that is the heavieſt article, yet it is undoubtedly the eaſieſt conquered, and I know the infallible method of doing it. And, in a letter to Dr Tenison, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, he expreſsly promiſes to reform his religion to that Prelate's liking. Ibid. p. 357, 371. By a letter of Toland's to a Clergyman, ibid. P. 373, probably written near the ſame time (viz. 1706) with that to the Archbiſhop, it appears that he had received the Sacrament.

[H] His indiſcreet behaviour did not a little contribute to exaſperate the people.] In a letter (15) writ to Mr Locke from Dublin by Mr Molyneux, that Gentleman, ſpeaking of Mr Toland, expreſſes himſelf thus: 'To 'be free and without reſerve to you, I do not think his 'management, ſince he came into this city, has been 'ſo prudent. He has raiſed againſt him the clamours 'of all parties, and this not ſo much by his difference 'in opinion, as by his unſeaſonable way of diſcourſing, 'propagating, and maintaining it. Coffee-houſes and 'public tables are not proper places for ſerious diſcourſes 'relating to the moſt important truths. But when alſo 'a tincture of vanity appears in the whole courſe of a 'man's converſation, it diſguſts many that may other-the Grand Jury was ſollicited to preſent him for it, and to gain the readier compliance, the preſentment of that of Middleſex was printed at Dublin, with an emphatical title, and cried about the ſtreets. Accordingly, the laſt day of the term he was preſented there in the Court of King's-Bench. The Jurors, however, did not ground their proceedings upon any particular paſſage in this book, moſt of them having never read it, and thoſe that did, confeſſed they did not underſtand it (t). But the matter did not reſt here, for in a few days after, the Lords Juſtices of that Kingdom landing from England, the Recorder of Dublin [Mr Hancock] in his congratulatory ſpeech, begged their Lordſhips would protect the Church from all its enemies, particularly from the Tolandiſts (u). Agreeably thereto, the Parliament fell upon his book [K], voted it to be burnt by the common Hangman, and ordered the Author to be taken into cuſtody of the Serjeant at Arms, and to be proſecuted by the Attorney-General at Law. Hereupon Mr Toland found it neceſſary, in the beginning of September, to withdraw himſelf out of Ireland [L], and to avoid the ſtorm, he came into England juſt before the paſſing of that vote (w). It muſt be obſerved, that the Diſſenters in Ireland were the chief promoters of all this proſecution [M], and as our Author had, by writing this book, loſt the greateſt part of his friends of that perſuaſion, ſo as ſoon as he got ſafe to London, he publiſhed an Apologetical Account (x) of the treatment he had met with in Ireland, wherein he ſpares neither the diſcipline nor worſhip of that ſect, which he there renounces, and declares himſelf a Latitudinarian [N]. (17) In juſtice to our Author we muſt not omit to mention his tranſlation into Engliſh, from the Italian, a diſcourſe upon coins, by Signor Bernardo Davanzati, a gentleman of Florence, publiſhed by him this year, in the view of remedying the miſchiefs ariſing from the wicked practice of clipping our coin.

[K] The parliament fell upon his book.] On Saturday the 4th of Auguſt it was moved in the Committee of Religion, that the book, intitled, Chriſtianity not myſterious, ſhould be brought before them, and it was ordered accordingly to be done on the Saturday following. The Committee not ſitting that day, the next Saturday, Auguſt 28th, there met a very full Committee, wherein this buſineſs was a great while debated: ſeveral perſons, eminent for their birth, good qualities, or fortune, oppoſed the whole proceeding, being of opinion it was neither proper nor convenient for them to meddle with a thing of that nature. This being without much argument carried againſt them, they inſiſted, that the paſſages in the book which gave offence ſhould be read, and then the Committee was adjourned to the 4th of September. That day ſeveral Gentlemen ſpoke to the objections made to ſome paſſages in the book, after which they urged, at Mr Toland's requeſt, that he ſhould be called to anſwer in perſon, to declare the ſenſe of his book, and his deſign in writing it. Which being denied, a letter containing theſe declarations, received that morning from Mr Toland, was offered to be read by an honourable member, who went to the bar of the Houſe for that purpoſe. But this was rejected, and the Committee came immediately to theſe reſolutions; to which the Houſe agreed, after ſome debate, on Thurſday following, being the 9th of September, "That the book, intitled, Chriſtianity not myſterious, containing ſeveral heretical doctrines, contrary to the Chriſtian religion and the eſtabliſhed church of Ireland, be publickly burnt by the hands of the common Hangman. Likewiſe that the Author thereof, John Toland, be taken into the cuſtody of the Serjeant at Arms, and be proſecuted by Mr Attorney-General for writing and publiſhing the ſaid book. They ordered too, that an addreſs ſhould be made to the Lords Juſtices, to give directions, that no more copies of that book be brought into the kingdom, and to prevent the ſelling of thoſe already imported." The ſentence was executed on the book the Saturday following, viz. the 11th of September, before the Parliament-houſe gate, and alſo in the open ſtreet before the Town-houſe, the Sheriffs and all the Conſtables attending (18).

(18) See Toland's Apology, p. 22, et ſeq.

[L] He found it neceſſary to withdraw himſelf out of Ireland.] The day that his book was burnt, Mr Molyneux wrote to Mr Locke (19) to acquaint him, that Mr Toland was driven out of the kingdom. 'The 'poor Gentleman, ſays he, by his imprudent manage-'ment, had raiſed ſuch an univerſal outcry, that it was 'even dangerous for a man to have been known once 'to converſe with him. This made all men, wary of 'reputation, decline ſeeing him, inſomuch that at laſt 'he wanted a meal's meat, (as I am told) and none 'would admit him to their tables. The little ſtock of 'money which he brought into this country being ex-'hauſted, he fell to borrowing from any one that would 'lend him half a crown, and run in debt for his wigs, 'cloaths, and lodging.'

(19) In a letter, dated Sept. 11, 1697.

[M] The Diſſenters were the chief promoters of all this proſecution.] In a letter, dated July 20, the ſame Gentleman informs Mr Locke of this, and ſays, when he aſked one of that perſuaſion, What if a violent Church of England jury ſhould preſent Mr Baxter's books as pernicious, and condemn them to the flames by the common Executioner? That Diſſenter was ſenſible of the error, and ſaid, He wiſhed it had never been. Mr Molyneux, as appears from theſe letters, was very warm againſt theſe proceedings in the Iriſh parliament, where he himſelf ſat (20). Nor does Mr Locke ſpare the Diſſenters upon this occaſion. In his anſwer to the aforeſaid letter he writes, 'I think with you the Diſ-'ſenters were beſt conſider, that which is ſauce for a 'gooſe is ſauce for a gander; but they are a ſet of men 'that will always be the ſame.' Mr Toland, upon another occaſion, gives us a character of ſome of his countrymen at this time, which he ſays diſcovers the original root of all this violent heat and fury againſt his book. 'When I was in Dublin, ſays he, in the year 1697, 'I walked out one day to the village of Finglaſs, and 'overtook upon the way two gentlemen of the old Iriſh 'ſtock, with whom I had contracted ſome acquaintance 'at the coffee-houſe. They told me they were going 'a good way further, about a buſineſs of ſome import-'ance; and not many minutes after one of them cried 'out with joy to the other, See Couſin! by heaven, 'matters will go well; pointing at the ſame inſtant to a 'Raven feeding and hopping hard by, which had a 'white feather or two in the wing that was towards us. 'The other appeared no leſs tranſported, nor would 'they ſtir, till they ſaw what way the Raven flew, 'which being to the South of them, and with a great 'noiſe, they were fully confirmed about the ſucceſs of 'their buſineſs (21).'

[N] And declares himſelf a Latitudinarian.] In anſwer to the imputation of being a rigid Nonconformiſt, Mr Toland ſays, "he will never deny but the real ſimplicity of the Diſſenters worſhip, and the ſeeming equity of their diſcipline (into which, being ſo young, he could not diſtinctly penetrate) did gain extraordinarily upon his affections, juſt as he was newly delivered from the inſupportable yoke of the moſt pompous and tyrannical policy that ever enſlaved mankind, under the name or ſhew of religion. But, when greater experience and more years had a little ripened his judgment, he eaſily perceived that the differences were not ſo wide as to appear irreconcileable; or at leaſt that men, who were found Proteſtants on both ſides, ſhould barbarouſly cut one another's throats, or indeed give any diſturbance to the ſociety about them: and as ſoon as he underſtood the late heats and animoſities did not totally (if at all) proceed from a concern for meer religion, he allowed himſelf a latitude in ſeveral things that would have been matter of ſcruple to him before. That his travels (22) increaſed, and the ſtudy of eccleſiaſtical hiſtory perfected, this diſpoſition, wherein he continues to this hour; for whatever his own opinion of thoſe differences be, yet he finds ſo eſſential an agreement between the French, Dutch, Engliſh, Scotch, and other Proteſtants, that he is reſolved never to loſe the benefit of an inſtructive diſcourſe in any of their churches upon that ſcore; and it

caped from Ireland, ſo that he gladly embraced the opportunity which was thrown into his hands by the conjuncture in 1690 (y), of propoſing a method to reform the militia, in a pamphlet in 8vo, intitled, Militia Reformed: or an eaſy ſcheme of furniſhing England with a conſtant land-force, capable to prevent or ſubdue any foreign power; and to maintain perpetual quiet at home, without endangering the Public Liberty (z). There being a collection of Milton's Proſe-works on foot about this time, Mr Toland was pitched upon to write the life of that celebrated Author. It was both prefixed to that collection publiſhed this year in folio, and likewiſe printed ſeparately in 8vo, with this title, The Life of John Milton, containing, beſides the Hiſtory of his Works, ſeveral extraordinary characters of Men, of Books, of Sects, Parties, and Opinions. In this performance, he took occaſion to enter into the controverſy concerning the Author of Icon Baſilike, and oppoſed the then generally received opinion, which had aſcribed that Work to King Charles I; he does not ſcruple to ſtile the whole of that report, a notorious impoſture, and from thence ſteps forward to declare his doubt, that the ſpuriouſneſs of ſeveral books generally aſcribed, either to Chriſt or his Apoſtles, or to ſome other great perſons, was yet undiſcovered through the remoteneſs of thoſe ages, the death of the perſons concerned, and the decay of their monuments, which might give us true informations (aa). As theſe aſſertions drew ſeveral adverſaries (bb) upon him [O], he defended himſelf in a treatiſe, which for that reaſon he intitled, Amyntor, in which he gave a catalogue of ſuch primitive books as he concluded to be ſpurious, and likewiſe a complete hiſtory of the Icon Baſilike, in proof of his firſt aſſertion. The ſame year, 1699, in the ſpring, he made a trip to Holland (cc); ſoon after his return, the Duke of Newcaſtle, one of his Patrons and Benefactors (dd), having put into his hands a manuſcript containing ſome Memoirs of Denzil Lord Hollis, Baron of Iſield in Suſſex (*), from the year 1641 to 1648; he publiſhed them by his Lordſhip's direction: and the following year, upon the encouragement of Mr Rober Harley, he reprinted Harrington's Oceana (ee) [P]. About the ſame time there appeared an anonymous ſatyrical pamphlet upon the Clergy, of which Mr Toland tacitly acknowledged himſelf the Author. It was intitled, Clito, a Poem [Q] on the Force of Eloquence. In the beginning of the year 1701, he publiſhed another pamphlet

[O] Theſe aſſertions drew ſeveral adverſaries upon him.] As to the diſpute about the Εἰκὼν Βασιλικὴ, enough hath been ſaid already in the courſe of this work, to which we ſhall therefore only obſerve at preſent what regards Mr Toland in particular, that his account was ſent to Mr Bayle, who publiſhed it with his own approbation (24), before he had ſeen Mr Wagſtaffe's defence, which was then printed. After this Mr Wagſtaffe, in 1711, put out a third edition of his Vindication &c. (25). An anſwer to which was inſerted in the Hiſtory of England during the reign of the Stuarts, by Mr Oldmixon. Lond. 1730 (26.) In the ſecond part of his Amyntor, Mr Toland gives a catalogue of books mentioned by the Fathers, and other ancient writers, as truly or falſly aſcribed to Jeſus Chriſt, and other eminent perſons commended by Fabricius (27) and Pfaffius (28). But though, in anſwer to Mr Blackall, he profeſſes he had no view, in the paſſage cited in the text, to the books of the New Teſtament, yet he endeavoured, by ſeveral ſuggeſtions and inſinuations, to render the authority of the preſent canon ſuſpicious and precarious. In which point he was anſwered, 1. by Mr, afterwards the famous Dr, Samuel Clarke, in a ſmall tract, intitled, Some Reflections on that part of a book called Amyntor, &c. 2. Since the writing of this article of Toland, there has very lately (†) appeared a pamphlet, intitled, The Life and Remains of Dean Bathurſt, by Mr Warton, Profeſſor of Poetry in the Univerſity of Oxford; wherein, among other curious particulars, that ingenious gentleman informs us, that in the Aſhmolean Muſæum, among the manuſcripts of Aubrey the Antiquarian, there is one, very little known, but valuable. It is an account of Engliſh writers, particularly our Poets, with many of whom Aubrey was intimately acquainted, and contains ſeveral new and curious anecdotes of their lives. It was lent to Mr Wood while he was drawing up his Athenæ, as appears from a note of Wood to Aubrey, written in a blank leaf; but Wood, as appears from another note left by the author Aubrey, greatly caſtrated the manuſcript while in his poſſeſſion. Wood's account of Milton (29), the firſt that ever appeared in print, and which hath ſince furniſhed the ſubſtance of all the materials now extant of Milton's life, was literally taken from this manuſcript. But Wood (ſays Mr Warton) has omitted ſome circumſtances; one of which is, that Milton was actually whipped by Dr Thomas Bainbrigge, Maſter of Chriſt's college, while he was at Cambridge. This explains more fully the following paſſage in one of Milton's elegies:

[P] Upon the encouragement of Mr Robert Harley, he reprinted Harrington's Oceana.] In a memorial (31), addreſſed to that gentleman after he was Earl of Oxford, our Author gives us an account of the ſtate of his own political principles, in which he aſſures his Lordſhip, that he means no more by liberty than a government of laws, and not of will, particularly our own excellent conſtitution of King, Lords, and Commons; yet without the Jure-divino-ſhip of the Prince, or the Paſſive Obedience of the Subject; the laws being to both an equal rule. As the Whigs mean no other Commonwealth, contrary to the furious and ill-affected part of the Tories; ſo I am perſuaded, ſays he, many of the Tories are far from aiming at ſetting up irreſiſtible power or indefeaſible ſucceſſion, contrary to the ſuggeſtions of ſome weak but well-meaning Whigs. The Papiſts and Jacobites are common enemies to both, and againſt theſe they muſt both join at laſt, or be ruined. Such a Commonwealth's-man I only approve, as your Lordſhip formerly was, when you encouraged me to reprint Harrington's Oceana, though neither of us imagined the model itſelf to be practicable. The whole title of this edition runs thus: The Oceana of James Harrington, and his other works, ſome whereof are now firſt publiſhed from his own manuſcripts. The whole collected, methodized, and reviewed, with an exact account of his life prefixed by John Toland, in folio. In the preface to this, which is dated Nov. 30, 1699, he ſays, I am this preſent day beginning the 30th year of my age.

(31) It is dated Dec. 17, 1711, and printed in his Miſcellaneous Works, Vol. II. p. 220, et ſeq.

[Q] Clito, a poem.] The Editor expreſsly aſcribed it to Mr Toland, and moreover declares, that he is underſtood in the poem by Adeiſidæmon, unſuperſtitious. Mr Toland never openly denied either of theſe facts. Adeiſidæmon undertakes to undeceive mankind in reſpect to ſome religious truths, and, having mentioned the great and ſurprizing things he can perform in theſe matters, proceeds thus:

Nor will I here deſiſt; all holy cheats,
Of all religions, ſhall partake my threats;

pamphlet without his name, which he called, The Art of Governing by Parties [R]: he dedicated this book to the King, with this inſcription; To William, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland: Stadtholder of Guelderland, Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, and Over-Yſſel: Supreme Magiſtrate of the two moſt potent and flouriſhing Commonwealths in the Univerſe. And ſoon after he put out Propoſitions for uniting the two Eaſt-India Companies [Dutch and Engliſh]: in a Letter to a Man of Quality, who deſired the opinion of a Gentleman not concerned in either Company. In March following, he wrote two letters to Dr Hooper, Prolocutor of the Lower Houſe of Convocation, where his book, Chriſtianity not Myſterious, and his Amyntor, were then under the conſideration of a Committee. But this did not ſtop the proceedings of that houſe. They extracted five propoſitions out of the firſt, and in ſubſtance reſolved, that in their judgment the ſaid book contains pernicious principles, of dangerous conſequence to the Chriſtian Religion, written on a deſign (as they conceive) and tending to ſubvert the fundamental articles of the Chriſtian Faith; that the poſitions extracted out of it, together with divers others of the ſame nature, are pernicious, dangerous, ſcandalous, and deſtructive of Chriſtianity. This repreſentation was ſent up to the Upper Houſe, who agreed with the other in their opinion of the book: however, after the moſt mature deliberations [S], it was there declared, that without a licence from the King, (which they had not yet received) they did not find how they could have ſufficient authority to cenſure any ſuch books. Several pamphlets came out on occaſion of this difference between the two houſes upon the extent of that Aſſembly's juriſdiction. In ſome of thoſe that were written in favour of the Lower Houſe, Mr Toland found ſuch an account of Chriſtianity not Myſterious, as he thought injurious to his character: for which reaſon he publiſhed Vindicius Liberius: or Mr Toland's defence of himſelf againſt the Lower Houſe of Convocation; wherein, beſides his Letters to the Prolocutor, certain paſſages of the book, intitled, Chriſtianity not Myſterious, are explained, and others corrected, with a full and clear account of the Author's principles relating to Church and State, and a juſtification of the Whigs and Commonwealth's Men againſt all their opponents (ff). Upon the paſſing of the new Act of Succeſſion, in June this year, 1701, occaſioned by the death of the Duke of Glouceſter, our Author publiſhed his Anglia Libera, wherein he aſſerts and explains the natural advantages of that act, and being reſolved to puſh his fortune qua data via, he took the opportunity of attending the Earl of Macclesfield, who carried the act to Hanover. Here he preſented his book to the Princeſs Sophia, and was the firſt who had the honour of kiſſing her Electoral Highneſs's hand on occaſion of the ſaid act [T]. Not long after his return to England, upon the calling the new Parliament, our Author publiſhed the following advertiſement in the Poſtman: 'There having been a public report as if Mr Toland ſtood for Blechingley in Surrey, it is 'thought fit to advertiſe, that Sir Robert Clayton (gg) has given his intereſt in that bo-

Whether with ſable gowns they ſhew their pride,
Or under cloaks their knavery they hide;
Or whatſoe'er diſguiſe they chuſe to wear
To gull the people, while their ſpoils they ſhare.

This piece was animadverted on in a pamphlet, intitled, Mr Toland's Clito diſſected, and Fuller's plain proof of the true mother of the Prince of Wales made out to be no proof: In two letters from a Gentleman in the Country to his Friend in London. This Author remarks, that Mr Toland rightly aſſumes the title of Adeiſidæmon, which, in downright Engliſh, is one that fears neither God nor Devil.

[R] The art of governing by parties.] The whole title is, The Art of governing by Parties; particularly in religion, in politicks, in parliament, on the bench, and in the miniſtry; with the ill effects of parties on the People in general, the King in particular, and all our foreign affairs, as well as on our credit and trade in peace or war, &c. In the firſt chapter he obſerves, that, till the acceſſion of the Stuarts to the imperial throne of this realm, we never knew the art of governing by parties. It was ſet on foot, ſays he, among us by the firſt of that race, and was daily improving under his ſucceſſor, till at laſt it fatally turned on himſelf, and deprived him both of his crown and life. But becauſe this execrable policy was brought to perfection under Charles II, I ſhall diſplay ſome of its worſt effects in his reign, and the diſmal influence it has on all our affairs even at this time. In the enſuing books he characteriſes ſeveral great ones of his own time, as the Lords Somers, Halifax, Nottingham, Rocheſter, Marlborough, and others, who happened not to be his Patrons at that time.

[S] After mature deliberation.] They conſulted with Council, who adviſed them, that by any ſuch judicial cenſure both Houſes might incur a Præmunire by 25 Hen. 8. The queſtions they put to the Lawyers were; 1. Whether the Convocation's giving an opinion concerning a book that is heretical, impious, and immoral, is contrary to any law? to which they received an anſwer in the affirmative: ſecondly, whether the poſitions they had extracted out of Chriſtianity not myſterious were ſuch an opinion as is contrary to any law? to which it was anſwered in the negative. Beſides this advice, they inquired what had been formerly done in ſuch caſes, and found, that, on a complaint being exhibited againſt ſome books by the Lower to the Upper Houſe in the year 1689, the learned in both the laws were of opinion they could not proceed judicially in ſuch matters (32).

[T] On occaſion of the ſaid act.] The Earl of Macclesfield was pleaſed to recommend him particularly to her Highneſs. Mr Toland ſtaid there five or ſix weeks, and, upon his departure, the Electreſs dowager and the Elector were pleaſed to preſent him with ſeveral Gold medals as an acknowledgment for his book. Her Highneſs gave him likewiſe the pictures of herſelf, the Elector, the young Prince, and of her Majeſty the Queen of Pruſſia, done in oil-colours. The Earl of Macclesfield, in his return, waited upon the King at Loo. 'There, ſays Mr Toland, he preſented me to kiſs his 'Majeſty's hand, and took off thoſe impreſſions which 'might have been made upon him by ſome of them 'who endeavoured to prepoſſeſs him againſt thoſe 'that were the moſt zealous for his ſervice, and the 'moſt faithful in his intereſts. My Lord himſelf went 'with a prejudice againſt me to Hanover, where he 'was thoroughly undeceived, and became my hearty 'Patron, till, juſt on his going home, he was removed 'by death from the ſervice of his country and his friends.' It muſt be obſerved, that from the time of his writing his pamphlet upon the militia, which was levelled againſt any ſtanding army, our Author had ſided with the Tories againſt the miniſtry of Lord Somers and Halifax, with whom, he ſays, he never entered into any manner of tranſactions either at home or abroad (33). Before Mr Toland's return to England, he made a viſit to the court of Berlin, where he talked openly againſt the authority of the Scripture, and had a diſpute before the Queen of Pruſſia at Charlottenburgh with Mr Beauſobre upon that point. This latter gave afterwards an account of the diſpute very much in his own favour. He ſays it happened in the beginning of October, 1701 (34).

'rough to an eminent Citizen, and that Mr Toland has no thoughts of ſtanding there, or 'any where elſe.' This advertiſement furniſhed a ſubject for the pleaſant humour of an anonymous Writer, who publiſhed a little pamphlet, intitled, Modeſty miſtaken [U]. The King's ſpeech, at the opening of the Parliament, gave our Author occaſion to publiſh, in 1702, in 8vo, Paradoxes of State relating to the preſent Juncture of Affairs in England, and the reſt of Europe, chiefly grounded on his Majeſty's Princely, Pious, and moſt Gracious Speech. Soon after which, King William being now known to be in an irrecoverable ſtate of ill health (hh), he put out another pamphlet, containing, I. Reaſons for addreſſing his Majeſty to invite into England their Highneſſes the Electreſs Dowager, and the Electoral Prince of Hanover, and likewiſe, II. Reaſons for attainting and abjuring the pretended Prince of Wales, and all others pretending any claim, right, or title from the late King James and Queen Mary: with arguments for making a vigorous war againſt France (ii). Upon the acceſſion of Queen Ann, Mr Toland thought proper to go to the Courts of Hanover and Berlin, where he was received very graciouſly [W] by the Princeſs Sophia, and the Queen of Pruſſia, and had the honour to be often admitted into their converſation; and as he made a longer ſtay at Berlin than at Hanover, ſo he had frequent opportunities of waiting upon the Queen, who took a pleaſure in aſking him queſtions, and hearing his ſingular opinions. This gave him occaſion to write ſome philoſophical pieces, which he then preſented to her Majeſty. Three of theſe, after his return to England, in 1704, he printed (with ſome others) in the form of letters, inſcribed to Serena, i. e. the Queen of Pruſſia, who, he aſſures us, was pleaſed to aſk his opinion concerning the ſubjects of them [X]. In one of theſe letters (kk), he maintains that the beſt, if not the only demonſtration of the ſoul's immortality, is from Divine Authority. At the ſame time he publiſhed an Engliſh Tranſlation of the Life of Æſop from the French of Mr de Meziriac (ll), and dedicated to Anthony Collins, Eſq; [Y]. In 1705, before the election of the new Parliament, he found means to introduce himſelf into the Patronage of Mr Harley, then Secretary of [U] Modeſty miſtaken.] The whole title runs thus: Modeſty miſtaken; or a Letter to Mr Toland upon his declining to appear in the enſuing parliament. He begins his Letter thus: 'Among all the news of this buſy 'ſeaſon, no report has affected me ſo peculiarly, as that 'of your inclination to fill a ſeat in the grand approach'ing Council; for I am perſuaded, that not only our 'Civil Intereſt, but our Religion, has ſome dependance 'on the iſſue of the next debates; and I have long 'known your talents, whether in Politicks or Theology, 'to be ſo weighty, as to qualify you at once for a good 'old Committee-man, and for a member of that healing 'ſynod, the Aſſembly of Divines: it was with this dou'ble juſtice to your merit that I lately confounded an 'Academical Fop, who, ſpeaking of your book-learned 'Antagoniſt, the late Biſhop of Worceſter, and gravely 'ſtiling him a body of Divinity, was by me given to 'underſtand, that what the Biſhop had in profundity, 'Mr Toland made out in latitude; and that if the one 'was Corpus Theologiæ, the other was Tractatus Theolo'gico-politicus.' See what has been ſaid in Remark [G] note (14).

[W] He thought proper to go to the courts of Hanover and Berlin, where he was received very graciouſly.] We have an account from himſelf what it was that called him to theſe courts at this juncture, which was to inform them of (what he then thought convenient to call) the true ſtate of the Engliſh court upon that change, which created at Hanover ſome uneaſy ſpeculations. It is in a letter quoted in remark [Y]. After having related the ſeries of his political conduct, from his firſt coming into the world till that time, he proceeds thus: 'Thoſe 'who paſs for Tories, without being Jacobites, are 'perfectly miſinformed about me, and if they knew 'how I repreſented them at Hanover and in Holland, 'as being really for the ſucceſſion, and in what matters 'I was of opinion they deſerved to be obliged, they 'would undoubtedly believe me no enemy of theirs, 'how little I might thereby befriend myſelf.' This was our Politician's employment there. Next he lets us know what it was that ſent him upon this errand. 'From theſe ſeveral conſiderations, continues he, you 'may eaſily infer, that in the firſt year of her Majeſty's 'reign, being a ſtranger abroad and friendleſs at home, 'I muſt needs have been in a very uncertain condition, 'were not the high-born perſons, under whoſe protec'tion I then lived, proof againſt all miſrepreſentations, 'and that they judged of things from their own know'ledge, and not by the paſſions of others, to which 'they are not ſo great ſtrangers as they are thought, or 'would ſeem. It was happy for me they had this gene'rous diſpoſition: for, at one and the ſame time, I had 'a Tory Secretary of State [Lord Nottingham] writing 'letters againſt me to foreign courts, as Agent to the 'Whigs, if not obnoxious to the law; and certain lead'ing Whigs were perſuading the ſame Princes that I 'was Mr Harley's creature, which was a higher crime 'by far than being a Tory. With relation to the Duke 'of Marlborough, I own, that, having known nothing 'of him but by the report of others, and being miſled 'by appearances of a conjunction between him and the 'moſt violent Tories, from whence I reaſonably ap'prehended danger to the ſucceſſion in the beginning 'of this reign, I gave myſelf, in Holland and Berlin, 'and elſewhere, ſome liberties in ſpeech——'

[X] Who, he aſſures us, was pleaſed to aſk his opinion concerning the ſubjects of them.] The Title of theſe letters runs thus: Letters to Serena, containing, firſt, the origin and force of prejudices. II. The hiſtory of the ſoul's immortality among the heathens. III. The origin of idolatry, and reaſons of heatheniſm. IV. A letter to a gentleman in Holland, ſhewing Spinoza's ſyſtem of philoſophy to be without any principle or foundation. V. Motion eſſential to matter, in anſwer to ſome remarks by a noble friend on the confutation of Spinoza. To all which is prefixed a preface, being a letter to a gentleman in London, ſent together with the foregoing diſſertations, and declaring the ſeveral occaſions of writing them. Theſe letters were animadverted on by Mr Wotton in a pamphlet, intitled, A Letter to Euſebia, occaſioned by Mr Toland's Letter to Serena; and the Author of the Divine legation of Moſes, B. 3. § 6. gives the third letter ſeveral hard names. Mr Toland's veracity, in aſſerting that the three firſt letters were written and preſented to the Queen of Pruſſia, has been called in queſtion; but, ſince the ſame Author (35) aſſures us, that Mr l'Enfant heard Mr Toland read A diſcourſe concerning prejudices to that Princeſs, the bare diſappointment of not meeting with any body in that court twenty years after, that could give any further account of the matter, will hardly be deemed ſufficient to juſtify ſo ſevere a cenſure as is paſſed upon it.

[Y] And dedicated it to Anthony Collins, Eſq;] This piece ſeems to have recommended itſelf to our Author's taſte, particularly by the paradoxical opinion maintained in it, That Æſop was an ingenious, eloquent, and comely perſon, a Courtier, and a Philoſopher; contrary to the fabulous relation of the Monk Planudes, who makes him a ſtupid ſtammering buffoon, and monſtrouſly deformed. Beſides, the original was then a ſcarce book. In 1697, Dr Bentley (36), though he had heard of it, had not been able to meet with it. And Mr Bayle ſays the ſame of himſelf, in the firſt edition of his Dictionary, publiſhed the ſame year. But he had found it afterwards, and quotes it in the ſecond edition (37) of the Dictionary, which was publiſhed at the time when Mr Toland went to Holland. As to Mr Collins, our Author much courted his friendſhip, which might have been uſeful to him; but, it is well known, that Gentleman had never any opinion of the uprightneſs of his principles.

State,

State, by whoſe direction, he publiſhed, without any name, the Memorial of the State of England [Z], in vindication of the Queen, the Church, and the Adminiſtration. This being animadverted on by Thomas Rawlins, Eſq; an intimate friend of our Author (mm), in a letter which contained ſeveral reflections upon the Duke of Marlborough's conduct the preceding campaign, as well as againſt Mr Harley. They were greatly incenſed at it, and Mr Toland was directed to anſwer it [AA]. This he performed, and the defence was immediately put to preſs, but ſuppreſſed after ſix or ſeven ſheets were printed (nn). In 1707, he publiſhed an ancient Latin Oration, exciting the Britons to a vigorous war with France, and about the middle of the ſpring, our Author made a tour into Germany, where he went firſt to the Court of Berlin, and thence to that of Hanover; but a ridiculous incident drove him from the former, and finding, from a manuſcript communicated by Mr Harley [BB], his account of the court of Hanover, had given a diſguſt there, by ſome obſervations he had made in it on the territories of a neighbouring Prince, he proceeded to Duſſeldorp, where he was very graciouſly received by his Electoral Highneſs, who, in conſideration of the Engliſh pamphlet he had publiſhed [CC], preſented him with a golden chain and medal, and a purſe of a hundred ducats. From Duſſeldorp he went to Vienna, in hopes of engaging the Imperial Miniſters to procure the title of Count of the Empire for an eminent French Banker, then in Holland; but notwithſtanding our Agent was commiſſioned to offer good round ſums of money for this protection, which was greatly wanted by his Principal, yet all his attempts therein (oo) proved fruitleſs [DD]. Whereupon, leaving Vienna, he made a viſit to Prague in Bohemia, where he ſucceeded much better in procuring a teſtimonial [EE] of his birth and family, which was given him by ſome of [Z] The memorial of the ſtate of England.] The title informs us, that this was deſigned to rectify the mutual miſtakes of Proteſtants, and to unite their affections in defence of our religion and liberty. It was written againſt the Memorial of the Church of England, by Counſellor Pooley and Dr Drake, which had been publiſhed with a view of influencing the people in the election of the enſuing parliament; to which end they had repreſented the Church to be in danger under the then Whig adminiſtration. In a letter to Mr Harley, dated December 14, 1705, upon the ſubject of this book, Mr Toland expreſſes himſelf thus: 'It is no ſmall 'ſatisfaction to me, that the judgment of the Queen, 'the Parliament, and the Miniſtry, do ſo unanimouſly 'concur with the book which (under your protection) 'I have publiſhed for their ſervice. As for any thing in 'it not juſt according to your ſentiments, which perhaps 'may happen in a point or two, you will have the 'goodneſs to conſider that I wanted opportunity to 'conſult you perſonally; I having finiſhed it in a very 'few days, without any to adviſe me but Mr P——, 'being in the country, and not maſter of time enough 'to poliſh the very language (38).'

[AA] They were greatly incenſed at it, and Mr Toland was directed to anſwer it, which he did.] Mr William Stephens, Rector of Sutton, who was found to be the Publiſher, refuſing to be an evidence againſt Mr Rawlins, was ſentenced to ſtand in the pillory. That ſentence however was afterwards remitted. Mr Toland's anſwer was compoſed under the title of A Defence of her Majeſty's adminiſtration, particularly againſt the notorious forgeries and calumnies with which his Grace the Duke of Marlborough and the Right Honourable Mr Secretary Harley are ſcandalouſly defamed and aſperſed in a late ſcurrilous Invective, intitled, A letter to the Author of the Memorial of the ſtate of England. Our Author likewiſe publiſhed this year the following pieces: 1. Socinianiſm truly ſtated, being an example of fair dealing in Theological controverſies. To which is prefixed, 2. Indifference in diſputes recommended by a Pantheiſt to an Orthodox Friend, 1705, in 4to. 3. An Account of the courts of Pruſſia and Hanover, ſent to a Miniſter of State in Holland, 1705, in 8vo. dedicated to the Duke of Somerſet. It was tranſlated into French, Dutch, and High Dutch. Two letters were publiſhed againſt it in Dutch. Our Author had ſome intentions to have publiſhed a more correct edition of it. In Vol. II. of his Poſthumous works, there is a tract, intitled, The primitive conſtitution of the Chriſtian church, which appears to be wrote about this time from theſe words: 'This, 'ſays he (p. 124.) is ſelf-evident in the diſputes about Occaſional Conformity, which divides our nation at preſent.

He publiſhed it at the ſame time in Engliſh. The manuſcript was found by Mr Harley accidentally amongſt ſome others.

[CC] In conſideration of the Engliſh pamphlet he had publiſhed.] It was intitled, The Elector Palatine's declaration lately publiſhed in favour of his Proteſtant ſubjects, and notified to her Majeſty. To which is prefixed an impartial account of the cauſes of thoſe innovations and grievances about religion, which are now ſo happily redreſſed by his Electoral Highneſs. He publiſhed it at the requeſt of the Elector Palatine's Miniſter, who at that time had ſome particular reaſons to make himſelf acceptable to his maſter, as he wanted to be raiſed from the character of Reſident to that of Envoy. And being informed by Mr Toland, with whom he was intimately acquainted, of his deſign to go into Germany, he encouraged our Author to wait upon the Elector, and gave him inſtructions concerning the management of this affair (39).

(39) Life of Toland, p. 61, 62.

[DD] Yet all his attempts therein proved fruitleſs.] However, while he was here, he negotiated another affair, which turned to better account. In a memorial to the Earl of Oxford, dated December 17, 1711, he endeavours to recommend himſelf to his Lordſhip for the employ of a private Agent abroad. He has theſe words: 'They who confided to my management affairs 'of a higher nature, have found me exact as well as 'ſecret. My impenetrable negotiation at Vienna (hid 'under the pretence of curioſity) was not only applauded 'by the Prince that employed me, but alſo proportion-'ably rewarded (40).'

[EE] Procuring a Teſtimonial.] Mr Toland ſeems to have met with ſome injurious reproaches upon his birth, which put him upon this errand to Prague. The Teſtimonial runs thus: 'Intra ſcripti teſtamur Dom. 'Johannem Toland ortum eſſe honeſta nobili et antiquiſſima 'familia quæ per plures centenos annos, ut regni hiſtoria & 'continua monſtrant memoria, in peninſula Hiberniæ Enis 'Oën dicta, prope urbem Londino-Derienſem in Ultonia '*perduravit. In a letter (42), dated January, 1708, and ſent to Vienna, Mr Toland makes a handſome mention of this favour as follows:

(42) Miſcellanies, ubi ſupra, p. 381.

'Sir,

'I have nothing to add to what I did myſelf the 'honour to write to your Excellency per poſt, but that 'the Counteſs of Starenburg is not the only perſon at 'Prague to whom I am particularly obliged: For the 'very Reverend Father Guardian, and the reſt of the 'worthy members of the Iriſh convent, were not more 'diſpoſed to do me all the good offices of humanity, 'than they were forward to ſhew me the moſt zealous 'affection of countrymen.' Mr Francis o Deulin was the bearer of this letter, whom our Author, in return, of his Countrymen, Iriſh Franciſcans, in that city, where we ſee the honeſt Friars did then certify, under their hands and ſeal, that Mr Toland was deſcended from an honourable, noble, and moſt ancient family recorded in the Hiſtory of Ireland for ſeveral hundred years. By this time, his purſe being emptied, it was not without ſome hardſhip that he got back to Holland, in the latter end of the year 1708. Here he preſently ſet his pen to work, and publiſhed the year following, at the Hague, a volume containing two Latin Diſſertations, viz. Adeiſidæmon ſive Titus Livius a ſuperſtitione vindicatus, and Origines Judaicæ ſive Strabonis de Moyſe et Religione Judaica hiſtoria breviter illuſtrata. In the firſt of theſe diſſertations, he declares Superſtition to be no leſs deſtructive of any government, than downright Atheiſm: and in the latter, he prefers Strabo's account of Moſes, and the Jewiſh Religion, before the teſtimony of the Jews [FF]. This year he likewiſe publiſhed, at Amſterdam, a ſecond edition of Oratio Philippica, &c. to which he annexed an invective againſt the Authors of a Rhapſody, publiſhed monthly at Paris, under the title of Mercure Galant (pp). In 1710, he publiſhed an anonymous pamphlet in French, relating to the affair of Dr Sacheverel [GG]. During this abode in Holland, he had the good fortune to get himſelf introduced to Prince Eugene of Savoy, who gave him ſeveral marks of his generoſity (qq). In the latter end of 1710 (rr), he returned to England, where he found Mr Harley, now Earl of Oxford, and Lord Treaſurer, ſtill his friend (ss). It was owing to the liberality of that Patron, that at this time he maintained a handſome poſt, and took a country houſe at Epſom in Surrey; he was greatly delighted with his ſituation at this place (tt), and publiſhed a very entertaining hiſtorico-poetical deſcription of it, in 1711 [HH]. However, he did not continue long in the favour of Lord Oxford [II], and the next year we find him writing ſeveral pamphlets on the ſide of the oppoſition to that Miniſter [KK]. He agrees with our Author in aſſerting Livy's freedom from ſuperſtition (43). As to the firſt of theſe poſitions, that Superſtition is worſe than Atheiſm, it is manifeſtly retailed from Mr Bayle, who has ſcattered it up and down in his Dictionary and other writings. (44) Remarks on Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, p. 127, et ſeq. Lond. 1751, 8vo.

This ſubject is agreeably enough handled by a late writer (44).

In the latter Diſſertation our Author ridicules Huetius, who, in his Demonſtratio Evangelica, affirms, that ſome eminent perſons recorded in the Old Teſtament are allegorized in the heatheniſh Mythology. Moſes is underſtood by the name of Bacchus, Typho, Silonus, Priapus, and Adonis. Huetius was greatly provoked at this attack, and expreſſed his reſentment in a French letter, firſt publiſhed in the Journal of Trevoux, and afterwards printed with ſome diſſertations of Huetius, collected by the Abbot Tilladet (45); but theſe deſcended to perſonal abuſes on account of his illegitimacy. However, Mr Leibnitz agrees with our Author in this laſt aſſertion againſt Huetius, who, he ſays, in applying the Pagan fables to Moſes, hath ſhewn more learning than exactneſs: and Mr Des Maizeaux thinks he is not much in the wrong. On the other hand, in the Remarks on Eccleſiaſtical hiſtory (46), already cited, the Author obſerves, that a perſon can be produced, who was very like to Moſes, namely Bacchus, who was an Egyptian God. Huetius, in his Demonſtratio Evangelica, has with much accuracy and learning, ſays he, drawn up the compariſon, and the reſemblance is ſo great in ſo many particulars, that it cannot be ſuppoſed accidental: but then, continues he, Bacchus is a poetical Deity, and the accounts of him are taken from fabulous hiſtory. Bacchus is Moſes in diſguiſe. The ſame Author, from a paſſage in Herodotus, lib. ii. 42. concerning the Egyptian Hercules, compared with Exodus xiii. is inclined to believe this Hercules to have been Moſes.

Mr Toland ſent this letter the very day it was publiſhed to Mr Leibnitz, which, in a ſubſequent one, dated Feb. 14, 1710, N. S. to that Gentleman, he ſays, was wrote as an antidote againſt Dr Sacheverel's ſeditious ſermon. 'And the articles ſince exhibited againſt that Incendiary 'by the Commons ſhew, that I did not only rightly 'apprehend the ſcope of his writings, but that I no 'where ſtretched his meaning; and that his principal 'view has been the defeating the ſucceſſion in the houſe 'of Hanover. I ſhould have ſent you freely the articles 'at large, whereof I have an authentic copy; but that 'I ſuppoſe your Envoy at our court would not leave 'the Elector to the blundering abſtracts of Gazettes 'in a matter that ſo nearly and eſſentially concerns him-'ſelf and his poſterity (47).'

[HH] A poetical deſcription of Epſom in 1711.] The title is, The Deſcription of Epſom, with the Humours and Politicks of that Place, in a Letter to Eudoxa. There is added a tranſlation of four letters out of Pliny, as a ſpecimen of a tranſlation he was about of Pliny's Epiſtles. All the letters he tranſlated are in the collection of his Poſthumous Works, Vol. II. p. 48, et ſeqq; where his Deſcription of Epſom is likewiſe inſerted, p. 91, but ſo much corrected, enlarged, and explained, that it is, as it were, a new work, and Mr Toland for that reaſon called it, A New Deſcription of Epſom.

[II] He did not continue long in the favour of Lord Oxford.] Lord Oxford had been a very uſeful Friend to him, and he was very unwillingly torn from it. He wrote a memorial to that Miniſter, wherein he lays forth all his former ſervices (*), claims his promiſe, and offers to ſerve him in any capacity that ſhould not be deſtructive of the neceſſary ſupplies he received from Hanover (48). When he found nothing would do, he wrote his Lordſhip a letter, wherein, upon certain (as his Lordſhip thought) ambiguous words he let drop about the houſe of Hanover, I utterly, ſays he, renounced his friendſhip, and conſequently all the advantages one in my circumſtances might hope from his protection. This he relates two years after, as an argument to induce a perſon, in the oppoſition to Lord Oxford's miniſtry, to take him into the like uſeful friendſhip, as one that neither was nor could be any thing but a Whig; 'that ſo by your generous care, ſays he, 'I might be put in a condition of writing as freely as 'I think (49).' In the mean time he did not fail to keep up his correſpondence with the Princeſs Sophia. Preſently after his return from Holland, when he applied to the Earl of Oxford to ſerve him with his head, his pen, and his heart, he takes notice to his Lordſhip, that the October club, if rightly managed, would be rare ſtuff to work the ends of any party. 'I ſent, 'ſays he, ſuch an account of thoſe wights to an old 'gentlewoman [Princeſs Sophia] of my acquaint-'ance, as, in the midſt of fears (upon the change 'of the miniſtry and talk of a peace) to make her 'laugh (50).'

He continued writing pamphlets againſt the Miniſtry in the two following years [LL]; in the beginning of the latter of which, among others, he publiſhed The Art of Reſtoring: or the Piety and Probity of General Monk, in bringing about the laſt Reſtoration, evidenced from his own authentic letters; with a juſt account of Sir Roger [Earl of Oxford], who runs the parallel as far as he can. In a Letter to a Miniſter of State at the Court of Vienna. There were ten editions of this pamphlet in a quarter of a year, and he was not without great apprehenſions of a proſecution [MM] for it. He was encouraged to take the greater liberty, as the Queen's Death was daily expected at this juncture, which would have placed the Crown upon the head of the Princeſs Sophia, then alive, of whoſe favour he judged himſelf well aſſured [NN]; but that Princeſs happening to die before the Queen, who likewiſe deceaſed ſhortly after, our Author, upon the acceſſion of King George I, publiſhed The Funeral Elegy and Character of her Royal Highneſs the late Princeſs Sophia, with the Explication of her Conſecration Medal: written originally in Latin, tranſlated into Engliſh, and farther illuſtrated by Mr Toland (ww), who has added the Character of the King, the Prince and the Princeſs. Our Author being now more at his eaſe [OO], turned his thoughts more particularly verſies of Religion, by Sophia Charlotte, the late Queen of Pruſſia; being an anſwer to a Letter written to her Majeſty by Father Vota, an Italian Jeſuit Confeſſor to King Auguſtus. There is prefixed by the Publiſher, a Letter, containing the occaſion of the Queen's writing, and an Apology for the Church of England. II. Her Majeſty's reaſons for creating the Electoral Prince of Hanover a Peer of this realm, or the preamble to his Patent as Duke of Cambridge, in Latin and Engliſh, with Remarks upon the ſame, in 4to. III. The Grand Myſtery laid open; namely, by dividing of the Proteſtants to weaken the Hanover Succeſſion; and by defeating the Succeſſion, to extirpate the Proteſtant Religion. To which is added, the Sacredneſs of Parliamentary Securities, againſt thoſe who would indirectly this year, or more indirectly the next, if they live ſo long, attack the public funds.

[LL] He continued writing pamphlets the two following years.] In 1713, he put out An Appeal to Honeſt People againſt wicked Prieſts, or the very Heathen Laity's Declarations for Civil Obedience and Liberty of Conſcience, contrary to the Rebellious and Perſecuting Principles of the old Chriſtian Clergy, with an Application to the corrupt part of the Prieſts at this preſent time, publiſhed on occaſion of Dr Sacheverel's laſt Sermon. II. Dunkirk, or Dover: or the Queen's Honour, the Nation's Safety, the Liberties of Europe, and the Peace of the World, all at Stake, till that Fort and Port be totally demoliſhed by the French. In 1714, beſides thoſe mentioned in the text, he publiſhed, 1. Reaſons for naturalizing the Jews in Great Britain and Ireland on the ſame foot with all other nations: containing alſo a Defence of the Jews againſt all vulgar prejudices in all Countries. He dedicates it ironically to the Archbiſhop and Biſhops of both Provinces. 2. A Collection of Letters, written by his Excellency, General George Monk, afterwards Duke of Albemarle, relating to the Reſtoration of the Royal Family, with an introduction, proving by inconteſtible evidence, that Monk had projected that Reſtoration in Scotland, againſt the cavils of thoſe that would rob him of the merit of this action.

[MM] He was not without apprehenſions of a proſecution.] He wrote this piece at Epſom, and coming to town to get it printed as ſoon as it was finiſhed, he ſent a copy to a friend of the party he had now choſen, before it was publiſhed, to whom he writes thus: 'I 'flatter myſelf in this book you'll meet with more no- 'velties, than in the ordinary courſe of Poſtage I could 'have ſent in that time. Diſcourſing of Liberty, nay 'aſſerting and maintaining it, I could not but act with 'the greateſt freedom; and indeed it is impoſſible for 'a ſoul that is really fired with the love of his country, 'not to expreſs in the moſt pathetic terms a deteſtation 'for tyranny, a contempt for ſlaves, an averſion to 'traitors, and reſentment of injured truſt. But all 'this while I have not acted without caution likewiſe, 'expecting little aſſiſtance from many of thoſe that will 'be the lowdeſt to applaud me: and therefore the 'coming out of the book being fixed to next Tueſday, 'I have provided myſelf with a privacy, where I fancy 'I may be ſafe enough, till the firſt fury be overpaſt, 'if they think it adviſable to make any proſecution. 'Clipſtone is too far off, or it were the ſecureſt place in 'the world (51).'

[NN] Of whoſe favour he judged himſelf ſecure.] Speaking of his proſecution, he goes on thus: 'But 'leaving the event to time, you are to underſtand, 'that without any regard to theſe things, I am in about 'three weeks time bound for Germany, though firſt 'for Flanders, and next for Holland. I believe I ſhall 'be pretty well accommodated for this voyage, which, 'upon many accounts, I expect will be very ſhort. 'Lord! how near was my old woman being a Queen, 'and your humble ſervant being at his eaſe! All is not 'over yet, and ſome ſymptoms are promiſing enough. 'I have been the bolder upon this preſumption; nor 'am I alone, ſince all the Princes in Europe take their 'meaſures upon the ſame foot. You'll receive Mr 'Steel's Criſis by the ſame Carrier that delivers you my 'Art of Reſtoring. I think it a very good book; but it 'does not anſwer the expectation of many others, who 'are good friends to him and the cauſe (52).'

[OO] He turned his thoughts upon his Hiſtory of the Druids.] In the ſpecimen of this hiſtory, p. 8, Mr Toland aſſures his Lordſhip, from all Authors, that no Heathen Prieſthood ever came up to the perfection of the Druidical, which was far more exquiſite than any other ſyſtem: as having been much better calculated to beget ignorance, and an implicit diſpoſition in the people, no leſs than to procure power and profit to the Prieſts, which is one grand difference between the true worſhip and the falſe. Afterwards he profeſſes to keep ſtrictly to truth, being the fundamental law of an Hiſtorian: but, ſays he, if in clearing up ancient rites and cuſtoms long ſince extinct, any communities or orders of men ſhould think themſelves touched, they ought not to impute it to deſign in the Author, but to the conformity of things. 'I remember, continues he, 'when complaints were made againſt Sir Robert Howard, 'that in treating of the Heathen Prieſts, he had whipt 'ſome Chriſtian Prieſts on their back; all the anſwer he 'made was only, what made them get up there? which 'anſwer I claim before hand.' Notwithſtanding this, he goes on, and ſays he leaves the Reader to make ſuch applications himſelf, ſeldom making any for him, ſince he that is neither clear-ſighted, nor quick enough of conception to do ſo, may to as good purpoſe read the Fairy-Tales as this hiſtory. Soon after King George the Firſt's acceſſion to the throne, our Author drew up a memorial to a Miniſter of State, containing ſeveral hints for mending the ſtate, the ſubſtance of which, new modelled and enlarged, with ſome additions, he publiſhed in 1717, under the following title, State Anatomy of Great Britain, containing a particular account of its ſeveral Intereſts and Parties, their Bent and Genius; and what each of them, with all the reſt of Europe, may hope or fear from the Reign and Family of King George. Being a memorial ſent by an intimate friend to a foreign Miniſter, lately nominated to come from the Court of England. This tract was anſwered by Dr Fiddes, Chaplain to the Earl of Oxford, and by Daniel De Foe; whereupon Mr Toland publiſhed, The Second Part of the State of Anatomy, &c. containing a ſhort Vindication of the former Part, againſt the miſrepreſentations of the ignorant, or the malicious, eſpecially relating to our Miniſters of State, and to Foreigners, with ſome Reflections on the deſigned Clamour againſt the Army, and on the Swediſh Conſpiracy. Alſo Letters to his Grace the late Archbiſhop of Canterbury, cularly upon his History of the Druids, of which he drew up a large ſpecimen, and ſent it in three letters to Lord Moleſworth, in the year 1718 (xx). About this time, Mr Toland finding himſelf aſthmatical, and beginning to loſe his ſtomach, took a lodging at Putney for the ſake of the country air (yy). However, he uſually ſpent the greateſt part of the winter in town, where this year he publiſhed his Nazarenus [PP]. In this treatiſe our Author gives what he took to be the Original Plan of Chriſtianity, which was this: That the Jewiſh Converts were ſtill to obſerve their own Law throughout all generations, which was not however to be obſerved by the converted Gentiles; but that both were to be united into one Body or Fellowſhip, in that part of Chriſtianity particularly, which, better than all the preparative purgations of the Philoſophers, requires the ſanctification of the Spirit, and the renovation of the inward man. The ſame year he put out a pamphlet, intitled, The Deſtiny of Rome (zz) [QQ]. He was very much reduced in his fortunes at this time, being entirely ſupported by the bounty of his friends, the narrowneſs of which he complains of (aaa). Towards the latter end of the year following, Dr Hare, late Biſhop of Chicheſter, then Dean of Worceſter, having given an injurious repreſentation of our Author's conduct in penning ſome parts of Chriſtianity not Myſterious, Mr Toland publiſhed an advertiſement in the Poſtman, where vindicating himſelf from the Dean's aſperſion, he makes the charge fall heavy upon the Aſperſor. The Dean attempted to clear himſelf in an advertiſement printed in the Daily Courant; but did it in ſuch a manner [RR], as occaſioned the publiſhing of a pamphlet with this title, A Short Eſſay upon Lying: or a Defence of a Reverend Dignitary, who ſuffers under the perſecution of Mr Toland for a Lapſus Calami. About this time out Author, at the requeſt of Lord Southwell (bbb), undertook to defend the Independent Juriſdiction of the Iriſh Houſe of Peers, againſt a bill then brought into the Britiſh Parliament, wherein it was declared, that there lies an appeal from any decree of the Houſe of Lords in Ireland to that of Great Britain, as the Supreme Court of Judicature, and laſt Reſort. Mr Toland, in this affair, had likewiſe the direction and aſſiſtance of Lord Moleſworth (ccc), and this being the fatal South-Sea year, our Author met with a friend among the Directors, who, even without conſulting either of them (which the ſhortneſs of the time would not admit) was ſo kind as to do him the favour of making uſe of this Lord's name in his behalf for a thouſand pound ſubſcription in that fund. Our Author informs his Lordſhip, that he was offered a thouſand pounds advantage three hours after the thing was done, and thirteen hundred the 25th following; but my benefactor aſſures me, ſays he, that at the opening of the books it will be worth a great deal more. You may eaſily gueſs I will be governed by him in this point. Another ſuch job (continues he) will make me as eaſy and independent, as I deſire, without ever ſtock-jobbing more (ddd): ſince I may buy an annuity of two or three hundred pounds; though the purchaſe of land is got up to thirty years, and if things go on at this rate, will mount much higher. Elated with this project, it was about this time that he printed his Pantheiſticon (eee) ſive Formula celebrandæ ſodalitatis Socraticæ [SS]. and to the Diſſenting Miniſters of all denominations, in the year 1705-6, about a general toleration, with ſome of their anſwers to the Author, who now offers to public conſideration what was then tranſacted for private ſatisfaction; together with a Letter from their High Mightineſſes the States General of the United Provinces on the ſame ſubject (53).

[QQ] The Deſtiny of Rome:] Or the probability of the ſpeedy and final Deſtruction of the Pope; concluded partly from natural reaſons and political obſervations, and partly on occaſion of the famous Prophecy of Father Malachy (55), Archbiſhop of Armagh, in the XIIIth Century, which curious piece containing emblematical characters of all the Popes, from his own time to the utter extirpation of them, is not only here intirely publiſhed, but likewiſe ſet in a much clearer light than has ever hitherto been done.—In a Letter to a Divine of the Church of the Firſt-born. What made him trifle away his time upon this ſubject, ſays Mr Des Maizeaux (56), I will not pretend to account for: but we have ſhewn the true reaſon in the text, which was no other but the misfortunes that attended the want of a ſplendid ſhilling.

[RR] He did it in ſuch a manner.] In a Poſtſcript to a Viſitation Sermon, intitled, Church Authority, ſays Biſhop Hoadly, had juſt ſuch a reſemblance to Chillingſworth, as Mr Toland has to Mr Locke, who, in Chriſtianity not Myſterious, is often quoted to ſupport notions he never dreamt of. Mr Toland, in the News-paper mentioned above, having defied him to ſhew any ſuch quotation [of which there is none] in that book, the Dean in anſwer to this, publiſhed in the Daily Courant of Feb. 3, 1720, as follows: Juſt publiſhed, the fourth edition of the Dean of Worceſter's Sermon, &c. [In the poſtſcript, l. 9, from the end, inſtead of is often quoted, read makes great uſe of Mr Locke's principles] which occaſioned the abovementioned pamphlet. Our Author, in his Tetradymus (57) (of which preſently) relates the whole tranſaction, wherein having produced Mr Locke's own words to falſify the Dean's charge of Mr Toland's making uſe of Mr Locke's principles, he obſerves, that it appears by the whole connexion, that this emendation was not in the Doctor's thoughts at the beginning; or, ſuppoſing it were, that it ſerves his cauſe as little as the other way of ſpeaking, ſince I proceed, ſays he, upon different principles from Mr Locke, and principles that are better, if you believe the then Biſhop of Worceſter (58). In fine, no ſlip of the pen, nor any of the methods laid down by an ingenious writer [A ſhort eſſay upon lying] can poſſibly ſalve the Doctor from oblique dealing, as the drawing me by the head and ſhoulders into his pamphlet was unneceſſary, if not ſpightful, with regard to me or ſome other. I ſay it again, that it would have been no condeſcenſion below his dignity, ſince he vouchſafed to take notice of me at all, if he had accuſed his memory, or in any other manner owned his miſtake; inſtead of having recourſe to ſhifts that deſerve a courſer name than I am willing to give them, out of the reſpect I pay him on other accounts.

[SS] His Pantheiſticon, ſive Formula celebrandæ ſodalitatis Socraticæ.] Our Author, while he was in Holland in 1709, wrote a Diſſertation de genere loco et tempore mortis Jordani Bruni, Nolani, which was inſcribed to Baron Hohendorf, to whom he ſent it at Vienna. He likewiſe ſent another copy afterwards to Mr Leibnitz the ſame year.

Dialogue between the Preſident and Members of a Philoſophical Society, who are Pantheiſts, that is, ſuch as acknowledge no God but the Univerſe. The piece is made up in the form of Reſponſes, Leſſons, a Philoſophical Canon, and a ſort of Litany; the whole being printed both in red and black, one cannot forbear thinking it was drawn up by way of mockery to ſome Chriſtian Liturgies. It has been obſerved by one of his friends, that the Author himſelf ſeemed to have been ſenſible, that he had too much indulged his looſe imagination; ſince he got it printed ſecretly, under a diſguiſed name, at his own charge, and took off a few copies, which he diſtributed with a view of receiving preſents for them (fff). Some time after, he publiſhed a book, intitled, Tetradymus, as containing four tracts; in the laſt of theſe, addreſſed to the Biſhop of London, having inſerted his advertiſement againſt Dr Hare, with the Doctor's anſwer, he here makes a reply to that anſwer, and concludes with an account of his own conduct and ſentiments [TT]. The following year, 1721, in May, Dr Hare publiſhed a book, intitled, Scripture vindicated from the miſrepreſentations of the Lord Biſhop of Bangor, &c. In the Preface of which, he charged our Author with having, in ſome copies of his Pantheiſticon, inſerted a blaſphemous prayer to Bacchus [UU]; but he was defended from this heavy charge by Mr Des Maizeaux, who, upon enquiry, aſſures us, Mr Toland never dreamt of writing any ſuch thing (ggg). Some letters of the Earl of Shaftſbury to Lord Moleſworth having been communicated by the latter to our Author the year before, were publiſhed by him, with that Lord's conſent, this year [WW]. To theſe letters, he prefixed a large Introduction, wherein he gives a particular year (59). In this tract there is an account of all the works of Jordano, the founder of Pantheiſm. However, Mr Toland obſerves to Mr Leibnitz, that this Author's works, particularly his Spaccio della Beſtia trionfante, ſive Beſtiæ triumphantis expulſio (i. e. the expulſion of ſuperſtition) is not a ſecret to be communicated to every body *. In the firſt volume of Mr Toland's miſcellaneous pieces, p. 316, et ſeq. is inſerted an account of Jordano Bruno's book of the Infinite Univerſe and Innumerable Worlds, tranſlated from the original Latin, printed in the year 1514.

[TT] An account of his own conduct and ſentiments.] Here he ſolemnly profeſſes, that the religion taught by Jeſus Chriſt and his Apoſtles, but not as ſince corrupted by the ſubſtractions, additions, or other alterations, of any particular man or company of men, is that which he infinitely preferred before all others. 'I do, continues he, over and over again repeat it, Chriſt and his Apoſtles, excluſive of either oral tradition or the determination of ſynods, adding, what I declared before to the world, that religion, as it came out of their hands, was no leſs plain and pure, than uſeful and inſtructive (60).' The title of this book is Tetradymus: containing, I. Hodegus; or the pillar of cloud and fire, that guided the Iſraelites in the wilderneſs, not miraculous; but, as faithfully related in Exodus, a thing equally practiſed by other nations, and in thoſe places not only uſeful but neceſſary. II. Clidophorus; or, Of the Exoteric and Eſoteric Philoſophy, that is, of the external and internal doctrine of the Antients: the one open and public, accommodated to popular prejudices and the eſtabliſhed religion; the other private and ſecret, wherein to the few capable and diſcreet was taught the real truth, ſtript of all diſguiſes. III. Hypatia; or, The hiſtory of a moſt beautiful, moſt virtuous, moſt learned, and every way accompliſhed Lady; who was torn to pieces by the Clergy of Alexandria, to gratify the pride, emulation, and cruelty of their Archbiſhop Cyril, commonly but undeſervedly ſtiled St Cyril. IV. Mangonentes; being a defence of Nazarenus, addreſſed to the right reverend John Lord Biſhop of London, againſt his Lordſhip's Chaplain, Dr Mangey, his Dedicator, Mr Paterſon, and, who ought to have been named firſt, the reverend Dr Brett, once belonging to his Lordſhip's church. The firſt diſſertation was anſwered in a pamphlet, called Hodegus confuted; or a plain demonſtration that the pillar of cloud and fire, that guided the Iſraelites in the wilderneſs, was not a fire of human preparation, but the moſt miraculous preſence of God. 1721, 8vo. And in A diſcourſe upon the pillar of cloud and fire which guided the Iſraelites through the wilderneſs, proving it to have been miraculous: occaſioned by a diſſertation of Mr Toland's, called Hodegus. Inſerted in the Bibliotheca literaria, &c. 1723, Numb. V. p. 1, et ſeq.

[UU] A blaſphemous prayer to Bacchus.] The Doctor introduces it thus: ſpeaking of the conſtitutions of Carolina, he obſerves, that by one of the articles none are excluded from ſettling in that country on account of their opinions, but downright Atheiſts, ſuch as the impious Author of the Pantheiſticon. To this paſſage, at the bottom of the page [xxi], he inſerts the following note: 'This Atheiſtical writer, not content with what he has dared to print in this profane piece, has, I am told, in ſome copies inſerted a prayer in manuſcript in theſe or the like words, Omnipotens & ſempiterne Bacche, qui hominum corda donis tuis recreas, concede, propitius, ut qui heſternis poculis ægroti facti ſunt, hodiernis curentur, & per pocula poculorum. How to fill up the blank I have left I do not remember. Thus prays this impudent Pantheiſt, whoſe impudent blaſphemies loudly call for the animadverſions of the civil power.' And, upon further intelligence, he inſerted this advertiſement in the Errata: 'The prayer to Bacchus, p. xxi, being, to the beſt of my remembrance, in the very words in which I have heard it repeated more than once by the ſame perſon; and yet differing much in expreſſion from two written copies I have lately ſeen (which alſo differ from each other) I thought it would not be unacceptable to the reader to give him the following copy, which, whatever the other be, I can aſſure him is from an original: Omnipotens & ſempiterne Bacche, qui humanam ſocietatem maxime in bibendo conſtituiſti, concede, propitius, ut iſtorum capita, qui heſterna compotatione græventur, hodierna leventur; idque fiat per pocula poculorum. Amen.'

[WW] Were publiſhed with that Lord's conſent this year.] This is collected from a letter (61) of Lord Moleſworth to our Author, the firſt paragraph of which runs thus:

'To Mr Toland.

'Brechenſton, near Dublin, June 25, 1720.

'Sir,

'I ſhould be glad that any thing my Lord Caſtleton met with in my Lord Shaftſbury's letters to me would encourage him to try for heirs to his honours and eſtate: I think he owes ſo much to his family and country. I was always of your opinion, that thoſe letters were very valuable for the reaſons you give, and had it in my thoughts that it would be a good thing to publiſh them. But, upon farther conſideration, that my Lord Shaftſbury's relations might take it amiſs that I divulge family ſecrets, and that it would be conſtrued a piece of vanity (now much in uſe) for me to print my own commendations (as you know there are ſuch in ſeveral of thoſe letters), I concluded it better to have ſuch publication deferred till after my death. If you have any good reaſons to think otherwiſe, let me know them. You may, if you think fitting, communicate them to Mr Collins, and take his opinion of them. I own I am proud enough of having been not only ſo intimate with that great man, but to have had a hand in the firſt forming of his mind to virtue. There are other great miniſters now living, for whom I endeavoured as much; but, as they have forgot it, ſo will I. The Lord Shaftſbury was of a different temper, and carried on his friendſhip to my ſons, the eldeſt of whom did him ſignal ſervice in Italy, where at Naples he died.'

To this if we add Lord Moleſworth's extraordinary kindneſs afterwards to Mr Toland in his ſickneſs, there is no room to ſuppoſe the publication was made without that Lord's privity and conſent. This Lord ſent frequent meſſages and billets to Mr Toland, while he lay ill at Putney. In one of the latter (63) he writes thus: cular account of Lord Shaftſbury's principles and conduct (hhh), with reſpect to public affairs. It was now four years that Mr Toland had been in a declining ſtate of health, and this year, about December, he grew much worſe, and finding little or no relief from the aſſiſtance of his Apothecary, he took the advice of a friend (iii), and ſent for Mr Woodward, who, not judging rightly of the true ſtate of his caſe, brought a continual vomiting and looſeneſs upon him, by which he grew a great deal worſe (kkk), and not without difficulty got to his lodgings at Putney on the Saturday before Chriſtmas-day. Here he continued ſo ill, as to be wholly confined to his chamber till the end of January, when he began to grow perceptibly better (lll), and in a few weeks got ſo well, as to entertain hopes of a recovery. In this interval, he wrote his diſſertation, intitled, Phyſic without Phyſicians, to ſhew the danger of truſting Phyſicians, while every man may eaſily be his own Phyſician. He likewiſe prepared a Preface to be prefixed before a pamphlet, called The Danger of Mercenary Parliaments, which was to be reprinted againſt the approaching Election of a new Parliament; but in the latter end of February (mmm), he relapſed into all his former ſymptoms, being ſeized with his old pains in his thighs, reigns, and ſtomach, with a total loſs of appetite, and hourly reachings, attended with a very high-coloured water, which he took to be occaſioned by the gravel (nnn); but we are told by one of his friends, who attended him in his laſt moments, that a ſevere rhueumatiſm had hung long upon him, which turning to the black jaundice, attended with a fever, proved mortal to him, about three o'clock on Sunday morning, the 11th of March, in the fifty-third year of his age. The ſame Author aſſures us, that 'he behaved, throughout the whole courſe of 'his ſickneſs, with a philoſophical patience, an intire reſignation to the Divine Will, 'and was thoroughly ſenſible of his approaching diſſolution; for upon his appearing ſome-'thing more than ordinary chearful the day before he died, and my telling him I hoped 'he was better, he replied quick upon me, Sir, I have no hopes but in God. A few minutes 'before he died, looking earneſtly at ſome friends that were in the room, and being aſked 'if he wanted any thing, he anſwered with the firmeſt reſolution, I want nothing but 'death (ooo).' And Mr Des Maizeaux tells us, that 'he looked upon death without 'the leaſt perturbation of mind, bidding farewel to thoſe that were about him, and tell-'ing them he was going to ſleep (ppp).' His body was decently interred, on the 13th following, in Putney Church-yard. He wrote an epitaph for himſelf ſome few days before his death, which we ſhall inſert in the note [XX]. As to his character, Mr Molyneux declares (qqq), that he was a candid Free-thinker, and a good Scholar; but at the ſame time vain, and addicted to religious diſputes in Coffee-houſes and other public places. We learn from Mr Des Maizeaux (rrr), that he was fond of paradoxes, and affected ſingularity in his opinions; that he might have employed his talents much better; but he had the misfortune to fall into an idle indiſcreet way, which he indulged to his death, notwithſtanding the repeated advices and remonſtrances of his beſt friends. And it was obſerved by the Author of the Freeholder's Journal (sss), that his being known to the world is owing chiefly to the animadverſions of learned men upon his writings, among whom it is a common trick in their diſputes, to charge their adverſary with an agreement to, or reſemblance of Mr Toland's notions, as the greateſt infamy, and the ſureſt criterion of error.

'To Mr Toland.

'Albemarle-ſtreet, Jan. 5, 1721-2.

'Sir,

'Saturday night, about nine, I received yours of that 'day, which gives me ſuch a diſmal account, of your 'ill ſtate of health, that I was extremely concerned at 'the condition I found you were in, I doubt, for want 'of neceſſaries. I cannot forbear wiſhing you were 'in Town; for I doubt you cannot eaſily get ſuch 'broths and bits of eaſy digeſtion as I ſhould take care 'to procure for you. Your landlady may be a very 'good woman, and have a great reſpect for you; 'but her poverty (64) may prevent her from providing 'ſuch ſort of victuals and drinks as are proper for a ſick 'man, reduced to ſo weak a condition as I find you are. 'Indeed I expected you in Town after the letter I wrote 'to you laſt week; not imagining you had been ſo much 'out of order; though I ſaw by your looks that a fit 'of ſickneſs was growing upon you, which I hoped 'your vomits and purges had prevented in a great 'meaſure. I intend to ſollicit the Peer, your old ſtingy 'acquaintance, and my neighbour, and ſee whether a 'letter which I ſhall ſend him will move him once in 'his life to be generous and charitable. Your reflections 'upon the Phyſicians and the Injuſtice of the world are 'very right; but you muſt not indulge melancholy 'thoughts at ſuch a time. Let it ſuffice you to know, 'that, although my circumſtances are narrow enough, 'you ſhall never want neceſſaries whilſt I live. I am 'ſenſible that bare neceſſaries are but cold comfort to a 'man of your ſpirit and deſert; but it is all I dare 'promiſe you. It is an ungrateful age, and we muſt 'bear with it the beſt we may, till we can mend it. 'Adieu, be chearful, and think of going with me for 'Ireland.

'Yours ſincerely,

'Moleſworth.'

TONSTALL, or TUNSTALL [CUTHBERT], ſucceſſively Biſhop of London and Durham in the ſixteenth century, a man of great learning, integrity, and politeneſs, was a natural ſon of one Mr Tunſtall, a Gentleman of good rank (a) [A], by a daughter of the Conyers family (b). He was born at Hatchford in Richmondſhire, about the year 1474 [B]: and became a Student in the Univerſity of Oxford about 1491, particularly, as ſome will have it, in Balliol-College. Being forced to leave it by reaſon of the plague, he went to Cambridge, where he became Fellow of King's Hall (c) [C]. After ſome ſtay there, he travelled beyond ſea, and ſtudied in the Univerſity of Padua, then in the higheſt repute; and took the Degree of Doctor of Laws, not having, that we can find, taken any Degree in either of our Univerſities (d). He ſo well improved himſelf in every place, that 'there was ſcarce any kind of good learning in which he was not excellent; 'being a very good Grecian, well acquainted with the Hebrew, a very eloquent Rhe-'torician, a ſkilful Mathematician, famous eſpecially for Arithmetick, a great Lawyer, 'and a profound Divine (e).' And all theſe accompliſhments were crowned with eminent piety, virtue, and regularity (f). They ſoon recommended him to the eſteem of all good men, particularly of William Warham, then Archbiſhop of Canterbury, a moſt generous Patron of Learning; who conſtituted him his Vicar-General, or Chancellor [D], Aug. 25, 1511; introduced him to the King: and alſo collated him, on the 16th of December 1511, to the Rectory of Harrow on the Hill in Middleſex (g). On the 15th of April 1514, he was inſtalled in the Prebend of Stow-longa in the Church of Lincoln: and, November 17, 1515, admitted Archdeacon of Cheſter (h). May the 12th, 1516, he was made Maſter of the Rolls (i), for which he was extremely well qualified on account of his knowledge in the Laws. The ſame year, he and Sir Thomas More were ſent Embaſſadors to the Emperor Charles V, then at Bruſſels; and had the pleaſure and happineſs of living there in the ſame houſe with the moſt excellent Eraſmus (k) [E], which created a laſting and indelible friendſhip between them (l). During this employment, our Miniſter was very ſedulous in his charge, as well as very capable of executing it; and nothing wherein his Majeſty was concerned eſcaped him. He perfectly underſtood the ſtate of the Imperial Court, penetrated into all the deſigns of it, and failed not, as occaſion offered, to impart his advice accordingly, either to the King, or his Officers (m). He returned to England in 1517, but had not been at home above ten days, before he was ſent upon a ſecond Embaſſy to the Emperor (n). In 1519, he was collated to the Prebend of Botevant in the Church of York (o). The 26th of May, 1521, he was alſo made Prebendary of Combe and Hornham in the Church of Sarum;

[A] Was a natural ſon of one Mr Tunſtall, a gentleman of good rank.] Biſhop Godwin ſays, that he 'was the 'baſe ſon of one Tunſtall, a Gentleman of a very an-'cient houſe. It is reported, (adds he) that their firſt 'anceſtor attended William Conqueror as his Barbor, 'and being raiſed by him unto ſome better fortune, in 'memory of his former eſtate, took for his armes Sable 'three combes Argent. But I take this for a fable. 'The ſpecial uſe of armes is to expreſſe unto poſterity 'the vertues of ſuch as are raiſed unto Gentry, and 'not to remember any thing that may be to the diſ-'grace of the bearer, and make him leſſe honourable. 'Were the firſt of his race, as he is ſuppoſed, becauſe 'he was not advanced for being a Barbor but for his 'faithfull and loyall ſervice, ſuch armes ſhould rather 'have beene given him, as might have regiſtered that 'virtue, then twighted him with the baſeneſs of his 'firſt trade and manner of life. Rather therefore ſhould 'I geſſe ſome other occaſions of theſe armes, which as 'they were born by him, may have many very honour-'able ſignifications.'——It hath been the ſimple vanity of many conſiderable Families in this kingdom, to deduce their pedigree from thoſe plundering Invaders, who attended William the Baſtard in his conqueſt of England. And, poſſibly, that might be the vanity of the Tonſtall-family, who derived their name from the Latin word Tonſor, a Barber; and told the ſtory ſet down above in Biſhop Godwin's words. But it is much more likely, that the name of that family was taken from a place in England called Tunſtal; there being no leſs than eight pariſhes, or places, of that name in this Kingdom (1). Dr Fuller ſays, that their chief ſeat was at Tonſtal-Thurland in Yorkſhire, from whence unqueſtionably they took their ſurname (2).... In the pedigree of the Holland-family, it is aſſerted (3), that Cuthbert Tunſtal, in his youth, near two years, was brought up in Sir Thomas Holland's kitchen unknown, till being known, he was ſent home to Sir Richard Tunſtall, his father.

[B] About the year 1474.] A. Wood ſays, that it was 'in the year 1476, or thereabouts (4).' But, by a memorandum of our learned Author's at the end of his book, De veritate Corporis & Sanguinis Domini noſtri Jeſu Chriſti in Euchariſtia, it appears that he was in the ſeventy-ſeventh year of his age in 1551, when he finiſhed that book; and conſequently muſt have been born about the year 1474. His words are, Hoc opus ab authore abſolutum eſt, Anno ætatis ſuæ ſeptuageſimo-ſeptimo, qui fuit annus Domini 1551.

In 1523, May 25, he was made Keeper of the Privy-Seal (s). Though he was undeniably a perſon of good ſenſe and learning, yet upon the firſt appearance of Luther's Writings againſt Popery, ſo far was he from being convinced by them, that he very earneſtly ſollicited Eraſmus to write againſt Luther, upon whom he beſtows very hard names: But Eraſmus handſomely excuſed himſelf (t) [G]. [G] He very earneſtly ſollicited Eraſmus to write againſt Luther, upon whom he beſtows very hard names: but Eraſmus handſomely excuſed himſelf.] He begins his letter by informing Eraſmus, that he was ſuſpected of having aſſiſted Luther in his anſwer to King Henry VIII. His own words are; 'Dici non poteſt, quantopere ſum 'gaviſus, lectis tuis literis, præſertim his quibus tum 'ad Regem tum ad Legatum ſcriptis, his te ſuſpicio-'nibus liberas, quas de libello a Luthero in Regem 'edito, tanquam aliquid ineſſet tuum, hic ſubortas eſſe non-'nulli tibi retulerunt: non quod animis hominum tam 'alte inſederat hæc ſuſpitio, ut tuis literis fuerit revel-'lenda: quandoquidem ſic totus liber contumeliis ſca-'tet, ſic ſingulis pagellis Lutherianum virus ſpirat, ut 'ex qua officina prodierit, ille ipſe lectus prodat; verum 'ea re ſum lætatus vehementer, quod ex his intellexi 'tibi cum Lutherianis male convenire, teque a Pontifice 'Maximo rogatum, ut congrediendi cum Luthero pro-'vinciam ſuſciperes, jam exoratum prope in procinctu 'eſſe. Id quod omnes amici tui magnopere & ex-'pectant & cupiunt, ut cum illo Proteo, imo verius 'Atheo, tandem congrediare. Cæterum ex Luthero, 'inquis, & Lutherianis male audiam. At non pejus, 'quam Deus ipſe, quem ille malitiæ omnis autorem 'facit, dum liberum tollit ab hominibus arbitrium, 'atque omnia ſtatis neceſſitatis legibus fieri prorſus 'contendit, ut liberum cuiquam non ſit, ſi velit bene-'facere,' &c. i. e. 'I cannot expreſs, how great a joy your letters have given me, eſpecially thoſe you have written to his Majeſty and the Legate (12), by which you free yourſelf from the ſuſpicions entertained here againſt you, as if you had had a hand in Luther's book againſt the King; not that thoſe ſuſpicions were ſo fixed in people's minds, that there was any need of letters from you to remove them; for the whole book is ſo full of railing, and breathes ſo in every page the Lutheran poiſon, that the reading of it ſhews out of what ſhop it comes. But I am extremely glad to find by your letters, that you are upon ill terms with the Lutherans, and have been requeſted by the Pope to engage with Luther; which you are preparing to do. That you would at length attack that Proteus, or rather that Atheiſt, is the earneſt expectation and deſire of all your friends. But you ſay, that it will give you a bad character with Luther, and the Lutherans. Not worſe ſurely than Luther doth to God himſelf, whom he makes the author of all evil, when he takes Free-will from mankind, and maintains that all things are done by the laws of Neceſſity, ſo that every one is not at liberty to do good if he would.' &c.——This letter breathes the true ſpirit of Popery, and not that ſpirit of Meekneſs for which ſome have celebrated our Author. But it is to be remembered, that it was written whilſt Popery was triumphant; and in our Prelate's younger years: Afterwards, age, and the revolutions in the ſtate of religion in this kingdom, cooled his zeal, and taught him more prudence and moderation. Let it be further obſerved, That he was not then a Predeſtinarian, as he became afterwards, witneſs his book Againſt the impious blaſphemers of God's Predeſtination. And as to Luther, he at firſt profeſſed that cruel doctrine, but ſoftened ſome of the rigor of it before his death; and his Followers condemn it abſolutely.

(12) i. e. King Henry VIII. and Cardinal Wolſey, who was the Pope's Legate.

Eraſmus, in his Anſwer, commends our Biſhop's zeal, but inſinuates that it ought to be according to knowledge. And has theſe excellent paſſages: 'Iſtud tam pium ſtudium, tam flagrantem erga Eccleſiam Dei zelum non poſſum equidem non vehementer probare, præſul cum primis obſervande: nec dubito quin iſtum mentis impetum judicio ſuſceperis: at mihi meique ſimilibus circumſpiciendum eſt, ne, quod ſcribit Apoſtolus, zelum habeamus, ſed non ſecundum ſcientiam; ac, juxta Parmenonis comici dictum, metuendum ne nimium calidum hoc ſit modo. Siquidem video quibuſdam uſu venire, ut dum majore ſtudio quam judicio rem gerunt, non ſolum una cum zizaniis evellant triticum, quod Chriſtus in Evangelio fieri vetuit, verum etiam pro zizaniis evellant triticum; dum vel prius damnant quam intelligunt, vel quod pie dictum eſt interpretatione depravant: idque videri volunt zelum religionis, & hæreſeωv odium, quum hæc præcipua ſit peſtis & pietatis & concordiæ. Sic qui vehementer amant quempiam, nihil in eo non laudant: qui vehementer oderunt, nihil non damnant. In Lutheri ſcriptis quædam audio reprobari, quæ, ſi ſobria collatione inter eruditos & integros diſputarentur, nonnihil conferrent ad ſpiritualem & Evangelicum vigorem, a quo mundus nimium profecto degeneravit' . . . . . Then he bewails the diſturbances occaſioned by the Anabaptiſts, and other Sectaries, in Germany, who were running from one extreme into another. . . . 'Utinam de exitu rei tua te fallat divinatio, mihi non admodum ſagaci jamdudum idem ſubolet: quod ſi eveniat, vereor ne pro excuſſis Pontificibus, Epiſcopis, & Principibus, ſordidos quoſdam dominos recipiamus multo illis inclementiores. Nam ἀναρχίαν jampridem muſſant ii quos Anabaptiſtas vocant: aluntur & alia dogmatum monſtra, quæ, ſi proruperint, efficient ut Lutherus propemodum orthodoxus videri poſſit. . . . . Extitit aliud inſaniæ genus, Prophetæ volunt videri, ſed ridentur ab omnibus. Nulla quidem adhuc exorta ſecta, quæ de Chriſto prædicet impie: multis tamen hic opinionum tumultus addidit animos, ut auſint non ſolum de Chriſti Divina natura blaſphema loqui, verum etiam de Scripturæ totius autoritate dubitare. Ita fit, quoties ſemel effractis repagulis ſeſe in licentiæ campum effudit hominum temeritas, nullam facit inſaniendi finem, donec omnia ſecum involvat exitio.' . . . The ſubſtance of which is, 'That he could not but greatly commend his pious affection and flagrant zeal for the church of God, and did not doubt but it was taken up with due judgment; but as for Himſelf and others, they were to beware not to have a zeal without knowledge, as the Apoſtle writes, and according to Parmeno's ſaying, that it ſhould not be too hot. For he ſaw it uſually happen, that when men act with more eagerneſs than judgment, they not only do what Chriſt hath forbidden in the Goſpel, that is, pluck up the wheat with the tares, but inſtead of the tares pull up the wheat; whilſt they condemn before they underſtand, or miſinterpret what hath been piouſly ſaid: and that they would have it paſs for a zeal for religion, and an averſion to hereſies, when it is the chief bane of piety and concord. So they who vehemently admire any one, find nothing but good in him; and they who hate violently, diſlike all. In Luther's writings, ſays he, I hear that ſome things are condemned, which, if they were coolly examined by learned and unprejudiced perſons, would contribute to that ſpiritual and Evangelic Heartineſs and Zeal, which is too much loſt in the world. . . . . The Biſhop had hinted at the Confuſions like to enſue from ſome blind Zealots, upon the alteration of Religion . . . Eraſmus ſays, he apprehended the ſame; and was afraid that, in the room of Popes, Biſhops, and Princes, the Scum ſhould become uppermoſt, and prove more ſevere and unmerciful maſters than the others. The Anabaptiſts were already aiming at Anarchy; and other monſtrous opinions were hatching, in compariſon of which Luther appeared almoſt orthodox. . . . Another kind of madneſs, ſaith he, is that they would paſs for Prophets; but they only expoſe themſelves to ridicule. Some begin already to talk blaſphemouſly about the Divine nature of Chriſt, and to bring the authority of the Scriptures into queſtion. So it comes to paſs, that when Mankind have once broken the bounds, they never ſtop in their madneſs, till they have involved every thing into utter deſtruction.'

King of France's being taken at the battle of Pavia (u). We find him employed, in March 1527, in profecuting ſeveral perſons in his Dioceſe, particularly about Colcheſter, that entertained heretical opinions, as they were called, that is, differing from the then eſtabliſhed Popery (w). The July following, he attended Cardinal Wolſey in his pompous Embaſſy into France (x); being one of his Eminency's moſt able and faithful Counſellors [H]. In 1529, he was one of the Engliſh Embaſſadors at the famous Treaty of Cambray; and, at his return from that place through Antwerp, bought up all the copies of William Tindale's Tranſlation of the New Teſtament that remained unſold, in order to burn them at Paul's Croſs (y) [I]: So firmly attached was he to Popery! However, he had behaved with ſo much faithfulneſs and prudence in his Embaſſies [K], and all other public employments, that, in 1530, he was tranſlated to the rich Biſhopric of Durham (z) [L]. Before his removal from the See of London, he had beſtowed much money in furniſhing a Library in Cambridge, with good books, both printed and manuſcript, which he had collected abroad. And, after his tranſlation to Durham, he laid out great ſums, in adorning that city with public buildings, and in repairing, improving, and beautifying his epiſcopal houſes (aa) [M]. He declared, and wrote, for King Henry the Eighth's divorce from Queen Catharine of Arragon, when that affair came to be debated: though it ſeems he afterwards altered his mind (bb) [N]. And when that King took the title of Supreme Head of the Church of England, he recommended it, both in his injunctions, and in a ſermon preached at Durham; as he teſtifies in a letter, ſet down in the note below (cc) [O]: though he had before, in 1531, ſolemnly proteſted againſt that [H] Being one of his Eminency's moſt able and faithful Counſellors.] Eraſmus, after mentioning him in that capacity, among many of our moſt eminent men, breaks out into this exclamation: Quid Cuthbertum Tonſtallum, cum quovis priſcorum conferendum, quorum non ita multa paria celebravit antiquitas? O domum illam auguſtam ac felicem! O vere ſplendidum Cardinalem, qui tales viros habet in conſiliis, cujus menſa talibus hominibus cingitur! (13).

[I] Bought up all the copies of William Tindale's tranſlation &c.] This fact is thus related by Biſhop Burnet (14), from the original author Edward Hall (15). 'Tonſtall, then Biſhop of London, being a man of invincible moderation, would do no body hurt, yet endeavoured as he could, to get their [the Reformers] books into his hands: So being at Antwerp, in the year 1529, as he returned from his Embaſſy at the Treaty at Cambray, he ſent for one Packington, an Engliſh merchant there, and deſired him to ſee how many New Teſtaments of Tindal's tranſlation he might have for money. Packington, who was a ſecret favourer of Tindal, told him what the Biſhop propoſed. Tindal was very glad of it; for being convinced of ſome faults in his work, he was deſigning a new and more correct edition; but he was poor, and the former Impreſſion not being ſold off, he could not go about it: ſo he gave Packington all the copies that lay in his hands, for which the Biſhop payed the price, and brought them over, and burnt them publickly in Cheapſide. This had ſuch an hateful appearance in it, being generally called a burning of the Word of God, that people from thence concluded, there muſt be a viſible contrariety between that Book and the Doctrines of thoſe who ſo handled it; by which both their prejudice againſt the Clergy, and their deſire of reading the New Teſtament, was encreaſed. So that next year, when the Second Edition was finiſhed, many more were brought over, and Conſtantine being taken in England, the Lord Chancellor (16) in a private examination, promiſed him that no hurt ſhould be done him, if he would reveal who encouraged and ſupported them at Antwerp; which he accepted of, and told that the greateſt Encouragement they had, was from the Biſhop of London, who had bought up half the impreſſion. This made all that heard of it laugh heartily, though more judicious perſons diſcerned the great temper of that learned Biſhop in it.'

[M] And, after his tranſlation to Durham, he laid out great ſums in adorning that city, &c.] This is the account given of it by Biſhop Godwin (19): 'Hee built from the ground a moſt beautiful Porch or Gate-houſe (with a Chappel annexed thereunto) of faire ſtone, in the caſtle of Durham, and added to the ſaid caſtle certaine gates with iron bars and portcullises, ſupported with ſtrong wals on each ſide. He brought water thither with a conduit, whereas before time it was ſerved with well-water. He made the gate-houſe at Alnewike, [a chamber at Aukland] and built the Tolebooth in the market of Durham, all of ſtone, with divers edifices neare the hinder part of the ſaid Tolboothe, which he gave alſo to the city of Durham. Laſtly, he repaired with great charge [Norham-caſtle] and the third part of Tine-bridge.'

Only the Biſhop of Rocheſter refuſed to ſet his hand to it (20).' J. Pits's account is more explicit; being in theſe words (21): Unicam in tota vita ſibi inuſſit maculam, quod videlicet ab Henrico rege ſeductus & inductus fuerit, ut matrimonium Regis cum Catherina Hiſpana diſſolvi poſſe & debere aſſeruerit, idque libro ſcripto probare conatus fuerit. Cujus facti ita eum poſtea pœnituit, ut in contrariam plane ſententiam deſcenderit, & damnato, quem prius ſcripſerat, libro, Reginæ partes conſtanter tenuerit, fueritque in illa cauſa unus ex Reginæ advocatis, i. e. Of which he ſo much repented afterwards, that he went into the quite contrary opinion; and condemning the book he had written, conſtantly took the Queen's part, and was one of the advocates in her cauſe.' This latter part is explained by the following paragraph in Biſhop Fiſher's life (22): 'Cardinall Campeius called for Doctour Cuthbert Tunſtall, Biſhop of London, and deſired to heare him ſpeak, for he was a man of profound judgement and learning, and one in whoſe wiſdom and honeſty the Cardinall repoſed great confidence. In 1535, he was one of the Commiſſioners for taking the valuation of Eccleſiaſtical Benefices, in order to ſettle the Firſt-fruits and Tenths (ee). And in 1537, the King commanded him, on account of his learning and judgment, to peruſe Reginald Pole's book of Eccleſiaſtical Union (ff); which occaſioned ſome letters between the Cardinal and our Biſhop; particularly a ſevere joint one from him, and John Stokeſley, Biſhop of London, againſt the Pope's Supremacy (gg) [R]. The year following, he was appointed to confer about the Reformation of Religion, with ſome Embaſſadors from the Proteſtant German Princes; but things were not yet ripe for a proper alteration in this Kingdom (hh). In 1541, came out a new edition of the Bible in Engliſh, reviſed by him and Nicolas Heath, Biſhop of Rocheſter [S]. He did not approve of every part of Popery; but was of opinion, that old Uſages and Traditions were not to be broken without a great cauſe, and that ſome of them were in no wiſe to be broken (ii). In the reign of King Edward the Sixth, he went along with the Reformation [T] for ſome years; and was one of the Privy-Council, and of the King's Council in the North (kk). And eftſones upon the receit of the King's ſaid letter, I repaired to Dureſm, and there preached myſelf again in great preſence, as wel in ſetting forth the King's Title, as in declaring the uſurped authority of the Biſhop of Rome, heretofore uſed in this realm. And ſo have done, and ſhall, from time to time accompliſh the King's commandment in my dioceſs, God willing. There were words in the ſaid Letter that ſore grieved me; that the King's Highneſs ſhould repute, that I ſhould look for a new world, or mutation. If the King's Highneſs knew my mind, as God doth, ſure I am, thoſe words had not been put in. And that I ſhould now look for the renewing of that thing, which I withſtood heretofore, as far as I might, when he flouriſhed moſt, it is not likely. Surely I look for no mutation, nor new world, but one; which is the changing of this life tranſitory to the life eternal in the world to come. Which mutation, whenſoever it ſhall happen, I beſeech Almighty Jeſus of his infinite mercy, that I may leave the King's Highneſs in his moſt proſperous reign many years after my deceaſe, to myche increaſe of his Honour, the wealth of his Subjects, and the propagation of his moſt royal poſterity. [S] In 1541, came out a new Edition of the Bible in Engliſh, &c.] There is, in the beginning, the picture of King Henry VIII, with Crumwel and Cranmer; and the title is, 'The Bible in Engliſh, of the largeſt and greateſt Volume: auctoryſed and appointed, by the Commaundement of our moſt redoubted Prince and Sovereign Lord, King Henry VIII, Supreme Head of this his Church and Realm of England: To be frequented and uſed in every Church within this his ſaid Realm; according to the tenour of his former injunctions given in the behalf. Overſeen and peruſed at the Commaundement of the King's Highneſs, by the Right Reverend Fathers in God, Cuthbert Biſhop of Durham; and Nicolas Biſhop of Rocheſter. Printed by Edward Whitchurch, Cum Privilegio, ad imprimendum ſolum. 1541.' . . . Only in the matter of the corporal preſence, he was ſtill of the old perſuaſion, and writ about it (34).

ing the revenues of his rich Biſhopric, took the advantage of an accuſation of miſpriſion of treaſon brought againſt him; for which he was committed to the Tower, on the 20th of December 1551 (ll) [V]. The Parliament ſitting, on the 28th of March, a Bill was brought into the Houſe of Lords, to attaint him for miſpriſion of treaſon. Archbiſhop Cranmer ſpoke warmly and freely againſt it [W], not ſatisfied, it ſeems, with the charge that was laid: However, the Bill paſt, and the Archbiſhop proteſted. But when it came down to the Commons, they were not ſatisfied with the evidence, which conſiſted of bare depoſitions of witneſſes; but required, that the accuſers might be brought face to face: And ſo it went no farther (mm). When he could not be ruined in a Parliamentary way, means were contrived to do it in a more private and effectual manner. For that purpoſe, a Commiſſion was granted, September 21, 1552, to ſeven perſons [X]; impowering them to call before them Cuthbert, Biſhop of Durham, and examine him of all manner of conſpiracies &c. And if he were found guilty, to deprive him of his Biſhopric (nn). Accordingly he was deprived, either the 11th or 14th of October (oo), and remained a priſoner in the Tower all the reſt of King Edward's reign. Upon his deprivation, the Biſhopric was offered to Dr Robert Horne, Dean of the ſame Church, who refuſed to accept of it: Next, to Nicolas Ridley, Biſhop of London. Then a project was formed of dividing the Biſhopric into two, by founding a new one at Newcaſtle: but that deſign did not take effect; nor, very probably, was it ever intended it ſhould. For, though that is mentioned in a private Act of Parliament, in March 1552-3, whereby it was actually diſſolved; yet, in April 1553, being converted into a County Palatine, it was given to the ambitious John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland (pp) [Y]. Upon Queen Mary's acceſſion to the Throne, in 1553, Biſhop Tonſtall was not only delivered from his impriſonment, on the 5th of Auguſt (qq), but alſo reinſtated in his Biſhopric [Z]. March 13, 1554, he was put in Commiſſion with Gardiner, Bonner, and others, to deprive Robert Holgate, Archbiſhop of York, and John Bird, Robert Ferrar, and Paul Buſh, Biſhops of St David's, Cheſter, and Briſtol, on account of their being married (rr). Otherwiſe he behaved, during this whole cruel reign, with great lenity, moderation, and good nature; no ways embruing his hands in the blood of the faithful and unfortunate Proteſtants [AA], who were brought to the ſtake: ſo that his Dioceſe eſcaped the perſecutions, which were too frequent in others at that time (ss). For I meet with a marginal note in Mr Foxe, which indeed juſtly deſerved even in the faireſt letters to be inſerted in the body of his book: 'Note, that Biſhop Tonſtal in Queen Mary's 'days was no great bloody Perſecutor: for Mr Ruſſel 'a preacher was before him, and Dr Hinmer, his 'Chancellour, would have had him examined more par'ticularly; the Biſhop ſtaid him, ſaying, Hitherto we 'have had a good report among our neighbours, I pray 'you bring not this man's blood upon my head.'

came to the Crown, there were great hopes that a man of his great meekneſs and knowledge (tt) would have readily come into the Reformation; but being attached to ſome of the errors of Popery, and being indeed ſo far advanced in years, that he had in all probability but a very little time to live, he conſciencioufly choſe rather to loſe his rich Biſhopric, than act againſt his own judgement (uu). Being therefore deprived in July 1559, for refuſing the oath of Supremacy, he was committed to Matthew Parker, Archbiſhop elect of Canterbury [BB], in free cuſtody, where he was entertained in a moſt kind, friendly, and brother-like manner (xx) [CC]. The Archbiſhop, in his frequent converſations with him, brought him off from many of the errors of Popery [DD]. [BB] He was committed to Matthew Parker, Archbiſhop elect of Canterbury.] Had Antony Wood conſidered every circumſtance, he need not have aſked, 'how that 'could be, ſeeing the ſaid Matthew was not conſecrated 'Archbiſhop till December 17, 1559 (44)?' But Biſhop Tonſtall was 'put in priſon for a little while,' after his refuſing the oath (45). And the Conge d'elire for Archbiſhop Parker being dated July 18, and he being actually elected Auguſt 1ſt (46), he might, at leaſt from this laſt period, very properly bear the title of Archbiſhop, even before his conſecration. However, to avoid all ambiguity, we have added above, in the text, the title of Archbiſhop elect.

[DD] The Archbiſhop . . . . brought him off from many of the errors of Popery.] So the Archbiſhop himſelf teſtifies. Hic, opera Matthæi, a multi Papiſticis nugis, quas Maria regnante ſequutus eſt, prorſus abductus fuit, Papalemque tam ambitioſe dilatatam, Potentiam, plane a Chriſtianorum cervicibus depellendam, & ſuæ, nempe Romanæ urbis atque diœceſis finibus concludendam, affirmavit. . . . . In articulis tamen quibuſdam eccleſiaſticis adhuc firmiter hæſit, etſi Clericorum conjugia lege divina licita ac permiſſa ſtatuerit (49). i. e. 'By Matthew [Parker's] means he was entirely brought off from many Popiſh trifles, which he had adhered to under Queen Mary, and was of opinion, that the Pope's ambitious Power, which was ſtretched ſo far, ought to be ſhaken off from the necks of Chriſtians, and confined within its proper bounds, namely the city and diœceſe of Rome.——However, he ſtuck firmly ſtill to ſome articles of Popery, though he judged that the marriage of Prieſts was allowed by the law of God.'. . . . And, in the point of Juſtification, he was of the ſame opinion as the Reformed (50)—He told Bernard Gilpin, that in the matter of Tranſubſtantiation, Pope Innocent III. had done unadviſedly, in making it an article of faith. And further confeſſed, that the Pope committed a great fault in the buſineſs touching indulgencies; and other thing (*).

[LL] We ſhall conclude this article with Biſhop Tonſtall's character of Yorkſhire.] As this Prelate was attending upon King Henry VIII, in his progreſs towards the city of York, upon the hill beyond Barneſley, ſome four miles on this ſide Doncaſter, he took an occaſion to ſhew unto his Majeſty, and ſpeak of the pleaſures of Yorkſhire: requiring his Grace to behold and look upon the country before him there, affirming, that he ſhould ſee the greateſt and faireſt valley there, that was in all Europe, from end to end, and he never ſaw the like as that was for all pleaſures and commodities, which he could well teſtify and witneſs. And therefore deſired his Highneſs to behold upon his right hand the great hills, the Yorkeſwouldes, and Blakemore hills; and likewiſe to behold thoſe great mountains and fells which were upon the left hand; the breadth of which valley is ſome thirty or ſixty miles wide in the moſt places, and in length ſome eighty and one hundred miles: wherein for cities and towns, caſtles and mannor-houſes, famous rivers and brooks, parks and woods, corn, graſs, and cattle, fairs and markets, fiſh and fowl, mines and quarries of coal and ſtone, and likewiſe mines of lead, iron, and other metals, he never ſaw the like in all his travels. And for the truth and verity thereof, as it may and doth plainly appear, ſome miles weſt of Tadcaſter there is within ſome ſeven or eight miles circuit ſeventy-ſeven mannor-houſes, whereof the worſt of them were Eſquires of an antient continuance. There be alſo within the ſame circuit twenty-five woods, thirty-two parks, ſixteen rivers, eight market towns, and in them and other villages there, there be as many fairs in the year as in any other place in England. There be alſo twenty-four coal-mines, and divers fornaces both for melting and drawing forth iron into bars: There be alſo much other metals, if they were ſought for; and for corn, graſs, and cattle, fiſh, and fowl, not inferior to the beſt place in all England. And there is one thing here more worthy to be ſpoken of than all the reſt; which is of the great abundance of free-ſtone and lime, that is there to be found within that circuit; as much lime and free-ſtone as would build as many churches, cities, caſtles, towns, and houſes, as are in all England, if need were. And for the pleaſures of hunting and hawking, fiſhing and fowling, it is as delicate a place as any there is in all England (78). C

TYRRELL [JAMES], Author of a hiſtory of England, and deſcended from an ancient and conſiderable family [A]; was the eldeſt ſon of Sir Timothy Tyrrell of Shotover, near Oxford, Knight, by Elizabeth his wife, ſole daughter and heir of the moſt learned Dr James Uſher, Archbiſhop of Armagh. He was born in Great Queen-Street, in the pariſh of St Giles's in the Fields, Middleſex, in the month of May, 1642, and educated chiefly in the Free-ſchool at Camberwell in Surrey. In the year 1657, he was admitted a Gentleman-Commoner of Queen's-College in Oxford, where he continued three years under the tuition of Mr Thomas Tully and Mr Timothy Halton. Thence he went to the Inner-Temple, to ſtudy the laws of the land (a). On the 28th of September, 1663, he was created Maſter of Arts at Oxford (b). And, about two years after, was called to the Barr. However, he did not practiſe in that profeſſion; but employed himſelf very diligently in ſtudying the Hiſtory and Conſtitution of this country, as his learned works afterwards ſufficiently evinced. He reſided chiefly upon his eſtate at Oakeley near Brill in [A] Deſcended from an ancient and conſiderable family.] The Tirel, or Tyrrel, family is of great antiquity in England;..... Tirel being one of thoſe eminent men who came over with William the Conqueror in 1066 (1). And Walter Tirell was the perſon ſaid to have ſhot William Rufus in the year 1100 (2). One of them was the common anceſtor of the numerous family of the Tyrrels, ſeated both in Ireland and England.——Hugh Tirell was one of thoſe brave Engliſh Noblemen, who, in the year 1172, made a conqueſt of Ireland (3). Some of them were Barons of Caſtle-Knoc in the county of Dublin, whoſe eſtate by females was transferred to other families about 1370 (4). And a branch of them is ſeated at Fertulogh, in the county of Weſt-Meath (5)—— In England; the manor of Thornton in Buckinghamſhire, after having paſſed through the families of Barton and Ingleton, became the poſſeſſion of the Tyrrels, deſcended from Jane heir-general of Robert Ingleton (6), the laſt of that name in the beginning of King Henry VIII. From whom are alſo deſcended both the other families of the Tyrrels in this county, of Caſtlethorp and Oakeley: and they all deſcended from one common anceſtor, Humphrey Tyrrel, Eſq; nephew of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, one of the coheirs of Sir Humphrey le Bruin, as well as the ſaid Humphrey Tyrrel. That family hath alſo a ſeat at Leckhamſtead, in the ſame county (7). And a branch of the ſame family is ſeated at Heron-gate in Eſſex; Sir Edward Tyrrel, Knt. being created a Baronet, October 31, 1627.——To return to Humphry Tyrrell: George his eldeſt ſon dyed in 1571, and He, by his ſecond wife, Margaret, daughter of Thomas Aſton of Aſton in Cheſhire, Eſq; had an elder ſon, Sir Timothy, Knt. Maſter of the Buckhounds to Prince Henry and King Charles I, who dyed in 1633, leaving iſſue by Eleanor his wife, daughter of Sir William Kingſmill, his eldeſt ſon, Sir Timothy, Knt. of Oakeley and Shotover, one of the privy Chamber to King Charles I, a Colonel, Governor of Caerdiffe, and General of the Ordinance under the Lord Gerard, who paid 750l. compoſition for his eſtate. By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Archbiſhop Uſher, he had James, who is the ſubject of this article, and three other ſons beſides ſeveral daughters (8).

Buckinghamſhire, and was made one of the Deputy-Lieutenants and Juſtices of the Peace for that county: in which offices he continued till King James the Second turned him and the reſt out of Commiſſion, for not aſſiſting in taking away the Penal Laws and Teſt (c). Upon the Revolution, he zealouſly eſpouſed King William's intereſt, and writ with great ſtrength in vindication of his Expedition into England, and his title to the Crown; as will be ſhewn preſently. When he began compiling his Hiſtory of England, he came and lived chiefly at Shotover, near Oxford, for the benefit of the Bodleian, and other Libraries in that Univerſity (d). The firſt thing he publiſhed, was a book written by his grandfather, Archbiſhop Uſher [B]; and he wrote alſo a Vindication of that learned Primate [C]. He did not run into thoſe extravagant notions about the Prerogative, and Paſſive-obedience and Non-reſiſtance, which were ſo much eſpouſed and recommended in his time; but was for a limited Monarchy; as appears by his anſwer to Sir Robert Filmer [D], and eſpecially by his fourteen Political Dialogues [E], of which an account is given

(d) From the information of a perſon who knew him.

[B] The firſt thing he publiſhed, was a book written by his grandfather, Archbiſhop Uſher.] A. Wood ſays, it was Mr Tyrrell who publiſhed it (9). But, upon inſpection, it appears that it was publiſhed by Dr Robert Sanderſon, Biſhop of Lincoln, and dedicated by our Author to King Charles II. The title of it is, 'The Power communicated by God to the Prince, and the Obedience required of the Subject. Briefly laid down and confirmed out of the Holy Scriptures, Teſtimony of the primitive Church, Dictates of right Reaſon, and Opinion of the Wiſeſt among the heathen Writers. By the moſt reverend Father in God, James late Lord Archbiſhop of Armagh, and Primate of all Ireland. Publiſhed out of the original Copy written with his own hand by the reverend Father in God, Robert Lord Biſhop of Lincoln, with his Lordſhip's Preface thereunto, dated London, Dec. 31, 1660. With an Epiſtle Dedicatory to the King by James Tyrrill.' Lond. 1661. 4to. Biſhop Sanderſon, in the Preface, acquaints us, That this Treatiſe was written by the reverend and learned Author, at the ſpecial command of King Charles I. about the time when thoſe unhappy Diſtempers did firſt begin to appear openly in our land. As ſoon as the Treatiſe was finiſhed, the Author cauſed a Copy thereof to be fairly tranſcribed, and, with a Dedicatory Epiſtle prefixed thereunto, to be preſented to his Majeſty; who having read the Book, ſignified his Will and Pleaſure that it ſhould be Printed. Which notwithſtanding, whether by the Negligence or Unfaithfulneſs of the Party to whoſe Care and Truſt it was committed, was not done, &c.

(9) Athen. col. 973.

Mr Tyrrell concludes his Dedication in theſe words... 'I ſhall now make this my moſt humble Suit to your Majeſty, that as the reverend Author in his life-time publickly profeſſed his Loyalty to his Sovereign, and conſtantly prayed for your Majeſty's happy and glorious Return to theſe your Kingdoms, and in all things ſhewed himſelf your loyal Subject, ſo you would be pleaſed to own him as ſuch, by affording your gracious Countenance to this his poſthumous Work, which will eternize the Memory of the deceaſed Author, and thereby confer the greateſt temporal Bleſſing on,

'Your Majeſty's moſt loyal

'And obedient Subject,

'James Tyrrill.'

[C] And he wrote alſo a Vindication of that learned Primate.] It contains three and thirty pages in folio, and is printed at the end of The Life of Dr James Uſher, Lord Primate of Armagh, publiſhed by Richard Parr, D. D. Lond. 1686. with this title, 'An Appendix to the Life of the Lord Primate Uſher, containing a Vindication of his Opinions and Actions in reference to the Doctrine and Diſcipline of the Church of England, and his conformity thereunto, from the aſperſions of Peter Heylin, D. D. in his Pamphlet called Reſpondet Petrus.'——This Reſpondet Petrus, was the Anſwer of Peter Heylin, D. D. to ſo much of Dr Bernard's book, entitled The Judgment of the late Primate of Ireland, &c. as he is made a party by the ſaid Lord Primate in the point of the Sabbath. Lond. 1658. 4to.

[D] As appears by his anſwer to Sir Robert Filmer.] This anſwer is entitled, 'Patriarcha non Monarcha: or the Patriarch unmonarched; being Obſervations on a late Treatiſe and divers other Miſcellanies, publiſhed under the name of Sir Robert Filmer, Baronet, in which the Falſeneſs of thoſe Opinions that would make Monarchy jure divino are laid open, and the true Principles of Government and Property (eſpecially in our Kingdom) aſſerted.' Lond. 1681. 8vo. ——This book was reflected upon by Mr Edmund Bohun, in the Preface to the Second Edition of Sir Robert's Patriarcha; 1685. 'In which (as it is ſaid) Sir Robert Filmer's Patriarcha is vindicated from the cavils and miſconſtructions of the Author of a piece ſtiled Patriarcha non Monarcha, &c.'

[E] And eſpecially by his fourteen Political Dialogues.] The nine firſt of theſe Dialogues were publiſhed in 1692; the tenth in 1693; the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth, in 1694; and the fourteenth in 1695. quarto. Afterwards they were collected into one volume folio, with this general title, 'Bibliotheca Politica: or an Enquiry into the antient Conſtitution of the Engliſh Government, with reſpect to the juſt Extent of the Regal Power, and the Rights and Liberties of the Subject. Wherein all the chief Arguments, both for and againſt the Late Revolution, are impartially repreſented and conſidered. In fourteen Dialogues. Collected out of the beſt Authors, antient and modern.' Lond. 1718.' 1727. That the Reader may judge of the nature of this work, we ſhall give him this ſhort ſummary of it. He enquires, in Dialogue the firſt, whether Monarchy be Jure Divino? In the ſecond, whether there can be made out from the Natural, or Revealed Law of God, any Succeſſion to Crowns by Divine Right? In the third, whether Reſiſtance of the Supreme Power, by a whole Nation, or People, in caſes of the laſt extremity, can be juſtified by the Law of Nature, or Rules of the Goſpel? In the fourth, whether abſolute Non-reſiſtance of the Supreme Powers be enjoined by the Doctrine of the Goſpel, and was the antient practice of the Primitive Church, and the conſtant Doctrine of our Reformed Church of England? In the fifth, whether the King be the ſole Supreme Legiſlative Power of the Kingdom: And whether our Great Councils, or Parliaments, be a fundamental part of the Government, or elſe proceeded from the Favour and Conceſſions of former Kings? In the ſixth, and ſeventh, whether the Commons of England, repreſented by Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes in Parliament, were one of the Three Eſtates in Parliament, before the forty-ninth of Henry III, or eighteenth of Edward I? The eighth, is a Continuation of the ſame Diſcourſe, concerning the Antiquity of the Commons in Parliament; wherein the beſt Authorities for it are propoſed and examined: with an entrance upon the queſtion of Non-reſiſtance. In Dialogue the ninth, he enquires, whether by the antient Laws and Conſtitutions of this Kingdom, as well as by the Statutes of the thirteenth and fourteenth of King Charles II, all Reſiſtance of the King, or of thoſe commiſſioned by him, are expreſsly forbid upon any pretence whatſoever: And alſo, whether all thoſe who aſſiſted his Majeſty, King William, either before, or after his coming over, are guilty of the breach of this Law? In the tenth, 1. whether a King of England can ever fall from, or forfeit his Royal Dignity for any breach of an original contract, or wilful violation of the fundamental laws of the Kingdom? 2. Whether King William, the Norman, did by his Conqueſt acquire ſuch an abſolute unconditional Right to the Crown of this Realm for himſelf and his heirs, as could never be lawfully reſiſted or forfeited for any male-adminiſtration or tyranny whatever? In the eleventh, 1. In what ſenſe all Civil Power is derived from God, and in what ſenſe it may be alſo from the people. 2. Whether his Majeſty King William, when Prince of Orange, had a juſt cauſe of war againſt King James II? 3. Whether the proceedings of his Majeſty, before he was King, as alſo of the late Convention, in reſpect of the ſaid King James, is juſtifiable by the Law of Nations, and the conſtitution of our Government? In the twelfth, 1. Whether the vote of the late Convention, wherein they declared the Throne to be vacant, can be juſtified from given below. Subjects of a religious nature did likewise sometimes employ his thoughts; for he drew up a clear and elegant Abridgment, in English, of Bishop Cumberland's Philosophical Disquisition, or Enquiry, into the Laws of Nature [F], which was published in 1692. But his capital work was, 'The General History of England, both Ecclesiastical and Civil; from the earliest Accounts of Time;' which he intended to bring down to the reign of King William III [G]; but which was compleated, and published, only as far as the end of King Richard the Second [H]. In that work, he makes it his business to oppose and confute Dr Brady's History of England (e); especially these two favourite notions of the Doctor's, 'that all the Liberties and Privileges the People can 'pretend to, were the Grants and Concessions of the Kings of this Nation, and were de-'rived from the Crown (f) [I]. And, that the Commons of England represented by 'Knights, the antient constitution and customs of this Kingdom? 2. Whether the said Convention, declaring King William and Queen Mary to be lawful and rightful King and Queen of England, may be justified by the said Constitution? 3. Whether the act passed in the said Convention, after it became a Parliament, whereby Roman-Catholick Princes are debarred from succeeding to the Crown, was according to Law? In the thirteenth, 1. Whether an oath of Allegiance may be taken to a King or Queen de facto, or for the time being? 2. What is the obligation of such an oath; whether to an actual defence of their Title against all persons whatsoever, or else to a bare submission to their power? 3. Whether the Bishops, who refused to take the oath of Allegiance to their Majesties, could be lawfully deprived of their Bishopricks? In the fourteenth Dialogue he shews, that the Arraigning and Murther of King Charles I, can by no means be justified by the proceedings of the Convention-Parliament against King James II, upon his Abdication; the grounds and manner thereof being wholly different. Proved by an exact relation of the beginning, progress, and issue of the late Civil War.——The chief books our Author cites, and animadverts upon; are, Dr Brady's, and Sir Robert Filmer's several pieces, Dr Hickes's Jovian, P. Heylin's Stumbling-block of Rebellion, Dr Johnston's Excellency of Monarchical Government, L'Estrange's Observators, Bishop Sanderson's Preface to Archbishop Usher's Power of the Prince, Digges's Unlawfulness of Subjects taking up arms, &c. To which he opposes the Authorities of Grotius, Puffendorf, William Petyt, Esq; ... Cooke's Argumentum Anti-Normannicum, Rushworth, &c. And in this work he shews a very extensive reading, and thorough knowledge of our Constitution.

[F] For he drew up a clear and elegant Abridgment, in English, of Bishop Cumberland's Philosophical Disquisition, or Enquiry, into the Laws of Nature.] The Bishop's book was written in Latin, with this title, De Legibus Naturæ Disquisitio Philosophica: in qua earum Forma, summa Capita, Ordo, Promulgatio, & Obligatio è rerum natura investigantur; quinetiam Elementa Philosophiæ Hobbeianæ, tum moralis, tum civilis, confiderantur & refutantur. Lond. 1672. 4to (10). Our Author's Abridgment of it was intitled, 'A brief Disquisition of the Law of Nature, 'according to the Principles and Method laid down in 'the reverend Dr Cumberland's (now Lord Bishop of 'Peterborough's) Latin Treatise on that Subject. As 'also his Confutations of Mr Hobbs's Principles, put 'into another method. With the right reverend Author's 'approbation.' Lond. 1692. 8vo. A Second edition corrected, and somewhat enlarged, came out in 1701. The right reverend Author's approbation was contained in a Letter to the Bookseller, wherein he thus speaks of Mr Tyrrell's performance .... 'I found that he had 'not only well translated and epitomized in some 'places what I had written in Latin, but had fully 'digested the chief things of my Design in a well-chosen 'Method of his own, with great perspicuity, and had 'added some Illustrations of his own, or from other 'learned Authors, with a Philosophical Liberty, which 'I must needs allow. For this reason I judged that the 'then unknown Author had given too low a title to his 'Book, and that I was to esteem him a good Hyperaspistes, or able Second, in this combat for Truth and 'Justice, rather than a Translator or Epitomizer of 'what I had written..... And I hope that since this 'Learned Gentleman hath conquered the Difficulties 'of the Search into the Rise of the Laws of Nature, 'now many of our younger Gentry will be encouraged 'to follow him in the way which this his Treatise makes 'plain before them (11). For from thence they may 'receive assistance, not only to discern the Reasonable-'ness of all Vertue and Morality, which is their duty 'and ornament as they are Men, but also they may 'here see the true foundations of civil Government and 'Property, which they are most obliged to understand, 'because, as Gentlemen, they are born to the greatest 'intereſt in them both.'——

[G] The General History of England, both Ecclesiastical and Civil, &c.] The rest of the title will inform us with what it further contains: .. being as follows ... 'Taken from the most Ancient Records, Manuscripts, 'and Printed Historians. With Memorials of the most 'eminent Persons in Church and State. As also the 'Foundations of the most noted Monasteries, and both 'Universities.' What he published of it, is comprised in Five Volumes folio: sometimes bound in Three. And printed at London 1700. 1704.

[H] But which was compleated, and published, only as far as the end of King Richard II.] It is said that Mr Tyrrell had brought that History down lower; but was prevented by death, or otherwise, from making it public (12).

[I] That all the Liberties and Privileges the People can pretend to, were the Grants and Concessions of the Kings of this Nation.] The patrons of that Opinion grounded it upon the Conquest of William I, or the Bastard; alledging, that by his subduing of Harold and the whole English Nation at the battel of Hastings, he thereby put an end to the old Saxon Government and Laws; so that no man at this day can claim any right to their Liberties, or any kind of property, but what must be owned as wholly derived from the Laws, Concessions, and Charters that have been from time to time granted by Him and the Succeeding Kings of this realm (13). What the Liberties and Privileges of this Nation were under the Saxons, our Author had shewn, in the Introduction to the first Volume of his History (14); wherein he observes, among other things, That their Government was rather Aristocratical, than Monarchical; and that their Kings were at first no better than Generals in war, and in time of peace had little or no power: Moreover, that their succession to the Crown was not lineal, or hereditary, but mostly elective, &c. (15).——As to the supposition, of all the Liberties and Privileges of the people being annihilated by the Conquest; he cannot rest satisfied with it. For they who make it, 'being greater friends to the arbitrary 'Power of Kings, than to the Laws and Liberties of 'their country, lay down this hypothesis, thereby to 'confer on the Prince an absolute power to break all 'our Laws, and seize upon our Liberties and Properties 'at his pleasure, and thereby reduce this kingdom to 'the same miserable state of Slavery with some of our 'neighbouring Nations; upon the aforesaid pretence, 'That all the Liberties and Privileges we now enjoy, 'being at first derived from the Concessions of former 'Kings (and those in great part wrested from them by 'force) their Successors may, whenever they shall think 'it conducing to the greater safety of the kingdom, '(of which they are to be the sole judges) reassume 'them, and thereby make themselves absolute masters 'of the Lives, Liberties, and Fortunes of their Subjects, 'as they suppose their Conqueror and his son William 'Rufus to have been during their times. Nor may 'any body question or resist such Princes if they shall 'think fit so to do, since they have by this supposed 'Conquest of their predecessors, an absolute and in-'defeasible right to the Crown of England, paramount 'to all Laws, Compacts, and Coronation-oaths, the 'interpretation of which must lie wholly in their breasts, 'as being responsible to none but God, if they either 'wrest, or wilfully break and transgress them (16).' These arbitrary Maxims our Author opposes all along; shewing by many instances, that King William I. did not claim and exercise an absolute Dominion over the Lives and Liberties of all his Subjects.——The same point is also professedly handled by Mr Cooke, in his 'Argumentum Anti Normannicum: or an Argument 'proving,

[K] That the Commons of England, repreſented by Knights, Citizens and Burgeſſes of Parliament, were not introduced, nor were one of the Three Eſtates of Parliament, before the 49th of Henry III.] There being, in none of our Offices, any precepts to the Sheriffs, to cauſe Two Knights out of each Shire, and Citizens and Burgeſſes out of the reſpective Cities and Burghs, to be choſen and returned for Parliament, before the 49th of Henry III. A. D. 1265. Dr Brady (18), and others, inferred from thence, That before that time, the body of the Commons of England, or Freemen collectively taken, had not any ſhare or votes in making of Laws for the Government of the kingdom, nor had any communication in Affairs of State, unleſs they were repreſented by the Tenants in capite.—Now the ſaid year 1265 happening during the Barons wars, and while the King was their priſoner; it was intended thereby to inſinuate, That the Houſe of Commons was the Offspring of Rebellion.——Before that period, according to the opinion of the beſt Antiquaries (19), the Parliaments conſiſted of the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, and Barons. Of theſe Barons there were two ſorts, the greater Barons, or the King's chief tenants, who held of him in capite by Barony: And the leſſer Barons, who held of the King by military ſervice, in capite. The former had ſummons to parliament by ſeveral writs: and the latter (that is, all thoſe who were poſſeſſed of thirteen Knights-fees and a quarter) had a general ſummons from the Sheriff in each county. This is quite plain from the following clauſes in King John's Magna Charta . . . 'Et ad habendum Commune Conſilium 'regni de Auxilio aſſidendo, aliter quam in tribus caſi- 'bus predictis, vel de Scutagio aſſidendo, ſummoneri 'faciemus Archiepiſcopos, Epiſcopos, Abbates, Comi- 'tes, & majores Barones ſigillatim per literas noſtras: '& preterea faciemus ſummoneri in generali, per vice- 'comites & ballivos noſtros, omnes illos qui de nobis 'tenent in capite, ad certum diem, ſcilicet ad termi- 'num quadraginta dierum ad minus, & ad certum locum; 'et, in omnibus literis illius ſummonitionis, cauſam 'ſummonitionis exprimemus.' i. e. 'And in order to have [or hold] a Common Council of the kingdom for aſſeſſing an Aid, (otherwiſe than in the three caſes aforeſaid) (20) or for aſſeſſing a Scutage, we ſhall cauſe to be ſummoned the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, and greater Barons ſeverally by our letters; and, moreover, we ſhall cauſe to be ſummoned in general, by our Sheriffs and Bailiffs, all thoſe who hold of us in capite, to a certain day, namely at the end, or expiration, of forty days at the leaſt (21), and to a certain place; and, in all the letters of ſuch ſummons, we ſhall expreſs the cauſe of the ſummons.'——Here being no mention of Knights of Shires, or other Repreſentatives of the Commons, for ſo important an affair as the granting of Money, we may very juſtly conclude, that there were then none. ——In this ſtate things continued till the 49th of Henry III; when, inſtead of keeping the old form, Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leiceſter, and his party, thought fit to ſummon, not all, but thoſe of the greater Barons who ſided with them. And, inſtead of the leſſer Barons, who came with large retinues, they ſent their writs to the Sheriff in each county, to cauſe two Knights in every Shire to be choſen, and one, two, or four Burgeſſes for each Burgh, to repreſent the body of the people, reſiding in thoſe Counties and Burghs: leſt they ſhould be in no ſmall danger from ſuch unlimited and tumultuous aſſemblies. If that form had been obſerved before, it is amazing there ſhould not be the leaſt remains of it in our Records or public Offices. Unleſs we ſuppoſe, with the learned Biſhop Squire (22), that there were not any formal Summons even to the Lords before the 49th of Henry III; becauſe they were to come to the Parliament ſuo jure, in their own right, by preſcription, and conſequently there was no occaſion for any Summons.

(22) Enquiry into the foundation of the Engliſh Conſtitution; or an Hiſtorical Eſſay upon the Anglo-Saxon Government. Lond. 1745. 8vo. p. 258. note.

But to trace this matter higher up, even to its origin: It is univerſally allowed, that our Conſtitution is founded upon the Saxon Government once eſtabliſhed in this iſland. And it is certain, that Power and Authority naturally follow Property. Government and Legiſlation therefore muſt be veſted of courſe in the richeſt perſons in the ſtate, and thoſe that are put in places of truſt and dignity. Among the ancient Germans indeed, of whom the Saxons were a branch, all had a right to be preſent at the public Aſſemblies (23); that is, all the Land-holders, but not thoſe whoſe chief buſineſs it was to cultivate the land, and to be employed in mechanic arts; for theſe were ſuppoſed to be preſent, and to give their conſent to the Laws, by their Lords, or thoſe whoſe lands they occupied (24). And, after the Saxons were ſettled here, every Land-holder of the Kingdom, whether of the Clergy or Laity, who was of an approved age, and had not forfeited this privilege by ſome previous miſdemeanor, had originally a right to be preſent there in perſon, whenever he pleaſed to make uſe of that right (25). But, in proceſs of time, the leſſer Freeholders finding it an intolerable burthen to attend the Witena-gemot twice a year, even from the remoteſt parts of the Kingdom; they left the burthen of that attendance to the Richer, who had better means, and more leiſure: or they ſent Deputies out of the ſeveral Tithings to repreſent them; as trading Communities afterwards did (26). And there is all the reaſon to believe, that this method continued with very little alteration, after the Conqueſt, and even in King John's time. For, the confirmation of Magna Charta, in a great Council, or Parliament, holden in Runnemede, A. D. 1215, is not only a good evidence of what was uſually done (27): but is alſo an emblem of the Champs de Mars, or May, among the old Franks, which were in effect the ſame Aſſemblies as were afterwards called Parliaments; they being held in a large open field, capacious of the greateſt company, and moſt commonly by the ſide of a river, for the conveniency of water (28).

Now if we examine further, wherein the difference between Mr Tyrrell and Dr Brady conſiſts, it will appear from the following particulars. Upon examining the Saxon Laws (29), and the ancient Gemots, Councils, and Synods (30); it is manifeſt, that the Legiſlative Power was lodged in the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots; and in other perſons that are denoted by the following names: Witum, Witan, Witena, or Witenan, Sapientes, Wiſemen; Ealdormen, Aldorat, Seniores, Senatores, Aldermen, Elders, or Senators; Eadigan, Optimates, Magnates, Primates, Proceres, Principes, the great or chief men; Æthelum, the Nobles; Thegen, or Thains; Conſiliarii, Counſellors; Satrapæ Præfecti, Governors; Duces, Commanders; Comites, Governors of Counties; Tam Clerus quam Populus, Clergy and People; Lege eruditi, learned in the Law.—Who are meant by all theſe names? is the queſtion. Dr Brady contends (31), that Witen, or Sapientes, moſtly ſignifies Noblemen, or great Lawyers: That Optimates, Magnates, &c. denote only Chief, Great, or Noble Men (32): That Clerus and Populus ſignify only Clergy and Laity (33): That the Saxon Witena-gemotes conſiſted only of Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Maſſe-Thegnes, or dignified and great Clergymen, Aldermen, or Comites, King's Gereves, or Præpoſiti, King's Thegns, Miniſters, or Officers, his Counſellors, Judges, or Magiſtrates (34). —In oppoſition to this, Mr Tyrrell affirms, that the general or great Council of Eſtates, conſiſted of the Clergy, Nobility, and Deputies of Cities and great Towns (35): That Dr Brady brings no good authority for the word Sapientes ſignifying only Noblemen, or great Lawyers (36): That the word Nobilis includes not only Noblemen of title, ſuch as Dukes, Marquiſes, &c. but alſo all Gentlemen of families, who are well born, and do not exerciſe mechanick trades (37): [But it is to be remembered, that there was no Duke in England till King John's reign, and no Marquis till Richard the Second's. And that it was not the title as now, but the eſtates, or high poſts and offices, that were qualifications for ſitting in Parliament.] To proceed; Mr Tyrrell goes on with obſerving, that Proceres does not ſignify only men noble by birth, but the chieſeſt of ſubjects or citizens: And Primates, no more than principal or chief men, however born: That Optimates ſignifies no more than the better ſort of men and great Lords, and is not confined to the King's Thanes, or Tenants in capite only: And Principes doth not always ſignify Princes, or men noble by birth, but any chief or principal man, remarkable by place, office, or dignity (38).

Our Author, Mr Tyrrell, is chiefly valuable for his copious tranſlation of all our old Engliſh Hiſtorians, and his methodical arrangement of them under the reſpective years: By which means, the Reader ſees their different accounts at one view. But, as it is not ſo agreeably digeſted, nor ſo well interwoven, as ſome more modern, though leſs faithful, Hiſtories; therefore it is not ſo much ſought after by the indolent and thoughtleſs, that is, the generality of Readers: who look into books more for amuſement than real improvement. However, it hath an intrinſic value, and deſerves a place in the Libraries of all lovers of the Hiſtory and Antiquities of Great Britain. Though it muſt be owned, that it is not free from faults and miſtakes [L]. This learned and induſtrious Author died in 1718, aged ſeventy-five, and upwards, and was buried in Oakley church (b). One common Miſtake there is running among all thoſe who have writ upon this ſubject; which is, That they judge of the ancient times by the preſent, and think that the Number of Freeholders then, bore any proportion to what they do now. Whereas it appears from Domeſday-book, that the Holders of all the Lands, in 1087, were under 1200. So that the majority of them might, without any great inconvenience, be ſummoned to, and appear at, the great Councils of the Nation; ſuppoſing that they were all qualified by having Thirteen Knights-fees and a quarter, which there is great reaſon to queſtion: Or rather they may reaſonably be ſuppoſed not to have been above five, or ſix hundred.

A pretty exact account of the ſeveral Times, and Places, wherein our Kings, after the Conqueſt, uſed to keep their Courts, either de more, according to cuſtom, or otherwiſe, may be ſeen in the Folio Edition of Rapin's Hiſtory, at the end of each King's reign. At thoſe times, the great Councils of the Nation were commonly holden, as hath been ſhewn by the learned Mr T. Madox (39). ——It is to be obſerved, That the firſt time the word Parliamentum occurs in our ancient Hiſtorians, Bromton, and the reſt (40), is under the year 1164. And according to W. Prynne, in his Animadverſions, the firſt Record wherein Parliamentum is uſed for Parliament, is clauſe 28 Hen. III. memb. 12. dorſo. See Spelman's Gloſſary, under Parliamentum.

[L] Though it muſt be owned, that it is not free from faults and miſtakes.] He hath committed ſeveral Miſtakes in his Tranſlations from the ancient Hiſtorians, as I have obſerved in many inſtances; and he hath alſo ſuffered himſelf to be overbyaſſed by the notion, That the Norman Conqueſt had brought little or no Alteration in the Engliſh Conſtitution: which it certainly did in many inſtances; eſpecially in that very material point of Tenures, as hath been ſhewn by the beſt judge in thoſe affairs, the very learned Sir Henry Spelman, in his treatiſe of the Origin of Feuds and Tenure by Knights Service.

[M] By whom he had the late Lieutenant-General James Tyrrell, of Shotover, Eſq;] That gentleman was Colonel of a regiment of foot; and his Commiſſion, as Colonel, bore date April 21, 1709, as Major-general, December 18, 1735, and as Lieutenant-general, July, 1739. He was one of the Grooms of the bed-chamber to his late Majeſty, when Prince of Wales, and repreſented the Corporation of Boroughbridge, in Yorkſhire, in the third parliament of King George I, and the firſt and ſecond of King George II. He was alſo Governor of Graveſend and Tilbury-fort; appointed, in May 1742, Governor of Berwick and Holy-iſland; and dyed the 30th of Auguſt following, aged ſixty-eight (41). ANE [Sir HENRY], the Younger, a man of a very ambiguous character in the laſt century; eldeſt ſon of Sir Henry Vane of Hadlow in Kent, Knight [A], was born about the year 1612. His education was at Weſtminſter-School, with Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, Thomas Scot, and others of that ſtamp (a); at which time, the livelineſs of his temper rendered him acceptable company to thoſe called good fellows; and yet he abſtained from that lewdneſs, which intemperance ſometimes leads into. At the age of fourteen, or fifteen, he became altered in his diſpoſition (b); though he is not pleaſed to tell us by what means. About the ſixteenth year of his age, he was admitted a Gentleman-Commoner of Magdalen-hall in Oxford; but when he ſhould have been matriculated as a Member of the Univerſity, and taken the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, he quitted his gown, put on a cloak, and ſtudied notwithſtanding for ſome time in that Hall (c); where, we are told, that though he was under the care of a very worthy Tutor, he lived not with great exactneſs. After that, he ſpent ſome little time in France, and more in Geneva; from whence he imported a full prejudice and bitterneſs, both againſt the Government, and the Liturgy, of the Church of England. His father, then Controller of the Houſ-

. [A] Son of Sir Henry Vane of Hadlow in Kent.] The family is ſaid to have been originally of the dioceſe of Durham (1). They derive themſelves from Howel ap Vane of Monmouthſhire; whoſe ſon, Griffith ap Howel Vane, had to wife Lettice, daughter of Bledwin ap Kenwyn, Lord of Powis.——The 6th in deſcent from him, was Henry Vane, knighted for his valiant behaviour at the battle of Poictiers, in 30 Edw. III, whoſe deſcendant, in the fifth generation, named——John, altered his name from Vane to Fane; and by his wife Iſabel, daughter of John Darell, of the county of Kent, Eſq; had four ſons, and three daughters: Henry——Richard, anceſtor to the preſent Earl of Weſtmorland; Thomas; and——John, anceſtor to the Lords Bernard, and the now Earl of Darlington (2). This John had the manor of Hadlowe, and other eſtates in Kent, and elſewhere, of the gift of his elder brother Henry, who dyed without iſſue. By Joan his wife, daughter and co-heir of Edward Hault, Eſq; he had ——Henry; and Richard; and Thomas. Henry was unwarily drawn into Sir Thomas Wyat's inſurrection, but pardoned by Queen Mary, on account of his youth. He was twice repreſentative in parliament, in 1559, and 1563, in the time of Queen Elizabeth. He dyed in 1582, leaving, by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of Godſalve, Eſq; his only ſon and heir——Henry, who was twice married: firſt, to Mary, daughter and heireſs of Thomas, Fane of Buſton, who brought him no child; ſecondly, in 1585, to Margaret, daughter of Roger Twiſden, of Eaſt Peckham in Kent, Eſq; He dyed at Roan, October 14, 1596, leaving iſſue by his ſecond wife——HENRY, born February 18, 1589, and Ralph. Henry was father of Sir Henry, who is the ſubject of this article. He reſumed the ancient name of his anceſtors, writing himſelf Henry Vane, and his poſterity have continued to do ſo ever ſince. In the 22d year of his age, March 28, 1611, he received the honor of knighthood from King James I; after which he improved himſelf by travel, and in learning foreign languages. He was elected one of the burgeſſes for the city of Carliſle, in the parliaments which began in 1614, in 1620, in 1625; and ſerved in every parliament after, to the time of his deceaſe, being elected for Thetford in Norfolk, Wilton in Wiltſhire, and for the county of Kent (3). In the firſt parliaments, his abilities, and his affection to the royal family, were ſo conſpicuous, that King James I. made him Cofferer to his ſon Prince Charles; who continued him in the ſame office after his acceſſion to the throne, and made him one of his Privy-Council. In Sept. 1631, he was appointed Embaſſador extraordinary, to renew the treaty of friendſhip and confederacy with Chriſtian IV. king of Denmark; and alſo to treat and conclude on a firm peace and confederacy with Guſtavus Adolphus, King of Sweden. He came back to England in Nov. 1632 (4). In May 1633, he nobly entertained King Charles I. at Raby-caſtle, on his way to Scotland to be crowned: as he did again, April 30, 1639, in his Majeſty's expedition to Scotland, when Sir Henry commanded a regiment of 1099 men (5). He was made Treaſurer of the Houſhold, in September 1639, upon the death of Sir Thomas Edmondes; and, on the 5th of February following, conſtituted Principal Secretary of State for life, in the room of Sir John Coke: And was generally in the moſt important commiſſions. But on his appearing in the proſecution of the Earl of Strafford, the King was ſo offended with him, that he removed him from his place of Treaſurer of the Houſhold, and alſo from being Secretary of State. It does not appear that he was concerned in any meaſures againſt the King, but continued in London without acting in the rebellion. And, on the 1ſt of December, 1645, the Parliament debating on propoſitions of peace with the King, voted, that it be recommended to his Majeſty, to create Sir Henry Vane, ſenior, a Baron of this kingdom. He was not in any commiſſion or employment under the Parliament, or Commonwealth; but lived retired till the latter end of the year 1654, when he departed this life, at his Seat at Raby-caſtle, in the ſixty-ninth year of his age. By his wife, Frances, daughter of Thomas Darcy, of Tolleſhunt in the county of Eſſex, Eſq; he had four ſons, and five daughters. Thomas, and John, who dyed infants; Sir Henry; Sir George, knighted November 22, 1640, and ſeated at Long Melton in the county palatine of Durham. The five daughters were, 1. Margaret, married to Sir Thomas Pelham, Bart. anceſtor to the preſent Duke of Newcaſtle; 2. Frances, wedded to Sir Robert Honeywood, of Pet in Kent, Knt. 3. Anne, wife of Sir Thomas Liddal, of Ravenſworth in the biſhoprick of Durham, Bart. 4. Elizabeth, wife of Sir Francis Vincent, of Stoke-Dabernon in Surrey, Bart. and 5. Catharine (6).

hold, and a Privy-Counſellor, was extremely angry at this (d): And, it being ſuggeſted to King Charles I, that the heir of a conſiderable family about his Majeſty, was grown into diſlike of the diſcipline and ceremonies of the Church, and that his Majeſty might do well to take ſome courſe about him; upon that, Biſhop Laud took him to taſk, and ſeemed to handle him gently in the conference, but concluded harſhly enough againſt him in the cloſe (e), though we are not told in what manner. Thus made uneaſy at home, his giddineſs led him, in 1634, with ſome Non-conformiſts, to the infant colony of New England, then a receptacle of all ill humours, and a medley of every thing called Religion (f). His father was againſt his taking that voyage, but the King being informed of the ſon's inclination, obliged him to conſent to it for three years; his deſign, as he pretended, was, to begin a ſettlement upon the banks of the river Connecticut (g). No ſooner was he landed, but his parts made him quickly taken notice of, and very probably his quality, being the eldeſt ſon of a Privy-Counſellor; inſomuch, that when the next election of Magiſtrates for the colony of Maſſachuſets came, he was choſen their Governor (h). But being a warm, hot-headed, unexperienced young man (i), and an enthuſiaſtic rigid Puritan (k), his working and unquiet fancy raiſed and infuſed amongſt them a thouſand ſcruples of conſcience, which they had not brought over with them, nor heard of before (l). He openly eſpouſed the Antinomian Doctrines [B], and gave ſuch encouragement to the Preachers and Spreaders of them, that it raiſed their vanity, and gave them ſuch an intereſt among the people, as the very next year had like to have proved fatal both to the Church and Commonwealth. But the ſober part obſerving his conduct, concerted ſuch meaſures among themſelves, as put an end to his Government the next election. Some time after, about 1639, he returned privately to England (m). He ſeemed then to be much reformed from his extravagancies, and, with his father's approbation and direction, married a Lady of a good family (n). Alſo through his father's credit with Algernoon Percy, Earl of Northumberland, then High-Admiral of England, he was joined with Sir William Ruſſel in the office of Treaſurer of the Navy, a place of great truſt and profit (o), which he equally ſhared with the other, and ſeemed a man well ſatisfied and compoſed to the Government (p). Being a perſon of great natural parts, of a quick conception, and very ready, ſharp, and weighty expreſſion [C]; and withal of very profound diſſimulation (q), which gave him a great advantage over the reſt of mankind; he came to be much conſidered. So that the town of Kingſton upon Hull choſe him one of their Repreſentatives, in the Parliament which met at Weſtminſter April 13, 1640, and again in the Long Parliament which began the 3d of November in the ſame year (r). In June 1640, he received the honour of Knighthood from King Charles I. But thinking both his father, and himſelf, ill uſed by the Court; his father, in that Sir Thomas Wentworth had with great earneſtneſs oppoſed his being made Secretary of State, and prevailed for above a month's delay; and himſelf, for that the ſaid Sir Thomas would needs be created (s) Baron of Raby, in the Dioceſe of Durham, a houſe and eſtate belonging to the Vane family, and an honour Sir Henry made account ſhould belong to himſelf [D]; from thenceforth he oppoſed, with great bitterneſs, and the utmoſt virulence, King Charles, and all his meaſures (t) [E]. [B] He openly eſpouſed the Antinomian doctrines, &c.] The author of his Life relates (7), that 'his honourable Birth, long hair, and other circumſtances of his 'perſon, rendered his fellow-travellers jealous of him, 'as a ſpye to betray their liberty, rather than any way 'like to advantage their deſign. But He, that they 'thought at firſt ſight to have too little of Chriſt for 'their company, did ſoon after appear to have too 'much for them. For he had not been long in New 'England, but he ripened into more knowledge and 'experience of Chriſt, than the Churches there could 'bear the teſtimony of. Even New England could not 'bear all his words, though there were no King's court 'or King's chapel.'——The late Author of the 'Account of the European ſettlements in America (8),' gives this character of him, and of his behaviour there: 'The famous Sir Henry Vane the younger, an enthuſiaſtic, giddy, turbulent man, of no very good diſpoſition, came hither [to New England] with ſome 'of the Adventurers; and rather than remain idle, 'plaid at ſmall games in New England, where the 'people had choſen him governor. It is not hard to 'conceive, how ſuch a man, at the head of ſuch a people, and engaged in ſuch controverſy [about Grace and 'Works] could throw every thing into confuſion.'—— Mr Vane's election, ſays another author (9), will remain a blemiſh to their judgment who did elect him, 'while New England remains a nation; for coming 'from England a young unexperienced gentleman, by 'the induſtry of ſome who thought to make a tool of 'him, he was elected Governor, and before he was 'ſcarce warm in his ſeat fell in with the Sectaries, 'and ſacrificed the peace of the State to them, leaving 'us a caveat, that all good men are not fit for Government.' R. Baxter ſays, he was fain to ſteal away by night, and take ſhipping for England, before his year of Government was at an end (10).

[C] Being a perſon of great natural parts, &c.] Mr Ludlow gives much the ſame character of him, in theſe words: 'In the beginning of the great Parliament, 'he was elected to ſerve his country among them, 'without the leaſt application made on his part to that 'end: And in this ſtation he ſoon made appear how 'capable he was of managing great affairs, poſſeſſing, 'in the higheſt perfection, a quick and ready apprehenſion, a ſtrong and tenacious memory, a profound 'and penetrating judgment, a juſt and noble eloquence, 'with an eaſy and graceful manner of ſpeaking. To 'theſe were added a ſingular zeal and affection for the 'good of the commonwealth, and a reſolution and 'courage, not to be ſhaken or diverted from the public ſervice (11).'.... The Lord Clarendon ſays, 'He was of a temper not to be moved, and of rare 'diſſimulation, and could comply when it was not 'ſeaſonable to contradict, without loſing ground by 'the condeſcenſion; and if he was not ſuperior to Mr 'Hambden, he was inferior to no other man, in all 'myſterious artifices (12).'

[D] An honor Sir Henry made account ſtould belong to himſelf.] The Lord Clarendon obſerves (13), that 'it 'was unluckily caſt upon the Earl [of Strafford] purely 'out of contempt of Vane.'——And he ſays elſewhere (14), it 'was an act of the moſt unneceſſary 'provocation (though he [the Earl of Strafford] contemned the Man with marvellous Scorn) that I have 'known, and I believe was the chief occaſion of the 'loſs of his head.'

of Strafford's tryal, he communicated a very material paper, privately taken by him out of his father's ſtudy, of which an account is given in the note [F]. The 26th of February, 1640-1, he carried up to the Houſe of Lords the articles of impeachment againſt Archbiſhop Laud (u). In June, 1643, he was nominated one of the Aſſembly of Divines (w). The following month he was appointed one of the Parliament's Commiſſioners, ſent into Scotland, to negotiate a treaty with that nation; and engage them in the Parliament's ſervice and aſſiſtance. Theſe Commiſſioners embarked on their voyage July the 20th, and arrived at Leith the 7th of Auguſt (x). Sir Henry, on his return to London, made a report of all their proceedings to the Houſe of Commons (y). He took the Covenant, among the reſt, on the 22d of September [G], and ſubſcribed it next to Oliver Cromwell (z): indeed it was in the main his own contrivance. About that time, he found means to ſupplant Sir William Ruſſel, and to be appointed ſole Treaſurer of the Navy (aa); which place he held till the firſt wars between the Engliſh and Dutch. In that office, we are told, he ſhewed a rare example of honour and integrity: For the fees were, at that time, four-pence in the pound, which, by reaſon of the war, honeſtly amounted to little leſs than 30,000 l. a year (bb). Sir Henry looking on it as too much for a private ſubject, very generouſly gave up his Patent (cc), which he had for life from King Charles I, to the then Parliament, deſiring but 2000 l. a year, for an Agent he had bred up to the buſineſs, and the remainder to go to the public. This was done, and the method of a fixed ſalary has continued ever ſince in that office (dd). About the beginning of the year 1645, he was one of the Parliament's Commiſſioners at the Treaty of Uxbridge (ee). As he was again at the Treaty in the Iſle of Wight, in 1648 (ff) [H]: but he was always an enemy to Peace. Having always appeared unſettled in matters of Religion, when the Independents ſprung up, he declared himſelf one of their Leaders (gg): and veered afterwards with every wind of new Doctrine, being ſucceſſively Preſbyterian, Independent, Anabaptiſt, Fifth-Monarchy-man, &c. [F] During the Earl of Strafford's tryal, he communicated a very material paper, &c.] That paper contained notes, taken by his father, Secretary Vane, of ſome opinions delivered at the Council-table, May 5, 1640. And Mr Whitelock gives us the following account, how they came to be diſcovered . . . 'Secretary Vane being out of town, ſent a letter to his ſon, Sir Henry 'Vane the younger, then in London, with the key of his 'ſtudy, for his ſon to look in his cabinet; for ſome papers 'there to ſend to his father. The ſon looking over many papers, among them lighted upon theſe notes, which being of ſo great concernment to the publick, and declaring ſo much againſt the Earl of Strafford, he held himſelf bound in duty and conſcience to diſcover them. He ſhewed them to Mr Pym, who urged him, and prevailed with him, that they might be made uſe of in the evidence againſt the Earl of Strafford, as being moſt material, and of great conſequence, in relation to that buſineſs. Accordingly they were produced, April 12, 1641, to the Houſe of Commons, and in the afternoon at a conference with the Lords; and the next day the Earl being brought to Weſtminſter, and both houſes being met, the notes were openly read. The title of them was,—No danger of a war with Scotland, if offenſive, not defenſive.——Then followed the opinions interlocutory. [King Charles] 'How can we under-'take offenſive war, if we have no more money.' [Sir Thomas Wentworth, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.] 'Borrow of the city 100000l. go on vigorouſly to levy 'ſhip-money; your Majeſty having tried the affection 'of your people, you are abſolved and looſe from all 'rule of Government, and to do what power will admit. 'Your Majeſty having tried all ways, and being refuſed, 'ſhall be acquitted before God and man. And you 'have an Army in Ireland, that you may employ to 'reduce this Kingdom to obedience: for I am confident 'the Scots cannot hold out five months.' [Archbiſhop Laud] 'You have tried all ways, and have always been 'denied, it is now lawful to take it by force.' [Lord Cottington] 'Leagues abroad there may be made for 'the defence of the kingdom; the lower houſe are 'weary of the King and Church: all ways ſhall be juſt 'to raiſe money by, in this inevitable neceſſity, and 'are to be uſed, being lawful.' [Archbiſhop Laud] 'For an offenſive, not any defenſive war.' [Lord Lieutenant of Ireland] 'The town is full of Lords, put the 'commiſſion of Array on foot, and if any of them ſtir, 'we will make them ſmart.'——What was accounted the moſt criminal, and no leſs than treaſon, in theſe words, was the propoſal, of bringing an Army out of Ireland, to reduce this Kingdom to obedience; by which the Earl's enemies underſtood England. But if he ſpoke any ſuch words, he plainly meant Scotland, which was in rebellion. For, as he ſaid in his own defence, the word this cannot rationally imply England; becauſe England was not out of the way of obedience, and becauſe there never was any the leaſt intention of landing the Iriſh Army in England, as the Lords of the Council were able to atteſt (17).

[G] He took the Covenant, among the reſt, &c.] Whilſt he, and his fellow-commiſſioners, were ſettling it with the Scotiſh parliament; the laſt finding fault with theſe two clauſes, concerning——'the preſervation of the 'King's perſon'——and, 'reducing the Doctrine and 'Diſcipline of both Churches to the pattern of the 'beſt Reformed.'——Sir Henry found out a ſoftening expedient, by adding to the firſt clauſe theſe or the like words . . . 'in preſervation of the Laws of the Land, 'and Liberty of the Subject——and to the ſecond—— 'according to the Word of God (18).'

(18) Ludlow's Memoirs, 8vo. Vol. I. p. 79.

[H] As he was again at the Treaty in the Iſle of Wight.] We are told, that he acted perfidiouſly upon that occaſion; in that he perſuaded his Majeſty, not to be prodigal in his conceſſions; alledging, that He had already yielded more than was fit for them to aſk, or Him to grant: yet afterwards did moſt fiercely inveigh againſt the conceſſions, as deſigned by his Majeſty, under the appearance of peace, to ruin the Parliament and Commonwealth (19).——The reaſon of this odd conduct is explained by Biſhop Burnet (20), who tells us, that 'Sir Henry Vane, and others who were for a change 'in the government, had no mind to treat any more. '—They went to the Treaty on purpoſe to delay mat-'ters; and therefore ſtudied to draw out the treaty to a 'great length, till Cromwell had ſettled Scotland and 'the North, and could bring up the Army to London.' '. . . In the mean time, Sir Henry flattered the Epiſ-'copal party to the King's ruin, as well as their own.'

[I] And veered afterwards with every wind of new Doctrine, &c.] The Lord Clarendon ſays of him, in this reſpect, that 'Vane was a man not to be deſcribed 'by any Character of Religion; in which he had 'ſwallowed ſome of the fancies, and extravagancies 'of every Sect, or Faction; and was become (which 'cannot be expreſſed by any other language than was 'peculiar to that time) a Man above Ordinances, un-'limited or unreſtrained by any rules, or bounds pre-'ſcribed to other men, by reaſon of his perfection. 'He was a perfect Enthuſiaſt; and, without doubt, 'did believe himſelf inſpired; which ſo far corrupted 'his reaſon and underſtanding, (which in all matters the Army, to acquaint them what the Parliament had done in satisfaction of their desires, and to persuade them to a compliance with the Parliament (bb). He doth not appear to have had any share in the King's Tryal or Death (ii); but was after that one of the most zealous Commonwealth's-men. In 1649, 1650, 1651, and 1652, he was appointed one of the Council of State (kk) [K]: and, in 1652, was for a time President of the same Council, being then also one of the Commissioners of the Navy (ll). The 9th of January 1649-50, he made the report to the House of Commons, from the Committee appointed to consider of the manner of electing future Parliaments (mm). Towards the end of the year 1651, he was nominated one of the Commissioners, that were to be sent into Scotland; in order to introduce the English Government there, and effect an union between the two Kingdoms (nn): but Sir Henry, for his own part, only sowed dissention between the opposite parties in the Kirk [L]. To embroil affairs, and have every thing unsettled; except perhaps a Commonwealth, with great latitude and libertinism; seems indeed to have been his natural disposition, and earnest endeavour. Therefore, when Oliver Cromwell went about to usurp and ingross the Supreme Authority, he became one of his most violent opposers; and left no stone unturned to supplant, and even to ruin him (oo). He was one of the great opposers of the dissolution of the Long Parliament [M]. And continuing his practices against Cromwell [N], the latter summoned him, in 1656, to appear before him in Council. After some delays, he appeared, when he was charged by the Protector with disaffection to the Government; which he had demonstrated in a late book, published by him with a seditious intention, called, A Healing Question proposed and resolved [O]. Sir Henry did not disown his dissatisfaction with the present state of affairs; and owned the

'without the verge of religion was superior to that of 'most men) that he did at some time believe, he was 'the person deputed to reign over the Saints upon earth 'for a thousand years (31).'—A. Wood says of him (22), as follows, in yet harsher terms; 'In sum, he was the 'Proteus of the times, a meer hotch-potch of religion, 'chief ring-leader of all the frantick Sectarians, of a 'turbulent spirit and working brain, of a strong com-'position of choler and melancholy, an inventor not 'only of whimseys in Religion, but also of crotchets in 'the State, (as his several Models testify) and composed 'only of treason, ingratitude, and baseness.'——It seems, there was a sect, from him called Vanists (23).

To fit and execute the powers given them, for a year (24).

[L] Only sowed dissention between the opposite parties in the Kirk.] The Kirk was then divided into two parties, denominated the Protestors, and the Resolutioners, which, like all other religious factions, acted with great fierceness against one another. To calm them, these Commissioners were sent: Some of them 'moved, that 'pains should be taken to unite these two parties. 'But Vane (says Bishop Burnet) opposed this with 'much zeal: He said, would they heal the wound 'that they had given themselves, which weakened them 'so much? The setting them at quiet could have no 'other effect, but to heal and unite them in their oppo-'sition to their authority: He therefore moved, that 'they might be left at liberty to fight out their own 'quarrels, and be kept in a greater dependence on the 'temporal authority, when both sides were forced to 'make their appeal to it: So it was resolved to suffer 'them to meet still in their Presbyteries and Synods, 'but not in general Assemblies, which had a greater 'face of union and authority. This advice was followed: 'so the division went on (25).'——It may not be amiss to hear what the Lord Clarendon says of Sir Henry Vane upon this occasion (26). 'There hath been scarce any 'thing more wonderful throughout the progress of these 'distractions, than that the Covenant did with such 'extraordinary expedition pass the two Houses, when 'all the leading persons in those Councils were at the 'same time known to be as great enemies to Presbytery '(the establishment whereof was the main end of this 'Covenant) as they were to the King or the Church. 'And he who contributed most to it, and in truth was 'the principal contriver of it, and the man by whom 'the Committee of Scotland was entirely and stupidly 'governed, Sir Harry Vane the younger, was not after-'wards more known to abhor the Covenant, and the 'Presbyterians, than he was at that very time known 'to do, and laughed at them then, as much as ever 'he did afterwards..... There need no more be said 'of his ability, than that he was chosen to couzen and 'deceive a whole nation which was thought to excel in 'craft and cunning: which he did with notable pregnancy and dexterity, and prevailed with a people, 'that could not otherwise be prevailed upon, than by 'advancing that idol Presbytery, to sacrifice their peace, 'their interest and their faith, to the erecting a power 'and authority, that resolved to persecute Presbytery 'to an extirpation; and, in process of time, very near 'brought their purpose to pass.'

[M] He was one of the great opposers of the dissolution of the Long Parliament.] By this Dissolution, we mean Oliver Cromwell's forcibly and irregularly turning them out of the House. For by Statute XVI. Caroli I. c. 7. the Parliament then assembled could not be dissolved, prorogued, or adjourned, unless by Act of Parliament; nor could they be adjourned, unless it was by themselves, or by their own order.——When therefore Lieutenant-Colonel Worsley entered the House of Commons with two files of musqueteers, to drive out the members, on April 20, 1653, Sir Henry Vane said aloud, 'This is not honest, yea it is against morality 'and common honesty.' Upon which Cromwell fell a railing at him, crying out with a loud voice, 'O Sir 'Henry Vane, Sir Henry Vane, the Lord deliver me 'from Sir Henry Vane (27).'

(27) Ludlow, Vol. II. p. 457.

[N] And continuing his practices against Cromwell.] Henry Cromwell, in a letter to Secretary Thurloe (28), gives this account of him, in 1655: 'Sir Henry Vane, 'and such like, who are rotten in their principles, 'can make good use of such delusions as these [Fifth-'Monarchy] and the like, to carry on their designs. '... Sir Henry goes up and downe amongst these 'people and others, endeavouringe to withdraw them 'from their submission to the present Government.... 'If he be not prevented, he will be a sad scourge to 'England.'——We find him again, in 1656, caballing against the Protector; and, when writs came out for a new parliament, 'was one of those who said, they 'would have no swordmen, no decimator, or any that 'received salary from the State to serve in parliament; 'and were resolved to give a lift to the Government, 'and doubted not of carrying all before them.' He then endeavoured to be elected for Boston in Lincolnshire, and afterwards for that County; but was disappointed. He polled in three places, and miss it in all (29).

[O] A Healing Question proposed and resolved.] The further title of it was, 'A healing Question propounded 'and resolved, upon occasion of the late public and 'seasonable call to Humiliation, in order to Love and 'Union amongst the honest Party &c.' Lond. 1656. four sheets, quarto. It was written upon an invitation given, in a declaration published by Cromwell, for a general Fast, that the people would apply themselves to the Lord, to discover the Achan which had so long obstructed the settlement of these distracted nations: And contained, says Ludlow (30), the state of the Republicans controversy with the King, the present deviation from that cause for which they engaged, and the means to unite all parties in the accomplishment of it. When it was finished, Sir Henry shewed it to Lieutenant-General Fleetwood, who seeming to approve it, desired to take it with him, and promised to communicate it to Cromwell upon the first opportunity.

writing of the book, and alſo the publiſhing, though in terms dark and myſterious enough, as his manner was. Whereupon Cromwell ordered him to give ſecurity, by a day limited, not to diſturb the peace of the nation, or elſe to ſtand committed. The time being expired, he appeared again before the Council, and delivered into Cromwell's own hand another Paper, containing the Reaſons of his diſapproving the preſent uſurpation, and a friendly advice to him to return to his duty, with ſome juſtification of his own conduct with regard to the publick. But notwithſtanding all this, and divers reaſons alledged by him to excuſe himſelf from giving the demanded ſecurity; one of which was, the ſummons ſent him to appear in Parliament; he was ſent priſoner to Cariſbrook-Caſtle, in the Iſle of Wight (pp). From whence being releaſed, December 31, 1656 (qq), he came to London, where he met with another kind of perſecution: For Cromwell perceiving that the impriſoning of him had proved unſucceſsful, he privately encouraged ſome of the Army to take poſſeſſion of certain foreſt-walks belonging to him, near Raby-Caſtle, and alſo gave orders to the Attorney-General, on pretence of a flaw in his title to a great part of his eſtate, to file a bill againſt him in the Exchequer. This was deſigned to oblige him to produce his title, which if he had done, they doubted not, by the craft of the Lawyers, to find ſome defect in it, whereby it was hoped he would be forced into a compliance: Yet, at the ſame time, he was privately informed that he ſhould be freed from this, or any other inquiſition, and have whatever elſe he could deſire, in caſe he would comply with the preſent authority (rr). But he remained inflexible all Oliver's time: And ſo he did under his ſucceſſor, Protector Richard; againſt whom there were many meetings of the chief ſticklers for a Commonwealth, at Sir Henry's houſe near Charing-croſs (ss). Great endeavours were uſed to keep him out of Richard's Parliament in 1659 (tt); and by direction, the returning officers at Hull and Briſtol would not return him, though he is ſaid to have had the majority; yet at laſt he was choſen for Whitchurch in Hamſhire, through the intereſt of Robert Wallop, Eſq; (uu). In that Aſſembly, he and other Republicans laboured to overturn the ſettlement of a Protector and two houſes of Parliament, and to introduce a Commonwealth: By their abilities, they ſoon leſſened Richard's power, and gained an aſcendent over his party, to which a warm ſpeech of Sir Henry's [P] is ſaid to have not a little contributed (ww). After Richard's abdication, the Long Parliament that had been reſtored by a general council of the officers of the army, conſtituted Sir Henry one of the Committee of Safety the 9th of May; and the 13th of the ſame month, one of the Council of State (xx). The 26th of the ſaid month, he was appointed the firſt of the ſeven Commiſſioners for managing the affairs of the Admiralty; and in September, Preſident of the Council: About which time he propoſed a new model of Government [Q]. Upon the Council of the Army's excluſion of the Parliament, which was on the 13th of October, he was nominated, four days after, one of the Committee of Ten from the Council of State, to conſider of fit ways to carry on the affairs of the Government; and alſo one of the Committee to nominate officers of the army. The 26th, when the Committee of Safety was framed [R], he was one of them; and their deſign

[P] A warm ſpeech of Sir Henry's.] It was in theſe words: 'Mr Speaker, Among all the people of the 'univerſe, I know none who have ſhewn ſo much zeal 'for the liberty of their country, as the Engliſh at this 'time have done: They have, by the help of Divine 'Providence, overcome all obſtacles, and have made 'themſelves Free. We have driven away the Here'ditary Tyranny of the houſe of Stuart, at the expence 'of much blood and treaſure, in hopes of enjoying 'Hereditary Liberty, after having ſhaken off the yoke 'of Kingſhip; and there is not a man amongſt us, 'who could have imagined that any perſon would be 'ſo bold as to dare to attempt the raviſhing from us 'Freedom, which coſts us ſo much blood and ſo much 'labour. But ſo it happens, I know not by what mis'fortune, we are fallen into the error of thoſe who 'poiſoned the Emperor Titus to make room for Domi'tian, who made away Auguſtus that they might have 'Tiberius, and changed Claudius for Nero. I am 'ſenſible theſe examples are foreign from my ſubject, 'ſince the Romans in thoſe days were buryed in Lewd'neſs and Luxury; whereas the People of England are 'now renowned, all over the world, for their great 'vertue and diſcipline; and yet ſuffer an Idiot, with'out courage, without ſenſe, nay without ambition, 'to have dominion in a country of Liberty. One could 'bear a little with Oliver Cromwell, though, contrary 'to his oath of fidelity to the Parliament, contrary to 'his duty to the Publick, contrary to the reſpect he 'owed to that venerable body from whom he received 'his Authority, he uſurped the government. His merit 'was ſo extraordinary, that our judgments, our paſſions 'might be blinded by it. He made his way to Empire 'by the moſt illuſtrious actions; he had under his com'mand an Army that had made him a Conqueror, and 'a People that had made him their General. But as 'for Richard Cromwell his ſon, who is he? what are 'his titles? We have ſeen that he had a ſword by his 'ſide, but did he ever draw it? And, what is of more 'importance in this caſe, Is he fit to get obedience from 'a mighty Nation, who could never make a footman 'obey him? Yet we muſt recogniſe this Man as our 'King, under the ſtile of Protector! a man without 'birth, without courage, without conduct. For my 'part, I declare, Sir, it ſhall never be ſaid that I made 'ſuch a Man my Maſter (31).'

[Q] He propoſed a new model of Government.] The ſubſtance of it was, That the ſupreme Power, delegated by the People to their Truſtees, ought to be in ſome fundamentals not diſpenſed with: That it is deſtructive to the People's Liberties (to which by God's bleſſing they are fully reſtored) to admit any earthly King or ſingle Perſon to the legiſlative or executive Power over this Nation: That the ſupreme Power, delegated, is not entruſted to the People's Truſtees, to erect matters of Faith and Worſhip, ſo as to exerciſe compulſion therein (32). —— Mr Baxter informs us (33), that 'Vane was for a Fanatick Democracy. When Crom'well was dead, he got Sir Arthur Haſlerigge to be his 'cloſe adherent on civil accounts, and got the Rump ſet up again, and a Council of State, and got the power much into his own hands. When in the height of his power, he ſet upon the forming a New Commonwealth, and with ſome of his adherents drew up the model, which was for Popular Government; but ſo that men of his confidence muſt be the people.'

[R] When the Committee of Safety was framed.] This Committee was authorized to ſeize and ſecure ſuch as might juſtly be ſuſpected of any deſign to diſturb the publick Peace, and alſo to remove ſuch Officers of the Army as they ſhould think fit, and to fill their places with others, till the Parliament ſhould take farther order therein. The time appointed for the duration of their power was Eight Days, by which time it was ſuppoſed the Houſe of Commons would be able to conſtitute a Council of State, to take care of affairs of that nature (34).

was apprehended to be the overthrowing of Magiſtracy, Miniſtry, and the Law (yy). We find him alſo, November 1, one of the Committee to conſider of a Form of Government for the three Nations as a Commonwealth. In that caſe, 'he was hard to be ſatisfied, 'but did much ſtick to his own apprehenſions, or notions (zz).' The proceedings of General Monk were very diſpleaſing and alarming to him, with the reſt of the Republicans; and new Commiſſions being ordered for raiſing of freſh forces, he was nominated Commander of a Regiment of Horſe, which was the only military employment he ever had (aaa). November 16, he was appointed one of the Committee of Nineteen, to determine the qualifications of Members of Parliament. Upon the re-aſſembling of the Long Parliament, being ſent for, he came and took his place in the Houſe, January 9, 1659-60. Then he was queſtioned for his compliance with the Army during the late interruption; and, though he anſwered ingenuouſly, it was voted, that he ſhould forthwith repair to his houſe at Raby, and remain there during the pleaſure of the Parliament: At the ſame time, he was diſcharged from being a Member of the Parliament (bbb). Delaying to remove from London, on account of illneſs, real, or pretended, and endeavouring to ſtir up the enemies of the then Government to riſe and take up arms; an order was made, February 1, for his being taken into cuſtody, and ſent to Raby; and another order, on the 13th, for the Serjeant at Arms to carry him to his houſe at Bellew in Lincolnſhire (ccc); in the way to his houſe at Raby (ddd). The month following, the Jeſuit provincial Bradſhaw, who came over from Spain with above a hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, was treating with him, and General Lambert (eee). After the King's Reſtoration, being, as he thought, conſcious to himſelf of having done nothing in relation to public affairs, for which he could not willingly and chearfully ſuffer, he came up, and continued at his houſe in Hamſtead near London (fff). But, June 11, 1660, the Houſe of Commons reſolved [S], that he ſhould be one of the Twenty Perſons to be excepted out of the act of General Pardon and Oblivion, for and in reſpect only of ſuch pains, penalties, and forfeitures, not extending to life, as ſhould be thought fit to be inflicted on him. And he never applying to the King, but lurking up and down, without giving any account of himſelf, and being looked on as a perſon of a miſchievous activity (ggg); engaged, with ſome of the Army, to drive the King out of England again (hhh); he was therefore committed to the Tower in July (iii). Upon the inſurrection of the Fifth-monarchy-men, in January 1660-1, Sir Henry, the only perſon of parts and figure who had formerly countenanced them, and writ in favour of their principles [T]; being now looked upon by the Court with a jealous eye, [S] But, June 11, 1660, the Houſe of Commons reſolved.] The ſeveral Reſolutions and Proceedings of the Houſe of Commons, with relation to Sir Henry, will appear by the following extracts from their Journals.

"June 11, 1660. Reſolved, that Sir Henry Vane, Knight, be one of the Twenty Perſons to be excepted out of the act of General Pardon and Oblivion, for and in reſpect only of ſuch pains, penalties, and forfeitures (not extending to life) as ſhall be thought fit to be inflicted on him by another act, intended to be hereafter paſſed for that purpoſe (35)."——The clauſe of the act of Indemnity, in purſuance of that reſolution, was in theſe words. 'Provided always, that this act, or 'any thing therein contained, ſhall not extend to the 'pardoning, or to give any other benefit whatſoever, 'to Sir Henry Vane, John Lambert, or either of them, 'but that they, and either of them, are and ſhall be out 'of this preſent act wholly excepted and foreprifed.'— Auguſt 17, 1660, Sir Heneage Finch reports, . . . That 'to the exception of the Four Perſons that fol- 'low in the clauſe concerning Vane, Lambert, &c. 'they alſo adhere, that they ſhould ſtand excepted 'for life: The Lord Finch (who managed the confe- 'rence for the houſe of Lords) ſaid, indeed they were 'not excepted as Murderers; but he took notice, that 'the King, of whoſe Wiſdom none will or can doubt, '. . . . . thought fit, ſitting the Parliament, to commit 'theſe perſons to the Tower of London. . . . But he ſaid 'withal, if they were capable of mercy, no queſtion 'but the King, the Fountain of Mercy, he would ex- 'tend it to them. In the mean time, their Lordſhips 'thought it fit to leave them to the Mercy of the King; 'and ſo he hoped this Houſe will too (36).'——

Auguſt 23. At a conference between the two Houſes, the Lord Chancellor Clarendon obſerved, that Heſilrigg and Vane were perſons, whom the ſecluded Members, after their reſtitution, and when they were preparing the way for the Reſtoration, looked upon as fit to be ſecured and confined: That, after the King was come in, thoſe Gentlemen, notwithſtanding the cenſure on them by the ſecluded Members, and the bleſſed end of the Long Parliament, returned to town; never applying themſelves to the King, but lurked up and down, without giving any account of themſelves: and his Lordſhip added, that they look on them as perſons of a miſchievous activity: And therefore their Lordſhips deſire to leave them to the Mercy of the King; with this further intimation, that they would be ready to join with the Houſe of Commons in a Petition to the King, that Mercy might be ſhewed them; and that his ſeverity might not extend to their Lives: And he did not doubt, but the interceſſion of the Houſe would be effectual for that (37).—— Auguſt 24, 1660. Reſolved, that this Houſe doth agree with the Lords, as to Sir Henry Vane's ſtanding excepted in the act of General Pardon and Oblivion; in the ſame ſort, as is offered in the amendments from the Lords.——Reſolved, That this houſe doth agree with the Lords, in the expedient offered by them, at the laſt conference, as to Sir Henry Vane and Colonel Lambert, for petitioning his Majeſty for their Pardon, as to their Lives (38).——Auguſt 28. Ordered, that it be referred to the Committee, who managed the laſt conference with the Lords, to draw a petition to his Majeſty, in the name of both Houſes, for his Majeſty's pardoning of Sir Henry Vane and Colonel Lambert, as to Life; according to what was offered by the Lords in that behalf, at the late conference (39).

[T] And writ in favour of their principles.] Their principles are well known to have been, that our Saviour was coming down to erect a Fifth-Monarchy upon earth, which would laſt a thouſand years. Sir Henry's 'enthuſiaſtick Treatiſe on that ſubject, was intitled, 'The retired man's Meditations: or the Myſtery and 'Power of Godlineſs ſhining forth in the living world, 'to the unmaſking the Myſtery of Iniquity in the moſt 'refined and pureſt Forms. And withal preſenting 'to view, 1. The Riches and Fullneſs of Chriſt's Per- 'ſon as Mediator. 2. The Natural and Spiritual Man 'in their proper diſtinctions. 3. In the Preface, he begins with ſome Prophecy of himſelf and of his party. 'There is not any thing which lies more 'croſs to the buſy and boundleſs Spirit of man, than 'that which takes him off the wing of his natural de- 'ſire, and is a bar unto that activity in him, which, 'if permitted to run its courſe, makes his feet ſwift to 'ſhed eye, was removed from one priſon to another, and at laſt to the Iſle of Scilly (kkk) [V]. The Lords and Commons had, in Auguſt, 1660, joined in a petition to the King, that if he were attainted, yet execution as to his life might be remitted [W]: to which his Majeſty gave a favourable anſwer, though in general words; ſo that he reckoned he was ſafe (lll). But in July 1661, the Commons had ſo far altered their ſentiments, as to order, that he ſhould be proceeded againſt according to Law [X]. And, for that purpoſe, be ſent for back to the Tower of London (mmm). In Eaſter term, 1662, he was indicted of High-Treaſon; and the Grand-Jury having found the bill, he was arraigned the 2d of June following, at the King's-Bench Bar. The ſubſtance of the charge againſt him, was, that he did compaſs and imagine the death of the King; contrived totally to ſubvert the ancient Frame of Government; and to keep out the ſaid Sovereign Lord from the exerciſe of his Regal Government: To effect which, he had traiterouſly and maliciouſly aſſembled, and conſulted, with other falſe Traitors; had appointed Officers; and arrayed a multitude, to the number of a thouſand perſons, with guns, &c. June the 6th, the day of his tryal, he pleaded ſtrongly, that no Treaſon could be committed againſt a King de jure, and not de facto, ſuch as King Charles II. was, from 1648 to 1659, when the crimes againſt him were laid: And that he acting then by authority of Parliament, the ſupreme Court of the Nation, could not be queſtioned by any inferior Court (nnn) [Y]. His enemies affirm, his whole behaviour was ſo aſſuming and inſolent, that the Court and King's Council told him, that his own defence was a freſh charge againſt him, and the higheſt evidence of his inward guilt, had there not been ſuch a cloud of witneſſes to prove the particulars (ooo). His friends maintain, on the contrary, that he behaved with great eloquence, ſoundneſs of judgment, and preſence of mind (ppp) [Z]. On the 11th of June, he

"To the King's moſt Excellent Majeſty: The humble Petition of the Lords and Commons in Parliament aſſembled.

Sheweth, that your Majeſty having declared your gracious pleaſure to proceed only againſt the immediate Murderers of your Royal Father: We your Majeſty's moſt humble ſubjects, the Lords and Commons aſſembled in Parliament, not finding Sir Henry Vane, or Colonel Lambert, to be of that number, are humble ſuitors to your Majeſty, if they ſhall be attainted, yet execution, as to their Lives, may be remitted: and, as in duty bound, we ſhall ever pray for your Majeſty's long and happy reign over us." [X] As to order, that he ſhould be proceeded againſt according to law.] Their orders upon that occaſion were as follow——July 1, 1661. Ordered, That Sir Henry Vane and John Lambert, that are wholly excepted and forepriſed out of the Act of Indemnity, be left to be proceeded againſt according to law: And it is recommended to Mr Attorney-general, to take care of the proceeding againſt them.——July 23. Upon information that the Fanaticks make mention of Lambert and Sir Henry Vane in their Meetings; and have great hopes to diſturb the publick peace, if they could procure their eſcape; Ordered, that Mr Attorney-general have notice to ſpeed the proſecution againſt Vane and Lambert, and prepare the evidence againſt them.—Nov. 22. Ordered, That the King's Majeſty be deſired to ſend for John Lambert and Sir Henry Vane back again to the Tower of London, in order to their Tryal. . . . Upon which application, his Majeſty returned this anſwer, That he would take care, that Vane, and Lambert, and Waller, ſhould be brought in ſafe cuſtody (41).——It is ſaid, that this Addreſs of the Houſe of Commons againſt Sir Henry, was 'either upon the account of his own behaviour, 'or that of his party, or ſome private reſentment (42).'

[Y] Could not be queſtioned by any inferior Court.] He laid it down as a maxim, That none are judges of the Power and Privileges of Parliament, but themſelves. For, admit once, that their judgment may be called in queſtion, and diſputed by private perſons, or by inferior Courts (whoſe Votes are included in theirs) the Fundamentals of Government are plucked up by the roots. Par in pares non habet imperium, multo minus in eos qui majus imperium habent; An equal has no command over his equal, much leſs over thoſe that have a greater command or authority (43). He alſo offered theſe points to the conſideration of the Court, and prayed earneſtly to have counſel aſſigned him to ſpeak to them: 1. Whether the collective body of the Parliament can be impeached of high-treaſon? 2. Whether any perſon acting by authority of Parliament, can (ſo long as he acteth by that authority) commit Treaſon? 3. Whether matters acted by that Authority, can be called in queſtion in an inferior Court? 4. Whether a King de jure, and out of poſſeſſion, can have Treaſon committed againſt him, he not being King de facto, and in actual poſſeſſion (44)? No council was aſſigned him.——And as to the pretence of the Power, or Authority, of Parliament; Sir Heneage Finch, the Sollicitor-general, ſaid, 'It is to be known, 'that it was not the eighth part of the Houſe of Com-'mons, ſuch as were let in, to do all that hath been 'complained of; and the acting under Authority of 'ſuch an End of a Parliament, under ſuch a violation, 'was no excuſe, but an aggravation; but that the 'Parliament was in law ended by the death of the late 'King, notwithſtanding that act of 17 Caroli I.—— 'As to the queſtion, Whether an Houſe of Parliament 'can commit treaſon? If they depart from that alle-'giance which they have ſworn, at their firſt meeting, 'they are impeachable for it.——And as to the que-'ſtion, Whether the King, being out of actual poſſeſſion, 'can have treaſon committed againſt him? He affirmed 'it (45).'——Juſtice Windham alſo held, 'That if 'the Houſe be under a force, and ſome kept out, ſome 'let in, to ſerve a turn, whatever they act is a nullity 'in law.'——Juſtice Twiſden held the ſame opinion, That it is not the ſitting of a few members within thoſe walls that will continue it a Parliament. And ſaid, Whether a Parliament may commit treaſon, is not the queſtion: but, Whether a few of the Houſe, ſhutting out their fellows, and uſurping the government, were not Traitors (46)?——In a word, the Reſolutions of the Court were: 1. That by the death of King Charles I. that Long Parliament was actually determined, notwithſtanding the Act, that it ſhould not be diſſolved but by the conſent of both Houſes. 2. That though King Charles II. was de facto kept out of the exerciſe of the Kingly office by Traytors and Rebels, yet he was King both de facto and de jure, and all the acts which were done to the keeping him out were high-treaſon. 3. That the very conſultation and adviſing together of the means to deſtroy the King and his Government, was an overt-act to prove the compaſſing of the King's death (47).

The Sheriff had beforehand ſignified to him, that he muſt not ſpeak any thing againſt his Majeſty, or the Government: and he beginning to reflect upon them, in his laſt ſpeech upon the ſcaffold, as the Lieutenant of the Tower apprehended [BB], he was interrupted by drums and trumpets placed about the ſcaffold on purpoſe to drown his voice (ttt). 'tence, and Death] in ſuch a manner, that he left it 'doubtful, whether his Eloquence, ſoundneſs of Judg- 'ment, and preſence of Mind, his gravity and magna- 'nimity, his conſtant adherence to the cauſe of his 'country, and heroick carriage during the time of his 'confinement and at the hour of death; or the malice 'of his enemies and their frivolous ſuggeſtions at his 'trial, the breach of the publick Faith in the uſage he 'found, the incivility of the bench, and the ſavage 'rudeneſs of the Sheriff, who commanded the trumpets 'ſeveral times to ſound, that he might not be heard by 'the people; were more remarkable.'——He adds a little lower, from a letter he had received . . . 'Sir 'Henry Vane was long in his defence, but not tedious: 'He much perplexed both Court and Council, and has 'acquired eternal reputation by nobly pleading for the 'dying liberties of his country; it being clear, that all 'the party which ſeemed to be indemnified by the act 'of Amneſty, ſhall be puniſhed in his perſon; and that 'for this cauſe only, That in his pleading he undertook 'by the Authority of the ſaid Parliament to juſtify what 'he had done.'

[AA] Than the King could do his promiſe.] Biſhop Kennett obſerves, 'Though the King gave a favourable 'Anſwer to the Addreſs of the two Houſes, yet it was 'in general words only, and could not be called a 'promiſe of ſparing his life (49).'——The ſubſtance of the Addreſs of the two Houſes was, That if Sir Henry ſhould be attainted, yet Execution as to his Life might be remitted: And his Majeſty granted the deſires in the ſaid petition. See note [W]. But, in leſs than a year, the Parliament ordered, that He ſhould be proceeded againſt according to Law . . . . . So that his Majeſty complied both ways with the Deſires of the great Council, or Wiſdom, of the Nation. . . . . Biſhop Burnet inſinuates, that the putting him to death was contrary to the Declaration from Breda. For, ſays he, that declaration 'being full for an Indemnity to all, 'except the Regicides, he was comprehended in that; 'ſince, though he was for changing the government, 'and depoſing the King, yet he did not approve of the 'putting him to death, nor of the force put on the 'parliament, but did for ſome time, while theſe things 'were acted, withdraw from the ſcene (50).'—In oppoſition to which, the Reader will be pleaſed duly to conſider this paſſage in that declaration . . . 'We do by theſe 'preſents declare, that we do grant a free and general 'Pardon, which we are ready, upon demand, to paſs 'under the great Seal of England, to all our Subjects, 'of what degree or quality ſoever, who, within forty 'days after the publiſhing hereof, ſhall lay hold upon 'this our grace and favour, and ſhall by any publick act 'declare their doing ſo, and that they return to the 'loyalty and obedience of good ſubjects; excepting 'only ſuch perſons as ſhall hereafter be excepted by 'Parliament.' . . . It is alſo to be remembered, as hath been obſerved above, that Sir Henry never applied to the King, but lurked up and down, without giving any account of himſelf.

[BB] And he beginning to reflect upon them in his laſt Speech, &c.] The words were theſe: 'I ſuppoſe you 'may wonder when I ſhall tell you that I am not brought 'hither according to any known Law of the land. It 'is true, I have been before a Court of Juſtice (and am 'now going to appear before a greater Tribunal, where 'I am going to give an account of all my actions) 'under their ſentence I ſtand here at this time. When 'I was before them, I could not have the liberty and 'privilege of an Engliſhman, the grounds, reaſons, 'and cauſes of the actings I was charged with, duly 'conſidered; I therefore deſired the Judges, that they 'would ſet their Seals to my bill of Exceptions; I preſſed 'hard for it again and again, as the right of myſelf, 'and every free-born Engliſhman, by the law of the 'land, but was finally denied it.'——Here Sir John Robinſon, Lieutenant of the Tower, interrupted him, ſaying, Sir, you muſt not go on thus, and in a furious manner ſaid, that he railed againſt the Judges, and that it was a lye, and I am here, ſays he, to teſtify that it is falſe. . . . Sir Henry replied, 'God will judge between 'me and you in this matter. I ſpeak but matter of fact, 'and cannot you bear that? It is evident, the Judges 'have refuſed to ſign my Bill of Exceptions.'——Then the trumpets were ordered to ſound in his face, to hinder his being heard. At which Sir Henry (lifting up his hand, and then laying it on his breaſt) ſaid, 'What 'mean you, Gentlemen? is this your uſage of me? 'did you uſe all the reſt ſo? I had even done (as to 'that) could you have been patient; but, ſeeing you 'cannot bear it, I ſhall only ſay this, That whereas 'the Judges have refuſed to ſeal that with their hands, 'that they have done; I am come to ſeal that with my 'blood, that I have done.'——He then proceeded to give ſome account of his life; and mentioning the Solemn League and Covenant, the trumpets ſounded again, and the Sheriff catched at the Paper in his hand. Upon which, Sir Henry only ſaid, 'It was hard he might not 'be ſuffered to ſpeak; but, ſays he, my uſage from man 'is no harder than was my Lord and Maſter's: And all 'that will live his life this day, muſt expect hard dealing 'from the worldly Spirit.'——The trumpets ſounded again, to hinder his being heard. Then, a ſecond time, Sir John Robinſon, and two or three others, endeavoured to ſnatch the paper out of Sir Henry's hand, but he kept it for a while, now and then reading part of it; afterwards, tearing it in pieces, he delivered it to a friend behind him, who was preſently forced to deliver it to the Sheriff. They alſo ſearched his pocket for papers (51).——Biſhop Burnet accounts for this 'new and very indecent practice,' as he calls it, in the following manner: 'It was obſerved, that the dying 'Speeches of the Regicides had left impreſſions on the 'hearers, that were not at all to the advantage of the 'government. So ſtrains of a peculiar nature being 'expected from him, to prevent that, drummers were 'placed under the Scaffold, who, as ſoon as he began 'to ſpeak of the publick, upon a ſign given, ſtruck up 'with their drums. This put him in no diſorder. 'He deſired they might be ſtopped, for he underſtood 'what was meant by it. Then he went through his 'devotions. And, as he was taking leave of thoſe 'about him, he happening to ſay ſomewhat with re- 'lation to the times, the drums ſtruck up a ſecond time: 'So he gave over, and died with ſo much compoſed- 'neſs, that it was generally thought, the government 'had loſt more than it had gained by his death (52).' R. Baxter alſo obſerves, that 'no man could die with 'greater appearance of a gallant reſolution and fearleſs- 'neſs than he did, though before ſuppoſed a timorous 'man. Inſomuch, that the Manner of his death pro- 'cured him more applauſe than all the Actions of his 'life (53).'

[CC] He had a head as darkened in his notions of Religion, &c.] Theſe are Biſhop Burnet's own words, who adds, 'For though he ſet up a form of religion in a 'way of his own, yet it conſiſted rather in a withdraw-'ing from all other forms, than in any new or parti-'cular opinions or forms; from which he and his party 'were called Seekers, and ſeemed to wait for ſome 'new and clearer manifeſtations. In theſe meetings he 'preached and prayed often himſelf, but with ſo peculiar 'a darkneſs, that though I have ſometimes taken pains to 'ſee if I could find out his meaning in his works, yet I 'could never reach it. And ſince many others have ſaid 'the ſame, it may be reaſonable to believe he hid ſome-'what that was a neceſſary key to the reſt. His friends 'told me, he leaned to Origen's notion of an univerſal 'ſalvation of all, both of devils and the damned, and 'to the doctrine of pre-exiſtence.'——The Lord Clarendon's judgment of our Author's book Of the Love of God, and the Union with God, is much to the ſame purpoſe ... 'Which, ſays he, when I had read, and 'found nothing of his uſual clearneſs and ratiocination 'in his diſcourſe, in which he uſed much to excel the 'beſt of the company he kept, and that the ſtyle thereof 'was very much like that of Sancta Sophia (55); and 'that in a crowd of very eaſy words, the ſenſe was too 'hard to find out: I was of opinion that the ſubject-'matter of it was of ſo delicate a nature, that it required 'another kind of preparation of mind, and it may be 'another kind of diet, than men are ordinarily ſupplyed 'with (56).'

[EE] What hath been ſaid further of him by way of character.] It may be ſummed up in theſe obſervations of well-meaning R. Baxter: At his return from New England, Sir Henry 'proved an inſtrument of greater 'calamity to a ſinful people. Being choſen a Parlia-'ment-man, he was very active at firſt for bringing 'delinquents to puniſhment. He was the principal man 'that drove on the Parliament with that vehemence 'againſt the King. Being of ready parts, great ſub-'tilty, and unwearied induſtry, he laboured, and not 'without ſucceſs, to win others in parliament, city, 'and country, to his way..... To moſt of the Changes 'that followed, he was that within the Houſe, that 'Cromwell was without. His great zeal to inflame the 'war, and to cheriſh the Sectaries, and eſpecially in 'the army, made him above all men to be valued by 'that party. His unhappineſs lay in this, That his 'doctrines were ſo cloudily formed and expreſſed, that 'few could underſtand them; and therefore he had but 'few true diſciples... His obſcurity was by ſome im-'puted to his not underſtanding himſelf; but by others 'to deſign, becauſe he was able to ſpeak plain, when 'he pleaſed. The two things in which he had moſt 'ſucceſs, and ſpake moſt plainly, were his Earneſt Plea 'for Liberty of Conſcience, and againſt the Magiſtrates 'intermeddling with Religion, and his teaching his 'followers to revile the Miniſtry, calling them ordina-'rily Black Coats, Prieſts, and other names which 'ſavoured of reproach..... When King Charles came 'in, he was queſtioned with others by the Parliament, 'but ſeemed to have his life ſecured. But, being 'brought to the Bar, he ſpake ſo boldly in juſtifying 'the Parliament's Cauſe, and what he had done, that it 'exaſperated the King, and made him reſolve upon his 'death (65).' The great ſhare Sir Henry had in the Troubles of the Nation, expoſed him to the Satires and Lampoons of the Royaliſts, as may be ſeen in the Rump, or Collection of Poems (66).

Integrity, and feared his Abilities (zzz). But we are perſuaded, that he rather fell a ſacrifice to the Earl of Strafford; and was taken out of the way, for being one of the moſt able and active Members of the Republican Party [FF], which the Court, and the Generality of the Nation, were then reſolved to cruſh. Sir Henry Vane left only one ſon, named Chriſtopher, who was knighted by King Charles II, and advanced by King William, July 8, 1699, to the title of Lord Bernard of Bernard-caſtle. By his wife Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter of Gilbert Holles, Earl of Clare, he left two ſons, Gilbert, and William. Gilbert ſucceeded him in honour and eſtate, and dying April 27, 1753, left, among many other children, Henry, his eldeſt ſon, who was created, April 3, 1754, Viſcount Barnard and Earl of Darlington. William was advanced, June 1720, to the titles of Viſcount Vane and Baron of Duncannon in the county of Tirone in Ireland (*).

[FF] He fell a ſacrifice to the Earl of Strafford, &c.] Biſhop Burnet concurs in the ſame opinion, as appears from this paſſage . . ' The great ſhare he had in the ' attainder of the Earl of Strafford, and in the whole ' turn of affairs to the total change of government, ' but above all, the great opinion that was had of his ' parts and capacity to embroil matters again, made ' the Court think it neceſſary to put him out of the ' way (67).' He was often nick-named Sir Humorous Vanity. C

VERE [Sir FRANCIS], or DE VERE, ſecond ſon of Geffrey de Vere [A], a branch of the noble and moſt ancient family of the De Veres, Earls of Oxford [B], was born in the year 1554 (a). Applying himſelf early to the art of war, he became one of the moſt famous Generals in his time. His firſt entrance on a martial life, was when he went to the aſſiſtance of the States of Holland, among the forces ſent by Queen Elizabeth, under the command of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leiceſter. They arrived at Fluſhing the 10th of December (b), 1585; and continuing in thoſe parts, he gave early proofs of a warlike genius, and undaunted courage. In 1587, the town of Sluys being beſieged by the Prince of Parma, the Earl of Leiceſter was ſent for out of England to its relief: and our young Officer, Mr Vere, with Sir Roger Williams, and a garriſon of Engliſh and Walloons, bravely defended it; though, the place being furiouſly battered with 17000 great ſhot, and a large breach made, they were obliged to ſurrender it to a ſuperior force (c). In 1588, he was part of the Engliſh garriſon, which gallantly defended Berghen-op-Zoom againſt the Prince of Parma, who had laid ſiege thereto. They gave him ſuch warm entertainment, by ſeveral brave repulſes, frequent ſallies, and other-well applied arts of war, that he quitted all hopes of blocking up the harbour, or gaining the town; and, winter approaching, he broke up the ſiege, after it had been carried on for two months. And ' that true cou-

[A] Second ſon of Geffrey de Vere.] This Geffrey was the third ſon of John de Vere, the fifteenth Earl of Oxford, of this noble family: which Geffrey de Vere, by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of Sir Richard Hardekyn of Colcheſter, he had four ſons, and a daughter; viz. 1. John Vere of Kirkby-hall in Caſtle-Hedingham, Eſſex, Eſq; who by Thomaſine his wife, daughter of William Carew, of Stone-caſtle in the county of Kent, Eſq; had two ſons, John and Robert, who both dyed without iſſue. 2. Sir Francis Vere, the ſubject of this article. 3. Robert, who dyed young. 4. Horace, created Baron Vere of Tilbury, July 25, 1625.—— Elizabeth, the daughter, was married to Sir Robert Harcourt of Stanton-Harcourt, anceſtor of the preſent Lord Harcourt (1).

[B] A branch of the noble and moſt ancient family of the De Veres, Earls of Oxford.] The De Vere family may juſtly be ſtyled one of the moſt ancient, noble, and illuſtrious in the world. Alberic de Vere, the firſt of the family who ſettled in England, came over with William the Conqueror; and was enriched by him with ſeveral fine Lordſhips; particularly with that of Caſtle-Hedingham in Eſſex, where he fixed his reſidence, and that became the head of his Succeſſors Barony. From him proceeded a numerous race of noble perſons, which obtained the higheſt Honors, and became eminent in the arts of peace and war. His ſon Alberic was, by King Henry I, made Lord great Chamberlain of England: his grandſon, Alberic de Vere, was created, in 1137, by the Empreſs Maud, Earl of Oxford; a title confirmed unto him by her ſon, King Henry II. And a dignity enjoyed by his deſcendants and ſucceſſors, of the ſame ſurname, for Twenty Generations, from the year 1137 to 1703, a circumſtance attending, as far as we can remember, no other Britiſh noble family whatſoever. Beſides the great office of Lord High Chamberlain, and the Earldom of Oxford, hereditary dignities in this family; ſome of them diſcharged the offices of Port-reve of London, of Lord Chief Juſtice, Chancellor, High-Admiral, Lord High-Steward, and Conſtable of England. William de Vere, ſon of the firſt Earl, was Biſhop of Hereford in 1186. And this family hath produced ſeveral renowned Warriors and Generals, and four Knights of the order of the Garter. Robert, the ninth Earl, was by King Richard II. created Marquiſs of Dublin, (being the firſt who was honoured with the title of Marquiſs in this kingdom) and Duke of Ireland.

Immenſe, for a long time, have their Riches and Poſſeſſions been. John, the ſeventh Earl, who dyed 34 Edw. III. A. D. 1360, had, in Eſſex, forty-nine Knights-fees; in Suffolk, ſeventeen; in Cambridgeſhire, eighteen; in Huntingtonſhire, ſeven; each of which Knights-fees may juſtly be computed to be equal to two hundred pounds a year of our preſent money (2): Beſides the large perſonal eſtate. And, firſt and laſt, they had about Seventy Knight-fees in the county of Eſſex alone. John, the fourteenth Earl, when he came to the Earldom, in 1512, was offered Twelve thouſand pounds a year for his Eſtates: leaving in his occupation all manors, houſes, caſtles, parks, woods, foreſts, and all the demeſne lands thereto belonging; the yearly value of which laſt might be worth more than many preſent Earldoms. . . . Some of them ſuffered for their adherence to the Houſe of Lancaſter. And Edward Seymour, Duke of Somerſet, unjuſtly deprived John, the ſixteenth Earl, of his Eſtates, which were however reſtored. But the greateſt waſter of them was Edward, the ſeventeenth Earl. Having a very intimate acquaintance and friendſhip with Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, condemned for his indiſcreet adherence to the Queen of Scots; He moſt earneſtly interceeded with his father-in-law, William Lord Burghley, to ſave that Duke's life. Which not being gratified in, he declared he would do all he could to ruin his own wife, a daughter of Lord Burghley; accordingly, he not only forſook her bed, but ſold and conſumed very nearly all his noble inheritance. But it was finely repaired by the great fortune which Aubrey, the twentieth Earl, had with his wife Anne, eldeſt daughter and one of the co-heireſſes of Paul Viſcount Bayning. For this Lord Bayning appears, by the authentic account of one of his ſtewards, now before us, to have been poſſeſſed of One hundred and ſeven thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeventy-ſeven pounds, clear; without reckoning the jewels, plate, and houſhold ſtuff. And this was in 1637, the year before that Lord's deceaſe (3).

(2) According to Sir Edward Coke, a Knight's fee contained 480 acres.—2. Inſt. 596.

rage might not want its due reward or diſtinction, the Lord Willoughby, who was 'General of the Engliſh after Leiceſter's departure, conferred the honour of Knight-'hood on Sir Francis Vere, whoſe great fame commenced from this ſiege (d).' In 1589, Count Mansfeldt having paſſed with part of his army into the Iſle of Bommel, was endeavouring to make himſelf maſter of that place. Count Maurice, General for the States, had not above eight hundred men to oppoſe the Spaniards, and the whole force he could draw together did not exceed 1500: whereas, the enemies troops were then reckoned about twelve thouſand men (e). In thoſe circumſtances, Count Maurice thought it beſt to abandon the place. But Sir Francis Vere, who commanded ſix hundred Engliſh, part of the aboveſaid corps of eight hundred, repreſented, that conſidering the importance of the iſland, and the reputation of Count Maurice, whoſe firſt command in chief this was, the place could not be abandoned, with honour, without the knowledge and order of the States General. Whilſt a meſſage was ſent to them, Sir Francis undertook the defence of the place, and uſed ſuch induſtry in entrenching it, and planting artillery, that the enemy deſiſted from the enterpriſe.

The ſame year, the town of Bergh, upon the Rhine, being beſieged by the Marquis of Warrenbon, and diſtreſſed for want of proviſion, he was ſent by the States General to Count Meurs, Governor of Gelderland, with nine companies of Engliſh; to concert with him meaſures for the relief of that town. At his coming to Arnheim, the Governor being greatly hurt by the blowing up of gunpowder, and the States of the Province repreſenting to Sir Francis the importance of the place, and the great extremity it was reduced to; at their earneſt deſire, he haſtened to its relief, with ſeven companies of foot of their own nation, and twelve troops of horſe. With theſe, and the carriages laden with proviſions, he marched towards Bergh, through a heathy and open country, with ſuch diligence, that having ſurprized the enemy, who lay diſperſed in their forts about the town, in full view of them, he put proviſions therein, and returned without loſs (f). After ſome days refreſhment, the States, who had received advice how matters paſſed at Bergh, ordered a freſh ſupply of proviſions to be put therein under the command of Sir Francis. When he came within two Engliſh miles of the town, the way they were to take being very narrow, and leading by the caſtle of Loo, the enemy from the caſtle galled his men and horſes in their paſſage with ſuch reſolution, that Sir Francis perceived they were not the ordinary garriſon. Yet, by his military ſkill and valour, he beat them back to their caſtle, and was no further interrupted by them in his paſſage through the narrow way: But, before he could well form his men on a plain adjoining, he was again attacked by a freſh body of the enemy. At the firſt encounter, his horſe was killed under him by a pike, and falling upon him, he could not riſe preſently, but lay between the two armies, receiving a hurt in his leg, and ſeveral thruſts with pikes through his clothes, till the enemy was forced to give way. Though his forces conſiſted only of the two Engliſh troops under his command, and did not exceed 400 men, yet by his valour and conduct, the enemy was diſcomfited, and loſt about 800 men. And he threw in proviſions into Bergh, and exchanged the garriſon, notwithſtanding Count Mansfeldt was near with thirteen or fourteen thouſand foot, and twelve hundred horſe (g). In 1590, he bravely relieved the caſtle of Litkenhooven in the fort of Recklinchuſen, with the dioceſe of Cologne, in which the States had a garriſon that was beſieged by ſome of the neighbouring inhabitants; and recovered the town of Burick in Cleves, and a little fort on that ſide of the Rhine, which had been ſurpriſed by the enemy. He took by ſtratagem, in 1591, a fort near Zutphen [C], in order to facilitate the ſiege of that town. And aſſiſted Count Maurice at the ſiege of Deventer, being the chief inſtrument in the taking of the place (h). Through his conduct and management alſo, chiefly, it was, that the Duke of Parma received a ſignal defeat before Knodſenburgh-fort, near Nimmeghen; which obliged him to retire from thence, with more diſhonour than in any action that he had undertaken in thoſe wars (i). In 1592 we find, that he was elected one of the Repreſentatives in Parliament for the burgh of Leominſter in Herefordſhire (k). How he employed himſelf the three following years, doth not appear; though he was undoubtedly all that time in the ſervice of the States. When the expedition againſt Cadiz was reſolved, he was ſent for into England; and returned ſpeedily into the Low-Countries, with letters from Queen Elizabeth to the States, to acquaint them with her deſign, and haſten the preparation of the ſhips they had promiſed to attend her fleet: And withal, to deſire to have two thouſand of her own forces, as well of thoſe in their pay, as her own, to be employed in that ſervice. This being obtained, he ſailed to the appointed rendezvous before Boulogne on the coaſt of France; but finding no Engliſh ſhips there, he croſſed to Dover, where he found the whole fleet, and the Generals, the Earl of Eſſex, and Earl of Nottingham High-Admiral, who received him

[C] He took by ſtratagem, in 1591, a fort near Zutphen.] Becauſe he wanted ſtrength to work by open means, he put the following ſleight in practice; which he pleaſed to take in his own words ... 'I choſe a good number 'of luſty and hardy young Soldiers, the moſt of which 'I apparrelled like the countrey-women of thoſe parts, 'the reſt like the men; gave to ſome baſkets, to others 'packs, and ſuch burthens as the people uſually carry 'to the market, with piſtols, and ſhort ſwords, and 'daggers, under their garments, willing by two or three 'in a company, by break of day to be at the ferry of 'Zutphen, which is juſt againſt the fort, as if they 'ſtayed for the paſſage-boat of the town; and bad them 'to ſit and reſt themſelves in the mean time as near the 'gate of the fort as they could for avoiding ſuſpition, 'and to ſeize upon the ſame as ſoon as it was opened. 'Which took ſo good effect, that they poſſeſſed the entry 'of the fort, and held the ſame till an officer with two 'hundred ſouldiers (who was laid in a covert not farre 'off) came to their ſeconds, and ſo became fully Maſter 'of the place. By which means the ſiege of the town 'afterwards proved the ſhorter (4).'

with much joy and favour, being then choſen to ſupply the place of Lieutenant-General of the army by the title of Lord-Marſhal. The fleet ſailed ſhortly after, and the Earl of Eſſex leaving his own ſhip, embarked in that which Sir Francis was in, on purpoſe to confer with him, fully and at eaſe, about the voyage. After two days ſailing, they landed near Rye, and the Earl taking Sir Francis along with him to Court, diſpatched him thence to Plymouth, where moſt of the land-forces were to march, to ſee them lodged, provided with neceſſaries, and exerciſed, which he accordingly did, to the great ſatisfaction of the Generals. During their ſtay at Plymouth, the Earl of Eſſex gave Sir Francis much countenance, and had him always near him; which drew upon him the envy of Sir Walter Raleigh, the Rear-Admiral, and Sir Coniers Clifford, the Sergeant-major General. But to allay it, the Earl ordered, that, in all meetings at land, Sir Francis ſhould have the precedence of Sir Walter; and Sir Walter of him at ſea. And, by Sir Francis's advice, what belonged properly to every office in the field was ſet down in writing, and delivered ſeverally to the officers, which prevented all ſubſequent diſputes. About the 10th of June, the fleet ſet ſail, and arrived before Cadiz July 1; Sir Francis acting as Vice-Admiral of the Earl of Eſſex's ſquadron (l). We ſhall not enter here into a detail of this expedition, of which a particular account may be ſeen in Hakluyt (m), in Camden's Annals (n), and our other Hiſtorians. We ſhall only obſerve, that he was one of the foremoſt, and the readieſt, to approach the enemy's ſhips (o)]D]. And equally active, induſtrious, and ſucceſsful was he, in getting poſſeſſion of the town of Cadiz [E]. He returned to England about the middle of Auguſt; and, after diſmiſſing the land-forces and ſhipping, and ſending back into the Low-Countries the troops he had brought from thence, he came to Court, where he remained the moſt part of that winter (p). However, he was again in Holland in January 1596-7, and the 24th of that month had a very great ſhare in the action near Turnhout, of which he hath given a fine and particular relation (q) [F]. This ſame year, he was engaged in a ſecond expedition with the Earl of Eſſex. The deſign of this expedition was, to deſtroy the fleet that lay in Ferrol, and other places on the coaſt of Spain, threatning to invade England; and, for that purpoſe, if occaſion was, to land troops: as alſo to intercept the Spaniſh fleet in their return from the Indies. Our armament conſiſted of the Royal Navy; ſome merchant-ſhips; ſeveral

[D] He was one of the foremoſt, and the readieſt, to approach the enemy's ſhips.] This is eaſily gathered from his own account. 'My ſhip (ſays he) was floaty, and 'ſtored with good ordnance, and proper for that ſervice, 'which made me haſten towards them, without ſtaying 'for any company. And indeed my readineſſe was ſuch, 'by reaſon of my riding with my anchor a pike, that 'no other ſhip could come near me by a great diſtance, 'ſo as I entered fight with them alone, making ſtill 'toward them upon one board, and ſo galled them 'with my ordnance, which was cannon and demi-'cannon, that they gave back, keeping ſtill in order, 'and in fight with me, drawing as near the town as 'they could, and with purpoſe (as I thought) as our 'ſhips thruſt further into the bay, to have fallen upon 'our ſmaller ſhips in the tayl of the whole fleet, and 'having made a hand with them, ſo to have put to the 'ſea-ward of us, the better to annoy us, and ſave 'themſelves from being blocked up. Wherein to pre-'vent them, I made toward the ſhore, ſtill ſounding 'with our leads, till the ordnance of the town might 'reach me, and I the ſhore with mine; inſomuch as I 'put them from under the town, and took certain 'ſhips, which rode there at anchor forſaken of their 'men, and followed them, continuing fight till they 'came under the fort of the Puntal. . . I was nearer Pun-'tal and the ſhore of Calis [Cales, or Cadiz] by much 'than any ſhip of the fleet, and further advanced into 'the Bay, ſo that now growing within ſhot of the fort, 'which lay on my right hand, and in like diſtance to 'the gallions on the left hand; and having the gallies 'a-head me, betwixt them both was plied with ſhot on 'all ſides very roundly, yet I reſolved to go on, know-'ing I had good ſeconds, and that many hands would 'make light work, &c. (5).'

[E] And equally active, induſtrious, and ſucceſsful was he, in getting poſſeſſion of the town of Cadiz.] The means he uſed for that purpoſe, be pleaſed to take in his own words. . . . 'As we approached aſſar off, ſaith he, we 'might perceive the enemy ſtanding in battle under 'the favour of the town, with cornets and enſigns diſ-'played, thruſting out ſome looſe horſe and foot to-'ward us, as it were to procure a ſkirmiſh. I, mark-'ing their faſhion, conceived hope of a ſpeedier gain-'ing the town than we intended, and were then about; 'and ſaid to his Lordſhip, at whoſe elbow I attended, 'that thoſe men he ſaw ſtanding in battel before the 'town, would ſhew, and make the way for us into the 'town that night, if they were well handled, and at 'the inſtant I propounded the means, which was to 'carry our troops as near and covertly as might be, 'towards the town, and to ſee by ſome attempt if we 'could draw them to fight further from the town, that 'we might ſend them back with confuſion and diſor-'der, and ſo have the cutting them in pieces in the 'town-ditch, or enter it by the ſame way they did. 'His Lordſhip liked the project, and left the handling 'thereof to me.' . . . And he executed it with great ſucceſs, as he proceeds particularly to relate. . . . . 'The ditch, ſays he, was very hollow, but dry, out of 'which was raiſed a maſſy rampier, with two round 'half bulwarks; the one towards the one ſea, the other 'towards the other, for height and thickneſs in their 'perfection, but not ſteeped and ſcarped; ſo as it was 'very mountable. . . . To the top of this rampier our 'men climbed, who, being for the moſt part old and 'experienced ſoldiers, of the bands I brought out of 'the Low-Countries, boldly attempted to climbe the 'wall, from which they beat with their ſhot the defen-'dants, wanting no encouragements that good exam-'ple of the chiefs could give them, the General him-'ſelf being as forward as any. Whileſt it was hard 'ſtroven and fought on that ſide, I ſent a Captain and 'countreyman of mine, called Upſher, with ſome few 'men alongſt the ditch, to ſee what guard was held 'along the wall towards the bay-ward, and whether 'any eaſier entrance might be made that way, or no, 'willing him to bring, or ſend me word, which he did 'accordingly, though the meſſenger came not to me. 'He found ſo ſlender a guard, that he entered the town 'with thoſe few men he had, which the enemy per-'ceiving, fled from the walls, and our men entred as 'faſt on the other ſide (6).'

[F] Of which he hath given a fine and particular relation.] See his Commentaries, p. 72, &c. The Lord Burghley calls it, 'an overthrow given by Count Mor-'rice and our Engliſhe forces commanded by Sir Ro-'bert Sidney and Sir Frauncis Vere, of a nomber of the 'King of Spaynes auncient ſoldiars, as the like hath 'not happened with ſuch ſucceſſe to the States ſynce 'the beginning of their warrs (7).'——Grotius ſays, this was ſo eaſy a victory, that the Conquerors loſt hardly ten men; but there were above 2000 of the enemies buried, and near 500 taken (8). Sir Francis himſelf informs us, that 'there were taken between 'fourty and fifty enſignes, and ſlain and taken of the 'enemy near three thouſand, and their Generall, 'Signieur de Ballancy, and Count de Warras, died on 'the place (9).'

furniſhed by the States of Holland, in all about 140; with an army of ſeven or eight thouſand land-men, as well preſſed as volunteers; and a thouſand of the Engliſh that were in the ſervice of the Dutch. Charles Blount, Lord Mountjoy, was appointed Lieutenant-General, which highly offended Sir Francis Vere [G], who had borne that office in the Cadiz voyage; however, he retained the title of Lord-Marſhal (r). They ſailed from Plymouth, July 9, but were driven back by a ſtorm, and detained about a month (s). Their proviſions failing, they diſcharged all the land-forces, except the thouſand men brought from Holland; and ſome propoſed a voyage to the Weſt-Indies, which Sir Francis oppoſed [H]. The Earl of Eſſex in the mean time went to Court; and, at his return, the deſign was purſued, of attempting to fire the Spaniſh fleet at Ferrol, and along the reſt of their coaſt; and to intercept their Indian plate-fleet. But a Council of war being called near the Groyne, it was reſolved to give over the enterpriſe of Ferrol, as not only difficult, but impoſſible; and to go directly to the Azores Iſlands, in queſt of the Spaniſh Indian fleet: from whence this came to be called the Iſland Voyage. They landed at Fayal, St Michael, Flores, and Gratioſa; loſing at the ſame time, by wilful miſtake, a large ſhip, which was a rich booty: and not being ſtrong enough to attempt the Spaniſh Indian fleet, that conſiſted of twenty ſail, and ſaved itſelf in the Port of Tercera (t). Sir William Monſon, the Earl of Southampton, and Sir Francis Vere, who were neareſt, gave them chace: and the two latter attempted to crowd into the haven with great boats at midnight, and to cut the cables of the neareſt ſhips, that they might be forced to ſea by the guſts which blew from the ſhore. But the Spaniards keeping a very ſtrict watch, that project miſcarried. So having taken only three Spaniſh ſhips, they returned from this unſucceſsful expedition to England [I], about the end of October (u). In the ſame year, he was appointed Governor of the Briel, one of the cautionary towns in the Low-Countries, through the intereſt of Secretary Cecil, and Sir Fulk Greville, and alſo of the Earl of Eſſex [K]. [G] Which highly offended Sir Francis Vere.] His own account will be the beſt, and moſt authentic. When the Earl of Eſſex acquainted him with it, though 'with 'much demonſtration of favour, and with many cir-'cumſtances of words;' . . . . 'I anſwered, ſays Sir 'Francis, that I had partly underſtood before my 'coming out of the Low-Countreys, my Lord Mount-'joy's going Lieutenant-General, ſo that I had fore-'thought and reſolved what to do. For though I was 'ſenſible, as became me, who ſaw no cauſe in myſelf, 'of this diſgrace, yet my affections having been always 'ſubject to the rules of obedience, ſince it was my 'Prince's action, and that it could not be but that my 'Lord Mountjoy was placed with her Majeſtie's con-'ſent, my ſincerity would not give me leave to abſent 'myſelf, and colour my ſtay from this action with any 'feigned excuſe; but counſelled me to come over, 'both to obey my Lord Mountjoy, and reſpect him 'as his place required, much more his Lordſhip, which 'was Generall to us both; though I was not ſo ignorant 'of his Lordſhip's power, as to doubt that my Lord 'Mountjoy, or any ſubject of England, could be thruſt 'upon him without his deſire and procurement. That 'therefore, as I had good cauſe to judge that his Lord-'ſhip had withdrawn much of his favour from me, ſo I 'humbly deſired his Lordſhip, that as by a retrench-'ment of the condition I was to hold in this journey, I 'held it rather a reſignment to his Lordſhip again of 'the honour he had given me the laſt yeare, ſo farre 'as concerned my particular reſpect to his Lordſhip un-'ſought for of me, then a ſervice to him; ſo hereafter 'he would be pleaſed not to uſe me at all in any ac-'tion, wherein he was to go chief (10).'

(10) Commentaries, p. 46, 47.

[H] Which Sir Francis oppoſed.] And for theſe very material reaſons: . . . Our 'fleet's being ſo ſlenderly 'provided with forces and proviſions, that nothing 'could be exploited there, anſwerable to the expecta-'tion would be generally conceived. And that in the 'mean time, through the want of her Majeſtie's Royal 'Navy, and other principall ſhipping of the realm, 'with the choice Commanders both for ſea and land, 'the State might be endangered by an attempt made 'by the Spaniards upon our own coaſt; whom they 'certainly knew to have then in a readineſſe a great 'power of ſea and land-forces in the north parts of 'Spain.'——This laſt reaſon was very material. For, 'on their return from the Azores, they met, toward the 'coaſt of Ireland, with two or three Spaniſh ſhips, full 'of ſoldiers, which they took: by which (adds he) we 'not only underſtood at our coming to Plymmouth their 'purpoſe to have landed at Falmouth with ten thou-'ſand men, but ſaw the inſtructions and orders of the 'ſea-fights, if they had met with us, which was ſo full 'of perfection, that I have ever ſince redoubted their 'ſufficiency in ſea caſes (11).'

[I] They returned from this unſucceſsful expedition to England.] Though there was no good underſtanding between him and the Earl of Eſſex, yet, at his firſt appearance to Court, he did not ſuffer his paſſions to get above Truth and Juſtice; of which take the account in his own words. . . . 'So ſoon as I was able to go 'abroad (12), I went to the Court, which was then at 'Whitehall; and becauſe I would uſe no bodies help 'to give me acceſſe to her Majeſty, as alſo that I de-'ſired to be heard more publickly, I reſolved to ſhew 'myſelf to her Majeſty, when ſhe came into the gar-'den; where, ſo ſoon as ſhe ſet her gracious eyes 'upon me, ſhe called me to her, and queſtioned with 'me concerning the journey, ſeeming greatly incenſed 'againſt my Lord of Eſſex, laying the whole blame of 'the evil ſucceſſe of the journey on his Lordſhip, both 'for the not burning and ſpoiling of the fleet at Faroll, 'and miſſing the Indian fleet. Wherein with the truth 'I boldly juſtified his Lordſhip with ſuch earneſtneſſe, 'that my voice growing ſhrill, the ſtanders by, which 'were many, might hear, (for her Majeſty then walk-'ed) laying the blame freely upon them that deſerved 'it. And ſome there preſent being called to confront 'me, were forced to confeſſe the contrary of that they 'had delivered to her Majeſty, inſomuch that I an-'ſwered all objections againſt the Earl, wherewith her 'Majeſty well quieted and ſatisfied, ſate her down in 'the end of the walk, and calling me to her, fell into 'more particular diſcourſe of his Lordſhip's humours 'and ambition; all which ſhe pleaſed then to conſtrue 'ſo graciouſly, that before ſhe left me, ſhe fell into 'much commendation of him, who very ſhortly after 'came to the Court. This office I performed to his 'Lordſhip to the grieving and bitter incenſing of the 'contrary party againſt me; notwithſtanding I had diſ-'covered his Lordſhip's coldneſſe of affection to me. . . . 'fearing more to incurre the opinion of ingratitude 'then the malice of any enemies, how great ſoever, 'which the delivery of truth could procure me (13).'

[K] And alſo of the Earl of Eſſex.] Sir Francis was ignorant of it. For he ſays upon this occaſion . . . . 'As I had good cauſe to doubt my Lord of Eſſex 'would not further me in that ſuit, ſo I was as loth 'to have any thing by his means in the terms I then 'ſtood in with his Lordſhip; much leſs by any other 'perſons that were known his oppoſers——He rather 'diſcouraged me than otherwiſe in the purſuit (15).'

——But in a letter of Rowland Whyte to Sir Robert Sidney, of November 5, 1597, we find this paſſage . . 'For the annexing of Brill to your government [of 'Fluſhing] upon the condicions you offer, of 5000 l. a 'yeare leſs, hath been already propounded to 1000

He was permitted, at the ſame time, to keep the command of the Engliſh troops in the ſervice of the States. In September, 1597, he went over, and took poſſeſſion of his Government (w) [L]. The December after, he was again in England, and reſorted frequently to Court, where he and Sir Edward Norris were gallantly followed, by the military Gentlemen (x). In February, 1597-8, a warrant was drawn, to take away from him the allowance of ten pounds a day as Serjeant-major of the field: He, and the Earl of Eſſex, uſed all their intereſt to have it ſtill continued, but the Lord Burghley was therein his aſſured enemy (y). The Queen ſent him, in 1598, to the States, upon the concluſion of a peace between France and Spain, to know whether they would come into that peace, or continue the war: they chuſing the latter, a new treaty was ſigned between England and Holland (z). And, the year following, when danger of an invaſion was apprehended from Spain, the Queen conſtituted him Lord-Marſhal: Being ſent for over in all poſſible haſte, he embarked, Auguſt the 22d, at the Briel, and came to London the next day, where he ſtaid till all apprehenſions of an invaſion were over. During his ſtay, he was propoſed, or mentioned, for Lord Deputy of Ireland. But the ſtrong factions between the two parties of Eſſex and Cecil, ſeem to have rendered his intereſt very fluctuating at Court (aa) [M]. The 21ſt of October he came back to the Hague; and had an audience of the States. In the beginning of the year 1600, there happened great uneaſineſſes and diſputes between him and the States, about matters of account [N]; and for their having leſſened, in his abſence, the companies he commanded for them, from a hundred and fifty to a hundred and thirteen men (bb). Happy was it for them, that they came not to an open rupture, nor did deprive him of the ſupreme command of their forces! For, to his undaunted valour and wiſe conduct was owing the ſignal victory, gained by their own and the Engliſh troops, on the 5th of July, 1600, near Newport. It was he that rallied and inſpirited thoſe troops, when they were giving way; and crowned them with certain victory [O]. The laſt and moſt ſignal military exploit performed by him, was his gallant defence

'[Earl of Eſſex] but he ſmiled at it, and wiſhed it 'were ſoe. He delt very earneſtly for Sir Francis Vere, 'but the Queen will not yeld unto it. My Lord Sheffild 'ſtill hopes to have it (16).'——

[L] In September, 1597, he went over, and took poſſeſſion of his government.] So he ſays in expreſs words (17). And yet Mr Camden affirms (18), that he and the fleet did not return till October: which we cannot tell how to reconcile.

[M] Seem to have rendered his intereſt very fluctuating at Court.] So we gather from the extracts of the following Letters of Rowland Whyte, agent at Court for Sir Robert Sydney, to the ſaid Sir Robert. In one dated from the Court, Nonſuch, Michaelmas-day, 1599, he writes thus: 'The States, if yt [the peace] goe forward, 'muſt have warning of yt, and I believe Sir Francis 'Vere will be ſent unto them about yt. He lives very 'darckly, for he comes very ſeldome here, and litle Speach 'of him. The Miſeries that his poore Regiments are in, 'both in Camp and in Zealand, is ſpoken of here; 'but the States is blamed for want of pay (19).'... In another letter, dated October 2, he has theſe words ... 'This peace with Spaine, is a thing very much 'deſired here; I beleve when her Majeſty is diſpoſed 'to harken unto yt thoroughly, ſhe will give ſome notice 'of yt to the States, and that by Sir Francis Vere, 'who is here, but comes not much to Court (20)..... And in another letter of the ſixteenth of the ſame month, he writes in a different ſtrain ... 'Sir Francis Vere is 'much graced at Court, and happy if this peace goe for- 'ward; that by the Warres he hath extremely enriched 'hymſelf to be able to live without yt (21).'——But what intereſt he had in particular with Secretary Cecil, and what his own diſpoſition was, will further appear from this part of another Letter to Sir Robert Sydney .... 'You are deſirous to be advertiſed of Sir Francis Vere's 'welcom here. Many kind Lettres paſt between Mr 'Secretary and him, while he was in the Low-Countries, 'and, at his arrival, he came to Mr. Secretaries, who 'brought him to the Queen, with whom he was long, 'and very graciouſly uſed; and true it is, that Mr. 'Secretary gives him all grace. My Lord Admirall (22) 'alſo brought him to the preſence, where all theſe 'ſaluted him, only my Lord Montjoy refraines ſpeak- 'ing to him; and my Lord of Suſſex (23) being in a 'corner of the preſence, my Lord Admirall ſhewed him 'to Sir Francis, but he never ſturd foote to goe towards 'him, but over his ſhoulder looked upon him, which 'the Earle tooke very ill, and began to chaffe at it. 'Yt was indeed here marvailed at, that the twenty 'companies came not to Flushing to be imbarqued; but 'I heare Sir Francis anſwered, that he wold not ſend 'any troopes of his, where their was ſo little love born 'him. He complaines, that your Lordſhip (24) went 'about to have his Comand from him; and when you 'cold not compas that, you wold have a regiment in 'the field, not to be comanded by him, which likewiſe 'the States wold not grant. And now when he was 'ſent for, it was writ unto him that you ſhuld ſay, that 'his coming over here was not to be emploied, but 'to anſwer ſuch contempts as were by him comitted 'towards my Lord of Eſſex; and that now againe you 'wold have his place from him (25). Laſtly, he be- 'leives that you were ſome cauſe of my Lord of Eſſex's 'unkindneſs towards him, by your aggravating of mat- 'ters; and ſaies, that the States had not ſo great an 'opinion of you, as you ſeme to aſſure to yourſelf (26).'

[N] In the beginning of the year 1600, there happened great uneaſineſſes and diſputes between him and the States about matters of account, &c.] For theſe matters of fact, we are indebted to the Letters juſt now mentioned. In one of September 22, 1599, we read as follows ... 'Sir Francis Vere hath written to the States, that he 'will be here ſhortly, but how he will lyke of the re- 'duction of his companies from 150 to 113, that is 'dowbtfull (27).' In another of Aprill 3, 1600—— 'I demanded of Monſieur Charon, why Sir Francis Vere 'was not in the field with his Excellency; he anſwered, 'that he grew too ſtately and ambitious, and, but for 'the reſpect was carried to ſome of his Frends here, 'he ſhuld find that he had offended the States by ſome 'late courſes (28).'.... 'He tells me, that the States 'will truſt no more 29 [Sir Francis Vere] (29).'.... 'It is reported here ſtill, that Sir Francis Vere is in 'diſgrace with the States, about matters of Ac- 'counts (30).... 'Yeſterday being Sonday, the Court 'was full that Sir Francis Vere will ſerve the States 'no longer; that he will come over to juſtify his 'actions (30).'

[O] And crowned them with certain victory.] The enemies forces were then weak and in mutinies, and their affairs in diſorder; which induced the States to carry the war into Flanders. The army of the latter conſiſted of about twelve thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe; and was divided into three parts, commanded by Count Erneſt of Naſſau, Count Solmes, and Sir Francis Vere; his troop conſiſting of one thouſand ſix hundred Engliſh, two thouſand five hundred Friſons, and ten cornets of horſe: with which troop he took his turn of vanguard, battle, and rereward, as it fell out. The ſiege of Newport was the firſt action they reſolved on: which the Spaniards advanced to hinder. And, partly the little canals which that country abounds with, and the many ſandy hillocks near the ſea-ſhore, rendered the ſituation of both armies very uneaſy and diſadvantageous. What ſhare he bore in the action, let us learn from himſelf—— 'To give our 'men the more courage, I went into the bottom amongſt 'them, where riding up and down, I was in their eyes 'both doing the office of a Captain and Soldier.—At defence of Oſtend; which was beſieged by the Archduke Albert, and a very numerous army, in 1601. To qualify him for that great employment, the States conferred on him the important office of General of all their army in and about Oſtend, with very ample power. Whereupon, he came to England, to obtain Queen Elizabeth's approbation; and leave, to raiſe 3000 of her ſubjects, at the States charge; and tranſport them into the Low-Countries in ten days warning, that is, by the 10th of May. He entered Oſtend, July 11, with eight companies of Engliſh, ſent him by Count Maurice, being part of the twenty Engliſh companies in his army; and found in the place thirty companies of Netherlanders, making about ſixteen or ſeventeen hundred men (cc). With this handful, (for no leſs than four thouſand were neceſſary for proper defence) (dd) he reſolutely defended the place againſt the Spaniſh army, which was computed at twelve thouſand men, until March 1601-2. During the courſe of this Siege [P], he received a reinforcement of twelve companies of Engliſh from Count Maurice: and cut out a new harbour [Q] at Oſtend, which proved of great ſervice to him (ee). The 14th of Auguſt, he was wounded in the head by the blowing up of a cannon; and that obliged him to remove into Zealand till September 19, when he returned to Oſtend, and found two thouſand Engliſh, and twenty enſigns of French, Walloons, Scots, and Friſons, that had arrived there in his abſence (ff). On the 4th of December, in the night, the Spaniards fiercely aſſaulted the Engliſh trenches, ſo that Sir Francis was called up without having time to put his clothes on: but by his conduct, the enemy were repulſed, with a loſs of about 500 men on their ſide (gg). In the mean time, the place began to be much diſtreſſed; for a hard froſt having ſet in about the 12th of November, with a ſtrong north-weſt wind, no ſhips, nor any ſuccours out of Holland or Zealand, could come to Oſtend. Sir Francis having advice, that the beſiegers intended a general aſſault; in order to put them off, and gain time, he artfully contrived to enter into treaty with them, for the ſurrender of the place (hh) [R]. But receiving

' my firſt coming I got one ſhot through my leg, and ' a quarter of an hour after another through the ſame ' thigh, which I then neither complained nor bragged ' of, nor ſo much as thought of any chirurgeon; for ' I knew if I left the place, my men would inſtantly ' quail. I therefore choſe (not having been uſed to ' have my troops foiled) to try the uttermoſt, rather ' then to ſhew them the way to flee, hoping ſtill for the ' coming of the Friſons and the horſe I ſent for. But ' their haſte was ſo ſmall, that my men, overlaid with ' number, forſook the place, notwithſtanding my beſt ' endeavour to ſtay them, haſting along the ſands to- ' wards our cannon, the enemy following them hard. ' I was forced, ſeeing them all going, to go for com- ' pany, with the laſt, uneaſily and unwillingly (God ' knows) and in the way my horſe fell dead under me, ' and upon me that I could not ſtirre: I had neither ' officer, gentleman, nor ſervant about me to give me ' help. Sir Robert Drury by chance came, and a ' gentleman, being a ſervant of his called Higham, ' drew me from under the horſe, and ſet me up behinde ' his maſter; which help came very ſeaſonably, for ' the enemy being near at hand when I fell, by this ' means I was ſaved out of their clutches. Thus I rode ' to the ordnance, where I found my brother Horace ' and the moſt of the officers that were living, with ſome ' three hundred foot. I made them ſtand from before ' the ordnance, and willed the Cannoniers to diſcharge ' upon the enemy that now ſwarmed upon the ſands, ' and at the ſame inſtant my own companie of horſe ' and Captain Balls coming thither, I willed them to go ' to the charge, and my brother with the foot to ad- ' vance and ſecond them home. This ſmall number ' of horſe and foot made an exceeding great change on ' a ſudden, for the enemy in hope of victory followed ' hard, and being upon the ſands, where horſe might ' ſerve upon them, were ſoon routed, moſt cut in pieces, ' the reſt ſaving themſelves by flight, as they could, in ' the downs, our men both horſe and foot followed ' them (32).' The fortune of the day being thus decided, Sir Francis began to take care of himſelf, who all this while having been undreſſed, the bloud leaking from him at four holes, together with a dangerous diſeaſe that had long held him, had made him extremely weak and faint. The enemy loſt above 120 enſignes, moſt of his foot ſlain, not many of his horſe loſt. On the States ſide in a manner the whole loſs fell upon the Engliſh, of which near 800 were hurt and ſlain, eight captains ſlain, the reſt all but two hurt, and moſt of his inferior officers hurt and ſlain (33).——The accounts we have of this Victory in the Letters of the Sydney-family, are as follow (34): . . ' The ennemy was over- ' thrown by the valor of the Engliſh, and the good ' direction of Sir Francis Vere, to whom his Excellency ' comitted the whole charge and comand of horſe and ' foote; and that the vanguard of the army kyled ' 5000 Spaniards, took 200 captains, and 110 coullers. ' Sir Franeis Vere hath gained a great deale of honor, ' and Prince Mores, in his lettre to the Queen, hath ' donne him right, attributing the victory to his good ' order and direction.'——' Sir Francis Vere's frends ' in Court doe highly comend the great ſervice he did ' the laſt battell, and have poſſeſſed her Majeſtie with ' it, who very often is hard to ſay, That ſhe holds him ' the worthies Capten of her time.'——' Yt is wondered ' here, by Sir Francis Veres frends, that the States have ' not preſented hym with ſome gifte of worth, either in ' plate or jewels, for the Victory he gott them that day, ' which preſerved their countrey from enſuing dangers.'

[P] During the courſe of this ſiege, &c.] Theſe remarkable occurrences are recorded to have happened . . . During the firſt month of the ſiege, the Spaniards diſcharged little leſs than thirty-five thouſand cannon-ſhot againſt the town (35). A bulwark, called the Sand-hill, was ſo thick ſtuck with bullets, that the ordnance could hardly ſhoot without hitting its former bullets, which like an iron wall made the latter fly in pieces up into the air: Yea, the bullets in it were ſo many, that they left no room to drive in paliſadoes, though pointed with iron; and ſome there were that would have undertaken to make the bulwark new, if they might have had the bullets for their pains (36). A gunner, more than once, ſhot a bullet into the mouth of a charged cannon; which, taking fire with the blow, returned the bullet inſtantly back again, attended with another of its own. As good a markſman was he (if he did it deſignedly) who, when a ſoldier of the town, having bought a loaf of bread was holding it up in a boaſting way, took away with a ſhot the uppermoſt half, leaving the other in the ſoldier's hand, who finding that he had received no hurt, ſaid ' it was a fair-conditioned bullet, for it had left him the better half behinde (37).'——John Carew, of Antony in Cornwall, a young Engliſh gentleman about twenty-three years of age, having in a ſally had one of his Arms ſhot off, he went and took it up, and brought back with him into the town unto the chirurgeon: and coming back to his lodging, ſhewed it, ſaying, ' Behold ' the Arm which but at dinner did help its fellow.' This he did and endured without the leaſt fainting, or ſo much as reſting upon his bed (38).

And therefore he expreſſed his uneaſineſs to Sir John Ogle, who hath given an account of this tranſaction (40), in the following manner . . . ' What think you? are we not in a fine taking ' here? ha! I will tell you, captain Ogle, there was ' never receiving part of the ſupplies he had long expected from the States, with an aſſurance of more at hand, he broke off the Treaty (ii) [S]. Thunderſtruck, and infinitely enraged at this diſappointment, the Archduke took a reſolution to revenge himſelf of thoſe within the town; ſaying, he would put them all to the ſword: His commanders and ſoldiers taking likewiſe an oath, that if they entered, they would ſpare neither man, woman, nor child. Accordingly, they made a general aſſault, on the 7th of January, 1601-2. But Sir Francis, with only about twelve hundred able fighting men, kept off the enemy's army of ten thouſand men; which threw that day above two and twenty hundred ſhot on the town: And had, before, thrown upon it no leſs than one hundred and ſixty-three thouſand two hundred cannon-ſhot, leaving ſcarce a whole houſe ſtanding (kk). Thus our brave hero having acquired immortal honour in the defence of Oſtend, for about eight months together, reſigned his Government, March 7, 1601-2, to Frederick Dorp, that had been appointed by the States to ſucceed him: And he, and his brother, Sir Horatio Vere, returned into Holland (ll). We ſhall only add, that this memorable ſiege laſted in all three years, and about a hundred days. Happy had it been for the ſoldiers, if the ſea had broke in and ſwallowed it up; for this place proved the common grave, though indeed a moſt glorious monument at the ſame time, to the beſt ſoldiers in the Low-Countries, Spain, France, England, Scotland, and Italy; whilſt they fought all the while for a mere barren

'never man of my fortunes and reputation (both which 'have been cleared hitherto) plunged in greater ex'treamity than I am now.'—Adding, 'that he was like 'a man that had both courage and judgment to defend 'himſelf, and yet muſt ſit with his hands bound, whileſt 'boys and devils come and box him about the ears. 'Yet this I will tell you too, (ſaid he) rather than you 'ſhall ever ſee the name of Francis Vere ſubſcribed in 'the delivery of a town committed to his cuſtody, or 'his hand to the leaſt article of treaty (though with 'the Archduke's own perſon) had I a thouſand lives, 'I would firſt burie them all in the rampier, yet in the 'mean while judge you of the quality of this our being.' ——However, to ward off ſo dangerous a blow as a general aſſault; to gain time for the ſuccours he impatiently expected, and that might poſſibly come every hour; as alſo to have an opportunity of repairing and ſtrengthening the works; he propoſed a treaty for ſurrendering the place. Commiſſioners were appointed on both ſides, one of whom was Sir John Ogle.——But to protract yet the time, Sir Francis uſed this ſtratagem: 'Cauſing a Gentleman that waited on him in his cham'ber to make an alarm at the entry of the Spaniſh com'miſſioners, He pretended thereupon treachery on their 'part (41); and made it the cauſe why he would nei'ther let them ſtay in the town, nor return the way 'they came. This bred diſputes, and meſſengers paſſed 'to and fro betwixt them and the Generall. In the 'mean time the flood came in, and the water waxed 'ſo high, that there was no paſſage that way without a 'boat; whereof there was none on that ſide of the town, 'nor any brought, for that had been to croſſe his own 'purpoſe. The Commiſſioners deſired earneſtly to be 'ſuffered to ſtay, though it were upon the worſt guard 'of the town; but it was denied: for he muſt rid him'ſelf of them; he could not do his buſineſſe ſo well, 'if their eyes and ears were ſo near him; he ſent them 'therefore to their friends on the Eaſt ſide, forecaſting 'wiſely, that e'er they could come there, and thence 'by the South to the Weſt ſide again, there to have 'admittance to his Highneſſe, and there to have the 'matter debated in council, he ſhould not only gain 'the whole winter-night, but moſt part of the next day 'for his advantage, which fell out according to that 'calculation; and beyond his expectation that it con'tinued longer.'—The reaſon of the General's proceeding in that unaccountable manner, was, 'To gain ſo 'much more time; for that was precious to him for the 'advancement of his works in the old town; to which, 'through the benefit of this ceſſation of hoſtility, he had 'now drawn moſt of the hands that could labour, giv'ing them ſpades to work, and order to have their 'weapons by them ready upon occaſion to fight; and 'he handled the matter ſo, that, e'er the Commiſſion'ers returned again, the old town and works were 'ſtronger by a thouſand men. He could not have done 'this (at leaſt ſo conveniently) had he begun conference 'with them at their firſt entrie, nor avoided that firſt 'conference, had he let them ſtay in the town, at leaſt 'he underſtood it ſo.'——This unaccountable Behaviour, one might naturally think, would have quite put an end to the Treaty. But Sir John Ogle, one of the Engliſh commiſſioners, who had not been let into the ſecret, managed it ſo with the Archduke, that the Commiſſioners were ſent again: And, this ſecond time, their reception 'was better than the firſt. For the 'General feaſted with them, and drank and diſcourſed 'with them; but came to no direct overture of article, 'though they much preſſed him. That part of the day, 'and the whole night, was ſo ſpent, and in ſleep. 'In the morning were diſcovered five ſhips out of Zea'land, riding in the road, that brought four hundred 'men, and ſome materials for the ſea-works. The men 'were landed, not without oppoſition, but without any 'hurt. And this pretext, of ſuccour from the States, 'the General took to break off the Treaty, which he 'had not yet really entered into: Whereupon the Com'miſſioners were diſcharged on both ſides (42).' —— The States, unacquainted with the General's deſign, were highly diſcontented at his Treating; imagining, that he was about making a ſeparate Peace between England and Spain; and even without the Queen's conſent (43).

[S] He broke off the Treaty.] And wrote this paper to the Archduke . . 'We have heretofore held it neceſ'ſary, for certain reaſons, to treat with the Deputies 'which had authority from your Highneſſe; but whileſt 'we were about to conclude upon the Conditions and 'Articles, there are arrived certain of our ſhips of warre, 'by whom we have received part of that which we had 'need of; ſo that we cannot with our Honour and Oath 'continue the Treaty, nor proceed in it; which we 'hope that your Highneſſe will not take in ill part; 'and that nevertheleſs, when your power ſhall reduce 'us to the like eſtate, you will not refuſe, as a moſt 'generous Prince, to vouchſafe us again a gentle audi'ence. From our town of Oſtend, the 25th of Decem'ber, 1601.

'Signed, Francis Vere.'

'Now, (as our Author goes on) whoſoever ſhall but con'ſider how many and how great difficulties the Archduke 'had ſtruggled with to maintain the ſiege; how highly 'concerned he was in point of honour, and how eagerly 'engaged in his affections; and what aſſured hopes 'he had of taking the town; will eaſily conceive that 'he muſt needs finde himſelf much diſcompoſed at ſo 'unexpected a diſappointment. He had already taken 'it with his eyes; and, as if he had bound the Leviathan 'for his maidens to ſport withall, under the aſſurance 'of the truce he walked the Infanta before the town, 'with twenty Ladyes and Gentlewomen in her train; 'as it were valiantly to ſtroke this wild beaſt, which 'he had now laid faſt in the toiles; and to look upon 'the outſide of the town before they entered into it (44).' ——Grotius adds, that all Flanders had flocked to ſee the ſurrender of the place as a certain ſpectacle. And repreſents the treaty as an unneceſſary, dangerous, and not very handſome piece of craft (45). Every ſtep of it might not indeed be conſonant to the Rules laid down by that excellent Civilian, in his book De Jure Belli & Pacis. But it was certainly an act of conſummate Generalſhip. And Dolus an virtus quis in hoſte requirit? Grotius's words are, 'Commovit Archiducem ea con'tumelia, quippe Flandria omnis velut ad certum ſpec'taculum potiundæ urbis concurrerat, & jam dicita fama 'propinquis regnis vagabatur. Nec ordinibus ſatis 'excuſata fraus per ſe indecora, ad hoc periculoſa magis 'quam neceſſaria.'

and fruitleſs ſpot of ground (mm). Soon after his diſcharge from the Government of Oſtend, Sir Francis, at the requeſt of the States, came to England to deſire freſh ſuccours; which went over in May, and were to be under his command (nn). He was a great favourite of Olden Barnevelt (oo). Upon receiving the news of Queen Elizabeth's death, he proclaimed King James I. at the Briel, in April 1603, and in June following came to England (pp). His Government of the ſaid town expiring, or being ſuperſeded at his good Miſtreſs's deceaſe [T], it was renewed to him by King James I. [V]. But, under that peaceable Monarch, Gentlemen of the ſword came to be leſs conſidered than under his martial predeceſſor. And they became almoſt uſeleſs to him, upon his making peace with Spain, in 1604. However, Sir Francis Vere could not live inglorious. But, after an honourable repoſe of about four years, he died quietly at home, Auguſt the 28th, 1608, in the fifty-fourth year of his age; and was buried in St John the Evangeliſt's Chapel in Weſtminſter-Abbey: where an uncommon monument was erected to his memory by his Lady [W]. Beſides his other preferments, he was Governor of Portſmouth (qq). His own glorious exploits, recorded by himſelf in his Commentaries [X], are the greateſt character and encomium of him that can be. However, the good account given of him by Sir Robert Naunton, we ſhall add in the note [Y]. He married Elizabeth, daughter and coheir of - - - - Dent, Citizen of London, who ſurvived him, and by whom he had three ſons and two daughters, John, Edward, Henry, Dorothy, and Elizabeth; all which died before him (rr).

But Sir William Broune, in a Letter to Robert Lord Sydney, tells him, 'that Sir Francis Vere, hearinge that he 'ſhold looſe his place, came himſelf to the Kinge, 'deſyringe to be lycenſed from the charge of the 'Brill (46).'

(46) Letters of the Sydney-family, Vol. II. p. 279.

[V] It was renewed again to him by King James I.] That it was at an end, in the beginning of that King's reign, is moſt evident from the patent then granted to him; which begins thus: 'Whereas the Toune of Brill 'in the Lowe Countries is nowe without a Governor, 'foraſmuche as we thinke meet and neceſſary, for the 'advancement of our ſervice in thoſe parts, to have 'the ſame place ſupplied by ſome perſonage of quality 'and guiffts fitt for a Chardge of that importance, 'Know ye &c. [W] Where an uncommon monument was erected to his memory by his Lady.] A print of it may be ſeen in Dart's and other Hiſtories of Weſtminſter-abbey. On a marble table, raiſed ſomewhat above the floor, reſts Sir Francis's ſtatue, as big as the life, on a quilt, all of figured alabaſter: Above which is a canopy of Lydian, or touch, ſtone, ſupported at the four corners on the ſhoulders of four knights in armour, kneeling on one knee upon the ground. And, on the canopy, are his helmet, vambrace, gauntlets, ſpurs and ſhield, of white marble exquiſitely wrought. Round the verge, is this epitaph, in gilt letters: 'Franciſco Vero, Equiti Aurato, Gal-'fredi F. Joannis Comitis Oxoniæ Nepoti, Brieliæ et 'Portſmuthæ Præfecto, Anglicarum Copiarum in Bel-'gio Ductori ſummo; Elizabetha uxor viro chariſſimo, 'quocum conjunctiſſime vixit, hoc ſupremum amoris 'et fidei conjugalis monumentum mœſtiſſima et cum 'Lacrymis gemens poſuit. But we find this other ingenious Epitaph made upon him:

'When Vere fought Death, arm'd with his ſword and ſheild, Death was afraid to meet him in the Feild:
But when his weapons he had laid aſide,
Death like a coward ſtrooke him, and he dy'd (49).'

[X] Recorded by himſelf in his Commentaries.] The title of them is, 'The Commentaries of Sir Francis 'Vere, being diverſe pieces of ſervice, wherein he had 'command, written by himſelf in way of Commentary.' They were publiſhed from the Author's original, compared with a copy in the poſſeſſion of the Earl of Weſtmorland, and another copy communicated by the Lord Fairfax, in the year 1657, by William Dillingham, D. D. finely printed by J. Field, Cambridge, fol. and adorned with very beautiful pictures of Sir Francis, and Sir Horace, Vere; Sir John Ogle; with maps, plans of battles, &c. At the end is ſubjoined, Sir John Ogle's account of the laſt charge at Newport battle; and his account of the parly at the ſiege of Oſtend; with a ſhort relation of ſome circumſtances during that treaty, by Henry Hexham. The Editor hath alſo continued the ſtory of that ſiege, from the time Sir Francis put up his pen, to the time that he put up his ſword there. ——At the end, is a relation of Newport battle, in elegant Latin, by Iſaac Doriſlaus; the ſame who was one of the Judges of the Court of Admiralty, and an aſſiſtant in drawing up and managing the charge againſt King Charles I. at his tryal (50).——In the beginning, the Editor gives the following juſt encomium of this work.

[Y] The good account given of him by Sir Robert Naunton, &c.] It is in theſe words. 'Sir Francis 'Vere was of the ancient and moſt noble extract of the 'Earles of Oxford: And it may be a queſtion, whether 'the Nobility of his Houſe, or the Honour of his Atchievements, might moſt commend him; but that we 'have an authentique Rule to decide the doubt:

Nam genus & proavos, & quæ non fecimus ipſi,
Vix ea noſtra voco . . . . .

'For though he were an Honourable Slip of that ancient Tree of Nobility, (which was no diſadvantage 'to his vertue) yet he brought more glory to the name 'of Vere, than he took of bloud from the Family. He 'was amongſt the Queen's ſwordmen inferior to none; 'but ſuperior to many: Of whom it may be ſaid, "To ſpeak much of him, were the way to leave out "ſomething that might adde to his praiſe, and to for-"get more that could adde to his Honour." I find 'not that he came much to the Court, for he lived almoſt perpetually in the Camp: but when he did, no 'man had more of the Queen's favour, and none leſs 'envied; for he ſeldom troubled it with the jealouſie 'and allarum of ſupplantations; his way was another 'ſort of undermining. They report, that the Queen '(as ſhe loved martiall men) would court this Gentleman as ſoon as he appeared in her preſence. And 'ſurely he was a Souldier of great worth, and commanded thirty yeares in the ſervice of the States, and 'twenty yeares over the Engliſh in chief, as the 'Queen's Generall: and he that had ſeen the Battail 'of Newport, might there beſt have taken him, and 'his Noble Brother, my Lord of Tilbury, to the 'life (51).'

VERE [HORACE], Baron of Tilbury, youngeſt brother of the preceding (a), was born at Kirby-Hall in Eſſex, in the year 1565 (b). He took to a military life from his youth (c), and accompanied his brother, Sir Francis, in his moſt ſignal exploits, being in courage equal, and in hazards undivided [A]. In the 20th year of his age, he with his brother, Sir Francis, then aged 31, went over with thoſe forces ſent the latter end of the year 1583, to the aſſiſtance of the States of Holland, and ſerved there in ſeveral actions with his brother, till he had the command of a regiment of foot; yet we don't find any particular mention made of him till the expedition to Cadiz, in 1596, wherein he embarked, and was knighted for his valour in taking of that ſea-port town (d). In 1597, he was in the Low-Countries in the ſervice of the States, and after the end of the campaign, lay ſick at the Hague (e). He continued there the following year, 1598, without any conſiderable action; but the enemy making ſtrong efforts in 1599, he greatly ſignalized himſelf in the campaign that year [B]. In 1600, he had a great ſhare in obtaining the victory at the famous battle of Newport (f); where, after Sir Francis, his brother, was wounded, he purſued the enemy, making great ſlaughter among them [C]. In 1601, he was with Prince Maurice at the ſiege of Rhineberg; and his brother, Sir Francis, being appointed General of the army employed in and about Oſtend, having orders for all the Engliſh to be ſent to him, Prince Maurice, not willing to part them from the ſiege, detached only eight companies under Sir Horace Vere, with which entering Oſtend, he had his ſhare in that memorable ſiege, and behaved with great conduct and intrepidity. After the parley on December 28, 1601, the Archduke made a general aſſault on the town (g), when Sir Horace Vere's ſtation was to maintain the Sand-hill, and defend the breach; Sir Charles Fairfax [D] being under him, with only twelve weak companies, whereof ſome had not above ten or twelve men; but had double arms, as pike and muſket, with ſtore of ammunition; all which was judged neceſſary for defending ſo dangerous a poſt. Yet it was performed with the loſs of a few men (h) in repulſing the enemy by a ſtratagem [E]. In this general aſſault, the Archduke loſt above two thouſand men, and among them many noblemen, &c.; but of the Engliſh were ſlain only forty, and about a hundred wounded, among which was Sir Horace Vere himſelf, in the leg. After this bloody ſhower was over, the fortifications were repaired; and on the 7th of March, 1602, Sir Horace, with his brother, embarked themſelves, their horſes and baggage being ſent before, having valiantly defended the town for above eight months againſt all the Archduke's power, and leaving it much better able to defend itſelf, than at their firſt coming thither; and both leaving behind them the marks of true honour and renown (i). The next news we hear of Sir Horace is, that he arrived at Fluſhing from England before the 20th of June,

[B] He ſignalized himſelf in the campaign 1599.] Sir William Brown, from Fluſhing, July 2, 1599, gives the following information to Sir Robert Sidney: 'Letters 'from Sir Francis Vere, and others, ſay, that June 24, 'by break of day, there was a half-moon made in 'the upper part of Bommel's-Waert, right againſt the 'iſland Voorn, not a league from a fort the enemy 'was building, who, about ſeven of the clock in the 'evening, gave a very hot aſſault upon it for near an 'hour. In the half-moon was Sir Horace Vere, and 'four companies of his regiment, with ſome French 'ſoldiers, who defended it with great valour, repulſing 'the enemy, who left behind them on the place eighty 'men; and, as reported by their own men, they loſt 'at leaſt 500 men in the aſſault. Our nation, continues 'Sir William, gained reputation, though they eſcaped not 'ſhot-free; Captain Upchar being ſlain, and ſeveral 'officers wounded (2).'

[C] He purſued the enemy, making great ſlaughter among them.] Sir John Ogle, in his account of the engagement, ſays, 'that he being advanced near 'the enemy, and their men ready to fall on them, Sir 'Horace Vere came on horſeback from purſuit of the 'enemy, whom the horſe had ſcattered (mentioned by 'his brother, Sir Francis,) and with 200 men, march-'ed along the Downs towards him, having with him 'his own Lieutenant-Colonel, Lowel, that commanded 'Sir Francis Vere's foot company, with other officers. 'And that Sir Horace willed him to join his forces, 'and give one good charge on that great troop of 'the enemy he ſaw ſtood firm before them, which 'they did accordingly, falling in pell-mell among 'them. And ſome troops of horſe ruſhing alſo in, 'they were preſently broken, and the ſlaughter was 'great on their ſide, as the execution eaſy to them (3).' Sir Charles, beſides his military abilities, was alſo a noted Antiquary, and particularly drew up a piece, intitled, Analecta Fairfaxiana, containing a very accurate account of the Fairfax family, which MS. was of great ſervice in reducing the pedigree of that family by the learned Antiquary, Mr Ralph Thoreſby, who congratulates his native town of Leeds in Yorkſhire, on the happineſs of having then reſident among them the Colonel's ſon, the learned and pious Thomas Fairfax, Eſq; 'who, ſays he, 'many years ago laid down his Commiſſion of Juſtice 'of Peace for the Weſt-Riding, and retired hither for 'devotion ſake; whoſe example, continues Mr Tho-'reſby, is at once both a happineſs and reproach to 'the neighbourhood, who cannot but obſerve him and 'his family, twice every day, going to attend the 'worſhip of God in his holy Temple there, in the 'moſt ſolemn manner, to offer up their prayers and 'thankſgiving to that God whoſe ſervice is perfect 'freedom (5).'

And when the Spaniards were climbing up the breach, they tumbled down among them much combuſtibles that were provided to impede them; the fight continued there hotter and hotter for the ſpace of above an hour, and they were ſo bravely repulſed, that they could not enter a man. On perceiving their retreat, the weſt ſluice was opened, out of which ran ſuch a torrent through the channel of the weſt haven, as carried many of their ſound, as well as wounded men into the ſea. 1603 (k), whence he ſet out the ſame night for the Hague to relieve his brother, Sir Francis, who was to embark for England. On his arrival there, Sir Horace joined the army under Prince Maurice, who being afterwards before Gertruydenburg, letters from the camp there of the 6th of Auguſt, N. S. brought advice of a quarrel between the Engliſh and French [F], wherein were ſlain of the Engliſh fifteen or ſixteen, and at leaſt thirty-ſix wounded; alſo as many of the French; and Colonel Bethune ſo hurt, that he died the next day (l): and that the fray continuing, the French would have been all ſlain, had not Sir Horace Vere come timely in to ſave them; and ſo great was the rage of the Engliſh, that his preſence could hardly prevail to ſtay their fury and revenge on the French; for neither the preſence of his Excellency Prince Maurice, or any other Commander, could quiet them, ſo greatly did they honour and love him. It does not appear, that any action happened during that campaign. But in 1604, Sir Horace again joined the army under Prince Maurice before Sluys, and from the camp, May 2, that year, wrote the letter, inſerted below, to Sir William Brown [G], with whom he had an intimacy, having, as it ſhould ſeem, been initiated by him in military diſcipline; for he ſubſcribed himſelf his loving ſon, yet was not allied to him. Sir William, by a letter to Robert Lord Sidney, dated at Fluſhing, July 12, acquaints him, 'that he had received a letter from Sir Horace Vere, on the 9th, from the Leaguers 'before Sluys, that a ſoldier, come out of the town, reported they were in great ſcarcity of 'proviſions, and were weak in their bodies for want of competent food to eat: alſo that the 'Governor would have made a ſally with 1500 men, which they refuſed, alledging their diſ-'abilities in weakneſs of their bodies (m).' Afterwards, by Sir Horace's good conduct, the town of Sluys was taken, overcoming difficulties, which, in the opinion of his friends, were impoſſible to ſurmount (n). In the campaign of 1605, he greatly ſignalized himſelf by his gallant retreat with 4000 men from Spinola, the Spaniſh General, when with three times that number he had graſped up Prince Maurice and his men againſt the ſea-ſhore (o) [H]. Sir William Brown, May 23, incloſed this letter to Robert Lord Sidney, obſerving, 'that therein due praiſe 'was given his Lordſhip's garriſon from Sir Horace Vere, 'who, ſays he, honourably gives witneſs of our men's beha-'viour.' And Captain Williams, in a letter to Sir William Brown, informs him; 'that on Saturday evening 'the enemy marched out of Sluys about 800 in two 'troops, and with them moſt of their ſlaves: when they 'came, continues he, within cannon-ſhot of our ſhipping, 'that lay in the drowned land, they made a ſtand; and 'after ſome ſtay, returned (without doing any thing) 'the ſame way they came, which was over the drowned 'land into the town. They came for two ends, firſt, 'to receive proviſion brought them out of Damm; 'the ſecond, to deliver their ſlaves to be led to Bruges; 'but their convoy did not come that night according 'to their expectation. The next day, at ſix in the morn-'ing, 3000 foot and 1500 horſe came with twenty-four 'waggons laden with meal to be delivered them, and 'to receive the ſlaves. His Excellency having intelli-'gence thereof, drew out his horſe, and the better 'part of his foot, with three field-pieces; the French, 'and the old Scotch regiment had the van-guard led by 'Count William; other Nations made the battle, and 'the Engliſh had the rear, for ſo it fell to be their 'turn, &c. After two hours ſtay, word being brought 'to his Excellency, that the groſs of the convoy were 'near paſſing over a moraſs towards Damm, he com-'manded Sir Horace Vere to draw off half the Eng-'liſh, and march to find the enemy: he thereupon 'drew off his own regiment and my troops, and when 'we came within ſight of the enemy, he bad me ſend 'my muſketeers, with a Lieutenant and a Serjeant. 'Our muſketeers, after two vollies, had no powder, 'and were on a retreat till I came in with the pikes, 'and then we went on again, and preſſed ſo hard the 'enemy, that they gave way; they had a river be-'tween them and us, which we paſſed, and I was in 'the way to follow the enemy, but Sir Horace Vere 'ordered me back. At my return I met his Excellen-'cy, who told me, if we had been an hour ſooner, 'we ſhould have had a good day: I ſaid, if we fol-'lowed them, we ſhould have a good execution; but 'for that they made haſte, and their retreat near, he 'judged it not convenient. Our men come to be in 'good order, and are glad of this ſmall buſineſs; I 'think we ſhall have more. We are all exceedingly 'bound to Sir Horace Vere; who doth me all the honour 'he can, and hath given ſtrict commandment, that 'none of his troops ſhall quarrel. I have loſt two 'men, and ſeven ſhot, and Lieutenant Zouch had his 'arm broken with a bullet on our firſt going on. As 'ſoon as we came to our quarter, Sir Horace ſent 'James to dreſs Lieutenant Zouch, and our ſoldiers: 'his care is much of us, and our loves muſt be as 'great to him. This ſiege will prove tedious, and 'produce many dangerous attempts by the difficult 'paſſage over (8).'

[H] He made a gallant retreat, &c.] Sir John Throgmorton, Lieutenant Governor of Fluſhing, in a letter from thence, dated October 5, 1605, to Robert Sidney, Lord Viſcount Liſle, has given the particulars thereof greatly to the honour of Sir Horace Vere, ſaying of him, 'that ſeeing their own horſe had abandoned their foot, 'and the enemy falling deſperately on their rear, he 'deſired Prince Maurice to let him, with thoſe of his 'nation, attack them. On which his Excellency 'giving him charge of the rear, and leaving him to 'make the retreat, he had no ſooner paſſed a river '(where his ſoldiers waded up to their middle) to 'come to the rear of the Dutch, and landed, but 'the enemy, with five or ſix troops of horſe, charged 'his three troops he had with him to favour his re-'treat, who thereupon ran all away, leaving Sir Ho-'race to receive them with only his foot; wherein he 'very bravely repulſed the enemy, and retired in 'good order to repaſs the aforeſaid river, in the rear

On the death of his brother, Sir Francis Vere, in 1608, he ſucceeded him as Lord General of the Engliſh forces in the Netherlands (p). And on the 18th of October, in the 7th year of King James, he was, by Letters patent under the great Seal of England, made ſpecial choice of (as therein expreſſed) to ſupply the place of Governor and Captain of the Town of Briel in the Low-Countries, and of all other forts thereunto belonging, and of all the garriſon and ſoldiers therein, or thereafter to be placed; with power to appoint a ſufficient Deputy or Deputies (q): which government his brother alſo had till the time of his deceaſe (r). A truce about that time had been made for twelve years between Spain and the States General, whereby they were in perfect tranquillity: but Sir Horace Vere being General of the Engliſh forces in the Netherlands, and Governor of the Briel, he was for the moſt part out of England till the latter end of King James's reign (s). In 1616 he was commiſſioned, May 22 (t), to render and yield up, into the hands of the States of the United Provinces, the town of Briel, and all the forts and ſkonces thereunto belonging, whereof he had then the charge, by virtue of the King's letters patent, together with all the Artillery and Ammunition remaining there, obſerving and performing, in all points, ſuch inſtructions as he ſhould receive under the hands of the Lords of the Privy-Council, concerning the rendering up the ſaid town, &c. However, the King, in conſideration of his ſervices, and the loſs of that Government, allowed him a penſion (u), as he did to Robert, Earl of Leiceſter, who had been Governor of Fluſhing [I]. [K] He attended prince Maurice to Utrecht againſt the Arminians, &c.] This expedition, with its conſequences, is one of the moſt memorable events in the hiſtory of the United Provinces. The famous ſynod of Dort, The utter extirpation of Arminianiſm, The eſtabliſhment of Calviniſm, The execution of that eminent Patriot Barnevelt, Grand Penſioner of Holland, And the impriſonment of the celebrated Hugo Grotius for life, all followed as the natural fruits of it. And as the ſtate of religion in England was likewiſe nearly connected with it, and the importance of Sir Horace's ſervice at Utrecht cannot otherwiſe be perfectly underſtood, we ſhall give a conciſe account of it as follows.

In 1608, while the Truce between the Spaniards and the United Provinces was negotiating, Arminius, an eminent Profeſſor at Leyden, began to broach his doctrine, which was warmly oppoſed by Gomar, another Profeſſor in the ſame univerſity. The doctrine of Arminius being directly oppoſite to that of Calvin, he was accuſed before the ſynod of Rotterdam, in which Gomar's party prevailed. Hereupon Arminius applying to the States of Holland and Weſt Frieſland to take cognizance of the diſpute, Gomar was ſummoned, together with him, before theſe Magiſtrates, who promiſed to have the affair diſcuſſed in a ſynod; but the Grand Council reporting to the State, that the whole diſpute was about ſome obſcure queſtions concerning Grace and Predeſtination, Barnevelt happened to ſay, he thanked God that the fundamental points of religion were not in queſtion, which was warmly reſented by Gomar (11). Arminius died October 10, 1609 (12); but his Partizans drew up a Remonſtrance, dated January 14, 1610, containing a Confeſſion of their faith, comprehended in five articles (13). On the other hand, the Gomariſts oppoſed to it a Contra-remonſtrance. Hence aroſe the names of Remonſtrants, and Contra-Remonſtrants. And the diſpute ſtill continuing with much bitterneſs, the States of Holland, who were made uneaſy thereby, convened, in 1611, ſix of the principal Divines of each party to diſpute before them on the points in queſtion; which being done, the States, without determining any thing, recommended to them to live in peace; but enjoining them to deliver their thoughts of the moſt proper means thereto. The Remonſtrants propoſed a Toleration, the Contra-Remonſtrants a National Synod. Both which opinions being laid before the States, they declared for a Toleration: thus the cauſe was gained to the Arminians; but the Gomariſts were favoured by the people, and grew very factious. Hereupon the Grand Penſionary Barnevelt, imagining that, if they made themſelves maſters of the election of miniſters, the States would inſenſibly appeaſe theſe troubles, propoſed the revival of an obſolete regulation made in 1591, by which the Magiſtrates and Conſiſtory were each to nominate four perſons, who ſhould chuſe a miniſter to be afterwards preſented to the Body of the Magiſtrates, who might receive or reject him. This motion was agreed to by the States, to the great mortification of the Contra-Remonſtrants, who complained that the States had exceeded their power. Hence aroſe a grand conteſt, who ought to be Judge in eccleſiaſtical matters. The Arminians attributed this power to the Civil Magiſtrate: The Gomariſts to the Clergy alone. Hence aroſe a ſeparation between them (14); each party ſeizing the churches of their adverſaries, ſtirring up ſedition, writing libels, &c. Theſe violences gave birth to a ſchiſm; ſome joining the old miniſters, and others the new.' In this time of confuſion Grotius was nominated Penſionary of Rotterdam, and ſent into England. It is imagined (15) he had ſecret inſtructions to get the King and the principal Divines to favour the Arminians, and approve the conduct of the States. He had ſeveral conferences with his Majeſty on that ſubject (16). But at his return to Holland he found the diviſions increaſed. Barnevelt and he having the direction of the proceedings of the ſtates in this matter, he was appointed to draw up an Edict which might reſtore tranquillity. It was approved by the States, and contained in ſubſtance, 'That, whereas ſeveral Divines 'had taught, that God has created ſome men to damn 'them; that he has laid certain men under a neceſſity 'of ſinning; that he invites ſome men to ſalvation to 'whom he is reſolved to deny it: That other Divines 'were charged with teaching, that men's natural ſtrength 'or works may operate their ſalvation. It is hereby 'ordained, that theſe doctrines be condemned by the 'Paſtors, both from the pulpits and on all other ſeaſon-'able occaſions. But as to thoſe who only believe and 'teach, that God hath from all eternity choſen to ſal-'vation, from the mere motion of his will through 'Jeſus Chriſt, thoſe who by Grace, which they have the assistance of the King of Bohemia, he had the command of them conferred on him by King James, laying aside Edward Cecil, who was first designed. In consequence of this command,

'not merited, and by the operation of the Holy Spirit, 'believe in Christ, and, by free grace given, persevere 'in the Faith to the end, We will (says the Edict) that 'they be not molested on that account, nor pressed to 'embrace other sentiments, or teach other doctrine. 'For we judge these truths sufficient for salvation, and 'proper for the instruction of Christians (17).' The States were very desirous that the King of Great Britain and the English Bishops should be satisfied with the manner in which they had explained themselves in this Edict; they were the more anxious, as they had reason to believe James unfavourable to the Arminians (18). However, the King, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishops, allowed the doctrine of the Edict to be orthodox, and equally distant from Manicheism and Pelagianism: the only thing which gave the King some pain, was to see the Civil magistrate assume a right of making decrees in matters of religion (19). But this Edict served only to increase the troubles, by driving the Gomarists, against whom it was manifestly levelled, into despair. The riots which had already happened, and which they hourly apprehended, made the Grand Pensionary Barnevelt propose to the States of Holland, that the Magistrates of the cities of the province should be empowered to raise troops for the suppression of the Rioters, and the security of their towns. Dort, Amsterdam (20), and three others of the most favourable to the Gomarists, protested against this step, which they regarded as a kind of declaration of war against the Contra-Remonstrants. Barnevelt's motion was nevertheless agreed to; and on the 4th of August, 1617, the States issued a placard accordingly. This fatal decree occasioned the death of the Grand Pensionary, and the ruin of Grotius, by incensing Prince Maurice of Nassau against them, who looked upon the resolution of the States, taken without his consent, as derogatory to his dignity of Governor and Captain-General. He had entertained a mortal enmity for several years against the Grand Pensionary (21), who concluded the truce in 1609 without his concurrence. Hitherto he had stifled his revenge for want of a proper opportunity to execute it; but it blazed openly on occasion of this decree of the States, which he considered as Barnevelt's act. He accused him of labouring to diminish his authority, found fault with the Edict drawn up by Grotius (22), declared publickly for the Gomarists, assisted at Divine service only in their Churches, and forbad the Soldiers to obey the States, when they would employ them to appease the riots. Some towns however, whether they suspected their garrisons, or found there was no other way to suppress the rioters, levied men in consequence of the States decree. The Contra-Remonstrants, seeing themselves powerfully protected by Prince Maurice, separated from the communion of the Arminians in 1617.

The States of Holland, wholly employed in seeking ways to compound matters, had come to a resolution, February 21, this year, to have a proper Formula drawn up, to which the Ministers of the two parties should be obliged to conform; that it should be sent first to Prince Maurice, and then presented to the States for their examination; and such a Formula was accordingly prepared by Grotius. But this project did not please the Prince; he wanted a National Synod; and the States General, entirely devoted to him, determined, in spite of the States of Holland, to convoke a National Assembly in Holland itself, at Dort (23). In the mean time Prince Maurice, who saw, with the utmost displeasure, several cities, agreeable to the permission granted them by the particular States, levy a new Militia without his consent, engaged the States General to enjoin the disbanding of those levies, which were stiled the Attendant Soldiers. And when these orders were not obeyed by the particular States (24), the Prince, considering this conduct as a rebellion, concerted with the States General, that he should march in person, with the troops under his command, to get these soldiers disbanded; that he should depose the Arminian Magistrates, and turn out the Ministers of their party. He accordingly set out, accompanied by the Deputies of the States General, in 1618, and, beginning with the province of Gueldres, he removed from the senate of Nimeguen all who were known or suspected to favour Arminianism, and turned out the Ministers, obliging them instantly to leave the Town. At Overyssel he met with no opposition. In Arnheim there was a numerous garrison of Attendant Soldiers; but the Prince, having intelligence from within the place, got into it by night; and the soldiers, seeing themselves betrayed, laid down their arms. Some Senators were deposed, and the Secretary of the Council banished the city. The States of Holland, knowing that the Prince was to treat Utrecht in the same manner, sent thither Grotius, and Hoogerbetz, Pensionary of Leyden, with instructions to consider and resolve on some method of opposing the commission given by the States General to the Prince, and to consult in what manner the Union between the particular State of the Provinces might be strengthened for their mutual aid and assistance (25). In consequence of these advices, the Magistrates doubled the guards at the gates, and armed all the militia they could assemble. Every thing seemed ready for enabling the city to make a vigorous resistance. The Burghers had taken up arms, and the Attendant Soldiers were posted in the principal quarters of the town. These dispositions did not divert the Prince from his design of seizing it. The old garrison, from a jealousy of the new, declared for him; this occasioned a mutiny: some of the Burghers left the interest of the city, which being unprovided of good officers, the Prince and the Deputies of the States found means to enter and reduce it. Being then Master of the town, he disbanded the Attendant Soldiers, made Leydenberg Secretary of the States (26), and some Senators prisoners, and turned out of their places those who had distinguished themselves by their resistance, putting in their room such as he could depend on. Nor was the Prince of Orange's (27) revenge so satisfied. The destruction of the Grand Pensionary he had resolved on; and, in that spirit, having procured an ordonnance of the States General, Barnevelt was seized on the 29th of August this year, 1618, and thrown into the castle of the Hague, as were Grotius and Hoogerbetz about the same time (28). Some days after these imprisonments, the Prince of Orange and the Deputies of the States General made a tour through the towns of Holland, where the Prince deposed such Magistrates as were relations or friends of the three illustrious prisoners, putting in their places others that were wholly devoted to him, and obliged some towns to receive a garrison, particularly Rotterdam. The Arminians had hitherto been the most powerful party (29) there, and had excluded the Contra-Remonstrants from preaching in the great church. But the Prince took that church from them, and gave it, with all the rest, to the Gomarists, except two only which were left to the Arminians. He placed a garrison of a hundred men in the town, and turned out and banished the Ministers who had appeared most zealous for Arminianism, such as Vorstius, Utengobard, and Episcopius. The warmest opposers of a National Synod being thus disabled from giving any further obstruction, the States General proceeded to the holding of it, and it was opened on the 15th of November, 1618, at Dort (30), wherein Episcopius and the other Arminian ministers were deposed, and Calvinism established.

The three prisoners were not brought to their trial till after the rising of this synod. But twenty-six Commissioners were appointed to be the Judges on the 19th of November. They began with Barnevelt, who was sentenced on the 12th of May, 1619, to lose his head. And this sentence was executed upon him the next day. The scaffold for his execution was erected in the court of the castle at the Hague, facing the Prince of Orange's apartments. After a short speech (31) to the people, the executioner struck off his head at one blow. It is affirmed, that the Prince of Orange, to feast himself with the cruel pleasure of seeing his enemy perish, beheld the execution with a glass. The people looked on it with other eyes. Many came to gather the sand, wet with his blood, to keep it carefully in phials; and the crowd of those who had the same curiosity continued the next day, notwithstanding all possible means were used to hinder them.

Five days after came on the trial of Grotius (32), which concluded in a sentence, pronounced May 18, 1619, condemning him to perpetual imprisonment, and the confiscation of his estate (33). In consequence of this sentence, he was carried from the Hague to the fortress

(17) This Edict being warmly attacked by the Contra-Remonstrants, Grotius reprinted it, with a collection of passages, justifying it against their censures. He afterwards wrote a defence of that decree, which he did not finish; but, on occasion of the dispute concerning the power of Sovereigns, he composed a considerable treatise, and had before handled that subject in a tract on the rights of the States of Holland.

(20) Grotius was sent to this town to reconcile them to these proceedings: he laboured with all his might; but in vain; the grief for which threw him into a fever, which had well nigh carried him off. His speech on this occasion was translated into Latin by Schrivelius, and is in the third tome of his Theological works.

(22) The substance of which was, that the five Articles should be examined in a Synod of Holland, and the decision carried to a Synod of all the Provinces; that, previous thereto, the sovereignty of all the provinces should be settled: that nothing should be fixed without an unanimous consent: that, if they could not agree, a general council of all the reformed churches should be convened: and that, in the mean time, a severe edict should be published against rioters and the authors of defamatory libels.

(23) The provinces of Holland, Utrecht, and Overyssel, protested against this resolution; and Barnevelt was so thunderstruck by it, that he would have resigned his place of Grand Pensionary; but was prevailed upon to continue in it by the earnest desire of the province. Grotii manes, p. 78.

(25) Grotius and Hoogerbetz promised they should not be abandoned by the States of Holland, from whom they brought letters, persuading them, that it was their duty to obey the States of Utrecht who paid them, and to resist the Stadtholder.

(26) Upon hearing of the imprisonment of Barnevelt, Grotius, and Hoogerbetz, and the banishment of Vorstius, Utengobard, and Episcopius, he was so terrified, that he made away with himself in prison.

(32) His accusation consisted of twenty-nine articles, confessed by himself. The chief of which was his opposing the Synod of Dort, being active in raising the Attendant Soldiers, and particularly in the resistance against the Prince of Orange at Utrecht.

fortreſs of Louveſtein near Gorcum in South Holland, at the point of the iſland formed by the Vahal and the Meuſe, on the 6th of June following. He had been above eighteen months ſhut up in this fortreſs, when, on January 11, 1621, Muys-Van-Holi, his declared enemy, who had been one of his Judges, informed the States General, that he had advice from good hands, that their priſoner was ſeeking to make his eſcape. Some perſons were ſent to Louveſtein to examine into this matter: but, notwithſtanding all the enquiry that could be made, they found no reaſon to believe that Grotius had laid any plot to get out.

His wife however was wholly employed in contriving how to ſet him at liberty (34). He had paſſed his time in the proſecution of his ſtudies, and for that purpoſe had been permitted to borrow books of his friends, which, when he had done with them, were carried back in a cheſt with his foul linnen that was ſent to Gorcum to be waſhed. The firſt year his guards were very exact in examining the cheſt, when it went from Louveſtein; but, being uſed to find in it only books and linnen, they grew tired of ſearching, and did not take the trouble to open it. Grotius's wife, obſerving their negligence, purpoſed to take advantage of it. She repreſented to her huſband, that it was in his power to get out of priſon when he pleaſed; if he would put himſelf in the cheſt that carried his books. However, not to endanger his health, ſhe cauſed holes to be bored oppoſite to the part where his face was to lie, to breath at; and make him try if he could continue ſhut up in that confined poſture as long as it would require to go from Louveſtein to Gorcum. Finding it might be done, ſhe reſolved to ſeize the firſt favourable opportunity. It ſoon offered. The Commandant of Louveſtein going to Heuſden to raiſe recruits, Grotius's wife made a viſit to his Lady, and told her in converſation, that ſhe was deſirous of ſending away a cheſt full of books; for her huſband was ſo weak, it gave her great uneaſineſs to ſee him ſtudy with ſuch application. Having thus prepared the Commandant's wife, ſhe returned to her huſband's apartment, and, in concert with a valet and a maid, who were in the ſecret, ſhut him up in the cheſt. At the ſame time, to prevent any ſurprize in the people's not ſeeing him, ſhe ſpread a report that he was ill. Two ſoldiers carried the cheſt: one of them, finding it heavier than uſual, ſaid, There muſt be an Arminian in it (35). Grotius's wife, who was preſent, anſwered with great coldneſs, There are indeed Arminian books in it. The cheſt was brought down on a ladder with great difficulty. The ſoldier inſiſted on its being opened to ſee what was in it; he even went and informed the Commandant's wife, that the weight of the cheſt gave him reaſon to think there was ſomething ſuſpicious contained in it, and that it would be proper to have it opened. Whether it was that ſhe was willing to wink at the thing, or through negligence, ſhe would not conſent: ſhe told him, that Grotius's wife had aſſured her, there was nothing but books in it. It is affirmed, that a ſoldier's wife who was preſent ſaid, there was more than one example of priſoners making their eſcape in boxes. The cheſt however was put into the boat, and Grotius's maid, who was in the ſecret, had orders to go with it to Gorcum, and put it into a houſe there. When it came to Gorcum, they wanted to put it on a ſledge; but the maid telling the boatman there were ſome brittle things in it, and begging of him to take care how it was carried, it was put on a carriage called a horſe, and brought by two chairmen to David Dazelaer's, a friend of Grotius, and brother-in-law to Erpenius, having married his ſiſter. When every body was gone, the maid opened the cheſt. Grotius had felt no inconvenience in it, though it was not above three feet and a half long. He got out, dreſſed himſelf like a maſon, with a rule and a trowel, and went by Dazelaer's backdoor, through the market-place, to the gate that leads to Valvic in Brabant (36). At this place he made himſelf known to ſome Arminians, and hired a carriage to Antwerp, taking the neceſſary precautions not to be known by the way. He alighted at Antwerp, at the houſe of Nicholas Grevincovius, who had been formerly a miniſter at Amſterdam, and diſcovered himſelf to no body elſe. It was on the 22d of March, 1621, that Grotius thus recovered his liberty; and on the 30th of that month he wrote to the States General, that, in procuring it, he had employed neither violence nor corruption with his keepers; that he had nothing to reproach himſelf with in what he had done (37); that he gave thoſe counſels which he thought beſt, for appeaſing the troubles that had ariſen before he was concerned in public buſineſs; that he only obeyed the Magiſtrates at Rotterdam, his maſters; and the States of Holland, his ſovereigns; and that the perſecution he had ſuffered would never diminiſh his love to his country, for whoſe proſperity he heartily prayed. After a few weeks ſtay at Antwerp, he went by invitation to Paris, where he arrived in ſafety on the 13th of April, 1631. Grotius's eſcape exerciſed the pens of the moſt famous poets of that time (38); and he himſelf wrote ſome verſes on his happy deliverance (39); and others alſo on the cheſt to which he owed his liberty; and in the latter part of his life he was at great pains to recover it (40). It was believed at Louveſtein, for ſome time after his eſcape, that he was ill; and, to give him time to get clear off, his wife gave out that his illneſs was dangerous; but as ſoon as ſhe learnt, by the maid's return, that he was in Brabant, and conſequently in ſafety, ſhe told the guards the bird was flown. They informed the Commandant by this time returned from Heuſden, who haſtened to Grotius's wife, and aſked her where ſhe had hid her huſband? She anſwered, he might ſearch for him: but, being much preſſed, and even threatened, ſhe confeſſed that ſhe had cauſed him to be carried to Gorcum in a book-cheſt: and that ſhe had done no more than kept her word to him, to take the firſt opportunity of ſetting her huſband at liberty. The Commandant, in a rage, went immediately to Gorcum, and, acquainting the Magiſtrate with his priſoner's eſcape, both came to Dazelaer's houſe, where they found the empty cheſt. On his return to Louveſtein, the Commandant confined Grotius's wife more cloſely; but ſhe preſenting a petition, April 5, 1621, praying her diſcharge, and Prince Maurice, to whom it was communicated, making no oppoſition, the majority were for ſetting her at liberty (41). Accordingly ſhe was diſcharged two days after, and ſuffered to carry away every thing that belonged to her at Louveſtein. This done, ſhe followed her huſband, and arrived at Paris in October, 1621 (42).

We have been more particular in ſetting forth the violent ſteps taken in bringing about this revolution in Holland by Prince Maurice, ſince they furniſh ſo many glaring proofs of his temper and principles in reſpect to religion: and therein are alſo ſeen the religious principles of Sir Horace Vere. He was entirely devoted to the Prince, who on his ſide was equally fond of him. We have ſeen him heartily concur in ſuppreſſing the Arminians and eſtabliſhing Calviniſm at Utrecht; and I believe it will not be doubted that he had imbibed the principles, though without the perſecuting revengeful ſpirit, of his Commander. But it is well known, that the doctrine of the Remonſtrants, upon the points of Grace and Predeſtination, was embraced at this very time by ſome of the moſt emient Divines in England, particularly Dr Overal, the learned Biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry, whoſe example muſt have had great weight with many of the clergy: and though it is true, Calviniſm was in general the doctrine of the church, as expreſſed in the articles of Faith, as long as King James, who had been bred in Scotland, held the crown, yet, in his Succeſſor's reign, this doctrine began early to be diſapproved, and in ſome years that of Arminius ſo generally prevailed, by the influence eſpecially of Dr Laud, afterwards Archbiſhop, that the Church of England might truly be ſaid to be Arminian, notwithſtanding ſeveral eminent perſons ſtill retained the Dutch principles. Among theſe muſt be reckoned Sir Horace Vere, who (by long reſiding among thoſe people, and through his devotion to the Prince of Orange) being a Calviniſt, would certainly breed up his children there in the ſame belief in particular, together with ſome antiepiſcopal principles in general, who would thereby unavoidably contract a diſlike to the Church of England. And the ſame is confirmed by Lord Clarendon (43), particularly in the caſe of Sir Horace's daughter Anne, who was married to Fairfax, General of the Parliament's army, and who, as that noble hiſtorian obſerves, having been bred in Holland, had not that reverence for the church of England as ſhe ought to have had, and ſo had unhappily concurred in her huſband's entering into rebellion. However, his Lordſhip makes this apology for her, that ſhe never imagined what miſery it would bring upon wrote the Life of King James the Firſt, and was in the Expedition, has given an account of it, which the Reader will find below [L]; and there ſee the reaſon of the ill ſucceſs of it. After which, during the army's being in winter-quarters, the Imperial forces, under Bavaria and Buquoy, advanced towards Prague, and the Bohemians quitted their garriſons to make their army more compleat. On the 8th of November, both armies met for the deciſion of King Frederick's fate. The Bohemians ſtood on the advantage-ground between the Imperialiſts and Prague, but the enemy breaking through, ruined their whole army, and purſued the victory. The King and Queen, ſurpriſed with the diſcomfiture among a wavering people, in a city not defenſible, were conſtrained to fly the next morning. The Engliſh were too far diſtant to be in the battle, and before they heard of it, the Earl of Eſſex paſſed through Lorrain, and through France poſted into England, to ſollicit the King to ſend thoſe regiments promiſed, and other ſupplies. The Princes of the Union, when they heard of the defeat, had not ſo much faith as to depend on King James for aſſiſtance; but before the ſpring, ſubmitted themſelves to the Emperor, leaving the almoſt ruined Palatinate as a prey to an inſulting enemy. Sir Horace Vere, with the Engliſh, only gave ſpirits to the vital parts of it (z). The Earls of Oxford and Eſſex left Sir Horace in his winter-quarters, and upon their narration of the ſtate of affairs in thoſe parts to the King, he called a full Council together to conſider thereof, who met at Whitehall, Jaupon the kingdom; and that ſhe utterly abhorred the proceedings of the pretended High Court of Juſtice againſt his Majeſty as much as any body could do. Of which his Lordſhip gives a moſt remarkable inſtance, well worth peruſing, as inſerted in this work (44), where it well deſerved a place.

[L] He went to the aſſiſtance of the King of Bohemia.] The account is in theſe terms: 'While they were 'grappling in Bohemia, ſays he, the marquis Spinola 'was forming an army in Flanders, and the Proteſtant 'Princes of Germany, calling themſelves Princes of the 'Union, raiſed forces for defence of the Palatinate, 'and their own intereſt, under the command of the 'Marquis of Anſpach. But ſo odious was the name 'of war to King James, that it was with difficulty he 'conſented to the raiſing one regiment of foot; but 'conſented that two more ſhould follow. Which regi'ment was the gallanteſt for their perſons that in many 'ages had appeared, either at home or abroad. It 'conſiſted of 2200 men compleat, under the command 'of Sir Horace Vere (after Baron of Tilbury) bred up in the 'ſchool of war, and a known maſter in the art of victory. 'The Engliſh followed Spinola, but at a diſtance; for 'he, being nearer the Palatinate, got much the ſtart 'of them. On the laſt of Auguſt, by the aſſiſtance of 'Maurice Prince of Orange, and a bridge of boats a 'little below Weſel, they paſſed the Rhine with Prince 'Henry of Naſſau, who, with 2000 horſe and 400 'muſqueteers, cleared the country before them. When 'they came to Coblentz, ſtanding on the center of the 'two rivers, the Rhine and Moſelle, giving out, on their 'march, as if the army intended to paſs the Moſelle, 'they (to divert the enemy's intelligence) drew two miles 'back from Coblentz, and paſſed the Rhine; and this 'ſudden change of reſolution amuſed the enemy. In the 'halt before Coblentz, one bullet (among others from the 'town) paſſed General Vere and the Earl of Eſſex, ſtand'ing together, and hit Flood, a gentleman, on the elbow. 'Before the army paſſed the Rhine, General Vere ſent 'Captain Row and Captain Dexter, with 94 ſick men, 'tents, trunks, &c. that were cumberſome, by water, to 'Bacrach, which town, within few days, was yielded to 'Spinola, after the example of Openheim, and other towns 'in the Palatinate: ſo ſpiritleſs were the people, that he 'met no reſiſtance. The Engliſh taken in Bacrach were 'uſed with civility, and, with payment of ſmall ranſoms, 'had liberty to return home. After the army, both 'horſe and foot, had paſſed the Rhine, they had hard 'marches through the pleaſant country of Naſſau, 'ſhaping their courſe towards Frankfort. Spinola, find'ing himſelf deluded on one ſide of the Rhine, paſſed 'the river Maine with all his horſe and 4000 foot, in'tending to ſnap them on the other ſide; but, the ſtream 'being too high, his waggons and ammunition took 'wet, and ſome field pieces were loſt, which admoniſhed 'him to retreat; otherwiſe he had probably cut off our 'forces, before they could have joined the Princes of the 'Union. The 24th of September, Prince Henry with 'the horſe, and General Vere with the foot, paſſed the 'river Maine near Frankfort, the foot marching up to 'the middle through the ſtream, and that night ſtood 'in arms, on alarms from Spinola's approach, not yet 'hearing he was retired. The next day they had a long 'march to recover Darmſted, one half of which town 'belonged to the King of Bohemia, the other to the 'Landgrave of Heſſe. There Prince Henry and the 'Dutch left the Engliſh, returning into the Netherlands 'again. The 27th of September, being joined by 1500 'German horſe, ſent by the Princes of the Union, they 'came to Brinſheim, the firſt town in the Palatinate, 'and, October 1, paſſed over the Rhine by Worms; 'and that day were met by the Marquis of Anſpach, 'and others of the Princes of the Union, who ſtaid 'to ſee them march by, wondering at their gallantry.

'After two days reſt, the Princes, with part of their 'army, being 2000 horſe and 6000 foot, joined with the 'Engliſh, and together marched towards Altzi, (a town in 'the Palatinate taken in by the enemy) which they in'tended to ſurprize. But hearing, by their ſcouts, of the 'town being quitted by the enemy, and that Spinola, 'with his whole army, was marching towards them, 'they faced about to make his way the ſhorter; and 'within three hours their ſcouts and the enemy's were 'in ſkirmiſh. The German Princes were not forward 'to engage, having not their whole army with them; 'but, finding how the enemy ſtrove to ſecure them'ſelves, they judged their ſtrength not to be great, 'and reſolved to attack them. The Dutch, in cour'teſy, yielded the vanguard to the Engliſh, which 'before they ſtood on as a punctilio of honour. Gene'ral Vere drew out of every diviſion 80 muſqueteers 'to begin the onſet, ſtanding ready, expecting the 'command of the Marquis of Anſpach to begin the 'charge; and the evening haſting, General Vere, tired 'with his delays, rode up the hill, accompanied with 'the Earls of Oxford and Eſſex, and there ſaw the enemy 'begin to march away without drum or trumpet, till 'the laſt diviſion moved, and then made the air ſhake 'with the noiſe of their ſhouts of joy, as was appre'hended for their eſcape. Wilſon blames the Princes in 'not attacking them, being not above 6000 foot and '2000 horſe, and might have come up with Spinola 'before he reached Openheim, whither he was marching. 'The Earl of Eſſex preſſed the Marquis of Anſpach to 'it, deſiring him not to let ſlip an opportunity ſo hap'pily put into his hand. He, not pleaſed to be urged 'to that, contrary to his humour, replied angrily, There 'is a fort betwixt us and the town, and we muſt paſs thi'ther under the mercy of their cannon. Sir Horace Vere, 'being by, ſaid, When ſhall we then fight, if we ſhun 'the cannon?' But no perſuaſion can be prevalent, where power and diſaffection join, ſays Wilſon. The Dutch horſe ſkirmiſhed with the rear of the Spaniſh; and ſome few of their ſtraggling foot, and about five or ſix horſe, were taken, which was all the hurt done them. The next day the Engliſh, with the other forces, marched into quarters again, where the ſoldiers found the fruits and wine in the muſt, no good preſervatives. But, after a ſtay of ſeven or eight days, Spinola led them a dance for digeſtion, pretending for Keyſars Luther, a town in the Palatinate, which made the Princes advance their whole body to attend him; but, as they drew near, he retreated: ſo they ſported with one another; though neither of the armies could be pleaſed with the ſharp froſty nights, ſo violent, that the ſoldiers lay in heaps on the ground, cloſe together, like ſheep, till they were ſummoned to warmer lodgings. The Engliſh were diſpoſed in three principal garriſons. General Vere commanded in Manheim, Sir Gerard Herbert in Heidelberg, and Burrows in Frankendale, impriſoning themſelves in walls, while the enemy roamed round about them, having only power to preſerve themſelves, the forces of the Princes of the Union being garriſoned in their ſeveral countries (45).

nuary 16, 1620; when, in conſideration thereof, the Earls of Oxford, Eſſex, and Leiceſter, the Lord Viſcount Wilmot, the Lords Danvers, and Alfield, Sir Edward Cecil, and Sir Richard Harriſon, Knights, were called to the Council-table, and acquainted with his Majeſty's pleaſure, that they, or any five or more of them, together with Sir Horace Vere, and Sir Edward Conway, Knights, (if they return to England whilſt this Committee doth continue) ſhall undertake preparations for the recovery and protection of the Palatinate, and have their meetings and aſſemblies at the Council-chamber at Whitehall (aa). But no aſſiſtance was ſent, purſuant to this order, farther than that 30000l. was given to the Princes of the Union to encourage them to keep in arms. Sir Horace Vere remained in Germany the year after, and kept the Palatinate from being quite over-run by the Imperial forces. On the re-aſſembling the Parliament, November 20, 1621, the King being abſent by indiſpoſition in health, commanded a meſſage to be delivered to both Houſes (bb) by the Lord Keeper, and the Lord Digby. After the Lord Keeper had acquainted the Houſes with his Majeſty's pleaſure, the Lord Digby having alſo the like command, gave a brief account of his negotiation with the Archduke, &c. Then he proceeded to give alſo an account how bravely Sir HORACE VERE had behaved himſelf in the Palatinate, and that by his wiſdom and valour, there were kept from the enemy, Heidelburgh, Manheim, and Frankendale, the laſt of which places had then endured a month's ſiege. And concluded, that the fitteſt redreſs was to furniſh and keep up the army already there, which muſt be done by ſupplies of men and money, and more forces prepared againſt the next ſpring (cc). Thereupon, whilſt Sir Horace Vere continued in Germany, he was by Letters Patent, bearing date the 16th of February, 1621, 19 Jac. I, in conſideration of his fidelity, ſervices, valour, and experience in military affairs, conſtituted Captain General of the forces in aid of Frederick, Elector Palatine, with full power and authority to raiſe and tranſport beyond the ſeas, with all expedition, 8000 foot and 1600 horſe of the King's ſubjects, or of other nations, that will take on under his banner (dd). Whether after this any forces were ſent abroad, or raiſed, hiſtory is ſilent: but towards the latter end of the year 1622, Heidelburgh was taken, and ſoon after followed the loſs of Frankendale, and Manheim, the chief fortreſs in the Palatinate (ee). Sir Horace Vere commanded in Manheim (ff), and having neither ſtrength of men or means to reſiſt an enemy, after he had defended it as long as man was capable of doing, he ſurrendered up the town to Count Tilly on honourable conditions to march out with bag and baggage, &c. [M]. On his return, in January, 1622-3, the King received him ſo graciouſly and thankfully (as Camden obſerves) that, forgetting himſelf, he ſtood bare to him (gg). On July 20, 1624, 22 Jac. I, he was conſtituted one of the Council of War, in conſideration of the knowledge the King had of his wiſdom, integrity, and experience, to aſſemble and meet together to take ſuch ways and means as ſhall be moſt requiſite for ſecuring the Realm of Ireland, with the reſt of the King's dominions, and putting the Navy Royal in readineſs: alſo to adviſe of ſuch ways and means as may give advancement by the aforeſaid means of aſſiſting the King's allies, eſpecially in the Low-Countries: and upon mature deliberation to ſet down in writing their opinions, and to offer to the King, and his Council, ſuch propoſitions, as may be meet for their conſideration, or to be by them put in execution (hh). At length, for his great merit and ſervices, on the acceſſion of King Charles to the throne, he was the firſt Peer of his Majeſty's creation, by the ſtile and title of Lord Vere Baron of Tilbury, in the County of Eſſex, by Letters Patent, bearing date, July 25, in the firſt year of his reign (ii) [N]. Not long after, in the ſame year, the Council of War (whereof the Lore Vere was one) appointed to manage the buſineſs of the Palatinate, were called into the Houſe of Commons, and this queſtion propounded to them, Whether the advice was followed in the four ends in the Act of Parliament of 21 Jacob. I, by which the monies given by that Act were to iſſue? Carey Earl of Totneſs, and Lord Brook, deſired to be excuſed from anſwering; the Lord Vere ſaid, he had been much abſent in the Low-Countries, and could ſay little; Lord Grandiſon ſaid, that ſince July laſt, they had ſeldom met; Sir Robert Manſel and Sir John Ogle deſired a copy of the queſtion, and that they might all confer together to give an anſwer. The Lord Vere's anſwer was ſatisfactory, he was excuſed from any further attendance; but all the reſt were called before them again, and giving unſatisfactory anſwers, were preſſed to deal clearly and fully in the buſineſs: on which they deſired they might have the King's conſent before they anſwered, as a ſpecial order of the Houſe required an anſwer (kk). As his Lordſhip ſtill held his Poſt of General

[M] He ſurrendered Manheim to count Tilly, &c.] In ſhort, the fault chiefly lay in the King of Bohemia himſelf, as appears from hence, that the Earl of Briſtol, in the articles of impeachment exhibited againſt him in parliament, 1 Charles I, being charged with the loſs of the Palatinate; in anſwer thereunto alledged his ſollicitations for ſupplying the forces there, by preſently ſending 30000l. borrowed of Sir Baptiſt Hicks, &c. beſides 10000l. which he lent, &c. and that if, by accidents of war, the Marquis of Baden, Count Mansfield, and the Duke of Brunſwick, received each of them an overthrow, he hopes he ſhall not be liable to the blame, his Majeſty having ſo far complained to his ſon-in-law, of the ordering affairs, as to give orders for withdrawing of his forces, as will appear by his Majeſty's letters to him, and to Sir Horace Vere, of the 3d of June, 1622 (46).

[N] He was created Baron Vere of Tilbury.] The preamble to the patent, ſetting forth his merit, as uſual upon theſe occaſions, preſents us with his juſt Elogium in the following terms: 'Qui ad arma & munera militaria ab ineunte ætate accinctus, tam per ſereniſſimam Principem Dominam Elizabetham nuper Reginam Anglie, quam per prechariſſimum Patrem noſtrum nuper Regem Jacobum beate memorie, in gravioribus & magis arduis negociis & expedicionibus tranſmarinis in Hiſpania & Germania, Francia & Provinciis Belgicis ad primarios ſemper fidelitatis, & honoris locos merito evocatus, tanta cum fide, zelo, fortitudine & alacritate indefeſſa in maximum hujus Gentis honorem inſervivit, ut ejus acta vere honorifica & laudabilia ſe Regibus & Reipublice ſuis acceptabilem, ipſumque per totum Chriſtianum orbem glorioſum reddiderunt, &c.' of the Forces in the ſervice of the States-General, he frequently went over to them, in the year 1627 [O]. And he continued in the Low-Countries the following year, 1628, when King Charles, by the Ambaſſadors of Denmark, and the States-General, being ſollicited to ſend forces and ſhipping to ſecure the Elbe, and for the defence of Luckſtadt, his Majeſty borrowed ſix or eight men out of every company ſerving in the States pay, under the conduct of the Lord Vere, to fill up Sir Charles Morgan's regiments that were to be employed therein, engaging his royal word, that for every man then lent to him, he would ſend them two, as ſoon as his forces returned from Rochel (ll). On the deceaſe of George Carew Earl of Totneſs, Maſter of the Ordnance, who died March 27, 1629, his Majeſty conferred that Place on the Lord Vere of Tilbury for life, as the ſaid Earl of Totneſs held it (mm). In 1633, he made the campaign in the Netherlands, and by his Majeſty's Letters Patent conſtituting him General of his Forces, being empowered to confer the honour of Knighthood, his Lordſhip, in the camp of Bockſtal near Balduck in Brabant, knighted, July 25, 1633, William Boſwel, at that time the King's Reſident with the States-General (nn). His Lordſhip afterwards reſided for the moſt part in England, and growing near ſeventy years of age, made his laſt Will and Teſtament the 10th of November, 1634, 10 Car. I. And not long before his death, which happened the following year, taking a reſolution to retire from the world, he diſpoſed of all his employments. Being ſuffered to make the beſt advantage he could of his thirty-three companies in Holland, and troops of horſe, Mr Goring had the one, and Mr Wilmot the other, and his office of the Ordnance he made over to the Lord Newport, to whom the reverſion had been granted ſome time before (oo). Thus having bid farewel to the buſineſs of the world, he did not continue in it long after. On the 2d of May, 1635, dining with Sir Henry Vane at Whitehall, he was ſeized with an apoplexy as he ſat at table. Calling for freſh ſalmon, and reaching out his plate to take it from one that carved, he was not able to draw his hand back again, but ſunk down. They inſtantly carried him to a bed, where he expired within two hours. He was buried on the 8th of that month, in the ſame vault with his brother, Sir Francis Vere, in Weſtminſter Abbey, with much military pomp, the train-bands attending the corpſe in great numbers, beſides moſt of the Nobility in town; and the ordnance of the Tower all going off at the time of his interment (pp). All which honours were judged to be due to a perſon, who had been Governor of the Briel, General of the Engliſh Forces in the Netherlands, Maſter of the Ordnance in England, and had reflected an honour to each Poſt by his diſtinguiſhed fidelity, and ſuperior abilities. He lies without any monumental inſcription, or elogium over him. But this has been, in ſome meaſure, ſupplied by the general diſplay of his worth in ſeveral writings. Among theſe, we ſhall take notice of the two following. Firſt, Dr Thomas Fuller, who was acquainted with his Lordſhip, has given this ſhort character of him: 'Horace Lord Vere had more meekneſs, and as much valour, as his brother; ſo pious, that he firſt made his peace with God, before he went out to war with man. Of an excellent temper, it being true of him what is ſaid of the Caſpian Sea, that it doth never ebb nor flow, obſerving a conſtant tenour, neither elated with good ſucceſs, nor depreſſed with the reverſe of fortune. Had one ſeen him returning from a victory, he would, by his ſilence, have ſuſpected that he had loſt the day; and had he beheld him in a retreat, he would have collected him a Conqueror by the chearfulneſs of his ſpirit. No doubt but he was well prepared for death, ſeeing ſuch was his vigilancy, that never any enemy ſurprized him in his quarters. Sir Francis, the elder brother, was more feared, Sir Horace more loved by the ſoldiers. Both lived in war, much honoured, and died in peace, much lamented (qq).' Dr William Dillingham alſo, who publiſhed the Commentaries of Sir Francis Vere, has given the following account of the Lord Vere: 'He was in courage equal to his brother, and in hazards undivided: for as he muſt be allowed a great ſhare in the actions recorded by his brother, ſo were his own ſervices afterwards, when General of the Engliſh, ſo eminent and conſiderable, that they might have furniſhed another Commentary, had not his own exceeding modeſty proved a ſtep-mother to his deſerved praiſes. He was a religious, wiſe, and valiant Commander, and (which quartered him in the boſom of the Prince of Orange) he was ſucceſsful in his enterprizes; ſometimes to the admiration both of friends and enemies. When he took Sluys, there was one ſtrong-hold firſt to be taken, which he found ſome difficulty to overcome; and that was in the opinion of his friends an impoſſible enterprize. And for his enemies, Spinola himſelf did him, in his life-time, the right to bear witneſs of his gallant retreat with four thouſand men from between his very fingers, when with three times that number he had graſped up the Prince [Maurice] againſt the ſea-ſhore. And as the proficiency of the ſcholars was ever accounted a good argument of their Maſter's ability, I ſhall (with their leaves) give you a liſt of ſome of his: Henry Earl of Oxford, Thomas Lord Fairfax, Sir Edward Vere Lieutenant Colonel, Sir Simon Harcourt Serjeant Major, Sir Thomas Dutton, Sir Henry Peyton, Sir John Burroughs, Sir Thomas Gates, Sir John Conyers, Sir Thomas Gale, Sir William Lovelace, Sir Robert Carey, Sir Jacob Aſtley, Sir Thomas Conway, Sir John Burlacy, Sir Thomas Winne, Sir Gerard Herbert, Sir Edward Harwood, and Sir Michael [O] He frequently went over to the Netherlands.] John Lord Haughton, (afterwards the ſecond Earl of Clare) who had married his eldeſt daughter, in a letter, dated May 19, 1627, to his brother-in-law, Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Strafford, writes thus: 'Lord 'Vere's occaſions will call him into the Low-Countries 'before he ſhould go over, his wife deſiring to lie in 'here, and that her mother, Lady Vere, would be 'with her (47).' His Lordſhip alſo, in another letter from the Hague, December 7, O. The Earl of Clarendon alſo recites, that Edward Lord Conway was bred up a ſoldier in ſeveral commands, under the particular care of the Lord Vere, whoſe nephew he was. And that Monk Duke of Albemarle had the reputation of a good field-officer, when he was in the Lord Vere's regiment in Holland (ss). In his laſt Will having appointed his body to be buried where it ſhall pleaſe God, he ratifies and confirms ſeveral conveyances by deeds of truſt of the Monaſtery of Hailes in the County of Glouceſter, and ſeveral Manors, Lordſhips, Farms, &c. lying in the ſaid County [P], and then proceeds in theſe terms: 'For it is 'my will and meaning, that the ſaid Monaſtery of Hailes, with the premiſes, &c. ſhall 'be in the power of my ſaid moſt loving wife, for her freely to diſpoſe of as ſhe ſhall think 'fit, either by ſale or otherwiſe, for her own uſe and benefit, at her pleaſure.' He alſo bequeaths to the ſaid Dame Mary, his wife, all his goods, chattels, &c. and all monies, debts, &c. owing to him by any perſon or perſons in England or elſewhere, and appoints her full and ſole Executrix. Accordingly Adminiſtration was granted, May 6, 1635, to the Right Honourable Mary Lady Vere, his Relict and Executrix; who lived to be very aged. After the death of the Counteſs of Dorſet, who had the tuition of the three youngeſt children of King Charles I; viz. the Duke of York, the Duke of Glouceſter, and the Princeſs Elizabeth, and died in May, 1645, the Parliament, that they might be ſure to keep them in their power, put them into the Cuſtody of the Lady Vere, an old Lady much in their favour, but not at all ambitious of that charge, though there was a competent allowance aſſigned for their ſupport (tt). His Lordſhip makes no mention in his will of any of his children; but though he left no heir male to bear his name, yet his blood is diſtributed in the veins of many noble families, leaving iſſue by his ſaid Lady, third daughter of Sir John Tracey of Toddington, in the County of Glouceſter, Knight [Q], five daughters his coheirs (uu).

[Q] Daughter of Sir John Tracey of Tedington in com. Glam. Knt.] This family, which is very ancient and honourable, took the ſirname of Tracey from a maternal Anceſtor, deſcended from the Traceys, Barons of Barnſtaple in Devonſhire, who, ann. 1066, accompanied the Conqueror in his expedition to England, and were denominated from the town of Traci in Normandy. The honour and barony of Barnſtaple (50) was the gift of King Stephen to Henry de Traci. By paternal deſcent, the family derives from the royal blood of the Saxon kings, namely from Goda, youngeſt daughter to King Ethelred (ſon of King Edgar) ſiſter to Edward the Confeſſor, and Walter de Maunt, or de Maige, a noble Norman, whoſe ſon Ralph was Earl of Hereford in the reign of his uncle the Confeſſor, but was deprived of it by the Conqueror; and his ſon Harold, at the time of the general ſurvey, poſſeſſing ſeveral Lordſhips, and fixing his chief reſidence at Sudeley, was Lord thereof, and of Todingtone in the county of Glouceſter, and by his wife Maud, daughter to Hugh Lupus, Earl of Cheſter, left two ſons; Ralph, Baron of Sudeley, progenitor of the Sudeleys, Barons of Sudeley, whoſe heirs male failed in John Lord Sudely, temp. Edw. III. (51); William, the younger ſon, was named Fair, from his mother (an uſual thing in that age). This William lived in the reign of Henry V, and held lands of his brother Ralph by the ſervice of one Knight's fee, which probably was the manor of Todingtone; for it appears, by Domeſday-book, that it was held by the Lord Sudeley, of the manor of Sudeley, and temp. Edw. I. the Traceys are expreſsly ſaid to be poſſeſſed of it; and this William (52), in a deed perfected by Oſwel, Lord of Sudeley, ſon and heir of the ſaid Ralph, is called his Uncle (53). This William's great great grandſon Henry had a daughter Margery, married to John Archer of Umberſlade in Warwickſhire, anceſtor to the preſent Lord Archer, Baron of Umberſlade. From this Henry deſcended, in the tenth generation, Sir William Tracey of Todington, Knt. called the Martyr, who was Sheriff of his county in 1513, (5 H. VIII.) and was a perſon of diſtinguiſhed parts and ſound learning, and is memorable for being one of the firſt that embraced the reformed religion in England, as appears by his laſt will, dated in 1530 (22 H. VIII.) The preamble of which runs thus: 'In the name of 'God, Amen. I William Tracey of Todington, in the 'county of Glouceſter, Eſq; make my teſtament and 'laſt will, as hereafter followeth: Firſt, and before 'other things, I commit myſelf to God and to his mercy, 'believing, without any doubt, or miſtruſt, that, by 'his Grace, and the merits of Jeſus Chriſt, and by the 'virtue of his paſſion and reſurrection, I have and ſhall 'have remiſſion of all my ſins, and reſurrection of body 'and ſoul, according as it is written, I believe that my 'Redeemer liveth, and that at the laſt day I ſhall riſe out 'of the earth, and in my fleſh I ſhall ſee my Saviour. 2. Mary, ſecond daughter of the ſaid Horace Lord Vere, was alſo born in the Netherlands, and naturalized with her ſiſter by Act of Parliament, 21 Jac. I. She was firſt married to Sir Roger Townſhend of Eaſt-Raynham, in the County of Norfolk, Bart, who departed this life on the 1ſt of January, 1636, and had iſſue by her Sir Roger Townſhend, Bart, Horace, ſecond ſon, Mary, Jane, Anne, Elizabeth, and Vere. Sir Roger Townſhend dying in his minority, was ſucceeded in title and eſtate by Sir Horatio Townſhend, who became the firſt Lord Viſcount Townſhend, and father of Charles Lord Viſcount Townſhend, Principal Secretary of State to King George I. and II; and by his firſt wife Elizabeth, daughter and ſole heir of Thomas Lord Pelham (father of his Grace Thomas the preſent Duke of Newcaſtle by his firſt wife, Elizabeth, daughter to Sir William Jones) left iſſue Charles, now [1762] Lord Viſcount Townſhend. The ſaid Mary Lady Townſhend, after the death of Sir Roger Townſhend the firſt of January, 1736, entered into a ſecond marriage with Mildmay Fane Earl of Weſtmorland, by whom ſhe was mother of Vere Fane Earl of Weſtmorland, and four daughters, whereof Mary was firſt married to Francis Palmer, ſon and heir to Sir Bryan Palmer of Aſtwell in the County of Rutland, Knight; and ſecondly, to John Cecil Earl of Exeter. Another daughter, named Catharine, was wedded to Conyers Darcy Earl of Holderneſs. Vere Earl of Weſtmorland, was father of Vere Earl of Weſtmorland, Thomas Earl of Weſtmorland, and John, now [1762] Earl of Weſtmorland, and Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford.

Catharine, third daughter of Lord Vere, was married to Oliver St John, ſon and heir of Sir John St John of Lidiard Tregoſe, in the County of Wilts, Knight and Baronet, who had iſſue by her ſeveral ſons, whereof Henry, the youngeſt, left iſſue a daughter, Anne, married to Anthony Bowyer, of Cambetwell in the County of Surrey, Eſq; and the reſt died without iſſue, except Sir Walter St John, the ſixth ſon, who died July 3, 1708, and had iſſue

' rehearſed is ſufficient, as I ſuppoſe, without any other ' man's works or merits. My ground and belief is, ' that there is but one God, and one Mediator between ' God and Man, which is Jeſus Chriſt; ſo that I accept ' none in heaven or in earth to be Mediator between me ' and God, but only Jeſus Chriſt; all others to be but ' as Petitioners in receiving of Grace, but none able to ' give influence of Grace; and therefore will I beſtow ' no part of my goods for that intent, that any man ' ſhall ſay or do to help my ſoul; for therein I truſt only ' to the promiſes of Chriſt: He that believeth and is ' baptized ſhall be ſaved, and he that believeth not ſhall ' be damned. As touching the burying of my body, ' it availeth me not whatſoever be done thereto; for ' St Auguſtine ſaith, De cura agenda pro mortuis, that ' the funeral pomps are rather the ſolace of them that ' live, than the wealth and comfort of them that are ' dead; and therefore I remit it wholly to the diſcretion ' of my Executors.—And touching the diſtribution of ' my temporal goods, my purpoſe is, by the grace of ' God, to beſtow them to be accepted as the fruits of ' faith; ſo that I do not ſuppoſe that my merit ſhall be ' by the good beſtowing of them, but my merit is the ' faith of Jeſus Chriſt only, by whom ſuch works are ' good, according to the words of our Lord, I was ' hungry, and thou gaveſt me meat, &c. and it followeth, ' That ye have done to the leaſt of my brethren, ye have done ' it to me. And ever we ſhould conſider that true ſaying, ' That a good work maketh not a good man, but a good ' man maketh a good work; for faith maketh a man ' both good and righteous: for a righteous man liveth ' by faith; and whatſoever ſpringeth not of faith is ſin.'

This will was condemned as heretical in the Biſhop of London's court, and an order on that account iſſued to Parker, Chancellor of Worceſter, to raiſe his body, according to the law of the church: The Chancellor, too officiouſly burning the corpſe, was, two years afterwards, ſued by the heirs of Sir William, fined 400 l. and turned out of his Chancellorſhip. The Martyr's ſecond ſon, Richard, had, by his father's gift, the manor of Stanway in the county of Glouceſter, and part of the poſſeſſions of the Abbey of Tewkeſbury, which Abbey was granted to him by the crown upon the diſſolution of the monaſteries. He was well educated, and wrote ſeveral treatiſes in defence of his father's faith very learnedly and judiciouſly; among which was that moſt memorable one, intitled Preparations to the Croſs, written experimentally (ſay the Decem Scriptores) having ſuffered much in his eſtate for his father's reputed heretical will. He alſo wrote prophetically, in 1550, two or three years before Queen Mary's reign, another treatiſe to teach one to die, which was annexed to the former, when reprinted, and falſely aſcribed by the Editor to John Frith; being one of the three found in the belly of a cod, brought, in 1626, to be ſold in the market of Cambridge, wrapped in canvas (54): on which occaſion the wits of that Univerſity diverted themſelves. This Richard's eldeſt ſon, Paul, was created a Baronet, June 24, 1664, being the thirtieth from the inſtitution of that order; but the title became extinct in 1677, in John, the fifth Baronet, who, dying without iſſue, left the manor of Stanway, with all his eſtate, to Ferdinando Tracey, ſecond ſon of John Viſcount Tracey.

(54) Which probably had been devoured by that voracious fiſh, out of the pocket of ſome ſhipwreckedSeaman. One of the ſcholars in his verſes had this diſtich: If Fiſhes thus do bring us books, then we May hope to equal Bodley's library.

The Martyr's eldeſt ſon, William, ſucceeded at Todington, and was father of John (or Henry) who married Elizabeth, ſecond daughter to John, the firſt Lord Chandos of Sudeley. John's grand-daughter, Mary, the ſubject of this remark, was born May 18, 1581, three days after which died her mother, Anne, daughter to Sir Thomas Throckmorton, of Corfecourt, Knt. which family had inriched themſelves by the marriage of Eleanor, ſiſter to the great grandmother of the Martyr. Mary was married firſt, when nineteen years of age, to Mr William Hoby, by whom ſhe had two ſons, who both died unmarried; and ſecondly to Sir Horatio Vere, Baron of Tilbury, one of the greateſt generals of his age, and dying December 25, 1671, was buried, January 10, at Caſtle-Heveningham in Eſſex, having lived to ſee her eldeſt brother, Sir John Tracey, advanced, January 12, 1642, to the dignity of Viſcount Tracey of Rathcoole in Ireland, whoſe grandſon, John, the third Viſcount, had, by his ſecond wife, Dorothy, daughter to Thomas Cox, of Caſtleditch in Herefordſhire, Eſq; a ſon, Roberty Tracey, Eſq; who, being bred to the law, went out Serjeant in that profeſſion, November 6, 1700, having, October 3, 1699, been, by King William, deſervedly made one of the Juſtices of the King's-bench, which he ſurrendered November 13, 1700, and was advanced to the ſame ſtation in the court of Common-pleas, being alſo, by Queen Anne, September 25, 1710, appointed, with Sir Thomas Trevor and Baron Scrope, Commiſſioner of the great Seal of England, until it was delivered, October 17, to Sir Simon Harcourt; and again, April 15, 1718, with Sir John Pratt and Sir James Montague, Baron of the Exchequer, upon the reſignation of Lord Chancellor Cowper. His ill ſtate of health obliging him to quit his employment, October 26, 1726, his Majeſty, King George I, in recompence of his ſervices, ſettled on him 1000 l. a year for life. He married Anne, eldeſt daughter to to William Dowdeſley, of Pool-court in Worceſterſhire, Eſq; and his grandſon, named Dowdeſwell, is his heir. The Judge had alſo two daughters, the younger of which, Dorothy, was married, April 10, 1725, to John Pratt, Eſq; eldeſt ſon of Sir John Pratt, Chief Juſtice of the King's-bench (55), whoſe younger ſon, now Sir Charles Pratt, was knighted and raiſed from the poſt of Attorney-general to that of Chief Juſtice of the Court of Common-pleas, December 28, 1761.

(55) Lodge's peerage of Ireland, under the article of Viſcount Tracy of Rathcoole.

Sir

Sir Henry St John, who was created Lord Viſcount St John by King George the Firſt, and had iſſue John Lord Viſcount St John, father of Frederick, now Lord Viſcount St John, who, on the deceaſe of his uncle, the famous Henry Viſcount Bolingbroke, and Baron of Lidiard Fregoſe, ſucceeded to thoſe titles, together with the ſeat and manor of Baterſea, and a large eſtate (xx). The ſaid Catharine was, ſecondly, married to John Lord Paulet, who had iſſue by her John Lord Paulet, father of John, created Earl Paulet, by the late Queen Anne. He had iſſue John, now Earl Paulet.

(xx) See Lord Bolingbroke's article.

Anne, the fourth daughter of the Lord Vere, was married to Thomas Lord Fairfax of Cameron in Scotland, who was General of the Parliament Army againſt King Charles I. A remarkable inſtance of this Lady's ſpirit and loyalty at his Majeſty's trial, has been already mentioned, as related by Lord Clarendon.

Dorothy, the Baron of Tilbury's fifth and youngeſt daughter, was married to John Wolſtenholm, Eſq; ſon and heir of Sir John Wolſtenholm of Noſtel, in the County of York, and of Fourtree-hall in Enfield, in the County of Middleſex, Bart; but died without iſſue by him.

The Lord Vere was evidently determined in the choice of Tilbury for his title, from the conſideration of that Manor's having been poſſeſſed by his Anceſtors almoſt from the firſt ſettling of the Vere family in England (yy). And though the patent declares the Barony to be the juſt reward (as it really was) of his perſonal merit, yet he was not even then without ſome view of ſucceeding to the Earldom of Oxford, and ſoon after became heir apparent to it [R]. We ſhall therefore, agreeably to the plan of this work (zz), give a full account of that noble family in a diſtinct article: and the rather, becauſe the title of the Earl of Oxford having been many years extinct in the name of Vere, and transferred to another (*), the many renowned actions of that moſt illuſtrious family, which produced ſo many heroes to the great honour of our country, may be otherwiſe in ſome danger of ſinking into oblivion.

(*) Viz. that of Harley.

[R] He became heir apparent to it.] Upon the death of Hugh Vere, the eighteenth Earl of Oxford, without male iſſue, in 1625, there aroſe a great diſpute about the deſcent of the title, which was claimed by Robert (Bertie) Lord Willoughby of Ereſby, in right of his mother, Mary, daughter of John de Vere, ſixteenth Earl of Oxford, againſt Robert Vere, great grandſon of John de Vere, the fifth Earl of Oxford. The Cauſe being brought before the Houſe of Peers in 2 Car. I. each Claimant, as uſual, drew up a ſtate of his caſe for the uſe of their Lordſhips: And the caſe of Robert Vere was as follows.

The Earldom of Oxford was granted by King Henry II. by his letters patent, to Aubrey Vere and his heirs; and the ſame Earldom deſcended from heir male to heir male unto Robert Vere, Duke of Ireland and Earl of Oxford, which Robert was attainted of high-treaſon by act of parliament, ann. 11 Rich. II. And ann. 16 Rich. II. in parliament, it was certified, that, before the ſaid attainder, certain Lands and Tenements, which were belonging to the ſaid Robert Vere, were intailed by fine, and by force of the ſaid intail ought to deſcend to Sir Aubrey Vere, uncle and heir to the ſaid Robert. Now the King, by the aſſent of the Parliament, graunted to the ſaid Sir Aubrey Vere livery of all the lands and tenements to him ſoe intailed by fine as aforeſaid. And further, whereas the ſaid Aubrey had yet ſhewed nothing in ſpeciall that the name and eſtate of the Earle of Oxford are to him intailed; notwithſtanding the King, having conſideration to the good ſervice which the ſaid Aubrey had done to him and his noble father, and howe the anceſtors of the ſaid Aubrey had bine Earles of Oxford a long time, and being willing that the eſtate and name of the Earle of Oxford, although they were forfeited, ſhould not ceaſe, but ſhould be contynued in time to come to the honour of the King and his realm, hath now of his ſpecial Grace reſtored, given, and granted, by aſſent of Parliament, to the ſaid Sir Aubrey, the Name, Title, and Honour of Earle of Oxford, to have the ſame Title, Eſtate, and Honour to the ſaid Aubrey, and his heires male for ever; and him made Earle of Oxford in full parliament; and preſently the ſaid Earle did his homage to the King, and after was put and ſet in his place with the Peeres of Parliament.

After which, ann. 21 R. II. the ſaid Act of Parliament, ann. 11 R. II. and all the dependancies thereupon, was repealed and made voyde.

After which, ann. 1, H. IV. the ſaid Act of Parliament, ann. 21 R. II. was repealed and made voyde.

And after the Act of Parliament, ann. 1. H. IV. was repealed and made voyde by Parliament, ann. 3 and 4 Edw. IV.

And in ann. 14 Edw. IV. the Earle of Oxford and twoe of his ſonnes were attainted of treaſon by Parliament.

And in ann. 1 H. VII. that Act was repealed and made voyde.

Aubrey Vere, Earle of Oxford, ann. 16 R. II. had iſſue Richard Vere, his ſon and heir, and died; Richard Vere, Earle of Oxford, had iſſue John, his eldeſt ſonne, and Robert his youngeſt ſonne; the grandchild and heire male of the bodie of John, his eldeſt ſonne, died ann. 18 H. VIII. without heire male of his bodie, or any heire male of the body of John, the eldeſt ſonne of Richard, having three ſiſters att his death, which were his heires and heires generall to John, Earle of Oxford, eldeſt ſonne of Richard.

John Vere, grandchild of Robert Vere, ſecond ſonne of Richard, was next heir male, and had the Earledome by virtue of the Act of Parliament of Richard II, without any new creation; and ſoe it was found by office, ann. 18 H. VIII. after the death of John Vere, Earle of Oxford, his couzen.

Ann. 23 H. VIII. the three daughters, ſiſters and heires of John, Earl of Oxford, deceaſed, clayme the landes of the Earldome, but not the Honor; and they of the one parte, and John, Earle of Oxford, couzen and heir male to their brother, ſubmitted themſelves to the award of King Henry VIII. and an award was made, which was confirmed by Parliament.

The ſaid John, Earle of Oxford, died (*), having iſſue John his eldeſt ſonne, Aubrey his ſecond ſonne, and Jeffery his youngeſt; John, the eldeſt ſon, had iſſue by his firſt wife (a Nevile) Catharine, married to the Lord Windſor, who pretends not; and by his ſecond wife had Edward, Earle of Oxford, and Lady Mary his daughter, and died; Edward, Earle of Oxford, had iſſue Henry, Earle of Oxford, by one Venter; and the Lady Derby, the Lady Montgomery, and the Lady Berkſhire, by his firſt wife, who pretends not, and died; Henry, Earle of Oxford, his ſonne, died without iſſue. The ſaid Aubrey, ſon of John, had iſſue Hughe Vere, his only ſonne, and died. Hughe Vere had iſſue Robert Vere, his only ſonne, now Earl of Oxford. And Jeffery had iſſue Horace, now Lord Vere, and next heir male to Robert. The Lady Mary had iſſue Robert, Lord Willoughby, her ſonne and heir, and died.

(*) This John, thus coming to the honor, was greatgrandfather to the now Earle of Oxford, and to the Lord Willoughby, who nowe pretends as heire general, and goeth about to overthrowe the title from which himſelf claims, wherein is a plain contradiction.

In this caſe, Robert Vere, now Earle of Oxford (56), ſonne of Hugh Vere, and after him Horace, Lord Vere, clayme the Earldom as next heire male of the bodie of Aubrey Vere, which was Earle of Oxford, ann. 16 R. II. by virtue of the ſaid Act of Parliament of ann. 16 R. II. which is no waye repealed, but is in force.

(56) i. e. the right, as he alledges; and the title was adjudged to him by the Peers, though not the title of Lord Bolebeck, Sanford and Badleſmere.

And hence it follows, that Horace, Lord Vere of Tilbury's male iſſue, had he left any, would have ſucceeded to the Earldom of Oxford.

VERE, Earls of Oxford. This noble and ancient family, the firſt of which, mentioned in our records, came into England with William, ſtiled the Conqueror (a), derives its deſcent much earlier. Leland, the famous Antiquary, carried it up as high as to the Patriarch NOAH [A], from whom he deduces the pedigree down to Alberic de Vere, the noble Earl, who, having married Beatrix, ſiſter to the Conqueror, and attending him into England, was greatly favoured by that Monarch. In whoſe reign we find him poſſeſſed of Cheneſiton (now wrote Kenſington) in com. Middleſex, Geling and Emingford in com. Huntingdon. As alſo of nine Lordſhips in the county of Suffolk, and fourteen in the county of Eſſex (b), whereof Colne, Heningham, and Benetly, were part; which continued in his poſterity till the laſt century. The Conqueror gave him likewiſe the whole inheritance of a great man in the Saxons days, called Walfine: in conſequence whereof he took from the Monks of Ramſay what Walfine had before the Norman conqueſt, and left it to his own poſterity (c). However he bore a great reſpect to the Monks of Abingdon in Berkſhire, to whom he gave the church of St Andrew, at Colne in Eſſex, with the land of Randulph the Prieſt, the tythes of the whole Lordſhip, Town, and Park, and of all that was tytheable there, and 120 acres of the demeſnes, the Spinney beyond the Park, as alſo the Park itſelf, Coleford mill, Mees paſture beyond Coleford bridge, one acre and a rood in Brademede, together with their meadow-land in Kinbrane and Linland, the woods of Dodeſpolleſho and Littlehar, with twenty acres of land; the lands of Goda, Edwin the Brewer, and of Aymeri the Long; alſo the land called Waluricmucche, the church of Beauchamp, together with three acres of meadow, and the whole tythes of the ſaid town. The church of Duurecourt, and the tythes there; alſo of the fiſhery, with paſture for 100 ſheep in the marſh. The churches of Campis and Benetlei; the tythes of the demeſnes of Rodinges-Grimbald, together with that church, and alſo Colne-Miblanc church, with every thing thereunto belonging, in the manors of Haingham, Laoreham, Aldeham, and Roinges, with two parts of all the tythes, and the moiety of the tythes of the demeſnes in Walde and Wadoho; the third part of the tythes of Haingham, together with that mill, 10d. land at Burgate, 3s. at Cripping, and 2s. 8d. which Hargar pays for his land in Roinges, together with a meſſuage in Colcheſter. Whereupon Colne aforeſaid was made a cell to that great Abbey of Abingdon; and in the latter part of his life he took a religious habit, and was ſhorn a Monk in the ſaid Abbey, to which he had been ſo large a benefactor (d); and there lies buried, together with William, one of his younger ſons [B]. This Alberic the firſt had iſſue by Beatrice, his wife, four ſons, Geffery, Alberic, Roger, Robert, whereof Geffery dying before his father, he was ſucceeded by

Alberic de Vere, the ſecond of that name, who confirmed all the grants made by his father to the Monks of Abingdon (e), and was in ſuch high eſteem with Henry I, that in the beginning of his reign he made him Lord Great Chamberlain of England, to hold the ſaid office in fee to him and his heirs, with dignities and liberties thereto belonging, as honourably as Robert Malet (f), [A] Leland carries the family up to Noah.] The pedigree is in this form.

Ex libello Genealogiæ comitum Oxonienſium.

Repetit genus a Noe. Deinde a Tideo Græco. Inſuper a Vero (1) nobili Romano. Poſtremo à Milone comite de Genny alias Giſney. Milo, Duke of Aungiers, and Duke and Leader of great Charles's hoſte and armye, married Berthelle, ſiſter of great Charles. Hic fuit ſuperſtes, A. D. 800.

1. Milo had to his firſt ſunne Rothuland or Rouland, Erle Palatine, Erle of Maunce and Bleuys, that was ſlaine of the Paganes at Rumcidevale. 2. He had alſo Baldewine de Ver, afterwards Duke of Maunce. 3. He had alſo Milo de Ver, to whom, as to the youngeſt brother and his nephew, King Charles gave the Erldom of Genney or Giſney, Avelina, doughter of the Erle of Nauntes, wif to Milo de Ver the ſun. Nicaſius de Ver, Erle of Genney, ſunne to yonge Milo, Erle of Genney. This Nicaſius had to wife Agathe, the doughter of the Erle of Champain. Of Nicaſius cam Otho de Vere, Erle of Genney, married to Conſtance, doughter to the Lord of Charters. Of Otho cam Amelius de Ver, Erle of Genney: Helena, doughter to the Erle of Eloys, tooke to huſband Amelius. Gallus de Ver, Erle of Genney; Gerthrudis, doughter of the Erle of Cleremont, wif to Gallus. Manaſſes de Ver, Erle of Genney; Petronilla, doughter of the Erle of Boleine, wif to Manaſſes de Ver. Alphonſus de Ver, Erle of Genney; Katarine, his wife, doughter to Arnalde, Erle of Flaundres. Albery de Ver, Erle of Genney; Beatrice, his wife, ſiſter to King William, Conqueror.

(1) Some of our Antiquaries derive the name from Vere, a town in Zealand. Vincent on Brook, p. 396. Weever's Funeral monuments, p. 613.

The ſaid Alberic is the noble Erle who came over with the Conqueror, and was rewarded by him with the Lordſhips mentioned above. Yet of the name of Alberic there was an Earl in Edward the Confeſſor's time, poſſeſſed of ſix Lordſhips in com. Warwick, fourteen in Leiceſter, ſix in Northampton, two in Oxford, and ten in Wiltſhire (2). But this Alberic is ſtiled Albericus Comes in Domeſday-book, has not there the name of de Vere, and may be of another family (3). Walcher, Biſhop of Durham, purchaſed the Earldom of Northumberland of King William the Conqueror, in the eleventh year of his reign, anno 1076, and was ſlain in 1079 (4); upon which the King gave the Earldom of Northumberland to Alberic, who probably was the ſame Alberic Comes; who, going with the King into Normandy, married there a widow, named Græcia, which gave an accompliſhment to a prophecy, That he ſhould poſſeſs Græcia; whereupon he fooliſhly went thither, to make himſelf King of that country, but was expelled by the Grecians. And going on that expedition, King William the Conqueror gave the Earldom of Northumberland to Robert de Mowbray (5).

(2) As he poſſeſſed ſome of theſe Lordſhips in the Confeſſor's time, he was probably then in England. Domeſday-book.

(3) Alberic II, ſon of Alberic ſenior, is not ſtiled Earl, though Henry I. made him Lord Great Chamberlain and Chief Juſtice of England; therefore it is not to be ſuppoſed there could be any deprivation or loſs of honour.

[B] He lies buried there, with William, a younger ſon.] It is ſaid that a monument was erected for him, with the effigies of him and his wife, and the following epitaph:

Cedunt e vita votis animiſque cupita,
Barbarus et ſcita, gentilis & Iſraelita.
Has pariter metas habet omnis ſexus et ætas:
En puer, en ſenior, pater alter, filius alter
Legem, fortunam, terram, venere, ſub unam:

Non Juveni tote quas epotavit Athene
Non vetulo tote vires vel opes valuere.
Sed valuere fides, et prælia quæ memoramus
Ut valeant valeant per ſæcula cuncta, precamur.

We are indebted for this to Mr Weever, who likewiſe ſays he had another epitaph for the ſaid Aubrey and Beatrice, mentioned in the book of Colne Priory, to be engraven on their monuments in theſe Engliſh words:

(6) Weever's Fun. mon. p. 613, 614.

Here lyeth Aubrey de Veer, the firſt Earl of Guiſnes, the ſonne of Alphonſus de Veer: The which Aubrey was the Founder of this place, and Beatrix, his wife, ſiſter of King William the Conqueror (6).

(7) Monaſt. Anglic. Vol. I. p. 106 and 437, where it is ſaid they had alſo a daughter, Roſe or Roheſia, wife of Geoffrey de Mandevil, Earl of Eſſex; but this is probably a miſtake. See rem. [E].

The ſaid Alberic and his wife Beatrix did, for the health of the ſoul of Geffery, their firſt born ſon, give to the Monks of Abingdon the church of Kenſington, in com. Middleſex, with two hides, 240 acres, and a carucate of land there, which Henry I. afterwards confirmed. He alſo gave, to the ſame Monks, his houſe in Weſtminſter-ſtreet, London (7).

(Lord of the honour of Eye in Suffolk) or any other before or after him, held the ſame, with ſuch liveries and lodgings of his Court as belonged to that office (g). This Alberic was alſo Juſtice of all England in that King's reign (h). In the fourth of King Stephen he ſuppreſſed an inſurrection of ſome Biſhops at Wincheſter [C]. And in the fifth of Stephen (with Richard Baſſet, then Juſtice of England) he executed the office of Sheriff for the counties of Surrey, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Eſſex, Hartford, Northampton, Leiceſter, Norfolk, Suffolk, Buckingham, and Bedford (i); which office was then of great power and truſt. But before the end of that year, in the conteſts between the King and Maud the Empreſs, he was killed at London (k). He gave to the Monks of Thorney, in com. Cantab. certain rents in Iſlep, amounting to 61. 10s. per annum (l). By his wife Adeliza, daughter to Gilbert, Earl of Clare (m), he had iſſue three daughters and five ſons: 1. Alberic, his heir; 2. —— a Canon of St Oſith's, at Chich in Eſſex; 3. Robert; 4. Geffery [D]; 5. William. The three daughters were, Roheſia, wife of Pagan de Beauchamp, and ſecondly of Geffery Mandevil [E]; 2. Adeliza, wife of Henry de Eſſex, Lord of Ralegh (n); 5. Juliana, wife of Hugh Bigot, firſt Earl of Norfolk (o). Their mother Adeliza gave to the Monks of St Oſith or Chich in Eſſex, lands of 7 l. per annum value, lying in Dalham, Tunſtal, and Denham, being part of her frank marriage, which was confirmed by her ſon,

Alberic the Third (p), who in his father's life-time was at the conqueſt of the cities of Nique [Nice], Antioch, and Jeruſalem, in the company of Sir Robert Curtoiſe (q), Duke of Normandy [F]; and in a ſiege of Antioch, in a battle againſt Solyman, commander of the Turkiſh

[C] He ſuppreſſed an inſurrection &c.] King Stephen having ſurprized divers great perſons, and forced them to deliver up thoſe caſtles they then held, and amongſt them Roger, Biſhop of Saliſbury, being compelled to deliver up Shireburn, Deviſes, and Malmſbury, thereupon the other Biſhops called a council at Wincheſter, 4 Kal. Sept. to which they ſummoned the King, who thereupon, ſay ſome, ſent this Alberic to ſeize upon that aſſembly (8); but others, with greater probability, tell us, he was only ſent to them with the King's anſwer, being learned in the laws; and by his ſpeeches and arguments he put a ſtop to the proceedings of the Council, and cauſed them to break up without any concluſion, telling them, among other particulars, that the King had been informed they were ſending ſome perſons to Rome againſt him; but he charged them to forbear that preſumption, leſt the King ſhould prevent their return (9).

And he alſo held the Lordſhip of Turwell, in the ſame county, of the Monks of Thorney, in fee-farm, as his father did (11). Geffery and William were his other ſons, who are mentioned in the grant of Maud, the Empreſs, to their brother Alberic. Geffery was Sheriff of Shropſhire from 11 H. II. to the end of the 16th of that reign (12). Alſo in 12 H. II, upon leving the aid for marrying the King's daughter, he then reſided in com. Salop, and certified his Knights fees to be nine de veteri feoffamento, and three de novo (13). What poſterity he had, if any, is not known; but, in 6 Rich. I, William de Boterel paid 9l. for the ſcutage of his Barony (14).

[E] A daughter, Roheſia, &c.] Our Antiquaries differ in their judgments whoſe daughter ſhe was, whether of Alberic the firſt or ſecond. Sir W. Dugdale, who mentions her (as aforeſaid) to be the daughter of the ſaid Alberic, yet, in his account of Pagan de Beauchamp, he recites her marriage with him, and of her being the widow of Geoffry Mandevil, Earl of Eſſex, and that ſhe was daughter of the ſecond Alberic (15). Sir William Seagar, Garter, in his collection of the Baronage in manuſcript, makes her to be the daughter of Alberic firſt mentioned, and to be firſt married to Pagan de Beauchamp, and ſecondly to Geoffry Mandevil, Earl of Eſſex. Vincent aſſerts (16), that ſhe was daughter of Alberic 2d; alſo that ſhe was married to Pagan de Beauchamp: And with him Weever (17) and others concur. Nicholas Jekyl Eſq; a laborious Antiquary, contemporary with Selden and Camden, and of their ſociety, has left in manuſcript the pedigrees of the Barons; and in both families, of Beauchamp and Mandevil, mentions the ſaid Roheſia to be daughter of Alberic 2d, and that ſhe died 1 Kal. Oct. 1160; yet there is no account when Pagan de Beauchamp died; but her ſon, by him, Simon de Beauchamp, was Steward to King Stephen (18), and died before 9 John, when William, his ſon and heir, was of full age, and had livery of his lands (19): whereby it may be concluded, that ſhe had, for her firſt huſband, Pagan de Beauchamp, ſon of Hugh de Beauchamp, who came in with the Conqueror; which agrees in time: and it is certain he, with his wife Roheſia, confirmed to the Monks of Thorney, in Cambridgeſhire, the grants of lands that four of her tenants had made to them within her Lordſhip of Colworth; and, with her ſaid huſband, was founder of Chickſand in Bedfordſhire; and ſhe was buried at Chickſand (20). All which, except her burial, was before 1 King Stephen, when ſhe was preſent with her huſband, Geoffry de Mandevil, at the conſecration of the church-yard of the Abbey of Walden in Eſſex, founded by the ſaid Geoffry (21). The ſaid Roheſia was a Lady of ſingular piety, and, on the northern edge of the county of Hertford, erected a croſs by the road ſide, which was thought, ſays Weever, in that age a pious work, to put paſſengers in mind of Chriſt's paſſion, whereupon it was called CRUX ROHESIA before there was either church or town (22). And under it ſhe cauſed to be made a kind of ſubterraneous chapel or oratory, whither ſhe uſed to retire for her private devotions. This chapel, not long ſince, hath been diſcovered, and largely deſcribed by Dr Stewkley (23). And, near the ſaid croſs, Euſtachius de Mare, in the reign of Henry II, founded a Priory of black Canons, ſtiled de cruce-Roheſia; and ſoon after, ſays Weever, Inns were built there for the uſe of Travellers, and, in proceſs of time, it grew to be a town, which, inſtead of Roheſia's croſs, was called Roheſia town, and thence contracted into Royſton.

[F] He was at the conqueſt of Antioch.] Leland relates (24) that, in 1098, Corborant, Admiral to the Soudan of Perſia, was fought with at Antioche, and diſcumfited by the Chriſtianes. The night coming on, in the chace of this bataile, and waxing dark, the Chriſtianes being four miles from Antioche, God willing, the ſauſte of the Chriſtianes ſhewed a white ſtar, or molette of ſyve pointes, which, to every manne's ſighte, did lighte and arreſt upon the ſtandard of Albrey, there ſhining exceſſively. Thus we ſee that Light and Ornament of Great Britain promptly recording an ordinary natural meteor for a miracle, declarative of an extraordinary Divine interpoſition in favour of a ſet of ſuperſtitious Chriſtians. However, ſuch a ſcrap of credulity is pardonable enough in that diſtinguiſhed Scholar's circumſtances. In reality it was vitium temporis magis quam hominis. When Leland wrote his Itinerary (25), where this ſuperſtitious brat is found, notwithſtanding he had followed his Royal Maſter and munificent Patron Henry VIII, in throwing off the Pope's ſupremacy, and all ſuch tenets as were appendant thereto, yet he certainly ſtill retained, together with the ſame maſter, moſt of the old leaven of the Popiſh faith, which, among other errors, inculcated the firm belief of an unfailing courſe of miracles throughout the whole Chriſtian period. In juſtice to Leland it ought likewiſe to be further obſerved, That theſe meteoric ſtars had been unconteſtedly held for miraculous from the earlieſt ages of Chriſtianity, a ſuperſtition that not improbably had its firſt rooting in, and was originally grafted upon, that truly miraculous ſtar which conducted the three Eaſtern Sages to Chriſt. The ſtar upon the Earl of Oxford's ſtandard had, it ſeems, the figure of a mullet, or ſtar with five points or rays: when the ſame kind of meteor has happened to be thrown into four rays, thus Turkiſh army, ann. 1097, he retook a banner of St George, taken from the Chriſtians; whereupon he afterwards gave the arms of St George in his ſhield. After the death of his father, returning to England, he was made an Earl in King Stephen's time by Maud the Empreſs: for by that title ſhe rendered and granted to him all the lands which his father Alberic de Vere held at the time of his death, and particularly the office of great Chamberlain of England. Alſo the land of William de Albrinces, with the inheritance which he claimed in right of his wife; and the caſtle of Colcheſter, as ſoon as ſhe could deliver it to him. The Earldom of Cambridgeſhire, with the third penny thereof, as an Earl ought to have, if the King of the Scots had not that Earldom; or ſhe could procure him to exchange it: But if not, he was to be Earl either of Oxford, Berkſhire, Wiltſhire, or Dorſetſhire, at the diſcretion of her brother, the Earl of Glouceſter, Earl Geoffry, and Earl Giſlebert [Clare]. Alſo the inheritance, to him and his heirs, of William de Helion, namely ten Knights fees; likewiſe Diham, which belonged to Roger de Rannis, and was the right of the nephews of this Earl Alberic, viz. the ſons of Roger de Rannis. And Turroc, which belonged to William Peverell, Earl of Nottingham, and the land of Salamon, the Prieſt of Tillebery. And to him and his dependants freedom to profit by theſe gifts, without being called to anſwer for any thing which they had done, before they joined Maud the Empreſs and the Earl of Anjou her huſband (r). This deed was given at Oxford, and ſigned by the Empreſs Maud's own hand, and ſeveral ſureties named for the performance thereof; and that the Earl of Anjou her huſband, and Henry her ſon, ſhould confirm it under their hands [G]. Accordingly that ſon, King Henry II, by a deed, dated at Dover, in his paſſage, granted to Alberic the Earldom of Oxford, and the third penny of the pleas of the county, to him and his heirs (s). In the twelfth of this King's reign, upon levying the aid for marriage of his daughter, Alberic certified his Knights fees to be 28. a 4th and 8th part (t); for which, in the 14th of that reign, he gave 20l. towards the aid (u). In the 2d of Rich. I. he gave a fine of 500 marks for the ſiſter of Walter de Bolebec to make a wife for his ſon (w). And in the 6th of that reign, on the collection of the aid for the King's redemption, he paid 30l. 2s. 6d. for the Knights fees he then held (x). Before the end of that year he died, and was interred in the Priory at Colne, where a monument was erected to his memory [H]. By his ſecond wife (y), Lucia, daughter and heir to William de Albrinces [I], he had two ſons, Alberic and Robert, ſucceſſively Earls of Oxford [K].

thus exhibiting the form (how rudely ſoever) of a croſs, that figure rivetted the belief of a miracle therein. The croſs is particularly ſacred to Chriſtianity, and the appearance of one has been conſtantly held for a ſignum ſalutis to the Chriſtians. Thus, for inſtance, when Julian the Apoſtate, for the particular encouragement of the Jewiſh religion, ſet about rebuilding the temple of Jeruſalem, great numbers of theſe meteoric croſſes or ſtars happened to light upon the cloaths of the workmen and by-ſtanders: What was the conſequence? Did not the Chriſtian writers, even the moſt famed for learning and ſound ſenſe (26), claim them, with the utmoſt aſſurance of faith, for ſo many miracles, denouncing the overthrow of that attempt: A piece of ſuperſtition, which has been marked by the preſent Biſhop of Glouceſter (27); who indeed may be thought to have laviſhed more learning and labour upon it than would have been needful, had not the delicacy of his deſign required ſuch a conduct. The reputation of the Fathers was to be carefully managed, and the weight of their evidence in general was to be ſignified by the reſpect ſhewn in the extraordinary pains taken to ſet it aſide in one particular, which was to be cenſured ſo as not to hurt the credit of their teſtimony with regard to the miracle of the fiery eruption, the truth whereof his Lordſhip had undertaken to aſſert.

The ſame year he was alſo one of the witneſſes to that grant, whereby the King, on a vacancy among the Eccleſiaſtics, gave them licence to make a free choice among themſelves (nn). In the 17th of John he was one of the chief of thoſe Barons that took up arms againſt the King, and was party to the covenants then made between them, whereby they were to have the city and Tower of London delivered up into their hands (oo). But, upon the death of King John, a peaceable accord being made between Henry III. and theſe Barons, Earl Robert was received into favour. Hugh, fourth Earl of Oxford, in 14 Henry III, was one of the witneſſes to that league the King made with Reginald, Earl of Boloigne, to make no peace or truce with the King of France without a mutual conſent (tt). In 1233, 17 Henry III, he was ſolemnly knighted at Glouceſter, on the King's ſolemnizing the feaſt of Pentecoſt there (uu). In the 21ſt of Henry III. the King ordered twenty marks yearly to be paid him for the third penny of the county of Oxford, as Earl of that county (vvv). And, 23 Henry III, on a difference between the King and the Monks of Winchester, relating to the election of an Archbiſhop of that ſee, he, with other peers, wrote about it to the Pope, who returned them for anſwer, that his Legate had inſtructions to provide a perſon of whom the King could have no ſuſpicion (xx). In the 30th of Henry III. he was one of the Barons who ſubſcribed that letter ſent to the Pope, complaining of his exactions upon this realm (yy). In 32 Henry III. he was in that parliament wherein the King was upbraided by the Lords with his licentious expences, and that his Treaſurer and Chancellor were not perſons of their approbation (zz). In 33 Henry III. he paid 1000 marks to the King for the wardſhip and marriage of Alice, heir of Gilbert de Saunford (aaa), whom he married to Robert his ſon ſoon after (bbb). In 24 Edward I. he went Ambaſſador, to conclude a truce with the French King; alſo to Reginald, Earl of Guelderland, to treat about an alliance with him; likewiſe to take the oath of Florence, Earl of Flanders and Zealand, relating to the agreement of the ſaid Earl to furniſh the King with armed men (51). In 25 Edw. I. he was ſent with the Biſhops of Wincheſter and Ely, William de Valence Earl of Pembroke, and others, to treat of peace between the Kings of England and France (52), and continued in Gaſcoigne, in the King's ſervice, a great part of that year (53); and, for his good ſervice in thoſe parts, had a ſpecial livery of the lands of William, the ſon of Warine de Mountchenſi, whoſe daughter and heir, Dyonifia, he had married, though ſhe was not then of full age (54). In 26 Edward I. the King at Ghent notified to the Pope, that, in order to ſettle a peace with the King of France, he ſends to him Hugh de Veer and Otta de Grandiſon, Knts, deſiring him to counſel and help them (55). And accordingly he went to the Court at Rome (56). 27 Edward I. he obtained a Charter for Free Warren in all his Demeſne lands within his Lordſhips of Haiwode in com. Norfolk, and Haſingbroke and Phanges in Eſſex (57): and he was at the Abbey of Holmcoltham in Scotland, Oct. 7, 1300, 28 Edward I, when Robert, Biſhop of Glaſcow, ſwore fealty to King Edward as his lawful Sovereign (58). In 29 Edward I. he was employed, with John Earl Warren, and others, to treat with certain French Ambaſſadors about the peace with the Scots (59), and, 32 Edward I, being returned to England, did his fealty to the King for the lands of his wife's inheritance (60). He was alſo the ſame year in the wars of Scotland (61). In 34 Edw. I. he was employed in the Scottiſh wars (62). In 1 Edward II. he was ſummoned to be at the King's coronation, as was alſo his wife Dyonifia (63), by whom it ſeems he had no iſſue: For, upon her death, 7 Edw. II, Ademare de Valence, ſon of the Lady Joan de Valence, was found to be her next heir, ſhe then dying ſeized of the manors of Eaſt and Weſt Hanyngfeld, Stanford, and Fenge, with the advowſons of thoſe churches; as alſo of the manors of Rodefwell, Great Fordham, and Thuritone, with the advowſon of the church of Thuritone, all in Eſſex (64).

This Earl Robert had alſo two daughters; Joan, married to William de Warren, ſon of John, Earl Warren and Surrey, who had with her, by gift of her father, the manors of Midingham, Tyburne, Pritewell, Wiſhamſtone, Nechamſtede, and Gynges, with lands in Ceſtreſham of 10l. a year (65). He had by her a daughter, Alice, married to Edmund, the ſon of Allan, Earl of Arundel, and died before his father, 18th Kal. January, 1286, in the nineteenth year of his age, leaving the ſaid Joan his wife great with child, who, 2 Kal. July, was delivered of a ſon, named, after his grandfather, John, and ſucceeded him in the Earldoms of Arundel and Surrey, and was alſo Earl of Strathern in Scotland, but deceaſed, without lawful iſſue, on the anniverſary of his birth-day, anno 1347, in the ſixty-firſt year of his age, leaving Alice, his ſiſter, heir to all his eſtates, married, as ſaid before, to Edmund Fitz-Allan, Earl of Arundel, and had by him a ſon, Richard, who ſucceeded in the Earldoms of Arundel and Surrey, which through the Mowbrays, Dukes of Norfolk, deſcended to the Howards, Dukes of Norfolk (66).

The other daughter of Earl Robert and Alice, his wife, was Lora, wife of Reginald de Argentein, with whom her brother, Earl Robert, gave the manor of Ketlingham in Norfolk in dower; and from her deſcended the families of the Lord Fitz-Warin, St George of Hatley, St George in Cambridgeſhire, and the Allingtons of Horſeheath in the ſame county (67).

This Earl Robert, in 18 Edward I, obtained the King's charter for an annual fair at his manor of Lanham in Suffolk, on Monday, Tueſday, and Wedneſday, in Eaſter week (68). And for works of piety it appears, that, for the health of his ſoul, he gave to the Knights Hoſpitalers all his royalty, and ſervices of two Knights fees in Aſhly and Silverly which Geffry Arſick had wont to perform unto them (69). And, 16 Edward I, 145 acres of land and meadow in Bilchaungre and Takeleigh in Eſſex, to the Canons of Tremenkale, for the health of the ſoul of Gilbert his ſon (70).

gious zeal ſo admirably conjoined, that the common people eſteemed him as a Saint (ooo). He inherited from his father the office of Great Chamberlain of England and the title of Lord Bolebec, and in right of his mother was Lord Samford. In 23 Edward I, his father then living, he was commanded by the King to attend his brother Edmund, Earl of Lancaſter, with horſe and arms to Gaſcony (ppp). In 25 Edward I. the King required him to be preſent, with his Counteſs, at the marriage of his daughter Elizabeth to the Earl of Holland at Ipſwich (qqq). In 26 Edward II. he attended the King on an expedition to Scotland (rrr), and was alſo in that war the following year (sss), and in 30 Edward I. was Sheriff of Northampton (ttt). In 34 Edward I. he was ſummoned to aſſiſt at ſettling the aid in the knighting, at Weſtminſter, on the morrow of the Holy Trinity, of the King's ſon, Prince Edward (uuu), afterwards Edward II, upon whoſe acceſſion to the throne, the Earl and his Counteſs were ſummoned, January 10, 1 Edward II, to attend at the King's coronation on the Sunday after Valentine's day at Weſtminſter, on which ſolemnity, Thomas de Vere, the Earl's eldeſt ſon, together with the Earl of Arundel, Hugh de Spencer, and Roger de Mortimer of Wigmore, bore the Royal robes (wwww). July 30, 1309, 3 Edward II, he received the King's commands to march againſt the Scots at Michaelmas next enſuing. On which buſineſs he was alſo ſummoned again, 7 Edward II, and in the tenth of that reign he went by the Royal command againſt the Welch (xxx). In the 18th of Edward II. he attended the King into Gaſcony againſt the French (yyy). In the 1ſt of Edward III. he was commanded to attend in arms againſt any hoſtile attempt that ſhould be made by Robert de Bruce and his adherents, who, in caſe he could not obtain a peace to his liking in treaty, to be negotiated on the marches of Wales, threatened to invade England (zzz). In the 4th of Edward II. the King, April 2, 1330, notified to his Treaſurer and Chamberlains, that Robert de Veer, Earl of Oxford, had ſet forth, that by inheritance he claimed to be Chamberlain to the Queen on the day of her coronation, and that he and his anceſtors, time immemorial, have enjoyed and exerciſed the ſame office. That, for the fee on that day, they received the Queen's bed, her ſhoes, and ſandals, three ſilver baſons in which the Queen is ſerved, viz. one for the waſhing of her head, and two for her hands; that the King was willing to deliver the ſame to him on account of the coronation of Queen Philippa his conſort, on which day he attended as Chamberlain; and that, as it evidently appeared he and his anceſtors had enjoyed the ſame, he had the ſhoes and ſandals delivered to him; therefore he now orders his ſaid Treaſurer and Chamberlains to pay him, in lieu of the ſaid bed, a hundred marks (4a). This Earl died the 19th of April, 5 Edward III, and was ſolemnly buried at the Priory of Colne (4b). He had iſſue by Margaret, his wife, daughter of Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, one ſon, Thomas de Veer [R], who dying in his life-time, the Earldom fell to his nephew,

John, the ſeventh Earl of Oxford (4c), who, at twenty years of age, ſubſcribed to that agreement the King made with Patrick, Earl of March, and others, for a ceſſation of arms on Tueſday, the feaſt of St Margaret the Virgin, 1333, 7 Edward III (4d), and the year after he was in the expedition made into Scotland (4e). His Lordſhip attended the ſame King in his wars againſt the Scots in the ninth and tenth years of his reign (4f), and in the fourteenth went with him to Flanders. In the fifteenth he was at the great feaſt and juſting in London, which the King cauſed to be made in reſpect to the Counteſs of Saliſbury (4g), and the ſame year had an aſſignation out of the ſubſidy then levied of 300l. in part of a greater ſum due to him for his ſervices in the King's wars beyond-ſea (4h). He had alſo that year a ſummons, dated November 4, 15 Edward III, to be at Newcaſtle upon Tyne with forty Gens d'Armes and Archers on the 24th of January, ready to march againſt the Scots. In 16 Edward III. he was again in the wars of France, in which ſervice he had forty men at arms (himſelf accounted) one Banneret, nine Knights, twenty-nine Eſquires, and thirty Archers on horſeback, with an allowance of fifty-ſix ſacks of wool for the wages of himſelf and his retinue (4i). In 17 Edward III. he accompanied Henry de Lancaſter Earl of Derby, and other great Lords, into Scotland, for raiſing the ſiege of Laumaban-caſtle (4k); but before their arrival the Scots had retreated (4l). And ſoon after the King coming to Berwick, with all his forces, a truce was made for two years. After which, the ſame year, the Earl embarked with William Montague Earl of Saliſbury, and other Lords, to aid the Counteſs of Montfort in Bretagne; and in their way met with a fleet fitted out by the Lord Charles of Blois, which lay to intercept them before the iſle of Guernſey; on which the two fleets engaging, the action was very bloody, being fought with much fury and bravery till night parted them. About midnight aroſe ſuch a ſtorm as ſeparated the fleets (4m). The Earl of Oxford, with [R] He had iſſue one ſon, Thomas de Veer.] Sir William Dugdale (71), in his account of this family, has recited ſome particulars of Thomas de Veer, whom he makes a younger brother of the ſaid Robert, Earl of Oxford; but it does not appear, by any authority, that he had ſuch a brother; and what Sir William mentions of him is certainly true of Thomas de Veer, ſon of the ſaid Earl Robert, which is evident in what he ſays of him. In 32 Edward I. he was in the wars of Scotland (72), and in 34 Edward I. he was knighted with Prince Edward, by Bathing and divers other ſacred ceremonies, and is expreſsly ſaid to be ſon and heir to the Earl of Oxford (73). The ſame year he attended the Prince in his expedition into Scotland (74). On the coronation of Edward II. he attended, and is ſtiled Thomas de Veer, ſon and heir of the Earl of Oxford. In 12 Edward II. he was again in the wars of Scotland (75), and, in 18 Edward II, the King having appointed him guardian of the coaſts of Eſſex, the Biſhop of London had the King's orders to adminiſter to him the oaths for that office (76). He married, in 8 Edward II, Agnes, widow of Pain Tiptoft, but had no iſſue by her (77). His father, Robert Earl of Oxford, in 3 Edward III, obtained the King's charter for a court-leet at his manor of Cheſham in Bucks, with all thoſe profits and advantages that the Sheriff of that county uſed to enjoy there, paying yearly five marks into the King's Exchequer. As alſo another charter for his tenants of Lavenham in Suffolk to be Toll free throughout all England (78).

he Engliſh, when the ſtorm was over, landed in Bretagne, near the city of Vannes, to which hey preſently laid ſiege, and took both the town and caſtle by ſtratagem, thus; the Earl of Oxford and his forces approaching ſilently to the walls without any difficulty, mounted up caling ladders, and entered the town, which ſo diſmayed the French, that every man ſhifted or himſelf, and eſcaped out of a privy poſtern (4n). The ſiege of Rennes and Nantes followed that of Vannes the ſame year, in both which our Earl ſignalized himſelf: but theſe, as alſo the particulars of the campaign the enſuing year, 18 Edward III, together with the famous battles of Creſſy and Poictiers, under the Black Prince, are too much known to be retailed here; and the glorious ſhare our Earl had in them is particularly enlarged on by Mr Barnes, in his hiſtory of this King, to which therefore we refer the Reader: And only obſerve, that, notwithſtanding the great and exemplary ſervices the Earl of Oxford had performed for his King and country, it does not appear that he had any beneficial grants; and probably his large eſtate made him leſs ſollicitous to obtain any ſuch favour, contenting himſelf with the glory he had atchieved. On the 24th of June, 32 Edward III, the truce between England and France (which from the battle of Poictiers had continued, with expectation of a full peace) being wholly expired, the French refuſed the conditions agreed on by King Edward and King John of France, then priſoner in England (4o). Hereupon Edward raiſed an army of 100000 fighting men (4p), and, having ſeen them muſtered and embarked between Sandwich and Dover, he notified, October 10, 1359, 33 Edward III, from Sandwich to the Earl of Oxford, that, for the diſpatch of the war with France, and for the defence of his kingdom, he was going beyond the ſeas, having conſtituted Thomas, his ſon, guardian of the kingdom of England; and the welfare of his kingdom lying much at heart, he had appointed a Council to be at Weſtminſter on Sunday next after St Martin's day (November 11) and commands him to be preſent there (4q). The Earl accordingly ſtaid to attend this Council, not embarking with the King; but he followed him not long after, and died in this expedition in the Engliſh army encamped before Rheims, January 24, 34 Edward III, in the forty-ſeventh year of his age. Before he ſet out he made his will [S], and thereby bequeathed his body to be buried in the chapel of our Lady, within the Priory of Colne, on the South ſide of the quire, at the head of John and Robert his ſons, there interred before. He married Maud, widow of Robert, ſon of Robert Fitz-Pain, and eldeſt daughter of Bartholomew, Lord Badleſmere, and ſiſter and co-heir of Giles, Lord Badleſmere, a great Baron in Kent (4r), by whom he had alſo other iſſue [T], beſides his eldeſt ſon, Thomas Vere, who ſucceeded him, and became the eighth Earl of Oxford, and, in the life-time of his father, attending the King in his expedition to France (29 Edward III.) was knighted on the Downs by his Highneſs (4s). On the death of his father he was likewiſe beyond the ſeas in the King's ſervice (4t). Robert, their only ſon and heir, who, on the death of his father, September 18, 1371, 45 Edward III, became ninth Earl of Oxford; but being then in his minority, King Edward III, in the 45th year of his reign, granted his marriage to Ingelram de Coucy, then Earl of Bedford, to the intent he might take to wife the Lady Philippa, daughter of that Earl by Iſabel, daughter of King Edward III. (4*x*), which marriage being effected, King Richard II, in the ſecond year of his reign, granted to William, Biſhop of London, and Roger de Beauchamp, 100*l.* per annum, for his better ſupport till he ſhould arrive at full age (4*y*). Alſo, in 6 Richard II, wanting lands of ſufficient worth to maintain her the ſaid Philippa, he obtained from the King, in conſideration of his ſervice done and to be done, that, during her life, they ſhould enjoy all thoſe lands which were beſtowed by Edward III, in remainder after Joane, the wife of John de Coupland, upon the ſaid Ingelram, Earl of Bedford, and Iſabel, his wife, and the heirs of their two bodies (4*z*). After which, the ſame year, making proof that he was of full age, and then doing his homage, he had livery of his whole lands (5*a*), and the next year he was ſummoned among the Peers to parliament (5*b*). In the 9th of Richard II. the King, having retained him in his ſervice, gave him, in conſideration thereof, the caſtle and Lordſhip of Okeham in Rutland, with all the foreſt of Rutland, to hold to him and his heirs male. And purpoſing to confer on him the title of Marquis of Dublin, that he might the better ſupport the ſaid honour, he aſſigned unto him in reverſion, after the death of James de Audeleigh, the caſtle, manor, and borough of Barnſtaple; the manors of Fremington, Ilferecombe, Combe-Martyn, South-Moulton, Holdeſworthy, Nemet-Bowe, Uppeye, Bovy-Tracey, Holne, Dertyngton, Kyngeſton, Blackdon, and Long-Acre, with all other lands of the ſame James de Audeleigh, lying in the counties of Devon, Cornwall, and Somerſet, which, after the death of him the ſaid James, were to deſcend to the King (5*c*). He was accordingly created a Marquis of Dublin the ſame year (5*d*), which being conſented to in parliament (5*e*), the King granted him the land and dominion of Ireland, with all profits, revenues, and regalities, as amply as the King himſelf ought to have the ſame, reſerving to the King the homages, reſort, and ſuperiority of that country, which confirmation in parliament was made by the girding of a ſword, and putting a circle of gold upon his head (5*f*). The title of Marquis had never till then been heard of in England, and therefore was much diſtaſted by others of the nobility (5*g*). The King alſo granted him all the benefit which might be had by John, ſon of Charles de Blois (then priſoner in Glouceſter-caſtle) that he might be able to maintain 500 men at arms, and 1000 archers, at the accuſtomed wages of war, by the ſpace of two years after his arrival in Ireland (which he intended about Candlemas the ſame year) in order to the conqueſt of that realm. And to go thither, warrants were iſſued out to employ veſſels to tranſport him and his retinue (5*h*). And the King eſteeming that honour, ſo lately conferred upon his chief favourite, too low for his merits, he was advanced to the title of Duke of Ireland upon the feaſt-day of Edward the Confeſſor (5*i*). He alſo ordained, that the heir of Charles de Blois, who challenged the Dukedom of Britany, (and whoſe ranſom he had obtained) ſhould ſell it to the French for 30000*l.* to the intent that this Duke, with that money, might by force get the dominion of Ireland before Eaſter enſuing (5*k*) [W]. [W] That he might get the dominion of Ireland.] The Iriſh hiſtorian gives this account of him: 'The Engliſh 'parliament, ſays he, to get rid of him, gave him a 'debt of 30000 marks, due from the French King, 'upon condition that after Eaſter he ſhould paſs into 'Ireland, to recover the lands the King had given him 'there. He had 500 men at arms, at 12*d.* per day, 'and 1000 archers, at 6*d.* a day, appointed him for 'two years, for the reduction of that country. He was 'truſted with the whole dominion of the realm during 'his life, without paying any thing therefore, or making 'any account for it. He had power to paſs all writs 'under his own teſt, and to place and diſplace all officers, 'how great ſoever, even the Chancellor, Treaſurer, 'Admiral, &c. and to name his own Deputy, and all 'other miniſters. Afterwards he had a larger patent, 'whereby the King granted him the whole territory and 'government of Ireland, the iſles thereto adjacent, with 'caſtles, counties, burroughs, towns, ſeaports, &c. 'together with homages, obeiſſances, vaſſals, ſervants, 'and acknowledgments of the Prelates, Earls, and 'Barons, &c. with the royalties, regalities, liberties, '&c. with all other things belonging to the ſovereign 'power, with abſolute and joint authority, ſo fully, 'perfectly, and truly, as he the King held, or had the 'ſame, or any of his progenitors in times paſt. Thus puffed up with wealth and honour, he grew inſolent, and thereby raiſed ſuch powerful enemies, as obliged him to fly for his ſafety beyond-ſea with Michael de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk [X]. Yet it was not long e'er he again landed in England with about four or five thouſand men, and, being got into Oxfordſhire, came, on the feaſt-day of St Thomas the Apoſtle, to Radcote-bridge upon the river Iſis; which bridge Henry Earl of Derby, who with his power was not far off, had broken in three places, and placed ſoldiers there to ſtop his farther paſſage. The Duke therefore, ſeeing himſelf in this deſperate condition, diſplayed the King's banner, and animated his men to fight, advancing before them to the bridge; and finding it impaſſable, environed by the Duke of Glouceſter on one ſide, and the Earl of Derby on the other, he threw away his ſword, gauntlets, and armour, and, leaping into the river, eſcaped them. But the Lords, growing powerful, cauſed the King to ſummon a parliament, which met at Weſtminſter, 11 R. II, where articles of high-treaſon were exhibited againſt him by the Duke of Glouceſter, Henry Earl of Derby, Richard Earl of Arundel, and others; and he, not appearing, was forthwith baniſhed, and all his poſſeſſions confiſcated, excepting his entailed lands, which only were to remain to his right heirs (5m). Being likewiſe attainted, outlawed, and fled beyond ſea (5n), he was, after five years baniſhment, ſtruck by a wild boar in hunting (5o), and died of his hurts at Lovaine, November 22, 1392, 16 R. [X] He fled beyond ſea, with the Earl of Suffolk.] He grew inſolent and bluſtering, ſays Walſingham, and put away the fair Lady Philippa, his wife (kinſwoman to the King) with purpoſe to take another who came out of Bohemia with Queen Anne, and was of mean extraction; which gave great diſtaſte to the nobility, eſpecially to the Duke of Glouceſter, the King's uncle, who, though he could not at preſent vindicate his niece, ſo repudiated, reſerved himſelf for an opportune time to do it. But ſoon after, Eaſter being paſſed, and the expectation of his going to Ireland ſtill continuing, the King, to prevent any tumult by the Nobles, accompanied him part of his way; and continuing retired for a while, they conſulted together how to murder the Duke of Glouceſter, the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, Derby, and Nottingham. And having ſtaid in thoſe remote parts of the kingdom, till they imagined the people had forgotten the ſo much talked of voyage into Ireland, he returned with the King to Nottingham caſtle, there to conſider farther how they might beſt put in execution the deſigned murders. The Nobles therefore, by way of prevention, raiſed all the power they could, and met at Haringhay Park, near High-gate in Middleſex, in an hoſtile manner; which ſo ſtartled the King, and his party then about him, that all of them began to deſire an accommodation, and to that end ſent to the Lords at Haringhay to come to Weſtminſter, that, upon a calm debate together, differences might be quietly compoſed: Who meeting there accordingly, the Lord Chancellor (Biſhop of Ely) made a ſhort ſpeech to them, in the cloſe whereof he ſaid the King deſired to know the cauſe of this their inſurrection; to which they anſwered, that it was for the King's advantage to rid him of thoſe Traitors he then had about him; among whom they firſt named Robert de Vere, Duke of Ireland. But the King, giving them fair words, and taking them into his chamber, where he made them drink together, told them they ſhould all meet in parliament, and equal juſtice ſhould be done to each. Matters being thus qualified, the Duke of Ireland, by the King's connivance, haſtes forthwith into Wales, there to raiſe what power he could (90); but diſcerning his danger, privily got away, diſguiſed, as was ſaid, in the habit of a ſervant, with a bow and a quiver of arrows at his back, and ſo, with five others in his company, alike accoutred, came to Cheſter, and ſoon after that fled beyond-ſea, with Michael de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk (91).

[Y] Leaving the world matter of talk.] About three years after, viz. in November, 1395, 19 R. II, the King having cauſed his body to be embalmed, and brought over into England in a Cypreſs caſe, made a ſolemn funeral for him at Colne in Eſſex, which he honoured with his preſence, and cauſed the coffin of Cypreſs, wherein his body lay, to be opened, that he might behold his face, and touch him with his fingers, openly ſhewing his love to the dead carcaſs which he bore him when alive (92). And Speed relates (93), that he cauſed him to be apparelled in princely ornaments and robes, and put about his neck a chain of gold, and rings upon his fingers (94).

[Z] He executed ſeveral commiſſions.] On the 14th of May, 1377, 51 Edw. III, he was joined in commiſſion with the Biſhop of St David's, Lord Chancellor, William de Montague, Earl of Saliſbury, and others, to treat of a peace and truce with Charles, King of France (95). In 4 Rich. II, as Ambaſſador, he treated with the Emperor of the Romans, and ſigned the articles of marriage between Richard and Anne daughter of the ſaid Emperor (96). In 7 Rich. II, Oct. 4, 1383, he was commiſſioned with John Devereux, Governor of Calais, to treat about a time and place for meeting of Plenipotentiaries of France to conclude a peace and truce at (97). In the eighth of Henry V, being then of full age, he was one of the witneſſes to the King's altering the ſucceſſion of the crown, and ſettling it on his ſon Henry, Prince of Wales (5z), who ſucceeding to the throne, under the ſtile of King Henry V, did, in the third year of his reign, ſummon this Earl Richard, among other great Lords, to meet him in the Quindenes of Eaſter, when he thanked them, and declared his intentions of going beyond-ſea for the recovery of his rights (6a). Going ſoon after the ſame year, he was attended into France by the Earl (6b); but before the end thereof, finding himſelf infirm, he made his laſt will on the 6th of Auguſt, 1415, therein bequeathing his body to be buried in the conventual church of the Priory of Colne in Eſſex, where his anceſtors lay interred, and gave to Alice, his wife, all his perſonal eſtate, to pay his debts, diſcharge his funeral expences, and diſpoſe of for pious uſes (*). John, became the twelfth Earl of Oxford, being then only nine years of age (6f). On 4 Hen. VI. he was, among others, knighted by the King at Leiceſter on Whitſunday (6g). In 7 Hen. VI, being then in ward, and having married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Howard the younger, Knt. without licence, he was obliged to purchaſe his pardon at the expence of 2000l. paid into the Exchequer. And before the end of that year, making proof of his age, and doing his homage, he had livery of his lands (6h). In 13 Hen. VI. the King granted him his licence, with twelve perſons of his retinue, to go in pilgrimage to the Holy land (6i): As alſo his protection for two years, with allowance of carrying, in ſpecie or bullion, 1001. and to receive 500 marks more, by way of exchange, to defray his expences (6k). In 14 Hen. VI. he was one of the commanders under the Duke of Glouceſter ſent to the relief of Calais, then beſieged (6l); and the French, on hearing of their arrival, retired before it, July 18, in the night, with ſuch precipitation, that they left behind them their proviſions, tents, &c. (6m). In 17 Hen. VI. the Earl was joined in commiſſion with John Duke of Norfolk, and others, to treat in the marches of Calais with Charles de Valois, or his Ambaſſadors, about a perpetual peace between England und France (6n); and alſo about ſetting at liberty the Duke of Orleans, then priſoner in England (6o). In 18 Hen. VI, (Richard, Duke of York, being made Regent of France on the death of the Earl of Warwick) the Earl of Oxford was the principal commander under him; and, with other noblemen, going into Normandy, obliged the French King to raiſe the ſiege of Ponthoiſe, leaving behind great riches and much proviſion (6p). The Earl probably continued in the wars of France till the concluſion of a truce in 23 Hen. VI (6q), in which year (1446) the King, at his inſtance, as proprietor of the ſhip called the Jeſus of Orwel, granted licence, March 8, to the captain thereof to tranſport as many perſons as he ſhall think proper, going on a pilgrimage to St James in Galicia (6r). In 28 Hen. VI, a truce being made between England and France, he was appointed a conſervator thereof on the part of England; as he was alſo of another truce, made the year following, for three years, from Auguſt, 1451, to Auguſt, 1454; and likewiſe of a third, concluded at Newcaſtle in 31 Hen. VI, to continue from May, 1453, to May, 1457 (6s). In 32 Hen. VI. he, with the Earls of Saliſbury, Shrewſbury, and ſome other Lords, undertook to keep the ſeas for three years next following, being allowed the ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage then granted for that ſervice (6t). In 35 Hen. VI. he was again appointed one of the conſervators of the truce made for two years with Scotland; as alſo of another, concluded for five years, in 38 Hen. VI (6u). But when King Edward IV. attained the crown, he cauſed this Earl John, far ſtricken in years, and Aubery, his eldeſt ſon (with others) to be attainted in parliament, and afterwards (viz. Feb. 1, 1 Edw. IV.) beheaded them both on Tower-hill (6w), and they were buried in the church of the Auguſtin friars, London (6x). Upon the recovery of the Crown, King Henry VI. called a parliament, wherein Edward being declared a Traitor and Uſurper, the Earl of Oxford, attainted by him (7a), was reſtored in blood, dignities, and ancient poſſeſſions. On the 23d of December following he was commiſſioned, with Richard Earl of Warwick, and others, to levy all perſons capable of bearing arms, and to muſter and review them as often as occaſion ſhould require; and to lead and command them in oppoſing King Henry's enemies, with a mandate to the Sheriffs of Cambridgeſhire, Huntingtonſhire, Norfolk, Suffolk, Eſſex, and Hertford, to aid and aſſiſt as often as required (7b). And John Tiptoft, Earl of Worceſter, having rendered himſelf very obnoxious to the Lancaſtrians, he was ſeized and brought to London, where the Earl of Oxford ſat High Steward on his trial, and, pronouncing the ſentence of death upon him, he was beheaded on Tower-hill (7c). On the firſt news of King Edward's return and landing, the Earl of Oxford repaired immediately to the Earl of Warwick in Warwickſhire, and was with him when Clarence's meſſage was delivered, unto which he made this reply: Go, tell your Duke, that I had rather be an Earl, and always like myſelf, than a falſe and perjured Duke; and that e'er my oath ſhall be falſified (as his apparently is) I will lay down my life at my enemy's foot, which I doubt not but ſhall be bought very dear (7d) [DD]. Soon after followed the memorable battle of Barnet-field, where the Earl of Oxford commanded the right wing of the army againſt Edward, and led the van-guard; but, by miſtake, his own men ſhooting againſt each other (7e), he and all his party were routed; whereupon he fled into Wales [EE], and thence to St Michael's mount in Cornwall (7f); but being beſieged there, after a ſtout reſiſtance, was forced to ſurrender a priſoner to King Edward, who ſent him to the caſtle of Hams in Picardy (7g); and in the parliament begun at Weſtminſter, Oct. 6, 14 Edw. IV. he (together with his brothers, Sir George and Sir Thomas) were attainted, but pardoned for their lives (7h). In 2 Rich. III, being ſtill priſoner in the caſtle of Hams, and obſerving what hopes of aid the Earl of Richmond then had from the French and others, he eſcaped thence, and together with Sir James Blount, Governor of that caſtle, and Sir John Forteſcue, Porter of Calais, went to the Earl of Richmond (at Montarges) to aſſiſt him in gaining the crown of England; Richmond received him with much joy, being a perſon of high nobility, expert in military affairs, and withal of high integrity; as Polydore Virgil relates (7i); and our other hiſtorians mention the great joy Richmond had on ſeeing him, looking on it as a preſage of his happy ſucceſs. When Richard received this news, he appointed part of the garriſon at Calais to march out to regain the caſtle of Hams; but the garriſon ſending to the Earl of Richmond for more aid, he diſpatched the Earl of Oxford with a choice number of expert ſoldiers, who, by his ſkilful conduct, drew off thoſe in the caſtle without any loſs. After which he haſted to the Earl of Richmond in Paris, and never left him till he had ſettled the crown of this realm upon his head, by the name and ſtile of Henry VII. (7k) [FF]. Upon which event the Earl was immediately reſtored to all his poſſeſſions (7l), and choſen of the Privy Council (7m). Alſo, at his coronation, was conſtituted one of the Commiſſioners for executing the office of Lord High Steward of England (7n), and was the firſt Knight of the Garter elected in that King's reign (7o) [GG]. [DD] It ſhall be bought dear.] King Edward, upon his landing at Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire, laying aſide all claim to the crown, pretended he was come only to enjoy his dutchy of York, whereupon he was admitted into that city, on taking his oath to be true to King Henry (104). But after that growing more potent, and the Duke of Clarence, brother to King Edward, falling from the Earls of Warwick and Oxford, to whom, in France, he had taken an oath to continue in firm amity with them, Edward took on himſelf the title of King at Nottingham (105). The Earl of Oxford was linked in cloſe friendſhip with the Earl of Warwick, having married Margaret his ſiſter, and had cauſe of inveteracy againſt King Edward, who had baniſhed him, and put his father and brother to death, as beforementioned. Therefore it may be preſumed he had ſome influence on the Earl of Warwick, in keeping him ſteady in the intereſt of King Henry; when the Duke of Clarence, who had married Warwick's daughter, endeavoured to reconcile him to King Edward, promiſing him to work his peace, and that with ſuch honour, as Warwick ſhould know himſelf not only a father to CLARENCE, but likewiſe to Edward, England's King (106).

[EE] He fled into Wales.] Leland ſays he fled into Scotland (107); but others ſay more truly that he fled towards Scotland, and finding danger in ſo long a journey, he altered his purpoſe, and turned into Wales, and thence, with the Earl of Pembroke, into France, and having gotten much at ſea, came into the Weſt country, where by ſubtlety he entered St Michael's mount in Cornwall with 397 men (108), on the laſt of September, and divers times coming down there into the adjacent villages, had good cheer of the inhabitants: Whereupon Bodrigan, the King's Lieutenant in that county, being commanded by the King, beſieged the Mount, but ſo favourably, that the Earl revictualled it; ſo that Richard Forteſcue, Eſq; of the body to the King, Sheriff of Cornwall, was ſent to continue the ſiege. And King Edward, by ſending pardons, ſo wrought with the ſoldiers in the Mount, that, had not the Earl ſubmitted, his own men would have made him priſoner, whereby Forteſcue entered the Mount on the 15th of February following, wherein he found victuals enough to have ſerved till Midſummer (109).

[FF] He ſettled the crown upon Richmond's head.] Upon Richmond's arrival in England, he marched with him to Boſworth, where King Richard being ready to give him battle, Richmond marſhalled his army, and appointed this Earl to command the vanguard, conſiſting of archers. And he behaved with ſuch great courage in the battle, that when they came to the ſword, fearing to be encompaſſed, he commanded that no ſoldier ſhould ſtir above ten feet from his colours: and then moſt valiantly charging the enemy in form of a wedge, put them to the rout, in which he ſlew many, and thereby became one of the chiefeſt inſtruments in obtaining the happy victory that day, Auguſt 22, 1458 (110).

Hertford and Middleſex, late belonging to George Nevil, Archbiſhop of York; alſo of the manors of Framlingham, Kelſall, Hareſtone, Peſenhall, Walton, with Tremley, and the hundred of Looſe in Suffolk, and of the manor of Willington in com. Bedford, which were part of the poſſeſſions of John, late Duke of Norfolk, attainted: Likewiſe of the manors of Berham, Walkefare, and Powers, in Waltham-parva in Eſſex, late the lands of Francis Viſcount Lovell, attainted; and of the manor of Botefworth in com. Northampton, late William Cateſby's, Eſq; attainted: Alſo of the houſe called the Herber, in the pariſh of St Mary Bothawe in the ward of Dowgate, firſt year of his reign, he was made Conſtable of the Tower of London for life (7p), and likewiſe Lord High Admiral of England, Ireland, and the Dutchy of Aquitain (7q). In the 3d of Henry VII. he was conſtituted one of the commiſſioners to exerciſe the office of High Steward of England at the coronation of the Queen (7r). And, upon the inſurrection made by John Earl of Lincoln on the behalf of Lambert Simnel, this Earl, with Jaſper Duke of Bedford, was chief commander of the King's forces againſt thoſe rebels, and vanquiſhed them, June 16, in a pitched battle at Stoke, near Newark upon Trent (7s). In 4 Hen. VII. he was empowered to examine what number of archers, armed at the King's expence, the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Eſſex, and Hertford, could provide for the relief of Britany; and to article with them, and review them, and to certify their names before the Quindenes of Eaſter (7t). And the ſame year, with the Duke of Bedford, had the command of thoſe forces ſent by King Henry into Flanders, in aid of Maximilian the Emperor againſt the French (7u). In the 8th of Henry VII. this Earl had the chief command of the army ſent againſt the French, and the King, in October, met him, then come from beating down the town of ARDE, at Mergiſon (7w), in his way to Bulloign. Two days after which they came before that town, and beſieged it till the 8th of November, when a peace being concluded with the French at Staples upon the ſea near that town, the Earl of Oxford aſſented, and ſigned the ſame (7x). In 9 Hen. VII. he was conſtituted Conſtable of the caſtle of Clare in Suffolk (7y), and, in 11 Hen. VII, he was one of the Guarantees on the part of England for keeping the peace then concluded with the Archduke of Auſtria (7z). In 12 Hen. VII. he was the chief commander againſt the Lord Audley and the Corniſh rebels at the battle of Black-heath, and environing the hill with his archers and horſemen, ſet on them with great valour, killing 300, and taking 1500 priſoners (8a). In 23 Hen. VII. he, with other great Lords, entered into a recognizance of 50000 crowns each, for performance of the articles of marriage between Charles, Prince of Spain, and Mary, the King's third daughter; and was preſent at that marriage, ſolemnized in the palace at Richmond, December 7, 1508, 24 Hen. VII. (8b). On the acceſſion of Hen. VIII. the Earl's patents were renewed for the office of Lord High Admiral of England, Ireland, and the dutchy of Aquitain, and of the conſtableſhip of the caſtle of Clare, and both were made to him for life (8c). He had alſo, May 16, 1 Hen. VIII, a grant and confirmation, to him and his heirs, of the caſtle and tower of Colcheſter (8d); and likewiſe a confirmation of the office of Lord Great Chamberlain of England (8e). After this there does not appear any mention of him, but that he made his will [HH] near five years before his death, which happened on Thurſday, March 10, in 4 Hen. VIII, having been Earl of Oxford full fifty years, and was buried in the priory of Colne, according to his deſire (8f). He largely contributed to the finiſhing St Mary's church in Cambridge (8g), and, in the eſtimation of all that knew him (8h), was a very wiſe, learned, religious, and magnificent man [II].

[HH] He made his will.] It was dated April 10, 1508, being (as his words are) in good health and perfect mind, not grieved, vexed, troubled, nor diſeaſed with any bodily ſickneſs. He bequeathed to the figure of the bleſſed Lady at Walſingham, his eagle of gold, diſplayed and garniſhed. He alſo bequeathed, in honour of the holy and bleſſed King, Maiden, and Martyr, St Edmund, to his monaſtery at Bury, his beſt whole ſuit of veſtments of cloth of gold of tiſſue, viz. for Prieſt, Deacon, and Subdeacon. And he wills and requires his Executors, as haſtily as they can after his departure, to cauſe 2000 maſſes of requiem to be ſaid and ſung for his ſoul by every Fryar, being a Prieſt, in any of the houſes of the black Fryars in Cambridge and Oxford, and the white Fryars of Lynn, which houſes were of the foundation of his anceſtors. And alſo to the brethren of the Charterhouſe, London, Shene and Sion; and every Monk, Chanon, or every other religious perſon, being a Prieſt, or abiding within any houſe of religion of the foundation of any of his anceſtors, ſhall ſing and ſay Placebo and Dirige, and commendations, and have 3s. 4d. for their labour. And every other Fryar, Monk, Chanon, or Prieſt, within any houſe of religion in the ſhires of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Eſſex, ſhall have, for their labour, 1s. 6d. His other bequeſts to Prieſts are very numerous. He wills that, if he has iſſue male of his body, lawfully begotten, they ſhall have his image of the Trinity, ſilver and gilt, and his croſs of gold, wherein lie two pieces of the holy croſs, with the garniſhing of the ſame; his bed of Roote, which he had by reaſon of his office of Great Chamberlain of England at the King's coronation; alſo his hangings of Tulins, a Celonanda Teſter of rich Arras, with a Torney thereon, which he had at the coronation of the Queen that is dead, by reaſon of his ſaid office, with ſeveral other particulars recited, which were to go to his heirs male, and in default to his nephew John Veer, ſon of his brother Sir George Veer, when he comes to the age of twenty-one years; and in default to his couſin John Veer, ſon and heir to Sir Robert Veer, Knt. his uncle, and in default to his right heirs. To the ſame heirs he alſo bequeathed the caſtle and honour of Hedingham and Gelham, with his manors of Bumſted, Canfield, Praiers, Bowre-hall, Greys in Hedingham-Sibille, Earls-Colne, Bentley, Crepinghall, Downham, Lavenham, Overhall, Nether-hall, Cokefield, Walſham-hall, Campes, Abingdon, Saxton, Swaffham-Bulbeck, Kenſyngton, and his place near Biſhops-gate in London. All which were of the old inheritance of the Earldom of Oxford, as by old gifts thereof made to his anceſtors manifeſtly did appear. He farther bequeathed to his nieces, Dorothy and Urſula, 600 marks, and conſtitutes executors, Elizabeth his dear wife, Sir Thomas Lovel, Sir James Hobart, Sir Robert Drury, Sir William Waldegrave, Sir Robert Lovel, Knts. Dr William Cook, John Veer the elder, Humphry Wingfield, John Daniel, John Joſſelyn, Eſqs; and William Okeley, Gent. each of which, being of the degree of a Knight, he bequeaths 10l. and to every other, ten marks (112).

(112) By a codicil, dated Sept. 1. 1512, 4 H. VIII, he confirms this will, of which the probate is dated May 10, 1514, and adminiſtration granted to Sir R. Drury, Sir W. Waldegrave, Knts. J. Veer, J. Joſſelin, and J. Daniel, Eſqrs; and W. Okeley, Gent. See the probate of his will in cur. prærog. Cant.

[II] He was a magnificent man.] Of his hoſpitality, and the great poſt he lived in, we have the following inſtance by Lord Bacon. The King, ſays that learned Author, was on a time entertained by the Earl of Oxford (that was his principal ſervant both for war and peace) nobly and ſumptuouſly at his caſtle at Heningham: And, at the King's going away, the Earl's ſervants ſtood in a ſeemly manner in their livery coats, with cognizances, ranged on both ſides, and made the King a lane. The King called the Earl unto him, and ſaid, My Lord, I have heard much of your hoſpitality; but it is greater than the ſpeech: Theſe handſome gentlemen and yeomen, which I ſee on both ſides of me, are ſure your menial ſervants. The Earl ſmiled, and ſaid, That were not for mine eaſe: They are moſt of them my Retainers, that are come to do me ſervice at ſuch a time as this, and chiefly to ſee your Grace. The King ſtartled a little, and ſaid, By my faith, my Lord, I thank you for my good cheer; but I may not endure to have my laws broken in my ſight: My Attorney muſt ſpeak with you. And it is part of the report, that the Earl compounded for no leſs than 15000 marks (113).

[KK] One ſon, John, by Margaret his wife.] This Lady, while her huſband was priſoner in the caſtle of Hams, was not ſuffered to have acceſs to him, and was forced to live upon the charity of others and by her needle-work, both very ſhort to ſupply her great wants. This unmerciful and moſt inhumane uſage was the more extremely followed, for that Oxford himſelf, his father, and brother, had ever ſided with the Lancaſtrians. And ſhe, being ſiſter to Richard Earl of Warwick, the capital enemy of King Edward, was held either dangerous, if her wealth balanced her birth and eſtate, or elſe unworthy of his favour, whoſe good fortunes, as was ſuggeſted, ſhe ever maligned (114). However King Edward, toward the latter end of his reign, granted her, being in great want, and her huſband ſtanding attainted as the patent ſets forth, an annuity of 100l. per annum during her life, to be paid out of the impoſts upon wines in the port of London (115).

[LL] He had no iſſue by his ſecond wife Elizabeth, &c.] This Counteſs, by her laſt will, dated May 30, 1537, 29 Hen. VIII, ordered her body to be buried in the pariſh-church of Wyvenho (116). And foraſmuch as ſhe had found from experience, that the rich, as well as the poor and needy, reſort to common doles, ſhe therefore would have no ſuch; but that her executors deliver to the curates, churchwardens, &c. of every pariſh near adjoining to the place of her burial, ſuch ſums of money as ſhall be thought convenient for the relief of poor and impotent perſons of the ſaid pariſhes; as alſo to the poor of every pariſh where ſhe was patroneſs, and had lands, to pray for her ſoul, &c. To the ſame end ſhe likewiſe bequeaths 12d. a maſs for 200 maſſes, viz. of the Trinity, the Holy Ghoſt, and requies; and the five wounds 50 each: Alſo to the picture of the Lady of Walſingham her wedding-ring: Likewiſe to the pariſh-church of Wyvenho her beſt veſtment, her beſt cope of crimſon velvet, her beſt chalices, and her two altar-cloths of crimſon velvet, and a fruntelet of the ſame ſuit; being a benefactor beſides to many other churches and religious houſes. And after bequeathing much rich furniture (117), &c. to John, then Earl of Oxford, and her brothers and ſiſters, and other near relations, ſhe leaves the overplus among the pooreſt of her ſervants, and in other deeds of charity, at the diſcretion of her Executors, who were, her brother Sir William Kingeſton, her ſiſter Jane Kingeſton, Philip Parrys, Eſq; John and Margaret Rider. And ſhe appoints overſeer of her will, Thomas Cromwell Lord Cromwell, and Lord Privy Seal, to whom ſhe bequeaths, for a poor remembrance, 10l. The probate bears date November 6, 1537, which ſhews ſhe died that year.

(116) By that of her former huſband, Lord Beaumont.

(117) Conſiſting of Arras hangings, ſeveral diamond rings, a little croſs of gold, with a piece of the holy croſs incloſed, which ſhe daily wore about her neck, a great ſilver ſhaving baſon, weight 24 oz. a baſon and ewer of ſilver, chaſed and gilt, &c.

[MM] The earldom devolved on his nephew John.] This John was ſon and heir of Sir George Veer, brother to the late Earl of Oxford. Which Sir George Veer was alſo ſteady in the Lancaſtrian intereſt, and was a commander in thoſe forces his brother John brought againſt King Edward, which obliged him to leave the kingdom. And when that monarch, in order to regain his crown, attempted to land in Eſſex, this Sir George, by his power and intereſt in that country (his brother being with King Henry) appeared ſo ſtrong, that Edward was obliged to land, ſore weather-beaten, at Ravenſpur in Holderneſs (118). Sir George and his brother Thomas were with the Earl in the bloody battle of Barnet, and thence followed him, firſt into Wales, and after into France, and thence embarked with him, and were with him at the ſurrender of St Michael's mount in Cornwall: whereupon all three were attainted (119), but pardoned for their lives: and the attainder of Sir Thomas Veer, Knt. was afterwards revoked (120). This Sir Thomas, being one of the commanders under Sir Edward Poynings at the ſiege of Sluys, 5 Hen. VII, 1489, loſt his life in the aſſault thereof, without leaving iſſue (121). Sir George Veer made his will Auguſt 21, 1500, wherein, bequeathing his body to be buried in the conventual church of the priory of Earls-Colne, he appoints, among other maſſes, twelve poor men to ſay to the twelve Apoſtles, at his funeral, before the high altar, the Lord's prayer; alſo in Engliſh, The Lord have mercy upon the ſoul of George Veer, and on the ſouls of all the faithful deceaſed (*). He bequeaths to the high altar at Heningham-caſtle, 10s. to the nuns at Heningham, 100 ewes; to the Franciſcans at Colcheſter, to the Carmelites at Malden, to the Friars preachers at Chelmſford, and to the Auguſtine Friars at Clare, 13s. 4d. each; to his Executors 40l. to be laid out on his funeral; to Margaret his wife 40l. and all the ſilver plate and utenſils of his houſe; to his three daughters, Elizabeth, Mary, and Dorothy, a gold chain, weight twenty-ſix ounces; a paper miſſale and a ſilver chalice to the high altar before which he was buried, and 3l. for gilding the ſaid chalice; to the Friars preachers at Cambridge, 40s. to St Oſith's convent, 5l. to the high altar of that convent, a covering and caſe for the ſame of purple velvet with his arms upon it: That all his tenements in Colcheſter be ſold, and the monies ariſing by ſuch ſale be applied to the uſe of his will; the remainder to be divided between his wife and his boys at the diſcretion of John Earl of Oxford, his brother, whom he appoints ſuperviſor of his will (122), which being proved April 3, 1503, ſhews he lived almoſt three years after the making of it. Adminiſtration was granted to Margaret his widow, who was daughter and heir of William Stafford of Litchfield and Frome in com. Dorſet, and had iſſue by her Sir George Vere, and John, the fourteenth Earl of Oxford (123); George was buried at Halſtead in Eſſex, where a monument was erected to his memory, much defaced in Weever's time (124): Their daughters were, Elizabeth, wife of Sir Anthony Wingfield, Knight of the Garter; Dorothy, wife of John Nevile, Lord Latimer; and Urſula, firſt married to George Windſor, Eſq; and ſecondly to Sir Edmund Knightly, of Faverley in Northamptonſhire.

of the Garter (8s). In 21 Hen. VIII. he received his writ to take his place in parliament (8t), and, October 1st following, sat among other nobles in the Star-chamber on the accusation of Cardinal Wolsey, and subscribed the articles against him, which were preferred to parliament (8u). July 13, 22 Hen. VIII, he subscribed that memorable letter, sent by the nobility of England, &c. to Pope Clement VII, intimating to his Holiness, that, unless he complied with King Henry in his divorce from Queen Catharine, his supremacy in this realm was not like to be long acknowledged (8w). In 24 Hen. VIII. the clergy, and other of the religious, to ingratiate themselves with the King, presented him with new-year's gifts very liberally, considering those of the nobility, of which notice was taken that the rich Earl of Oxford presented but nine sovereigns, valued at 10l. 2s. 6d. (8x); the Earl of Rutland 6l. 13s. 4d. &c. In 25 Hen. VIII. he was commissioned, with the Duke of Norfolk, to settle the household of the Lady (afterwards Queen) Mary (8y). In 28 Hen. VIII, on the rebellion of Aske and the northern rebels, the King, in justification of himself against their complaint of grievances, sets forth, that he had chosen of his Council Nobles of birth and condition, wherewith his subjects seemed to be content, and among them he mentions the Earl of Oxford (8z). In 29 Hen. VIII. he attended at the Christening of Prince Edward at Hampton-court, October 12 (9a.) And departed this life at his seat at Colne in Essex on Saturday, March 21, 31 Hen. VIII, and was buried at Castle-Heningham on Monday, April 12, following (9b). He married Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Sir Edward Trussel, Knight Banneret (son and heir of Sir William Trussel, Knt.) (9c), by whom he had issue three sons [OO], of whom

John de Veer, the sixth of that name, became the sixteenth Earl of Oxford, and, in 32 Hen. VIII, had livery of all the lands which descended to him by Elizabeth his mother, sister and heir to John Trussel, Esq; (9d). In 36 Hen. VIII. he was at the siege and taking of Bulloigne, having command in the rear of the King's army, under the conduct of John Lord Russel, Lord Privy Seal (9e). In 37 Hen. VIII. he received a commission of array to raise as well archers as horse and foot, to be in readiness to suppress the enemy as occasion required (9f). At the funeral of Henry VIII. at Windsor, Henry Grey, Marquis of Dorset, attending as chief mourner, the Earls of Oxford and Arundel were the two next (9g). At the coronation of Edward VI. he was made Knight of the Bath, and, being created with great royalty, was commanded to pay to the Heralds double fees (9h). July 28, 1562, 4 Eliz. he made his will, ordering his body to be buried in the body of the church of Earl's Colne (9i). He died in less than a year after this (9k). He married first Dorothy, daughter to Ralph Nevile, Esq; of Westmorland, who died, leaving him only a daughter Catharine [PP], whereupon he married secondly Margaret, daughter of John Golding, and sister of Sir Thomas Golding, Knt. by whom he had issue [OO] He had issue three sons.] His second son, Aubrey de Vere, married Margaret, daughter of John Spring, of Lanham in Suffolk, and had issue Hugh de Vere, who, by Eleanor his wife, daughter of - - - Walsh, Esq; was father of Robert Earl of Oxford, as will be shewn hereafter. The third son, Geffery Vere, was father of Sir Francis and Sir Horace Vere Lord Vere of Tilbury, of both whom we have before treated. The said John Earl of Oxford had also three daughters; Elizabeth, married to Thomas Lord Darcy of Chich in Essex, who had issue by her John Lord Darcy, father of Thomas Lord Darcy of Chich; and Elizabeth, the second wife of John Lord Lumley (126). The said Thomas Lord Darcy married Mary, daughter and heir of Sir Thomas Kitson of Hengrave in Suffolk, and, July 5, 1621, (19 Jac.) was created Viscount Colchester for life, with remainder to Sir Thomas Savage, Knt. and Bart. (who had married Elizabeth his eldest daughter) and to their heirs male (127). Also, Nov. 4, 2 Car. was created Earl Rivers, with like remainder to Sir Thomas Savage (128), from whom the Earls of Rivers descended. He had also three other daughters, who were, with the said Elizabeth, coheirs to the said Earl Rivers, who died Feb. 21, 1639, 15 Car. and was buried in the church of St Osith at Chich, whereby the Earldom devolved as beforementioned. His three daughters were, Mary, wedded to Roger Manwood, Esq; Penelope, to Sir G. Trenchard, of Wolveton in Dorsetshire, Knt. who died in a week after her marriage, and she was secondly the wife of Sir John Gage, of Firle in com. Sussex, Bart. ancestor by her to the present Viscount Gage; Susan, the youngest daughter, died unmarried; so that, by the family of Savage, Earls of Rivers, being extinct, the barony of Darcy is in abeyance, having its rise in the said Thomas Lord Darcy, who married the Earl of Oxford's daughter as aforementioned, and had summons to parliament 5 Edward VI.

Anne, the second daughter of the Earl of Oxford, was married to Edmund Lord Sheffield, from whom proceeded the Earl of Mulgrave, and John Sheffield, and his son Edmund, the last Duke of Buckinghamshire.

(129) Descent of Nobility.

[PP] He left only a daughter Catharine.] A marriage was agreed on, and indentures signed between her and Henry, son to the Duke of Somerset; but after the Duke's attainder and execution, a bill was brought into parliament, and enacted, 6 Edw. VI, 1551, that the indentures should be void and of none effect (130); and the Lady Catharine was afterwards married to Edward Lord Windsor, who died at Venice, Jan. 24, 17 Eliz. and had issue by her four sons and four daughters; Frederic Lord Windsor (from whom the present Lord Windsor is descended); Edward and Andrew, that were married; Mary and Elizabeth, who died in their infancies; Margaret, wife of John Talbot, of Grafton in com. Wigorn, Esq; (ancestor to the present Earl of Shrewsbury); and Catharine, wife of Robert Audley, of Berechurch in Essex (131), Esq; who are all recited in an inscription on a noble monument erected to her memory in the chancel of Tarbick in Warwickshire, wherein is this further mention of her Ladyship and her Lord:

Edward,

Edward, his ſon and ſucceſſor, the ſeventeenth Earl of Oxford [QQ]. This Earl travelled in his youth to Italy, and, on his return, was the firſt that brought embroidered gloves and perfumes into England; and preſenting the Queen [Eliz.] with a pair of perfumed gloves, ſhe was pictured with them on her hands (9l). He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in two juſts and tournaments before the Queen; the firſt in 1571, and the ſecond in 1580 [RR]: And he was the chief of thoſe nobles that embarked with Robert Earl of Leiceſter for the relief of Holland and Zealand in 1585, 28 Eliz. (9m). The next year he was one of the commiſſioners on the trial of Mary Queen of Scots (9n). In the memorable year 1588, 31 Eliz. the Earl, at his own charge, hired ſhips, and joined the grand fleet employed againſt the Spaniſh Armada (9o). In 32 Eliz. he ſat on the trial of Philip Howard, Earl of Arundel, who was unanimouſly found guilty of high-treaſon (9p): Yet he was ſuch an intire friend to Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, that, when he diſcerned the Duke's life in danger by the charge againſt him touching the Queen of Scots, he earneſtly interceded with Burleigh (his wife's father) for ſaving him, which being declined by the Treaſurer, the Earl, in great indignation, ſaid he would do all he could to ruin his daughter (9q) [SS]. The Earl died June 24, 1604 (9r), and was ſucceeded in honour and eſtate by his only ſon and heir,

Henry Vere, the eighteenth Earl of Oxford. In 1605, the King being at Oxford, he was created A. M. with other nobles then attending (9s). In 1610 he was the firſt choſen to be of the order of the Bath at the creation of Henry Prince of Wales (9t) [TT]. He afterwards travelled into Italy (9u), and returned home in 1618 (9w) [UU]. His exploits in 1620,

He makes his Executors, his well-beloved wife Margery Counteſs of Oxford, his ſon Edward Lord Bulbeck, his loving friend Sir John Wentworth, Knt. his truſty ſervants, Henry Golding, Robert Chriſtmas, and John Turner; and ſupervifors of his will, his ſingular good Lord the Duke's Grace of Norfolk and the Lord Robert Dudley, and bequeaths to each of them 20l. and one of his beſt horſes or geldings. In a ſchedule annexed he gives legacies to his ſervants, Henry Golding, Eſq; 20l. to Robert Chriſtmas, 20l. and to twenty other gentlemen, who were his ſervants, the moſt of them 20l. He alſo bequeaths legacies to forty-four yeomen his ſervants, and to twenty-two grooms that were his ſervants (133): Whence he appears to have lived in great grandeur.

[RR] He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in two tournaments.] In the firſt, this Earl of Oxford, Charles Lord Howard, Sir Henry Lea, and Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, afterwards Knights of the Garter, were challengers; and the Lord Stafford, Lord Henry Seymour, Thomas Cecil, and others, were defendants; and on each of the challengers her Majeſty beſtowed a prize, for the receiving whereof they were led armed by two ladies into her preſence-chamber. This triumph continued three days; the firſt at Tilt, the ſecond at Tourney, and the third at Barrier. In the ſecond, in 1580, the Earl of Arundel, and his aſſiſtant Sir William Drury, challenged all comers: The Defenders were the Earl of Oxford, the Lord Windſor, the famous Sir Philip Sidney, and others; and the prize was given by her Majeſty to the Earl of Oxford (134).

[SS] He would do his beſt to ruin his daughter.] Sir William Dugdale, who relates this, ſays further, that, in the ſame reſolution, the Earl not only forſook his wife's bed, but ſold and conſumed that great inheritance deſcended to him from his anceſtors. But for that part relating to his inheritance, Sir William cites Camden, who only ſays he was in a fair way to ſpend his eſtate (135): and it is certain the greateſt part deſcended to his ſon and heir, and, on his deceaſe without iſſue, devolved on his kinſman Robert Earl of Oxford, who died ſeized thereof, as will appear preſently. By this wife Anne the Earl had three daughters: Elizabeth, born July 2, 1575, married at Greenwich, Jan. 26, 1594, to William Stanley, Earl of Derby (136); 2. Bridget, born April 6, 1584, married to Francis Lord Norris of Ricot, after created Earl of Berkſhire; and 3. Suſan, born May 26, 1587, married to Philip Herbert, Earl of Montgomery, and, on the deceaſe of his elder brother William, was alſo Earl of Pembroke (137). Their mother Anne died at Queen Elizabeth's court at Greenwich, June 6, 1588 (138), and was interred in Weſtminſter-abbey on the 25th, attended by many perſons of great quality and honour: The chief mourner was the Counteſs of Lincoln, ſupported by the Lords Windſor and Darcy, and her train borne by the Lady Stafford; and among other mourners at her funeral were the Ladies Ruſſel, Elizabeth Vere, Willoughby ſiſter to the Earl of Oxford, Cobham, Lumley, Hunſdon, Cecil wife to Sir Thomas Cecil. Six bannerets were borne by Michael Stanhope, Edward Wotton, Anthony Cook, William Cecil, John Vere, and Richard Cecil (139). We have an account of this Earl from the Oxford Antiquarian, who, having acquainted us, that in his younger days the Earl was a penſioner of St John's college in Cambridge, proceeds in the following terms: 'This moſt noble Earl of Oxford, 'Sept. 6, 1566, waiting on Queen Elizabeth at Oxford, 'had the degree of A. M. conferred upon him by the 'Univerſity. He was in his younger days an excellent 'poet and comedian, as ſeveral of his compoſitions that 'were made public ſhewed, which I preſume are now 'loſt and worn out. All that I have yet ſeen are certain 'poems on ſeveral ſubjects thus: 1ſt, His good name being 'blemiſhed, he bewaileth. 2d, The complaint of a Lover 'wearing black and tawnie. 3d, Being in love he com-'plaineth. 4th, A Lover rejected complaineth. 5th, Not 'attaining his deſire, he complaineth. 6th, His mind not 'quietly ſettled, he complaineth. With many ſuch like 'things that were highly valued in their times (140).'

[TT] He was the firſt choſen of the order of the Bath.] The bill was ſigned by the King June 2, and he repaired to Durham houſe in the afternoon. The next day the Knights rode to the court, their pages riding before them, carrying a ſword in a white ſcabbard with a belt, with gilt hilts, and a pair of gilt ſpurs hanging thereon. Being alighted at the court-gate, the Earl of Oxford proceeded with his page before him, between his two governors; and the others followed according to their priority into the hall, where the King came, accompanied with the nobility. The Earl of Oxford was firſt preſented by the Governors to him ſitting under his State, the Page delivering the ſword to the Lord Chamberlain, and he to the King, who girt it about the Earl's neck, and the Earl of Northampton put on his ſpurs; the reſt were received accordingly (141).

1620, for the recovery of the Palatinate, have been already recited (9x); to which we muſt not omit to add, that, in 1622, being one of thoſe peers that aimed at public liberty more than their own intereſt, and ſpeaking freely, he was taken into cuſtody, being accuſed by one White, a Papiſt, (called after in deriſion Oxford White) of ſpeaking ſome words to the diſparagement of the King and diſhonour of his government; whereupon he was committed to the Tower. The Earl continued in the Tower a great while; and being an active man, the King ſent him at laſt to ſea, to be one of Buckingham's Vice-Admirals for the Engliſh coaſt (9y). He was ſo deſirous of a martial employ, that he propoſed to purchaſe of Robert Lord Vicount Liſle his regiment encamped in Cleveland in 1624 (9z). However, that not taking effect, he went into the ſea-ſervice as beforementioned. But, in the ſpring of that year, 1624, four regiments being raiſed to aſſiſt Prince Maurice againſt Spinola the Spaniſh general, after the defeat at Breda, the Earl went to the Hague, and ſtaid there the whole winter. But Henry Prince of Orange ſucceeding his brother (who died at the Hague, April 23, 1625.) and attempting one of the enemy's ſtrong works at Terheiden, either to relieve the town or drive the enemy from their trenches, failed in both, and loſt many gallant men, eſpecially Engliſh, in the enterprize. The Earl of Oxford led the van, and being a man corpulent and heavy, got ſuch a heat in the ſervice, that though he came off without hurt from the enemy, yet he brought death along with him; for falling ſick preſently after, he went to the Hague, and there died in the middle of ſummer, 1625 (10a). His body was brought to England, and interred in St John Baptiſt's chapel in Weſtminſter-abbey. On the 15th of July that year he had married Lady Diana, ſecond daughter to William Cecil, Earl of Exeter, one of the moſt eminent beauties and fortunes of the times (10b); but by her leaving no iſſue (10c), the honour devolved upon his kinſman,

Robert Vere, who was the nineteenth Earl of Oxford (10d). The Earl of Clarendon hath given ſome account of his Lordſhip's temper, which will be hereafter mentioned (10e). This Earl took to a military life [WW], had the command of a regiment in the ſervice of the States, and was ſlain at the ſiege of Maeſtricht, Auguſt 7, 1632. He died rich, having married Beatrix, daughter of Van Hemima of Friezland, by whom he had iſſue three ſons (10f), of whom

I, after a conteſt with Rob. Bertie, Lord Willoughby of Ereſby, who obtained the office of Great Chamberlain. Journal of Parl. 2 Car. I. See the article of Hollis, firſt Earl of Clare.

(10e) In the article of the firſt Duke of Buckingham.

(10f) The two younger ſons, Horace and Francis, died young, as did alſo his three daughters, Mary, Magdalen, and Suſan.

Aubrey, the eldeſt, ſucceeding to the honour and eſtate, became the twentieth Earl of Oxford. Being not five years and a half old at his father's deceaſe, he was in ward to King Charles I; but the civil wars breaking out, being then with his mother and her friends in Zealand, he entered early on a military life in the ſervice of the States, in which he had the command of a regiment of Engliſh foot about the year 1648 [XX]. June 20, 1654, he, with gence, underſtood the particular cauſe of his reſtraint, I will ſet down what I conjecture upon certain circumſtances. Mr Porie, Secretary to the Ambaſſador at Conſtantinople, took pains to tranſlate the King's book againſt Cardinal Perron out of French into Italian, upon requeſt of the Venetian ambaſſador; whereupon I am fallen into a conceit, that Mr Porie did ſend the ſaid book by an Italian, and that Mr Bertie's man, who was a Papiſt, did bewray it in Ancona. To this conjecture I am led by finding, in all Mr Porie's letters, a very eager deſire to know whether Mr Bertie were ſafely arrived at Venice. If my fancy ſhould be true, his caſe is the very ſame as Mr Mole's (*), and then I fear it will go hard with him.

(*) See an account of Mr Mole's caſe in remark [B] of Villiers, ſecond Duke of Buckingham.

In another letter from Sir Henry Wotton from Venice to Sir Ralph Winwood, Secretary of State, dated June, 1617, is this account: 'Now becauſe it is likely that 'his Majeſty will be preſſed to the aſſiſtance of this 'Republic, my Lord of Oxford intendeth to employ 'the interceſſion of his friends at home, that he may 'have leave to contract with them here, and to tranſ'port unto them ſome volunteer troops; wherein, as 'I conceive it, the King ſhall but leave his ſubjects in 'their natural liberty, and yet much oblige this ſtate 'unto him, without any change of his own, or ſo much 'as any direct engagement of himſelf in the cauſe. 'My Lord himſelf is grown a goodly gentleman, of 'great ability, for his years, both of body and judg'ment, and has already taken a way to make both his 'affection and reſolution well known to them here, by 'going in a very noble manner, both himſelf and his 'followers, to the ſiege of Gradiſca, as the public voice 'leadeth him. And of this I ſhall need ſay no more, 'becauſe he propoſeth to write himſelf to you, upon 'whoſe friendſhip he maketh much foundation, as he 'telleth me, &c. (142).'

[XX] He had a regiment of foot in 1648.] The famous Algernoon Sidney, in a letter to Robert Earl of Leiceſter, dated January 10, 1648, informs him, that, old Berington being dead, his brother Robert Sidney was made Lieutenant-colonel to the Earl of Oxford, then abroad (144). This regiment, on the breaking out of the war with the Dutch, was ſent for to England, and the ſaid Robert Sidney was made colonel thereof by King Charles II, May 31, 1665 (145); and it is yet ſubſiſting by the name of the Holland regiment. The Earl had afterwards a quarrel with his Lieutenant-colonel Sidney, with Wentworth, of the Bed-chamber to the King, was committed to the Tower for high-treaſon, with others, as conſpirators againſt the Lord Protector (10g) [YY]. But the Earl was never brought to a trial, and obtained his liberty ſoon after; though he was ever conſtant to the Royal cauſe [ZZ]. And upon Sir George Booth's riſing in 1659, he, with others, was apprehended, Auguſt 13, on ſuſpicion of being in the preſent plot [AAA]; but was diſcharged, on the 2d of November following, by the Committee of Safety (10h), on ſecurity to live peaceably. As he had been a great ſufferer in the Royal cauſe, he was the firſt of the ſix Lords deputed by the Houſe of Peers, with twelve of the Commons, to preſent to the King, at the Hague, the Parliament's ſupplication for the King's return (10i). His Lordſhip returned to England with the King, who, on the day of his arrival at Whitehall, deſigning to confer the Garter upon him, ſigned the letter for that purpoſe the laſt of May; and the next day, Friday, June 1, 1660, the Earl received the order in the Council-chamber (10k). His Lordſhip, Auguſt 20 this year, was Lord Lieutenant of the county of Eſſex (10l); and was alſo the ſame year appointed Lord Chief Juſtice in Eyre of all the King's foreſts, parks, and chaſes, on this ſide the river Trent. At the King's coronation, which was performed with great ſplendor on the 23d of April, 1661, the Earl of Oxford bore the ſword called the Curtana (10m). In 1665, on the war with the Dutch, a regiment of horſe being raiſed, the command of it was conferred on this Earl, and retained the name of Oxford's horſe to his death, and is now the royal regiment of horſe-guards blue. On Jan. 5, 1669, his Lordſhip was ſworn of the Privy Council (10n). In 1679, on the eſtabliſhment of a new Privy-Council, which met at Whitehall, April 21, his Lordſhip was left out of it; though he had ever behaved with great moderation, not being violent in any meaſures (10o); and on Jan. 6, 1680, he was again ſworn into it (10p). On King James's acceſſion to the throne, the Earl carried the ſword of ſtate at his coronation, April 23, 1685 (10q), but was left out of the commiſſion of Lord Lieutenant of the county of Eſſex, the Lord Petre having that truſt till Oct. 25, 1688, when his Majeſty conferred it again upon the Earl as a perſon more acceptable to the people (10r). On the landing of the Prince of Orange, he joined the Proteſtant Lords in the petition to King James for a free parliament (10s), which being delivered Nov. 17, and rejected, his Sidney, as appears from the following account in the Mercurius Politicus (146) from the Hague, April 19, 1651: 'On Saturday laſt the Lord of Oxford, and 'Lieutenant-colonel Sidney, Lord Leiceſter's ſon, fell 'out at play here, and are gone into Flanders to fight, 'with their ſeconds, Colonel Gerard and Captain Clerk.' After which is this relation from the Hague, of the 13th of May: 'The two duelliſts, Oxford and Sidney, have 'had their quarrel taken up by ſome friends, who pre-'vented them in the way to Flanders (147).'

[YY] A conſpiracy againſt the Protector.] Colonel John Gerard, brother to Sir Gilbert Gerard, with others, were tried by the High Court of Juſtice, and charged with a conſpiracy to murder the Protector as he ſhould go to Hampton-court, to ſeize the guards, and make themſelves maſters of the Tower, &c. and proclaim the King, for which he was ſentenced to be hanged; but, upon petitioning the Protector, was beheaded on Tower-hill. Sir Gilbert Gerard, with another of his brothers, Colonel Aſhburnham, Mr Joſeph Aſhburnham, and ſeveral others, were under cuſtody for it (148). How long the Earl of Oxford continued in confinement does not appear. In Thurloe's State-papers he is mentioned as follows, in a letter from Paris, May 8, 1654, N. S. to Mr Thomas Scot, at his houſe at Lambeth, London, intercepted: There is gone from hence lately, Colonel John Gerard, and with him Major Hallſey, who killed Mr Aſcham, with intent to kill the Protector. They have another deſign in the city; the Earl of Oxford is to be the Chief. Beverning, Nieuport, and Jongeſtall, the Dutch Ambaſſadors in England, in their letter, dated from Weſtminſter, July 3, 1654, to the States-General, write thus, 'Since our laſt, ſome more 'priſoners are ſent to the Tower, who are ſaid to have 'a hand in the conſpiracy; and, among the reſt, the 'Earl of Oxford is ſaid to be in no danger; and though 'there are ſtill above 300 priſoners, many are of opi-'nion they will put to death no more (149).'

[ZZ] He was ever conſtant to the Royal cauſe.] Secretary Thurloe, in a Letter to Henry Cromwell, Lord Deputy of Ireland, from Whitehall, April 20, 1658, informs him of the deſigns of the Royaliſts (Cavaliers he calls them) and that they were ſure of the Earl of Oxford. And, in a letter of intelligence from beyond the ſeas, July 18, 1658, this further account is given: 'There are none at preſent going for England, who are 'ſuſpicious perſons; but the Lord Gerard is very buſy 'in engaging for another trouble in England. It is 'thought, when any thing comes to the birth, the Lord 'of Oxford and the Lord Camden will be deeply en-'gaged (150).' This was relating to Dr Hewet's plot, who was tried before the High Court of Juſtice, May 25 that year, and condemned (151). And in letters of information relating thereto is this mention of the Earl: 'I hear they ſtill go on with their preparations in the 'city, and that many are engaged therein. It is thought 'they aim at the Earl of Oxford for their General (152).' However, his Lordſhip was not then taken into cuſtody.

[AAA] He was taken up on Sir George Booth's riſing.] The Earl was apprehended with the Lord de la Ware and Lord Falkland, on the 13th of Auguſt, and they were all ſent to priſon (153). The Earl of Clarendon gives the following account of this attempt of the Royaliſts: 'There was, ſays he, to be a general riſing of 'all who would declare for the King, on a day named 'about the middle of July, there being commiſſions in 'every county, directed to fix or ſeven known men, 'with authority to chuſe one to command in chief in 'that county, till they made a conjunction with other 'forces under the command of one who had a ſuperior 'commiſſion from the King, who was to be on the day 'appointed at Calais. But, by the treachery of Sir 'Richard Willis, who continually gave Thurloe intelli-'gence of all that he knew, the deſign had no proſper-'ous effect, and every poſt brought news to the King 'of perſons of honour and quality committed to ſeveral 'priſons throughout the kingdom (154).' And of all the enterprizes for ſeizing on ſtrong places, only that ſucceeded which was undertaken by Sir George Booth, who, having ſeized Cheſter, was joined by the principal gentlemen in the parts adjacent, and the Earl of Derby appeared in Lancaſhire. Lambert marched immediately againſt them, and, Auguſt 19, defeated Sir George Booth, who, eſcaping from the battle, was taken in diſguiſe at Newport Pagnel in Bucks, and the Earl of Derby was alſo taken priſoner; whereby all the hopes of the Royaliſts were at that time totally deſtroyed, and the Rump parliament thought of tranſporting the loyal families into Barbadoes, and other plantations, leſt they might hereafter produce in England children of their fathers affections. This ſpirit had not however any long continuance; for the army aſſuming ſupreme power, there were again ſeveral ſudden changes in England. The Committee of Safety, appointed by the army on the 2d of November, 1659, diſcharged from impriſonment the Earls of Oxford and Northampton, the Lord Falkland, and other Lords, on ſecurity to live peaceably; and this, ſays Whitlock, was to ingratiate with the Cavaliers. Alſo Sir George Booth was releaſed ſoon after upon ſecurity (155); and, on the arrival of Monk with his army, the face of affairs ſoon changed, and, a new parliament being ſummoned to meet, April 25, 1660, reſtored the ancient conſtitution of monarchy and epiſcopacy.

Majeſty the ſame day began his journey towards Saliſbury, and the Earl of Oxford immediately after went over to the Prince; and on King James's return from Saliſbury, and appointing the Marquis of Halifax, the Earl of Nottingham, and the Lord Godolphin, to treat with his Highneſs, who were to meet the Prince of Orange at Ameſbury, December 6, they were informed by the Earls of Oxford and Clarendon from his Highneſs, to make their propoſals in writing, which meſſage induced the King to ſend away his Queen, with her ſon, into France; and on the 10th of December he himſelf privately withdrew (10t). The Earl marched with the Prince into London, heartily concurred in the Revolution, and was among thoſe Peers who voted for the vacancy of the Throne (10u). Upon their Majeſties acceſſion, he was ſworn of the Privy Council, and made a Lord of the Bedchamber to the King (10w). He likewiſe continued in the command of his regiment, and was conſtituted Lieutenant-general of horſe and foot, Feb. 13, 1688-9, having precedency of the Earl of Marlborough, whoſe commiſſion for that poſt was dated the next day. His Lordſhip carried the ſword of ſtate at the coronation, April 11, 1689 (10x), and, on the 14th of June following, his patent was renewed for Lord Lieutenant of the county of Eſſex, and for Cuſtos Rotulorum, Auguſt 29 (10y). In 1690 his Lordſhip embarked with the King for Ireland, and was preſent at the battle of the Boyne, and the reduction of that kingdom; but, on his return to England, being in an advanced age, he never after engaged in the military ſervice abroad; though he kept the command of his regiment (10z). On the acceſſion of Queen Anne, his patent was renewed for Lord Lieutenant of the county of Eſſex, July 25, 1701 (11a). And he departed this life at his houſe in Downing-ſtreet, Weſtminſter, in the 78th year of his age, on March 12, 1702-3; at which time he was Colonel of her Majeſty's royal regiment of horſe-guards, Lord Lieutenant and Cuſtos Rotulorum of Eſſex, one of the Lords of the Privy Council, ſenior Knight of the moſt noble order of the Garter; and the twentieth Earl of this noble and ancient family, by whoſe death, without iſſue male, the Earldom became extinct therein (11b). His Lordſhip was buried, March 22, 1702-3, in St John Baptiſt's chapel, Weſtminſter-abbey, by the remains of Henry Vere, Earl of Oxford, buried 1625 (11c). He was of a humane and generous diſpoſition, ſteady in aſſerting the liberty of the ſubject, and the prerogative of the crown, and ſo tender of ſcrupulous conſciences, that he was the firſt of the Lords who entered their diſſents, 1 Will. and Mary, on rejecting the clauſe, allowing every one to be ſufficiently qualified for any employment or truſt, who, within a year before or after his admiſſion, did receive the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, either according to the uſage of the church of England, or in any other proteſtant congregation (11d). To his firſt wife he had Anne, daughter and coheir of Paul, Lord Viſcount Banning, by whom he had no iſſue (11e). He married ſecondly Diana, daughter of G. Kirk, Eſq; Groom of the Bedchamber to King Charles II, by whom he had iſſue one ſon and three daughters (11f), beſides Diana, who, Tueſday April 13, 1694, was married to Charles Beauclerk, Duke of St Albans (11g).

VERSTEGAN [RICHARD] well deſerves a place in theſe memoirs as a great reviver of the Engliſh antiquities, and an admirable critic in the Saxon and Gothic languages. He was deſcended from an ancient and worthy family in the Dutchy of Guelderland in the Low-countries, where his grandfather, Theodore Rowland Verſtegan, was born (a); but, being deprived of his friends by the inteſtine wars which depopulated and ruined that dutchy [A], he looked out for ſome other and better reſidence, and caſting eyes upon the then flouriſhing ſtate of England, he reſolved to croſs the ſea, and accordingly arrived here about the latter end of King Henry VIIth's reign. He was a young man, in the prime vigour of his age, and, falling into acquaintance with the female ſex, he entered into matrimony, and probably would in ſome meaſure have repaired his broken fortune, had not he

[A] The civil wars had depopulated that dutchy.] This dutchy, which is one of the ſeventeen United Provinces, is bounded to the North by Overyſſel and the gulf of the German ocean called Zuiderzee; to the South, the Meuſe, the dutchy of Cleves, the country of Liege, and the dutchy of Juliers; to the Eaſt, by the biſhoprick of Munſter, the dutchy of Cleves, and the territory of Cologne; and to the Weſt, the Zuiderzee, the province of Utrecht, Holland, Dutch Brabant, and the country of Liege. It lies in a plain, containing twenty-two towns, the chief of which are Nimeguen, Ruremonde, Arnheim, and Zutphen. The province is divided into four quarters, all very fertile, abounding with wood and paſture. Formerly it had its proper Lords, who made themſelves maſters of it under the Kings of France of the ſecond race. The firſt of theſe Lords flouriſhed ann. 878, from whom, after ſix generations, deſcended Wichard III, who ſucceeded to it ann. 1061; but having iſſue only a daughter, named Alix or Adelaide, ſhe by marriage brought Guelderland into the poſſeſſion of Otho of Naſſau, whom the Emperor Henry IV. created a count; and to him, after eight deſcents, ſucceeded Renaud II, ann. 1326, who was created a Duke by the Emperor Lewis IV, ann. 1339, with the privilege of inveſting and crowning the Emperor, and of coining money. This Duke Renaud, after five generations, was ſucceeded by Arnoul Count of Egmont, whoſe ſon Adolfus, turning rebel, roſe up in arms againſt him, and taking him priſoner, kept him confined a long time; whereupon Arnoul ſold the dutchy to Charles, ſirnamed the Raſh, Duke of Burgundy; but upon his death, in 1372, his daughter, Mary of Burgundy, ſurrendered it to Adolfus, who married, in 1463, Catharine of Bourbon, daughter of Charles I, and was killed in 1477, leaving his ſon and ſucceſſor Charles, who was diſturbed in his poſſeſſion by the Emperor Charles V, grandſon of the forementioned Mary of Burgundy. This war ended in a peace, whereby Duke Charles, in caſe of his leaving no iſſue, yielded up the Dutchy to the Emperor. And it was in the times of the Emperor Charles V, and his ſon Philip II, that the States General got poſſeſſion of almoſt all the Dutchy of Guelderland, the upper quarter of which was granted to Spain by the treaty of Munſter, whence it has the name of the Spaniſh Guelderland, comprehending the towns of Venlos, Ruremonde, and Gueldres. By the peace of Utrecht in 1713, and the barrier treaty in 1715, the dutchy was divided into three parts, of which Ruremonde and its dependencies were aſſigned to the Emperor; Gueldres, or Gelre (1) as it is called by the people of the country, was ceded to the King of Pruſſia; and the Dutch had, for their ſhare, Venlo and Stevenſwaert (2).

(1) The allies had taken it in 1703. The town is but ſmall, though it gives name to the province. It lies upon the river Niers, which ſerves it for a foſſe. The caſtle is very ſtrong, and paſſed for impregnable. It is diſtant four good leagues from the Weſer, weſt-ſouth-weſt. Cluver, Ortelius Guicciard.

been cut ſhort by death ſoon after his marriage, leaving behind him a ſon not more than nine months old. The mother however took care of the child, and, having brought him up to the age of ſixteen years, put him apprentice to a cooper [B], which trade he afterwards followed, and, ſettling in the pariſh of St Katharine near the Tower of London, he had by his wife this Richard Verſtegan our Author, who was born in that pariſh. The boy ſoon diſcovered a pregnant genius, and an inclination to letters, and his father, by diligence and frugality improving his circumſtances, reſolved, though a mechanic, to be at the expence of a liberal education for him; in which ſpirit, having given him a proper foundation of claſſical learning at ſchool, he ſent him to Oxford (b). The Student happily anſwered his father's hopes, and applying himſelf particularly to ſome branches of literature not much known then in the Univerſity, he made a diſtinguiſhed figure therein, and became much eſteemed. But, not being ſatisfied with the oaths required on taking a degree, he left this nurſery of learning without receiving that teſt of his literary merit; and, being by this time confirmed a zealous Roman catholic, he quitted his native country, went into the Spaniſh Netherlands (c), and fixing himſelf at Antwerp, he wrote and publiſhed a piece there againſt Queen Elizabeth [C], upon whom, according to the virulent ſpirit of that religion, he ſcattered the uſual flowers of hereſy and cruelty with an unſparing hand. Upon the breaking out of the rebellious league in the Netherlands [D], he removed with his

[B] Put him apprentice to a cooper.] This having been thrown out in diſparagement of our Author by ſome of his adverſaries, on an occaſion which will be mentioned preſently; by way of anſwer thereto the Oxford antiquary very juſtly obſerves, that there is not any diſcredit in it; to confirm which he takes notice, that the father of Wolfgangus Muſculus was of that trade; and it may be added in our Author's behalf, that Cooper Muſculus was not ſo well to paſs in the world as Cooper Verſtegan: And therefore, though the former ſaw his ſon's inclination to letters, and deſigned him for a ſcholar, yet he left him to his own ſhifts for a ſubſiſtence, which he procured by begging and ſinging from door to door till he came to a town called Raſponſwil, where he was taken into the houſe of a poor widow who gave him lodging; and being aſſiſted by the Lord of the manor, he went to ſchool: And afterwards proceeding to Schleſtadt, he ſung there ſo happily one day, at the veſpers of a convent of Benedictines, that the ſociety preſented him with the habit of their order gratis. He was then fifteen years of age (3), and applying cloſely to his ſtudies, he became at length a diſtinguiſhed preacher, and was choſen Prior of the houſe. But ſoon after, being obſerved to ſpeak in favour of Lutheraniſm, he was obliged to fly to Straſburg, where, throwing off his frock, he publickly married one Margaret Barth, to whom he had been betrothed before he left the monaſtery. As he had now no ſubſiſtence, he put his wife to ſervice with a clergyman, and bound himſelf apprentice to a weaver, an Anabaptiſt; but entering warmly into diſputes againſt the doctrines of that ſect with their Miniſter, who lodged in the houſe, the Weaver diſmiſſed him. Thus again reduced, he reſolved to earn his bread by working as a common labourer in the fortifications of the town. But the famous Martin Buter, having been informed of his merit, procured him the evening before to be appointed Catechiſt in the village of Dorliſheim near Straſburg. Here he preached every Sunday, and lodging the reſt of the week with Bucer, ſupplied the place of his Amanuenſis. Bucer, it ſeems, wrote ſo ill a hand, that the Printers could not read it (4). Muſculus therefore, being a great maſter of his pen, was very ſerviceable to his Patron in tranſcribing the work he was then buſied upon for the preſs. But this employ was put an end to in ſome months. Our Catechiſt was called by his pariſhioners to reſide among them; ſo that, receiving no part of his ſtipend (5), he ſet up a petty ſchool for a ſupport. Thus he paſſed a year in very hard circumſtances (6), till the Magiſtrates of Straſburg, who had aſſiſted him before with a purſe out of the public Treaſury, made him Miniſter-Deacon of their principal church. About two years after he went, on an invitation, to Augſburg, where he began to preach in January, 1631. He continued eighteen years at Augſburg, and procured the abolition of Popery there; but, upon the Magiſtrates receiving the Interim in 1548, he left that city, and, paſſing into Switzerland, was made next year Profeſſor of Divinity at Bern. This office he diſcharged with great reputation till his death, which happened there Auguſt 29, 1563, aged 66 years. He publiſhed ſeveral works, an account of which may be ſeen under his article in Moreri and Bayle; from the latter of whom we learn, that he left a ſon, Abraham Muſculus, who wrote his father's life, which was prefixed to the Synopſis concionum feſtalium, Wolfgangi Muſculi, printed at Baſil in 1595, 8vo.

[C] He publiſhed a piece againſt Queen Elizabeth.] It bears this title: Theatrum credulitatum Hereticorum noſtri temporis. The book is full of cuts, which repreſent the hanging, quartering, and beheading, or butchering of Popiſh Martyrs, engraven from the drawings of Verſtegan, who was obſerved, while in England, to be much delighted in drawing and painting (7). There are verſes put under each cut, to explain the meaning of it, which were made by John Boch, or Bochius, or Boqui, a famous Latin poet, who was born at Bruſſels in 1555; and having travelled for his improvement into Italy, Germany, Poland, and Muſcovy, was made, at his return, Secretary to the Maiſon de Villt, or Regiſter, of Antwerp, by the Duke of Parma, which place he was poſſeſſed of at the time of reprinting Verſtegan's book in 1602. He died there January 13, 1609. His poeſies are much cried up by the critics of the Netherlands, who even give him the title of the Belgick Virgil (8).

[D] Upon the breaking out of the rebellious league, &c.] The Oxford Antiquary, though in general a careful Timiſt, has ſuffered himſelf, in our Author's memoir, to wander in great confuſion for want of his uſual and commendable accuracy in dates. In order therefore to fix the time of Verſtegan's journey to Paris, it will be neceſſary to give ſome account of this rebellious league, as follows. The project was firſt deſigned by the Cardinal of Lorrain, who obſerved at the Council of Trent, that the ſureſt method of maintaining their religion againſt the Heretics [viz. the Proteſtants] was to form a league, to which proper means ſhould be uſed to bring in all Catholic ſovereign Princes and great Lords, eſpecially the King of Spain, to be under the direction of a Leader or Chief, appointed by the Pope, who was to be declared Protector of the League. The motion was approved, and the Cardinal's brother, the Duke of Guiſe, was about to be elected Chief, when the news arrived of his death. The Cardinal however did not drop his enterprize; but waiting ten or eleven years, till the young Duke of Guiſe, Henry of Lorrain, his nephew, came of age to execute it, he then propoſed the ſame thing to the Pope and the King of Spain, who came into his ſentiments, though upon different motives; the Pope in the deſire of ſeeing hereſy extirpated; the Spaniard in the view of making advantage of the diſturbances which the League would evidently occaſion in France. After the Cardinal's death in 1574 (9), the Duke of Guiſe, purſuing the ſame deſign, cauſed a form to be drawn up in 1576 conſiſting of twelve articles, in the view of getting it privately ſigned by ſuch Catholics as were moſt attached to his family; but, communicating it in confidence to the Governor of Peronne in Picardy, was betrayed by that Lord (10), who drew up another form in eighteen articles, in favour of the King. This act was ſigned at Peronne, Feb. 12, 1577, by near two hundred gentlemen and officers of the province, whoſe example was ſoon followed by all the provinces of the kingdom; and in November following all exerciſe of the reformed religion was prohibited by the eſtates of Blois. The King alſo, ſeeing the Leaguers aim more to leſſen his authority than to cruſh the Huguenots, put himſelf at the head of the League, in the deſign of making himſelf maſter of it; but not caring to enter into a war, he granted the Huguenots a toleration by the Edict of Poictiers in 1578. The Leaguers did not ſtir for ſome years after the King had declared himſelf their Chief; but in 1581 they his books (d) to Paris. Here the Engliſh Ambaſſador complaining of him to Henry III, then King of France, and urging, that, as he was born a ſubject to Queen Elizabeth, and a fugitive, who, in deſpite of his natural allegiance, had abuſed his Sovereign by a malicious repreſentation of cruelties, he might be delivered into his hands to be ſent to England, there to receive the proper reward of his demerits (e). The French monarch, though far from being diſpleaſed with the book, thought proper ſo far to yield to the Ambaſſador's ſuit, as to order Verſtegan into confinement [E]. How long he lay in priſon does not appear: But upon his releaſe he quitted France, apparently to eſcape a further proſecution, and, returning to Antwerp, republiſhed his book (f), and taking up the buſineſs and trade of a Printer, he acquired thereby a handſome ſubſiſtence, maintaining the port and figure of a gentleman [F]. It was during this interval that he was drawn into the quarrel which had been carried on ſeveral years with great animoſity between the regular and ſecular Prieſts of the Romiſh Church in England (g); and we are told, that on this occaſion, he mingled as much gall with his ink as the bittereſt of the Jeſuits, though he was no member of that fiery ſpirited ſociety, being rather a ſecular Clerk. Whether he ever publiſhed any of theſe railings ſeparately, or whether they were only inſerted as fit ſupports and decorations in other pieces, is no eaſy matter to find out at this diſtance of time: In whoſe iron arms, under this inſcription, that the beſt tempers have been unhinged by the heat of controverſy (b), let the filth lie faſt buried in oblivion, while the more worthy productions of his genius ſtill ſurvive to embalm his memory. It is certain, that, about the time of Queen Elizabeth's death, he turned his ſtudies on a more noble ſubject, which, being finiſhed, he publiſhed under the title of A Reſtitution of decayed intelligence in Antiquities concerning they put themſelves openly in defiance, under the conduct of the Duke of Guiſe, upon his Majeſty's entering into an alliance with the King of Navarre, a heretic. The Duke of Guiſe drew the Cardinal of Bourbon into his party, which was further ſtrengthened by the junction of the particular league of the Pariſians under the name of the Seize [ſixteen] (11). And, in 1584, the Duke withdrew from Court, and going to his government of Champaigne, went thence to meet the agents of the Cardinal of Bourbon and the King of Spain at Joinville, where a compact was made, that the Cardinal of Bourbon ſhould ſucceed to the crown, excluſive of all heretical Princes, in caſe the King died without iſſue; that the King of Spain ſhould furniſh fifty thouſand piſtoles a month for the ſupport of the League; and that, reciprocally, the Princes of the League ſhould aſſiſt his Catholic Majeſty in reducing to obedience his rebellious ſubjects of the Netherlands. This war commenced in 1585; but, ſome months after, the French monarch granting the League an edict, by which he revoked all thoſe that had been made in favour of the Huguenots, and took away the toleration, the war was thereupon rekindled through all the provinces of France, by the King of Navarre and the Prince of Conde on the ſide of the Huguenots, and by the Duke of Guiſe and the Leaguers on the other ſide, aſſiſted by the Pope [Sixtus V.] (12). The French King, ſiding with the League, publiſhed an edict in their favour, called the Edict of Reunion, in 1588, declaring his reſolution to exterminate herefy, and exclude every heretical Prince from the ſucceſſion to his crown, if he ſhould himſelf die without male iſſue. But ſoon after, ſuſpecting the Duke of Guiſe to harbour ſome ill deſigns againſt him, he cauſed him to be put to death, together with the Cardinal his brother. The King himſelf, Henry III, was aſſaſſinated the next year, 1589, and was ſucceeded by the King of Navarre, Henry IV, who, after ſeveral ſtruggles with the League, at length profeſſed himſelf a Roman Catholic in 1593, upon which the Leaguers laid down their arms. From this narrative it appears to our preſent purpoſe, what breaking out of the rebellious League it was that drove Verſtegan out of the Netherlands, mentioned above, viz. undoubtedly that which commenced in 1585, a point which is left unſettled by the Oxford Antiquary. And a further uſe of this narrative will be ſeen in the next remark.

(11) This particular league was begun by a citizen of Paris, by name La Roche Blond. They had forty Chiefs, among whom the government was diſtributed according to the ſixteen wards or quarters of Paris, whence they were called the Seize or Sixteen.

(12) His Holineſs fulminated a bull againſt the King of Navarre and the Prince of Conde, depriving them of their eſtates, and declaring them incapable of ſucceeding to any principality whatſoever; and the King of Navarre cauſed a proteſt againſt it to be fixed up at Rome.

[E] Verſtegan was impriſoned by Henry III.] We are told, that Henry III. was ſo much pleaſed with the pictures, and gave ſo much credit to them, that he did not ſpare to accuſe Queen Elizabeth of great cruelty, calling her a wicked and cruel woman (13). But her Majeſty was revenged, though undeſignedly, by John Boucher (14), who preſently kindled into a flame on Verſtegan's impriſonment, charging it on Henry as an heretical fault (15). This Boucher, who was a native of Paris, is called by Mr Wood an active firebrand of the League, and the character is confirmed by their own writers, who give the following account of him: That he was Rector of the Univerſity of Paris, and Prior of the Sorbonne in 1580, and afterwards became a Doctor of Divinity and Curate or Parſon of St Bennet's pariſh in Paris: that he was not wanting for parts; but that a falſe zeal rendered him one of the moſt ſeditious preachers of the League: That it was in a chamber, which he had in the college of Fortet, that the Leaguers held their firſt aſſembly in 1585. He declaimed publickly in the pulpit againſt Henry III, and alſo his ſucceſſor Henry IV; but, upon the converſion (16) of this laſt monarch, Boucher retired into Flanders in 1594, being then Canon and Dean of Tournay, where he died in 1644, having changed his ſentiments (17). Beſides the piece cited by Mr Wood, there are ſeveral ſermons of his in print (18). And the Apology, or defence of John Chatel, who was executed for rebellion, is alſo attributed to him, though publiſhed under the feigned name of Francis of Verona Conſtantin. To which muſt be added, that he publiſhed ſome things againſt Richer, as we are told by Mr Bayle, who obſerves, that he was not only the moſt ſeditious, but the moſt ſtubborn and unruly perſon among the rebels; that it was he who, giving order to ſound the alarum bell in his church, contributed more than all the reſt to the inſurrection; that on that ſucceſs he became more inſolent, and preached inſolently next day againſt the perſon of the King and his Counſellors; that his piece of the juſt depoſition of Henry III. was the moſt infamous ſatire that could be written; that it is very probable he was an accomplice with James Clement, who aſſaſſinated that King; that he was ſtill bolder againſt Henry IV. as an heretic; that after Henry profeſſing himſelf a Roman Catholic, Boucher ſtill retained his former ſentiments; and that he went into the Netherlands with the Spaniſh garriſon, which was at Paris during the league: That he died well changed in temper, and as zealous a Frenchman againſt ſtrangers, as he had been a furious Spaniard in France. To conclude with a remark on our preſent ſubject: Theſe tranſactions, paſſing between Henry III. and Verſtegan, ſhew, that his book againſt Queen Elizabeth was printed before the death of the French monarch, which happening in 1589, is an undeniable proof that the book had been printed before the edition of 1592, as Mr Wood was informed. The narrative in the preceding remark makes it more than probable, that the firſt edition went through the preſs at Antwerp not later than 1585, which year our Author went to Paris.

[F] He maintained the port and figure of a gentleman.] Proſperity is the genuine prey of Envy. No wonder then that Verſtegan's good fortune and ſucceſs fell under the ridicule of his adverſaries. The Author of a pamphlet againſt the Jeſuits, entituled, Another letter of Mr A. C. to his diſjeſuited kinſman, concerning the Appeal, State, Jeſuits, &c. thus gibes upon him: 'By his riſing up only by Brocage, ſays he, and Spierie for the Hiſpaniſhed Jeſuits, he lived then and there [at Antwerp] as if he were an HIDALGO, as who may not be a gentleman, who lives ſo far from home, where he is not known (19).

cerning the moſt noble and renowned Engliſh nation [G]. He proſecuted the ſame ſubject many years, and continued to employ the preſs by printing ſome other works, which ſhew him to be ſkilled both in painting and poetry [H]. Several years before his death he had the good fortune to marry a thrifty and prudent woman, who was a great help in ſupporting his credit; ſo that he lived, under the notion of a Spaniſh ſtipendiary, in good condition at Antwerp, among the Engliſh who had fled thither for the ſake of religion. It appears, by ſome letters written by him to the great Antiquary Sir Robert Cotton (b), that he was living in the end of King James, and the beginning of King Charles I's reign; but, dying abroad, the exact date of his death has not been preſerved amongſt us.

(b) Mr Wood ſays he ſaw two of theſe letters in the Cotton library; but I do not find them in Dr Smith's catalogue, and no other has been yet made of that library for the uſe of the Britiſh Muſæum.

[G] He publiſhed A Reſtitution of decayed Intelligence, &c.] This curious piece was firſt publiſhed at Antwerp in 1605, 4to. The ſubject is well handled, contains many things which were little known before his time, and was well received by the public, eſpecially on account of ſeveral prints engraven from his own drawings, among which are figures of thoſe Saxon and Daniſh deities from whom our days of the week take their names; yet Mr Wood obſerves, that the fame and ſale of it was hurt by the firſt edition of Camden's Remains, which unluckily came out the preceding year, 1604. However the book kept up a good ſhare of eſteem among the curious and learned in antiquities, as is evident from the ſeveral editions it has gone through, being reprinted in 4to at London, 1634, after which a ſecond impreſſion was made there in 1653, in a large 8vo, and a third in 1674, 8vo (20). The Reſtitution, &c. being our Author's maſter-piece, and that by which he is eſpecially known, and his memory and reputation ſtill preſerved in England, it will be proper to take notice of the two copies of recommendatory verſes prefixed to his book, chiefly becauſe we thereby come to know two of his friends and fautors, which is a part of his hiſtory: Theſe are Richard Whyte (21) of Baſingſtoke, and Richard Stanyhurſt; both men of diſtinction in the literary republic. The latter will fall under our notice hereafter (22). We ſhall therefore give here the following account of Dr Whyte from the Oxford Antiquary, who informs us (23), that the Doctor was the ſon of Henry Whyte of Baſingſtoke in Hampſhire, Gent. in which town his mother, the daughter of Richard Caplin of Hampſhire, brought him into the world in 1536. After going through Wincheſter-ſchool he was ſent to Glouceſter-hall (now Worceſter-college) in Oxford, whence he removed to New-college, being choſen a fellow there, and admitted perpetual in 1557. He proceeded A. B. May 30, 1559 (24); but before commencing Maſter, he withdrew from the college, and, continuing abſent till the time limited for abſence by the ſtatutes was ſpent, his fellowſhip was declared void in 1564. He had, it ſeems, croſſed the ſea to Louvain; whence going to Padua, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Civil and Canon Law, and was created Doctor in that faculty. At length, removing to Doway, he was there made Regius Profeſſor of Law; in which place he continued about twenty years, married two rich wives (one being an heireſs), grew wealthy, was made, by order of the Pope, Magnificus Rector, though out of his ordinary turn; and about the ſame time was created Comes Palatinus (25). At length, having buried two wives, he was, by the diſpenſation of Pope Clement VIII, ordained Prieſt, and about the ſame time obtained a canonry at St Peter's church at Doway. The firſt thing that made him known to the curious in literature was his expoſition of that ancient ænigmatical epitaph, which in his time was remaining near Bononia, the title of which is, Ælia Lelia Criſpis—Epitaphium antiquum in agro Bononienſi adhuc videtur: noviſſime autem a Ric. Vilo (26) Baſingſtochio amicorum precibus explicatum. Patav. 1568, in 4to, with a dedication to Chriſtopher Johnſon, head-maſter of Wincheſter-ſchool. Afterwards he wrote and publiſhed, 1ſt, Orationes quinque de circulo artium & philoſophiæ—Pro dignitiis Regum—Pro doctoratu—De ſtudiorum finibus cum notis. Atrebat. 1596, 8vo. The two firſt, which were ſpoken at Louvain, were publiſhed by Chriſtopher Johnſon beforementioned, about 1564, and ordered by him to be read publickly by the ſcholars in Wincheſter-ſchool. 2d, Notæ ad leges Decemvirorum in XII tabulis. Atreb. 1597, 8*vo.* 3d, Hiſtoriarum Britannicæ Inſulæ ab origine mundi ad annum Domini octingenteſimum, libri novem. Duaci 1602, in a thick 8vo (27), with a preface, to which is prefixed a print of the Author, with his arms, viz. Parted per Chevron, embattled Argent and Gules, three roſes leaved vert, countercharged of the field, on a chief of the ſecond a Lyon paſſant, Or; all within a bordure Ermine. Creſt a Stork or Crane ſtanding, reſting its right foot on the top of an hour-glaſs, with this Motto under all, Plus vigila. Allowed to our Author, Count Richard Whyte, with two Dragons for the ſupporters, by Sir William Dethicke, Garter Principal King of arms, in alluſion to the arms of his kinſman Dr John Whyte, Biſhop of Winton (28). Dr Whyte alſo publiſhed, 4th, Explicatio brevis privilegiorum juris et conſuetudinis circa ven. Sacramentum Euchariſtiæ. Duac. 1609, 8vo. 5th, De reliquiis et veneratione ſanctorum. Ibid. 1602. And ſome other things, which may be ſeen in John Pits (29). At length this learned perſon, dying at Doway about the year 1612, was buried in the pariſh-church of St James there.

(26) So our Author uſually wrote his name.

(27) The firſt, ſecond, third, fourth, and fifth, were printed in 1597, the ſixth in 1598, the ſeventh and eighth in 1600, and the ninth in 1602, ſeparately.

[H] He publiſhed ſome other pieces, &c.] The titles of ſome of theſe are, 1ſt, Odes in imitation of the ſeven penitential pſalms, with ſundry other poems and ditties, tending to devotion and piety, printed abroad in 1601, with the Jeſuits mark in the title. In theſe poems many matters of antiquity and ancient Saints of England are touched upon by the Author, who, ſubſcribing himſelf R. V. is claimed by Mr Wood for Richard Verſtegan, who, as he had been informed, had ſome ſkill in poetry as well as in painting. 2d, The ſundry ſucceſſive regal governments of the realm of England. Antwerp, 1620, printed in one large ſheet, wherein are copper-plate prints of a Briton, Roman, Saxon, Dane, and Norman. Mr Wood alſo aſcribes the following Engliſh tranſlation, which is ſubſcribed R. V. to our Author, intituled, A Dialogue of dying well. Antwerp, 1603, 8vo. written in Italian by Don Peter of Luca, a Canon regular and D. D. and by the Tranſlator dedicated to the Lady Joan Berkley, Abbeſs of the Engliſh Benedictine Nuns at Bruſſels. Moreover Verſtegan, ſays Mr Wood, hath written and tranſlated other things; but, few of them coming into England, we ſeldom or never ſee them.

(20) Since which time, being garbled by other writers, and the ſubject much improved by later inquiries, it has ſuffered the fate of many other valuable pieces, by having ſerved the turn, to be neglected as uſeleſs.

(21) His father, Thomas Whyte, was the ſon of Jenkyn Whyte, who was poſſeſſed of almoſt half the town of Baſingſtoke, being ſon of Thomas Whyte of Purvile in Hampſhire, grandfather to John Whyte, ſome time Biſhop of Wincheſter.

VILLIERS [GEORGE], the firſt Duke of Buckingham of this family, and the greateſt favourite of two ſucceeding Monarchs, that was ever known in this, or any other Kingdom. He was the third ſon of Sir George Villiers, Knight, by Mary, daughter of Anthony Beaumont of Cole-Orton, Eſq; names on each ſide of ancient extraction (a). He was born Auguſt 28, 1592, at Brookſby in Leiceſterſhire, where his Anceſtors had chiefly continued about four hundred years [A], though rather without obſcurity, than with any great luſtre.

(a) They had been ſeated long before at Kinalton in Nottinghamſhire. Life and Death of the Duke of Buckingham, by Sir Henry Wotton. Edit. 1642. 4to.

[A] Of ancient extraction.] The family of Villiers was deſcended from the ancient and noble houſe of Villiers, Seigneurs of Liſle Adam in Normandy (1), and came into England at the time of the conqueſt. But the firſt that was written of Brokeſby was Alexander de Vylers (2), who flouriſhed in the reign of Edward I, and was father to Sir Nicolas de Villiers, who, following that King into the holy Land, took on him the Croſs, chuſing that of St George, the Patron of his country, and five eſcallop ſhells on it to ſhew the cauſe of his expedition, being luſtre. Being carefully bred under his mother till ten years of age, he was then ſent to ſchool at Billiſden in the ſame County, where he was taught muſic, and other ſlight literature, till thirteen, when his father dying, he was taken home to her houſe at Godby by his mother, to whom both the elegant beauty of his perſon, and the gay ſprightlineſs of his temper rendered him a particular favourite. Under her tuition little regard, it ſeems, was had to grammar, or claſſical learning. He was inſtructed in dancing, fencing, and other ornamental accompliſhments, in which leſſons he had ſuch a natural and prompt dexterity, as obliged his maſters to reſtrain his forwardneſs for the ſake of his brothers, who being under the ſame training, might otherwiſe have been too much diſcouraged by his prodigious outſtripping them. At the age of eighteen, he travelled into France for a further improvement in the exerciſes of that nobility, and having ſpent three years in thoſe academies, he came home perfectly poſſeſſed of every qualification they could give him, without affecting any of the airs peculiar to that people. Upon his return, he paſſed a whole year, as before, under the wing and counſels of his mother. At the end of which, being now arrived to the age of manhood, he began to think of marriage, and in that view, fixed his eye upon a daughter of Sir Roger Aſhton, Gentleman of the Bedchamber to King James I, and Maſter of the Robes. But he was diverted from all purſuits of that kind by Sir John Graham, into whoſe acquaintance he fell about this time, who being one of the Gentlemen of his Majeſty's Privy-Chamber, encouraged him greatly to puſh his fortune at Court (b). This advice exactly concurring with his own taſte and humour, made a deep impreſſion upon his mind: he purſued it with ardour and addreſs, and the reſult anſwered the moſt ſanguine of his wiſhes. For not long afterward, the King (as his manner was) from ſome accidental glances (the firſt of which was at Abthorp, in a progreſs) took ſuch a liking to his perſon, that he reſolved to make him his mignon (c): and not content with barely being the architect of his fortune, he put his hand alſo to ſome part of the work; giving Sir John Graham ſecret directions how, and by what degrees, he ſhould bring him into favour. To this purpoſe, firſt an intimation of the King's pleaſure was conveyed to him to wait in order to be ſworn his Majeſty's ſervant, and ſhortly after his Cup-Bearer at large, ann. 1613, to which he was admitted in ordinary the ſummer following. An entrance being thus opened, favours came thick upon him, liker main-ſhowers, than ſprinkling drops, or dews. For the next St George's Day, 1615, he was knighted, and made Gentleman of the King's Bed-Chamber, and the ſame day had an annual penſion ſettled upon him of a thouſand pounds out of the Court of Wards. At New-Year's-Tide following, the King appointed him Maſter of the Horſe, and in July, 1616, he was inſtalled Knight of the Garter. On the 22d of Auguſt, he was created Baron of Whaddon, in the County of Bucks, and Viſcount Villiers; and January the 5th, the ſame year, was advanced to be Earl of Buckingham, and ſworn of the Privy-Council. In March, 1617, he attended the King into Scotland, where he was likewiſe ſworn a Privy-Counſellor of that Kingdom; and on the ſucceeding New Year's-Day, he was created Marquis of Buckingham, and made Lord High-Admiral of England, Chief Juſtice in Eyre of the Parks and Foreſts on the ſouth ſide of Trent, Maſter of the King's-Bench Office, Steward of Weſtminſter, and Conſtable of Windſor-Caſtle (d). With theſe great honours, and as great employments, he was likewiſe the ſole diſpenſer of the King's favours, ſo that he exalted all his own numerous family, and dependents. In February, 1623, he embarked for Spain [B], with Prince

(c) The merit of recommending him firſt of any one to the Queen, was claimed afterwards by Archbiſhop Abbot, who tells us alſo, that he was knighted with the Prince's ſword, and that Somerſet, the preceding mignon, oppoſed his being ſworn of the bed-chamber, and importuned his Majeſty, that he might be only ſworn a Groom. being ancient badges of thoſe Croiſades. From this Sir Nicholas deſcended, after eleven generations, Sir George Villiers, who became Father to the ſubject of the preſent article by his ſecond wife, daughter to Anthony Beaumont, of Glenfield in com. Leiceſter, Eſq; which Lady, ſurviving him, became ſecondly wife to Sir William Rayner, and laſtly to Sir Thomas Compton, Knight of the Bath (3), brother to William Lord Compton, Earl of Northampton, who, it is ſaid, had a great hand in the riſe of the Duke of Buckingham at Court. Weldon, in his Court and Character of King James I, having thrown ſome indecent reflections upon the Duke (4), there was publiſhed, in 1650, An Anſwer thereto, wrote by a perſon of figure in the ſame court, in which the Author relates, that the Duke's 'mother, a widow, 'being lately married to Sir Thomas Compton, brother 'to the Lord Compton, who by chance falling on a 'wonderful match for matchleſs wealth with Alderman 'Sir John Spencer's daughter (5) and heir, and his father 'then lately dead, this Lord was maſter of all, which 'was of more than credible; and ſo might be enabled 'bountifully to ſet up a kinſman without help or alms 'of the pariſh; and that, on Villiers's ſucceeding the 'old Earl of Nottingham in the Admiralty, who re'queſted of the King that he might have his place, he 'went in perſon to acknowledge the kindneſs, and 'preſented his young Lady with a very noble and 'valuable reward, which my Lord Compton paid 'for (6).' It is ſomewhat remarkable, that this noble friend and promoter of the Duke's riſe was taken out of the world by a ſudden act. 'Yeſterday ſevennight, 'ſays my Author, the Earl of Northampton, Lord 'Preſident of Wales, after he had waited on the King 'at ſupper (and had alſo ſupped himſelf) went in a boat, 'with others, to waſh himſelf in the Thames, and ſo 'ſoon as his legs were in the water but to the knees, 'he was ſeized with the colic, and cried out, Have me 'into the boat again, for I am a dead man.' Accordingly he died a few hours after at his lodgings in the Savoy, June 24, 1630 (7). His ſon and ſucceſſor, Spencer Compton, married Mary, daughter of Sir Francis Beaumont, brother to the Counteſs of Buckingham, by whom he had ſix ſons, the youngeſt of which, Henry, became Biſhop of London (*), and his eldeſt ſon James was father to the right honourable Sir Spencer Compton, being his third ſon, who was Speaker of the Houſe of Commons in that parliament, which paſſed an act to continue themſelves for ſeven years, tempore Georg. I, and was afterwards created Earl of Wilmington. The eldeſt brother George ſucceeded to the earldom of Northampton, as did alſo his eldeſt ſon James, and after his death the ſecond ſon George; but this laſt dying without iſſue in 1758 (8), the title became extinct in this family.

[B] He embarked for Spain.] Some time before this extraordinary frolic, the Duke's high favour with the King had tranſported him into a forgetfulneſs of his duty to the Prince, whom he was very near ſtriking. For that affront his Highneſs having conceived very great indignation againſt him, to remove it he projected this frolic, which ſucceeded to his wiſh, and fixed him in the Prince's favour (9). They ſet out on Tueſday, February 18, from a houſe lately purchaſed by the Marquis at Newball in Eſſex (10), with diſguiſed beards, and the feigned names of Thomas and John Smith, attended only by Sir Richard Graham, Maſter of horſe to the Marquis. Prince Charles (e), (afterwards King Charles I.) to make up the long agitated match with the Infanta of that Kingdom; and, in his abſence, he was created Earl of Coventry, and Duke of Buckingham, the 18th of May following. After his return from Spain, in September, he was made Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and Steward of the Manor of Hampton-Court. The death of King James, which happened March 27, 1625, brought no diminution to the power of the Duke; he continued in the ſame degree of favour with the ſon, which he enjoyed ſo many years under the father. The new King ſent him to conduct into England, his lately eſpouſed conſort (f), the Princeſs Henrietta Maria of France [C]. On which Embaſſy, he arrived at Paris, May the 24th, 1625 (g); and end, having no ſilver, they gave the Ferryman a gold piece of twenty-eight Shillings, which ſtruck the poor fellow into ſuch a melting tenderneſs, that ſuch good gentlemen ſhould be going, as he ſuſpected, upon ſome quarrel beyond ſea, that he could not forbear to acquaint the officers of the town with what had befallen him. The officers thereupon ſent preſently poſt to ſtop them at Rocheſter, but they were paſſed through it before. On the brow of Chatham-hill they were ſomewhat perplexed by ſpying the French Ambaſſador, with the King's coach and others attending him, which made them baulk the road, and teach Poſt-hacknies to leap hedges. At Canterbury, whither ſome bruit was run before, the Mayor of the town came himſelf to ſeize on them, as they were taking freſh horſes, alledging, in his blunt manner, a warrant to ſtop them, firſt from the Council, next from Sir Lewis Lewknor, Maſter of the ceremonies, and laſtly from Sir Henry Mainwaring, then Lieutenant of Dover-caſtle; at all which confuſed fiction the Marquis had no leiſure to laugh, but thought it beſt to diſmaſk his beard, and ſo told the Mayor that he was going covertly with ſuch a ſlender attendance to take a ſecret view (being Admiral) of the forwardneſs of his Majeſty's fleet, which was then in preparation on the narrow ſeas. On the way afterwards a Poſt-boy, who had been at Court, got ſomehow a glimmering who they were, but his mouth was eaſily ſhut. To Dover, by reaſon of bad horſes and theſe petty impediments, they came not before ſix at night; where they found Sir Francis Cottington, then Secretary to the Prince, and Mr Endymion Porter (11), who had been ſent before to provide a veſſel for their tranſportation. The next morning (for the night was tempeſtuous) taking ſhip at Dover about ſix, they landed the ſame day at Boulogne in France, near two hours after noon, reaching Montreil that night, and Paris the next day (12), viz. Friday the 21ſt. Here the Prince ſpent one whole day to view the city and the court; and, for a better diſguiſe, his Highneſs and the Marquis bought each a perriwig, ſomewhat to overſhadow their foreheads. They got ſight of the King and Queen, without being diſcovered, no not by Monſieur Cadinet, who had been lately Ambaſſador to England, and ſaw them both. Towards evening, by meer chance, they had a ſight of the Infanta and of the Princeſs Henrietta Maria, with other great Ladies, at the practice of a maſking dance which was then in preparation; having overheard two gentlemen who were going to that ſight, they preſſed after them, and were let in by the Duke de Mount-Baſon, the Queen's Lord Chamberlain, out of civility to ſtrangers, when diverſe of the French were put by. Leaving Paris next day at three in the morning, they ſpent ſix days at Bayonne, the laſt town of France, having before at Bourdeaux bought them five riding-coats, all of one colour and faſhion: and Sir Francis Cottington was employed to prevent their being entertained by the Duke of Eſpernon, telling him they were gentlemen of mean degree, and formed yet to little courtſhip or politeneſs (13). It being now Lent ſeaſon, they could get no fleſh in their inns, which occaſioned the following incident. Near Bayonne was a herd of goats with their young ones, upon which ſight Sir Richard Graham tells the Marquis he would ſnap a kid, and make ſome ſhift to convey it unſeen to their lodgings; the Prince overhearing it, Why Richard, ſays he pleaſantly, do you think you may practiſe here again your old tricks upon the borders? In this humour having ſatisfied the goat-herd, while the Marquis and his ſervant on foot chaſed the kid about the ſtack, the Prince killed him by a ſhot in the head with a Scotch piſtol (14). At Bayonne both their perſons and behaviour were eyed narrowly by the Count de Grammont, Governor of that jealous frontier, who told ſome of his train, that he thought them to be gentlemen of much more worth than their habits beſpoke them; yet he let them courteouſly paſs (15): and four days after they arrived at Madrid (16), where alighting at the Earl of Briſtol's houſe, the Marquis [Mr Thomas Smith] came in firſt, with a portmanteau under his arm; then [Mr John Smith] the Prince was ſent for, who ſtaid a while on the other ſide of the ſtreet in the dark. They were received with all poſſible politeneſs at this court. But the Duke ſoon began to be diſreliſhed for his behaviour to the Prince, which, together with his perſonal animoſity againſt the Duke of Olivarez, the ſole favourite at that court, was one reaſon that this journey intirely diſſolved the Spaniſh match, ſo many years in agitation (17).

[C] To conduct Henrietta from France.] Sir Henry Wotton takes notice (18), that in this embaſſy, which conſiſted all of meer ſhew, there wanted no ornaments or bravery to ſet it off; and he thinks it worthy ſome little remembrance, that the Duke on a ſolemn day gorgeouſly clad in a ſuit all overſpread with diamonds, and having loſt one of good value, perchance he might be dancing, after his manner, with loſty mien, it was ſtrangely recovered next morning in a court full of pages; ſuch a diligent attendant, ſays he, was fortune upon him every where, both at home and abroad. However, it ſeems, he experienced at this time one of her croſs purpoſes, if we may believe the Lord Clarendon, who, having obſerved, that in this embaſſy his perſon and prudence was wonderfully admired and eſteemed, and that he appeared in it with all the luſtre the wealth of England could adorn him, and outſhined all the bravery that court could dreſs itſelf in, and over-acted the whole nation in their own moſt peculiar vanities, proceeds thus: 'He had the ambition to fix his eyes upon, and to dedicate his moſt violent affections to, a Lady of a very 'ſublime quality, and to purſue it with moſt importunate addreſſes, inſomuch as when the King had 'brought the Queen his ſiſter as far as ſhe meant to do, 'and delivered her into the hands of the Duke, to be 'by him conducted into England, the Duke, in his 'journey, after the departure of that court, took a 'reſolution once more to make a viſit to that great Lady, 'which he believed he might do with much privacy: 'But it was ſo eaſily diſcovered, that proviſion was 'made for his reception; and if he had purſued his 'attempt, he had been without doubt aſſaſſinated; of 'which he had only ſo much notice, as ſerved him to 'decline the danger: But he ſwore in the inſtant, that 'he would ſee and ſpeak with that Lady in ſpight of 'the ſtrength and power of France. And from the 'time that the Queen arrived in England, he took all 'the ways he could to undervalue and exaſperate that 'court and nation, by cauſing all thoſe that fled into 'England, from the juſtice and diſpleaſure of that King, 'to be received and entertained here, not only with 'ceremony and ſecurity, but, with bounty and magnificence; and the more extraordinary the perſons were, 'and the more notorious their King's diſpleaſure was 'towards them (as in that time there were many Lords 'and Ladies in thoſe circumſtances) the more reſpectfully they were received and eſteemed. He omitted 'no opportunity to incenſe the King againſt France, 'and to diſpoſe him to aſſiſt the Huguenots, whom he 'likewiſe encouraged to give their King ſome trouble. 'He alſo took great pains to leſſen the King's affection 'towards his Queen, being exceeding jealous leaſt her 'intereſt might be of force enough to croſs his other 'deſigns, and had even brought himſelf (againſt his 'nature) to a habit of neglect, and even of rudeneſs, 'towards the Queen. One day, when he unjuſtly apprehended, that ſhe had ſhewed ſome diſreſpect to his 'mother, in not going to her lodging at an hour ſhe 'intended to go, and was hindered by meer accident, 'he came into her chamber in much paſſion, and after 'ſome expoſtulations, rude enough, he told her ſhe 'ſhould repent it. Her Majeſty anſwering with ſome 'quickneſs; he therupon replied inſolently to her, 'that there had been Queens in England who had loſt 'their heads. And it was univerſally known, that, 'during his life, the Queen never had any credit with 'the King, in reference to any public affairs (19).'

(11) He was taken in, not only as a bed-chamber ſervant of confidence, but, as uſeful for his ſkill in the Spaniſh tongue, and his ſingular credit in Spain, which we are told by Sir Henry Wotton; and theſe two qualities are intimated in ſeveral addreſſes to him by Mr Howel, in Epiſtol. Ho-Elianæ &c.

(12) About two poſts before, they had met with two German gentlemen, come newly from England, where they had ſeen the Prince and the Marquis taking coach together with the King, and retained ſuch a ſtrong impreſſion of them, that they now bewrayed ſome knowledge of their perſons, but were outfaced by Sir Richard Graham.

when he was arraigned in the Parliament, which met at Oxford in Auguſt, the King diſſolved that Parliament. At his Majeſty's Coronation, February the 2d, the ſame year, the Duke was Lord High-Conſtable for that day; and in the new Parliament, which met four days after, being impeached of high crimes and miſdemeanours by the Commons (b), the Duke put in his anſwer, which not giving content, the King, impatient of all proceedings (i) againſt him, choſe to diſſolve this Parliament alſo, rather than part with the Duke, and that too at a time when he was actually engaged in a war with Spain [D]. In the proſecution whereof, the Duke went not long after with the Earl of Holland to the Hague, in order to negotiate a treaty with the States about a common diverſion for the recovery of the Palatinate [E]. Within a month after the diſſolution of the parliament, the

(i) Sir Dudley Diggs and Sir John Elliot, two of the Members of the Commons, who carried up the impeachment, were committed to the Tower for ſome obnoxious expreſſions on that occaſion, though upon explaining themſelves, releaſed ſoon after.

(b) In this Parliament the Earl of Bristol exhibited Articles against the Duke, May 1, 1626, charging him with endeavouring to pervert the Prince (now King) to the Romiſh Religion in Spain, the King ſent a meſſage to the Lords, aſſerting the Duke's innocence of his own certain knowledge.

[D] Notwithſtanding he was then engaged in a war with Spain.] Lord Clarendon (20) having obſerved, that the Duke's anſwer to the impeachment was civilly couched; and, though his heart was big ſavoured of an humble ſervant, proceeds to inform us, 'that they who 'flattered him moſt before, mentioned him now with 'the greateſt bitterneſs and acrimony; and the ſame men 'who had called him Our Saviour, for bringing the 'Prince ſafe out of Spain, called him now the corrupter 'of the King, and betrayer of the liberties of the people, 'without the leaſt crime imputed to him, to have been 'committed ſince the time of that exalted adulation; 'or that was not then as much known to them as it 'could be now: ſo fluctuating and unſteady a teſtimony is 'the applauſe of popular councils. This tranſported him 'with indignation, and created in him a greater contempt of parliaments than he had before ſhewn, and 'which he did not forbear to publiſh in the moſt open 'manner. Such as had given any offence were impriſoned and diſgraced, and new projects were ſet on foot 'for money, which ſerved only to offend and incenſe 'the people, and brought little ſupplies; yet raiſed a 'great ſtock for expoſtulation, murmur, and complaint; 'many perſons of the beſt quality (excepting Peers) being committed to ſeveral priſons with unheard of circumſtances, only for refuſing to pay money required 'of them by thoſe extraordinary ways. And the Duke 'himſelf would paſſionately ſay, and frequently do, 'many things, which only grieved his friends, and incenſed his enemies, and gave them ability to do him 'harm.'

[E] He went to the Hague.] He ſet out in the beginning of November, as appears from a letter, dated November 7, from Sir Arthur Ingram to Sir Thomas Wentworth, Bart. in which is the following paſſage: 'The Duke [of Buckingham] is now gone over to the 'Hague, and from thence cometh to France, and, it is 'thought, will be here again before Chriſtmas. He 'hath carried all the great jewels of any value, of the 'King's, and all the gilt plate, it is ſaid, to borrow 'money upon them, to ſupply the King of Denmark 'withal (21).' Theſe jewels being crown jewels, and of very great value, it was neceſſary to have a warrant from the King himſelf, both for the delivering them to and receiving of them by the Embaſſadors, with a particular deſcription and weight of each jewel, which being very curious both in the form and richneſs of them, we ſhall lay before our readers (*). The warrant is directed to the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Holland, Lord Conway, Lord Compton, Sir Henry Mildmay, Maſter of the Jewel-Office, and Endymion Porter, one of the Grooms of the Bed-chamber, in theſe terms: 'Whereas we have lately employed the ſaid Duke and Earl as Embaſſadors to the States of the United Provinces, and for our eſpecial ſervice have commanded the ſaid Lord Compton to deliver into the hands of the ſaid Lord Conway the ſeveral jewels hereafter particularly mentioned, being at that time in his cuſtody, that is to ſay, (22) Theſe Jewels, with ſome of the Duke's, were pawned for 58400l. Vide The book of his Grace's accompts from 1622 to 1628 inclusive, by Sir Sackville Crow, a MS. in Muſæo Thoreſbeiano, communicated by the preſent worthy Poſſeſſor thereof. N. B. As theſe Crown Jewels are not now in the poſſeſſion of the Crown, and were apparently never redeemed, this account therefore is all that remains authentic of them.

While he was in the Netherlands, ſome curious Arabic MSS. collected by Erpenius, and by him left to his widow, were upon ſale to the Jeſuits at Antwerp. But the Duke, being informed of it by his Secretary Dr Maſon, ſtept between and purchaſed them for 500l. more than their weight in ſilver; 'a mixed act,' ſays Sir Henry Wotton, 'both of bounty and charity, and the 'more laudable, being much out of his natural element.' After the Duke's death they were preſented to the Univerſity of Cambridge by the Dutcheſs Dowager, as ſoon as ſhe knew from Dr Maſon that this was the intention of her huſband, who had a purpoſe likewiſe, as I am well informed, continues Sir Henry Wotton, to raiſe, in that Univerſity where he was Chancellor, a fair caſe for them, and to furniſh it with other choice collections from all parts at his own charge (23). It is well known that he ſpared no coſt in procuring ſcarce and curious coins (24), as well as pictures, of which laſt his collection at York-houſe was the admiration of the age (25). Here, to uſe Sir H. Wotton's phraſe, he was in his natural element; and the ſame is elegantly expreſſed in a picture, hanging in the Queen's ſtair-caſe at Hampton-court, where he appears in the figure of Mercury, preſenting the Arts and Sciences to their Majeſties ſitting in a cloud, while ſome boys are driving away Envy and Malice. The piece was drawn by Huntorſt, who, among ſeveral others, taſted largely of the Duke's liberality; particularly, it is ſaid that his Grace once gave Nicholas Lanier 500l. in gold, and at another time 300l. becauſe he could not get of King James what that painter deſerved (26).

[F] Hit expedition to Rochelle.] The Duke's conduct in this expedition was generally much cenſured, and no where more ſeverely than in a letter of Denzil (afterwards Lord) Holles to his brother-in-law Sir Thomas Wentworth (afterwards Earl of Strafford) which, containing ſome particulars about it not taken notice of by any of our hiſtorians, we ſhall lay before the Reader: 'God, ſays his Lordſhip, hath bleſſed us better than 'we deſerve, or by our preparations than we could 'expect, or elſe we had been in a far worſe condition 'than now we are, though we be ſufficiently bad: for 'it was a thouſand to one we had loſt all our ſhips to 'cloſe up this unfortunate action, if a fair wind had not 'ſo opportunely come to have brought them off; for 'they had but ten days victuals left, which failing, 'they muſt have ſubmitted themſelves to the enemy's 'mercy; who beſides were preparing with long boats 'to have come and fired them, which was marvellous 'feaſible, if they had ſtaid never ſo little longer. For 'the particulars of their moſt ſhameful deroute upon 'their retreat, which is or will be in every body's mouth, 'I doubt not but you know as well or better than my-'ſelf. For the action in general, one of themſelves, 'who, for his ſincerity and underſtanding I may term 'alſo a prophet of their own, has given me this cenſure 'of it, That it was ill begun, worſe ordered in every 'particular, and the ſucceſs accordingly moſt lamentable: 'Nothing but diſcontents betwixt the General and the 'moſt underſtanding of his ſoldiers, as Burroughs, Courtney, Spry; every thing done againſt the hair, and attempted without probability of ſucceſs, and there was 'no hopes of maſtering the place from the very beginning, eſpecially ſince Michaelmas; that a very great 'ſupply came at one time into the fort, and that ſince 'they relieved it at their pleaſure. Yet for all this the 'Duke would ſtay, and would not ſtay, doing things 'by halves: For had he done either, and gone through 'with it, poſſibly it could not have been ſo ill as it is; 'for he removed his ordinance, and ſhipped it a month 'almoſt, before he raiſed the ſiege, yet ſtill kept his 'army there, fit neither for offence nor defence; and 'at the laſt, the Saturday before the unfortunate Monday 'he came away, would needs give a general aſſault, 'where many good men were loſt, when there was no 'ordinance to protect them going on or coming off. 'Et qualis vita, finis ita, as they behaved themſelves 'while they were there, ſo did they at their coming 'away: for though they knew two thouſand French 'landed that morning in the iſland, and there was at 'leaſt three thouſand in the two forts, the great one 'and the little one (of which by the way we never heard; 'but they thought it not fit we ſhould know all perhaps, 'becauſe they knew ſecrecy an eſſential part of war 'policy) ſo as they could not but expect to be a little 'troubled with them in their marching, yet made they 'no proviſion to ſecure themſelves: For being to paſs 'by a narrow cauſey (where more than ſix or eight 'could not go in front, and which a very ſmall number 'might have made good againſt a million) and ſo by a 'bridge over a little paſſage into an iſland as it were, 'where once being they would be ſafe, there was no 'order taken for viewing and preparing the way, that 'when they came to it there was no paſſage over; ſo 'that their ſtay gave a great deal of time and oppor-'tunity to the enemy, who all the while followed them 'at the heels ſo cloſe, that my Lord Duke himſelf, 'who, I know not by what misfortune, was in the rear, 'had like to have been ſnapped, if he had not preſently 'made way through the troops upon the narrow cauſey: 'and had he, the General, miſcarried, what might have 'become, think you, of the whole army, like a body 'without a head, or a flock without a ſhepherd? But 'he carefully got himſelf on ſhip-board that night, to 'prevent the worſt, and to order boats for the ſhipping 'of the army; but the French, falling upon the rear, 'killed and took priſoners as they would themſelves, 'helped by our own horſe, who, to ſave themſelves '(which yet they could not do) broke in, rode over 'our men, and put all into diſorder, which made way 'for the ſlaughter; but it ſeems no reſiſtance at all was 'made, but they even diſbanded, and ſhifted every one 'for himſelf, there being no word of command given 'for the making them face about for repulſing of the 'enemy; for then it muſt needs have gone from hand 'to hand through the whole troops; and a ſerjeant major 'that was in the rear has proteſted to me, They did not ſo 'much as know, that any thing had been done till afterward 'a pretty while; and it had been the eaſieſt thing in the 'world, in that narrow place, to have beaten back the enemy, 'had they been never ſo many, or at leaſt to have defended 'themſelves. But the diſorder and confuſion was ſo great, 'the truth is, no man can tell what was done, nor no 'account can be given how any man was loſt, not the 'Lieutenant-Colonel how his Colonel, or Lieutenant 'how his Captain, or any one knows how another was 'loſt; which is a ſign that things were ill carried. This 'only every man knows, that ſince England was Eng-'land it received not ſo diſhonourable a blow: Four 'Colonels loſt; thirty-two colours in the enemy's poſ-'ſeſſion (but more loſt); God knows how many men 'ſlain; they ſay not above two thouſand of our ſide, 'and I think not one of the enemies.

'But I little thought to have ſaid ſo much when 'I began, l'appetit m'eſt venu en mangeant, one thing 'having drawn in another. I will here end with a 'prayer, that God, who only can draw light out of 'darkneſs, will be pleaſed to give us a better iſſue out 'of our preſent miſerable condition than any of us can 'expect, though we may hope and pray for it. To 'his holy protection I commend you and yours, and ſo 'I reſt

'Your moſt affectionate

'Brother and Servant,

Sir

King's neceſſities ſo preſſing, as obliged him to call a parliament. They were no ſooner met, than the Duke's exceſſive power was voted to be the cauſe of all the evils and dangers brought upon the King and kingdom; and a remonſtrance of grievances drawn up, wherein he was charged as the principal occaſion of them; but the parliament being prorogued till the 20th of October, 1628 (l), the Duke, in the interval, not only endeavoured to allay the prejudice raiſed againſt him in the Houſe of Commons, but alſo to regain the good-will of the Publick, and repair his loſt honour by a ſecond expedition to Rochelle, then ſtraitly beſieged by the French King; but while he was attending this affair at Portſmouth, he received, by one John Felton, a diſcontented Lieutenant in the army, a mortal ſtab into the heart, of which he died in leſs than a quarter of an hour, about ten o'clock in the forenoon, on Saturday, Auguſt 23, 1628, being then in full health and vigour, and only five days paſt the thirtieth year of his age [G]. However odious in his life, the cruelty of his death was univerſally

(l) The act for granting the famous petition of right was ſigned by his Majeſty the ſame day. The King having ſent the gauntlet, Fait ſait comme il eſt deſiré, in anſwer to the Commons addreſs on the 7th of June preceding. Upon which, ſays Mr Howell, the Duke made a notable ſpeech at the Council-table in joy thereof, Among other paſſages one was, That hereafter his Majeſty would pleaſe to make the parliament his favourite, and he to have the honour to remain ſtill his ſervant. Epiſt. Ho-Elianæ, Vol. I. § 5. No. VI. to the Lord Scroop, &c. dated London, Sept. 25, 1621. Salmon's Chron. Hiſt. under this year.

Sir Henry Wotton, on the other hand, having aſſured us (28), 'that the Duke undertook this ſervice to recover the public good-will; which he ſaw by his own example might quickly be won and loſt, obſerves as to the action, that it had been much leſs cenſured by ſome of the French writers than generally among ourſelves at home. That the Duke's carriage was noble throughout; reſpectful to the gentlemen, bountiful to the ſoldiers, as he found any diſtinguiſhed worth in them; tender and careful of the wounded; his perſonal courage unqueſtionable, and rather fearful of fame than danger. That he ſhewed no viſible alteration in his countenance after the ſuccours, which he expected, failed him, though it lay heavy at his heart; which to Dr Maſon, his Secretary, whom he laid on a pallet near him, broke out into bitter and paſſionate expreſſions, proteſting, that neither his diſpatches to diverſe princes, nor the great buſineſs of a fleet, of an army, of a ſiege, of a treaty of war and peace, both of them on foot together, and all of them in his head at a time, did not ſo much break his repoſe, as a conceit, that ſome at home, under his Majeſty, of whom he had well deſerved, were now content to forget him (29). But whom he meant, ſays Sir Henry, I know not, and am loath to roam at conjecture. Of the two ſorts proceeds this Author, he could not take the one, and he would not take the other: But in the general town, he maintained a ſeizure and poſſeſſion of the whole three full months and eighteen days, and that, at his firſt deſcent on ſhore, he was not immured within a wooden veſſel, but countenanced the landing in his long boat, where ſucceeded ſuch a defeat of 200 horſe, (and theſe not, by his gueſs, mounted in haſte, but, for the moſt part, gentlemen of family and great relations) ſeconded with 2000 foot, as, all circumſtances well ballanced on either ſide, may ſurely endure a compariſon with any of the braveſt impreſſions in ancient time. In the iſſue of the whole buſineſs he ſeems charged in opinion with a kind of improvident conſcience, having brought of that with him to the camp perhaps too much of a court, where fortune had never deceived him. Beſides, we muſt conſider him but rude in the profeſſion of arms, though greedy of honour, and zealous in the cauſe.' Some part of theſe remarks, by the Duke's friend, with regard to his courage, and conduct to the ſoldiers, is confirmed by a paſſage in a letter to one of his foes, to whom it was propoſed as an example for him to copy. The paſſage is as follows: 'Upon this occaſion I will relate to your Lordſhip what happened lately in the iſle of Rhee, when the Duke of Buckingham was the King's general there: I heard one relate it who was preſent upon the place. It was told the Duke by a colonel there, that two other colonels ſaid theſe words to him, which he would maintain with his life: That they obſerved the Duke often to go in his barge to the fleet, and that one time or other he would ſteal away into England, which if he did, they ſwore deeply that they would hang out the white flag, and deliver up the town and iſland to Toras, Governor of the caſtle. The Duke called next day a council of war, the accuſer abſent, and charged theſe two gentlemen with the words, who flatly denied them upon their honours, offering to make it good with their ſwords. This the Duke took for ſatisfaction; and, giving a general admonition, he diſmiſſed the court. Nay he [the Relater of this ſtory] ſaid further, that, during the Duke's abode in that iſland, there were ſoldiers and captains who would ſay ill things; and that they ſpoke as boldly of the Duke their General, as the Commons houſe of parliament did in the ſeſſion before he went thither; and that the Duke was told of theſe ſpeeches every day, but paſſed them over without ſo much as queſtioning any one (30).' After reading this, no doubt can be made how he treated the letter which was wrote by James Howell before this ſame ſeſſion of parliament. That forward penman, it ſeems, had been, in ſome ſhape or other, a Retainer (31) to the Duke, and, upon the confidence of that connexion, and the Duke's well known affability, preſumed to adviſe him to part with ſome of his places, to take away the mutterings that run of the multiplicity of offices; and continues he, (according to his wonted ſtrain of affected witticiſms) 'in my ſhallow apprehenſion your Grace might ſtand more firm without an anchor.' In proceeding, he ventures upon ſome further advice in regard to the better regulation of his Grace's private family, and then concludes with gilding ſuch unpalatable pills in the following courtly addreſs: 'I know your Grace does not nor needs not affect popularity. It is true, that the people's love is the ſtrongeſt citadel of a ſovereign Prince; but to a great ſubject it hath often proved fatal; for he who pulleth off his hat to the people, giveth his head to the Prince; and it is remarkable what was ſaid of a late unfortunate Earl, who, a little before Queen Elizabeth's death, had drawn the axe upon his own neck, That he was grown ſo popular, that he was grown too dangerous for the times, and the times for him [32].' Theſe laſt words evidently point at the Earl of Eſſex: And it is not improbable, that the ſtory of this illuſtrious ſtateſman was often mentioned by way of contraſt to that of the Duke, eſpecially after his unfortunate end. Among others, Mr Hyde (afterwards Lord Chancellor Clarendon) employed ſome thoughts and time upon the ſubject, in a piece, entitled, The difference and diſparity between the eſtates and conditions of George Duke of Buckingham and Robert Earl of Eſſex; which appears to be written preſently after the Duke's aſſaſſination.

To which we ſhall take this opportunity of adding, that he probably got into the Duke's retinue by the intereſt of Lady Scrope, who was ſiſter to the Earl of Rutland, and aunt to the Dutcheſs of Buckingham, Howel's Letters, Vol. I. § 5. [G] He received a mortal ſtab.] The very ſurprizing manner in which the Duke's aſſaſſination was perpetrated, furniſhed the dealers in omens and prodigies with choice matter to feed their fancies. Every tale that brought any tidings of the leaſt circumſtance relating to it was ſure to be eagerly liſtened to, and religiouſly preſerved as a ſacred treaſure. Hence we find the famous ſtory of the apparition or ghoſt of Sir George Villiers, the Duke's father, predicting his ſon's untimely end, if he did not change ſome part of his miniſterial conduct, equally retailed by the loyal and ſerious Earl of Clarendon (33), and William Lilly, juggler and mountebank to the rebels (34), whoſe miſrepreſentations were alſo thought worth while to be corrected in a more authentic account by that curious natural hiſtorian Dr Robert Plot (35), who uſhers in his narrative with the following introduction: 'Since William Lilly, the rebels juggler and mountebank, hath, in his malicious and blaſphemous diſcourſe concerning our late martyred Sovereign, of bleſſed memory, imprinted (among other his lies and falſehoods) a relation concerning an apparition, which foretold ſeveral events which ſhould happen to the late Duke of Buckingham, wherein he falſifies both the perſon to whom it appeared, and the circumſtances; I thought it not amiſs to enter here (that it may be preſerved) the true account of the apparition, as I received it from and under the hand of Mr Edmund Windham of Kottisford in the county of *Somerſet. 'Sir, univerſally deteſted. His bowels were interred at Portſmouth, and a handſome memorial of

' Sir,

' According to your deſire, and my promiſe, I have ' written downe what I remember (divers things being ' ſlipt out of my memory) of the relation made me by ' Mr Nicholas Towſe concerning the appartition which ' viſited him about 1627.

' I and my wife, upon occaſion being in London, ' lay at my brother Pyne's houſe without Biſhopſgate, ' which was next houſe unto Mr Nicholas Towſe's, who ' was his kinſman and familiar acquaintance, in con- ' ſideration of whoſe ſociety and friendſhip he took a ' houſe in that place; the ſaid Towſe being a very fine ' muſician, and very good company, for ought I ever ' ſaw or heard, a virtuous, religious, and well diſpoſed ' gentleman. About that time the ſaid Mr Towſe told ' me, that, one night being in bed, and perfectly ' waking, and a candle burning by him (as he uſually ' had), there came into his chamber, and ſtood by his ' bed-ſide, an old gentleman, in ſuch a habit as was in ' uſe in Queen Elizabeth's time; at whoſe firſt appear- ' ance Mr Towſe was very much troubled; but after a ' little while, recollecting himſelf, he demanded of him ' in the name of God, what he was? whether he were ' a man? And the Apparition replied nor: Then he aſked ' him if he were a devil? And the Apparition anſwered ' noe. Then ſaid Mr Towſe, In the name of God what ' art thou then? And as I remember Mr Towſe told ' me, that the Apparition anſwered him that he was ' the ghoſt of Sir George Villiers, father to the then Duke ' of Buckingham, whom he might very well remember, ſince ' he went to ſchole at ſuch a place in Leiceſterſhire, naming ' the place, which I have forgotten. And Mr Towſe ' told me, that the Apparition had perfectly the reſem- ' blance of the ſaid Sir George Villiers in all reſpects, ' and in the ſame habit that he had often ſeen him wear ' in his life-time. The ſaid Apparition alſo told him, ' that he could not but remember the much kindneſs, ' that he the ſaid Sir George Villiers had expreſſed to ' him, whilſt he was a ſcholar in Leiceſterſhire, as afore- ' ſaid; and that, out of that conſideration, he believed ' that he loved him, and that therefore he made choice ' of him the ſaid Mr Towſe to deliver a meſſage to his ' ſon the Duke of Buckingham, thereby to prevent ſuch ' miſchief as would otherwiſe befall the ſaid Duke, ' whereby he would be inevitably ruined. And then, ' as I remember, Mr Towſe told me, that the Appa- ' rition inſtructed him what meſſage he ſhould deliver ' to the Duke; unto which Mr Towſe replied, that he ' ſhould be very unwilling to go to the Duke of Bucks ' upon ſuch an errand, whereby he ſhould gaine nothing ' but reproach and contempt, and be eſteemed a mad- ' man, and therefore deſired to be excuſed from the ' employment. But the Apparition preſt him with much ' earneſtneſs to undertake it, telling him, that the circum- ' ſtances and ſecret diſcoveries (which he ſhould be able ' to make to the Duke of ſuch paſſages in the courſe of ' his life which were known to none but himſelfe) would ' make it appeare, that his meſſage was not the fancy of ' a diſtempered braine, but a reality. And ſo the Appa- ' rition tooke his leave of him for that night, telling him, ' that he would give him leave to conſider until the next ' night, and then he would come to receive his anſwer, ' whether he would undertake to deliver his meſſage to ' the Duke of Buckingham or noe. Mr Towſe paſſed the ' next day with much trouble and perplexity, debateing ' and reaſoning with himſelfe whether he ſhould deliver ' this meſſage to the Duke of Buckingham or not; but ' in the concluſion he reſolved to doe it. And the next ' night, when the Apparition came, he gave his anſwer ' accordingly, and then received full inſtructions. After ' which Mr Towſe went and found out Sir Thomas Blud- ' der and Sir Ralph Freeman, by whom he was brought ' to the Duke of Buckingham, and had ſeveral private ' and long audiences of him. I myſelfe, by the favour ' of a friend, was once admitted to ſee him in private ' conference with the Duke, where (although I heard ' not the diſcourſe) I obſerved much earneſtneſs in ' their actions and geſtures. After which conference ' Mr Towſe told me, that the Duke would not follow ' the advice that was given him, which was (as I re- ' member) that he intimated the caſting off and reject- ' ing of ſome men, who had great intereſt in him, ' and, as I take it, he named Biſhop Laud; and that ' he the Duke was to do ſome popular acts in the enſue- ' ing parliament, of which the Duke would have had ' Mr Towſe to have been a Burgeſs; but he refuſed it, ' alledging, that, unleſs the Duke had followed his ' directions, he muſt doe him hurt if he were of the ' parliament. Mr Towſe alſo then told me, that the ' Duke confeſſed, that he had told him thoſe things ' that no creature knew but himſelfe, and that none ' but God or the Divell could reveale to him. The ' Duke offered Mr Towſe to have the King knight him, ' and to have given him preferment (as he told me) ' but that he refuſed it, ſaying, that, unleſs he would ' follow his advice, he would receive nothing from him. ' Mr Towſe, when he made me this relation, told me ' the Duke would inevitably be deſtroyed before ſuch ' a time (which he then named) and accordingly the ' Duke's death happened before that time. He like- ' wiſe told me, that he had written downe all the diſ- ' courſes that he had had with the Apparition; and that ' at laſt his comeing to him was ſo familiar, that he was ' as little troubled with it as if it had been a friend or ac- ' quaintance that had come to viſit him. Mr Towſe told ' me further, that the Archbiſhop (then Biſhop of Lon- ' don) Dr Laud, ſhould by his counſels be the Author ' of very great trouble to the kingdome, by which it ' ſhould be reduced to that extremity of diſorder and ' confuſion, that it ſhould ſeem to be paſt all hope of ' recovery without a miracle; but yet, when all people ' were in deſpaire of happy days againe, the kingdome ' ſhould ſuddenly be reduced and reſettled againe in a ' moſt happy condition. At this time my father Pyne ' was in trouble, and committed to the Gatehouſe by ' the Lords of the Council, about a quarrel between ' him and the Lord Pawlett; upon which, one night, ' I ſayd unto my couſin Towſe by way of jeſt. I pray you ' aſk your Apparition what ſhall become of my father Pyne's ' buſineſs? which he promiſed to doe, and the next day ' told me, that my father Pyne's enemies were aſhamed ' of their malicious proſequution, and that he would be ' at liberty within a weeke, or ſome few days, which ' happened accordingly. Mr Towſe's wife (ſince his ' death) told me, that her huſband and ſhe living in ' Windſor-caſtle, where he had an office, that ſummer ' the Duke of Buckingham was killed, told her the ' very day that the Duke was ſett upon by the mutinous ' mariners at Portſmouth, ſaying, that the . . . . . ' . . . . . would be his death, which accordingly ' fell out, and that at the very inſtant the Duke was ' killed (as upon ſtrict enquiry they found afterwards) ' Mr Towſe, ſitting amongſt ſome company, ſuddenly ' ſtarted up, and ſaid, The Duke of Buckingham is ſlain. ' Mr Towſe lived not long after; but told his wife the ' time of his own death beforehand: which is as much ' as I can remember of this Apparition, which, accord- ' ing to your deſire, is written by,

' Sir,

Boulogne, Aug. 5, 1652. ' Your &c.

' Edmund Windham.'

The incident of the Duke's death is perhaps not more aſtoniſhing than it is, that this idle tale (for ſo I do not ſcruple to call it) ſhould be credited by the forementioned writers, notwithſtanding the evident marks which it bears of being nothing more than a mere phantom of Mr Towſe the relator's enthuſiaſtic brain, to which, it ſeems, at laſt the coming of the Apparition was ſo familiar, that he was as little troubled with it as if it had been a friend or acquaintance that had come to viſit him (36). However, that the Enthuſiaſt believed it, got himſelf introduced to the Duke, and told him the whole ſtory, is probable enough (37): one circumſtance eſpecially will never be queſtioned, that after the conference he told Mr Wyndham, that his Grace ſhewed no manner of regard to the advice of his Father's Ghoſt. Such a treatment of it was perfectly agreeable to the Duke's manner in general. And to the ſame purpoſe Sir Henry Wotton (who, by the bye, if he had heard of the Apparition, thought proper to ſay nothing of it) relates the following paſſage, which happened on the Duke's return to Plymouth, after the expedition to the iſle of Rhee: When Lord Goring diſpatched an expreſs meſſenger in all haſte, with advice to him to aſſure his perſon by declining the ordinary road, for that he had credible intelligence of a plot againſt his life, to be put in execution upon him in his ſaid journey towards the Court. ' The Duke, continues Sir Henry, meeting the meſſen- ' ger on the way, read the letter, and ſmothered it in ' his

(36) A circumſtance which, added to the extravagance of the reſt, is ſufficient to blaſt the credit of the whole.

(37) Sir Simons d'Ewes, who has related the account of his aſſaſſination at full length, concludes thus: It was reported the Duke had ſome prediction or forewarning given him to beware of this month of Auguſt as fatal to him. D'Ewes's Life of himſelf, MS. in the Britiſh Muſeum.

of him erected there by his ſiſter, the Counteſs of Denbigh [H]. His body was brought to York-houſe, whence, after lying ſome time in an illuſtrious manner on a hearſe, it was conveyed to Weſtminſter-abbey (m), and ſumptuouſly entombed on the North ſide of Henry VIIth's chapel, where a moſt noble monument is erected to his memory. The Earl of Clarendon, who had conſidered him thoroughly, having mentioned his faults with a candid impartiality, obſerves, that 'he was of a noble nature and generous diſpoſition, and of ſuch other endowments as made him very capable of being a great favourite to a great King, and underſtood the arts of a court, and all the learning that is profeſſed there, exactly well. That he was of a moſt flowing courteſy and affability to all men who made any addreſs to him; and ſo deſirous to oblige them, that he did not enough conſider the value of the obligation, or the merit of the perſon he choſe to oblige, from which much of his misfortune reſulted. He was of a courage not to be daunted, both in civil and military life, which was manifeſted in all his actions, and in his conteſts with particular perſons of the greateſt reputation [I], eſpecially

'his pocket without the leaſt imaginable apprehenſion, rides forward, having not above ſeven or eight perſons in his retinue, and thoſe with no other weapons than ordinary ſwords. After this he had not advanced three miles before he met with an old woman, near a town in the road, who demanded whether the Duke was in the company; and ſignifying ſome ſpecial occaſion to be brought to him, ſhe was led to his horſe's ſide, where ſhe told him, that, in the very next town through which he was to paſs, ſhe had heard ſome deſperate men vow his death, and ſo offered to direct him about by a ſafer way. This old woman's caſual acceſs, joined to that deliberate advertiſement which he had from his noble friend, moved him to participate both the tenour of the ſaid letter, and all the circumſtances, with his company, who all agreed, that the woman had adviſed him well: notwithſtanding all which importunity he reſolved not to wave his road, upon this reaſon, perhaps more generous than provident, that, as he ſaid, if he ſhould but once by ſuch a diverſion make his enemies believe he was afraid of danger, he ſhould never live without it. Hereupon his nephew, Lord Viſcount Fielding, being then in his company, out of a noble ſpirit beſought him, that he might wear his coat and blue ribbon through the town, pleading that his uncle's life, whereon lay the property of his whole family, was of all things under heaven the moſt precious unto him, and undertaking ſo to geſture and muffle up himſelf in his hood, as the Duke's manner was to ride in cold weather, that none ſhould diſcern the difference, and ſo the Duke ſhould be the more at liberty for his own defence; at which ſweet propoſition the Duke caught him in his arms and kiſſed him, yet would not, as he ſaid, in that caſe, accept of ſuch an offer from a nephew, whoſe life he tendered as much as himſelf; and ſo, liberally rewarding the poor old creature for her good-will, after ſome ſhort directions to his company how they ſhould carry themſelves, he rode on without perturbation of mind. He was no ſooner entered into the town, but a ſcambling ſoldier clapt hold of his bridle, which he thought was in a begging or a drunken faſhion; but a gentleman of his train, that rode a pretty diſtance behind him, conceiving by the premiſes, that it might be a beginning of ſome miſchievous intent, ſpurred up his horſe, and with a violent ruſh ſevered him from the Duke, who with the reſt went on quietly through the town; nor was there any further enquiry into this conſpiracy, the Duke peradventure thinking it wiſdom not to reſerve diſcontentments too deep (38).' This writer, Sir Henry Wotton, relates alſo another paſſage concerning the Duke, which happened juſt before his departure on this expedition to Rochelle, when it ſeems he took an opportunity, in a parting viſit to Dr Laud, then Biſhop of London, to tell him, that he well knew his Majeſty's unalterable affection for his Lordſhip, and therefore deſired him to recommend his poor wife and children to his favour. The Biſhop, prompted either by the words or the manner of his delivery, or both, aſked him if he had never any forebodings; to which the Duke replied, No; but I think I may chance to be killed as well as another man. We have choſen to mention this paſſage, becauſe it ſets before us a lively picture of this great Duke's courage. We ſee him here perfectly ſenſible, and conſiderate of the danger he was running into, yet far from being touched with any unmanly or unſoldierly fears or apprehenſions about it.

(38) Life and Death of the Duke, p. 19, 20, 21.

[H] His ſiſter, the Counteſs of Denbigh.] Sir Henry Wotton informs us, that ſhe received a letter from the Duke on the day of his death, whereunto all the while ſhe was writing her anſwer, ſhe bedewed the paper with her tears, and after a moſt bitter paſſion, (whereof ſhe could yield no reaſon but that her deareſt brother was to be gone) ſhe fell down in a ſwoon. Her letter ended thus: I will pray for your happy return, which I look to with a great cloud over my head, too heavy for my poor heart to bear without torment. But I hope the great God of heaven will bleſs you. The next day the Biſhop of Ely, her devoted friend, who was thought the fitteſt preparer of her mind to receive ſuch a doleful accident, came to viſit her: But hearing ſhe was at reſt, he attended till ſhe ſhould wake of herſelf, which ſhe did with the affrightment of a dream, her brother ſeeming to paſs through a field with her in his company, where hearing a ſudden ſhout of the people, and aſking the reaſon, it was anſwered to be for joy that the Duke of Buckingham was ſick, which ſhe had ſcarce related to her gentlewoman before the Biſhop was entered into her bedchamber for a choſen meſſenger of the Duke's death. The dreaming of his ſickneſs was the natural conſequence of that indiſpoſition of body that he felt the day before, as is related by the ſame writer, who further informs us, that the King, hearing it, was pleaſed to give him the honour of a viſit (39), and found him in his bed, where, after much ſerious and private diſcourſe, the Duke, at his Majeſty's departure, embraced him in a very unuſual and paſſionate manner, and did in like ſort to his friend the Earl of Holland, as if his ſoul had divined he ſhould ſee them no more. Such was the comment made upon it by the generality of people (40), always fond nurſes of omens and preſages; though it was evidently nothing more than the natural effect of the ſenſe he had of the danger he was about to run, as well from his enemies at home, who might more eaſily compaſs his ruin while abſent, as alſo from that of loſing his life in the expedition abroad: Nor was it difficult to foreſee the no leſs danger if he ſhould happen to eſcape at Rochelle with his life, but return home a ſecond time unſucceſsful, which was moſt likely to be the event, as had been not only the fate of a fleet commanded by the Earl of Denbigh (41), his brother-in-law, which ſet ſail from Plymouth to relieve the ſame city on the 17th of April preceding, but alſo of this very fleet intended for the Duke, which ſet ſail afterwards on the ſame deſign, under the command of the Earl of Lindſey, on the 18th of September following. In ſhort, the game was become deſperate: He knew it, and expreſſed his full ſenſibility of it in the abovementioned apartment with the King, who, when the meſſenger arrived at Tichfield with the news of his murder, was in his cloſet at prayers, in which the Duke no doubt had a ſhare; as is intimated in thoſe excellent lines of Mr Waller on the occaſion, which begin, So earneſt with thy God &c. (42).

(39) His Majeſty was then at Tichfield, the ſeat of ſix miles from Portſmouth.

[I] His civil courage was manifeſt in his conteſts with perſons of the greateſt reputation.] To confirm this, the noble hiſtorian produces the following remarkable inſtance: Having obſerved, that the Duke never endeavoured to do any man an ill office before he firſt told him what he was to expect from him, and reproached him with the injuries he had done, he goes on thus: 'In this manner he proceeded with the Earl of Oxford, a man of great name in that time, and whom he had endeavoured by many civil offices to make his friend, and who ſeemed equally to incline to the friendſhip. But when he diſcovered (or, as many thought, only ſuſpected) that the Earl was entered into ſome cabal in parliament againſt him, he could not be diſſuaded by any of his friends, to whom he imparted his reſolution, but meeting the Earl the next day, he took him aſide, and told him, he would rely no longer on his friendſhip, nor ſhould he [the Earl] expect any further friendſhip from him; but, on the contrary, he would be for ever his enemy, and do him all the miſchief he could. The Earl, who, as many thought, had not been faulty

'cially in his whole demeanor in the iſle of Rhee, both at the landing and on the retreat; 'in both which no man was more fearleſs, or more ready to expoſe himſelf to the higheſt 'dangers.' The Duke's memory has been ſeverely handled by many writers. Among others, Sir Simonds d'Ewes (n) repreſents him as a man of extreme luſt with regard to women. But this is unſupported by any facts, and reſts ſolely upon the authority of that writer, whoſe general character, both for miſtake and malice, are too well known to gain much credit (o). However we are far from thinking him obſtinate againſt all the temptations this way, to which his high ſtation and perſonal accompliſhments laid him open. No doubt he had his juvenilities with the ſex, though they were managed with decorum: In which reſpect he was a proper confident of thoſe of his maſter when Prince of Wales [K]. Whatever his amours were, it is evident he preſerved his heart entire to his Lady, whom, Sir Henry Wotton aſſures us, he loved dearly, and expreſſed his love in an act and time of no diſſimulation, towards his end bequeathing her all his manſion-houſes during her natural life, and a power to diſpoſe of his whole perſonal eſtate, together with a fourth part of his lands, in jointure. The regard he ſhewed to his relations was ſuch, that it was charged, though ſurely without reaſon, among his crimes. The laſt mentioned writer has indeed obſerved, that he left his elder brother John, of the ſame womb, a Viſcount (p), and Chriſtopher, his younger, an Earl (q): Sir Edward Villiers, his half brother (r) on the father's ſide, he either preferred, or removed, call it how you will, from his ſtep-mother's eye to the preſidentſhip of Munſter in Ireland, where he lived in ſingular eſtimation for his juſtice and hoſpitality, and died, with as much grief of the whole province as ever any Governor did [L], before his religious Lady, of ſweet and noble diſcretion, adding much to his honour. The eldeſt of the brethren, William, and heir of the name, was made a Baronet, but abſtained from Court, enjoying perhaps the greater greatneſs of ſelf-fruition (s). He left his mother a Counteſs by patent (t) in her own perſon, which was a new leading example, grown before ſomewhat rare ſince the days of Queen Mary. His ſiſter of Denbigh, that right character of a good Lady, he moſt recommended to the Queen, who, after a diſcharge of ſome French in her court, that were to return home, took her into three ſeveral places of honour and truſt. In ſhort, he left all his female kindred, of the entire or half blood, deſcending of the name of Villiers or Beaumont, within any near degree, either matched with Peers of the realm actually, or hopefully with Earls ſons and heirs, or at leaſt with Knights, or Doctors of Divinity, of plentiful condition. He did not much ſtrengthen his own ſubſtance in Court, but ſtood there on his own feet. For the truth is, the moſt of his allies rather leaned upon [K] He was a confident in the intrigues of his maſter.] We have a letter of this Prince, afterwards King Charles I, to the Duke, by which it appears he was privy to an amour of his Highneſs. It runs thus:

'Steanie,

[L] His death was much lamented by the province.] In the Earl of Cork's chapel at Youghall, where he was buried, there ſtill remains the following hexaſtic to his memory:

Munſter may curſe the time that Villiers came
To make us worſe, by leaving ſuch a name
Of noble parts as none can imitate,
But thoſe whoſe hearts are married to the ſtate:
But if they preſs to imitate his fame,
Munſter may bleſs the time that Villiers came.

His Lady abovementioned was Barbara, eldeſt daughter of Sir John St. John of Lidiard Tregoſe in Wiltſhire, and niece to Sir Oliver St John, created Viſcount Grandiſon in Ireland, Jan. 3, 1620, with limitation of that honour to her poſterity. She brought Sir Edward, beſides three daughters, four ſons; 1ſt, William, who ſucceeded his father in eſtate, and his uncle in the title of Viſcount Grandiſon in 1630. On the breaking out of the rebellion he adhered to King Charles I, and ſignalized himſelf on ſeveral occaſions; but being wounded at the ſiege of Briſtol, July 26, 1643, he was carried to Oxford, where he died in Auguſt following in the thirtieth year of his age, and has a noble monument erected to his memory in the cathedral of Chriſt-church (where he was buried) by Barbara Dutcheſs of Cleveland, his only daughter and heir. His character is drawn by Lord Clarendon (45) ſo very amiable, that the reader cannot but be pleaſed with it. 'He was a young man, ſays 'the noble hiſtorian, of ſo virtuous a habit of mind, 'that no temptation or provocation could corrupt him; 'ſo great a lover of juſtice and integrity, that no exam- 'ple, neceſſity, or even the barbarity of this war, could 'make him ſwerve from the moſt preciſe rules of it; 'and of that rare piety and devotion, that the court or 'camp could not ſhew a more faultleſs perſon, or to 'whoſe example young men might more reaſonably 'conform themſelves. His perſonal valour and courage 'of all kinds (for he had ſometimes indulged ſo much 'to the corrupt opinion of honour as to venture him- 'ſelf in duels) was very eminent, inſomuch as he was 'accuſed of being too prodigal of his perſon; his af- 'fection, zeal, and obedience to the King was ſuch as be- 'came a branch of that family. And he was wont to ſay, 'that if he had not underſtanding enough to know the 'uprightneſs of the cauſe, nor loyalty enough to inform 'him of the duty of a ſubject, yet the very obligations 'of gratitude to the King on behalf of his houſe were 'ſuch as his life was but a due ſacrifice for; and there- 'fore he no ſooner ſaw the war unavoidable, than he 'engaged all his brethren as well as himſelf in the 'ſervice, and there were then three more of them in 'command in the army where he was ſo unfortunately 'cut off. Theſe brothers were Sir John, who ſucceeded 'his brother William as Viſcount Grandiſon, but dying 'without iſſue male, the title came to George, whoſe 'grandſon and heir was created Earl Grandiſon, of 'Limerick in Ireland, Sept. 11, 1721. Edward, the 'third brother, and fourth ſon of the Preſident of Mun- 'ſter, was anceſtor to the preſent Earl of Jerſey (46).'

him than ſhored him up. His familiar ſervants, either about his perſon in ordinary attendance, or about his affairs of ſtate as his Secretaries, of office and his Steward, or of law, as that worthy Knight whom he long uſed to ſollicit his cauſes, he left all both in good fortune, and, which is more, in good fame; things very ſeldom conſociated in the inſtruments of great perſonages. This great Duke took to wife, eight years and two months before his death, the Lady Catharine Mannors, daughter and ſole heir of Francis Earl of Rutland (u) [M], by whom he had iſſue three ſons and a daughter. Mary, his firſt-born child, who, by patent, bearing date Aug. 31, 3 Car. She was firſt married to Charles Lord Herbert, ſon and heir to Philip Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery [N]; ſecondly to James Duke of Richmond and Lenox; and thirdly to Thomas Howard, brother to Charles Earl of Carliſle; but left no iſſue by any of them (w). Of the ſons, Charles the eldeſt died an infant, and was buried in Weſtminſter-abbey, March 17, 1626. The ſecond ſon George is the ſubject of the enſuing article; wherein will be given an account alſo of his third ſon Francis. After the Duke's death, the Dutcheſs entered into a ſecond marriage with Randulph Macdonald, firſt Earl and then Marquis of Antrim in Ireland (x). The King was much diſpleaſed with this match, and for ſome time refuſed to ſee her; yet afterwards, in 1635, he became ſo far reconciled as to treat her with the ſame reſpect he had ever done: but her children were taken from her [O]; the ſons to be brought up with the Prince,

[M] Francis Earl of Rutland.] This Earl Francis by a ſecond match had two ſons, Henry and Francis, who both dying in their infancy, the title came to Sir George Mannors, Knt. his brother and heir male (47), with whom, as to the eſtate, the Dutcheſs of Buckingham, after ſome diſputes, made the following agreement: That he was to have for his life 7000l. per annum; that legacies and annuities ſhould be parted betwixt them; that Belvoir and 2000l. a year ſhould go to his heir; and all the reſt to be ſettled on her and her children after her (48).

[N] She was married to Charles Lord Herbert, &c.] They were married about Chriſtmas, in the year 1634, by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the cloſet at Whitehall. It was done privately, and a few only invited, and ſooner than was intended, by reaſon the young Lady began to affect the younger brother, Philip Herbert (49), and of herſelf had moved the Lord Chamberlain his father that ſhe might marry him, ſaying he did apply himſelf to her more than Lord Herbert did; but the Dutcheſs chid her out of that humour; and now ſhe is married, the affection, ſays my Author (50), will vaniſh.

[O] Her children were taken from her.] In a letter, dated March 15, 1635, to Lord Wentworth, Deputy of Ireland, a very ſenſible correſpondent of his Lordſhip's, Mr Garrard, ſends him the following piece of news: 'The Dutcheſs [of Buckingham] hath been to ſee her 'daughter at Ramſbury, where ſhe yet is, and would 'fain have her home to her at Newhall; but the King 'will not ſuffer her to be bred a Papiſt. It is ſaid ſhe 'will come to my Lady Roxborough, and be bred up 'with the Princeſs until his Majeſty ſhall diſpoſe of her 'in marriage (51).' Accordingly the next year the ſame correſpondent writes as follows: 'Lady Mary 'Herbert is brought and placed with the Lady Rox'borough in the Prince's court. It is ſaid the Duke of 'Lenox ſhall marry her (52).' The Dutcheſs, it ſeems, upon her marriage with the Marquis of Antrim, had not only changed her religion, but, in the uſual forward zeal of a new proſelyte, was buſy in proſelyting others. Among the collection of letters, &c. laſt quoted, there is one to the Deputy from Lord Conway, wherein, ſpeaking of the Counteſs of Newburgh's then late converſion to Popery, which had been imputed to Walter Montague, Eſq; and Sir Toby Matthews, Knt. his Lordſhip makes this remark: 'The King did uſe ſuch 'words to Wat Montague and Sir Toby Matthews, that 'the fright made Wat keep his chamber much longer 'than his ſickneſs would have detained him; and Don 'Tobias was in ſuch a panick, as ſhews he would make 'a very ill martyr. But now the Dog dare again wag 'his tail.—They were, it ſeems, unjuſtly accuſed in 'this buſineſs, the converſion had been made by the 'Dutcheſs of Buckingham and Signor Con the Spaniſh 'Ambaſſador (53).' As Mr Montague made a remarkable figure in his time, and was the ſubject of much talk in the court of King Charles I, it will not be amiſs to take this occaſion of giving ſome account of him, as follows: He was a younger ſon to Henry Montague, firſt Earl of Mancheſter of this name, and was born in London, bred at Sidney college in Cambridge, and afterwards travelled beyond-ſea. Thus educated in a proper manner for a Cadet, whoſe fortune was to be made by the court, he became, like James Howel, an occaſional agent of the miniſtry, and was ſent ſeveral times upon public buſineſs into France (54). But in 1635, renouncing the Proteſtant religion in which he had been bred, he turned Papiſt, quitted the court and his relations in England, and, croſſing the ſea, went to Paris, and put on the appearance of one of the warmeſt zealots of the Romiſh church. Soon after this change he wrote in vindication of it a letter, upon which the aforementioned Mr Garrard makes the following remarks: 'Wat Montague, ſays he, wrote and ſent over to his 'father a letter (55), where he gave his Lordſhip the 'reaſons why, at his laſt being in England, he was re'conciled to the church of Rome. He ſent another to 'father Philips, one of the Queen's Prieſts, to publiſh, in 'caſe his father ſhould have concealed that ſent to him. 'They have paſſed up and down. There is nothing of 'value in his reaſons. If it had been but a good letter, 'I would have ſent it to your Lordſhip (56).' Mr Garrard's letter bears date Jan. 8, 1635. He had, on the 7th of December preceding, deſcanted upon our proſelyte's zeal in the following ſpirit: 'Wat Mon'tague, ſays he to his noble friend, triumphs in his 'new religion at Paris, and is ſuch a zealot there, that 'he wears a chain of beads, with a croſs hung to them, 'about his neck, waits upon that King whenever he 'goes to maſs, writes over to his friends here, that he 'is not only reconciled to the church of Rome, but is 'ready to die a martyr for his religion. That King 'gave him a preſent of a ring worth 1400l. which he 'ſent over by Sir Henry Hungate to ſhew the Queen. 'He is going to Rome, being, they ſay, the only favourite 'of Cardinal Barberino the Pope's nephew, whoſe letter 'he ſhewed here to his friends, ſo full of affection and 'many expreſſions of love to him, that he is convinced 'he ſhall make himſelf a better fortune there than he 'could have done here; which I believe is the true cauſe 'why he has changed his religion (57)'. However that be, the Oxford antiquary ſpeaks more favourably of him, and tells us, that his firſt ſettlement abroad, upon his change, was in the college of St Omer. And that afterwards he was received with great affection into the favour of the Queen-mother of France, who made him Abbot of Nantueil of the Benedictin order in the dioceſe of Metz, and thence promoted him, upon the death of John Francis de Gondy (58), to be Abbot of the ſame order in St Martyn's abbey near Pontboiſe, in the dioceſe of Roan; that he was alſo one of her Majeſty's cabinet council, and was inſtrumental in bringing into her favour the famous Cardinal Mazarine, who, when fixed, proved ungrateful to Montague and his friends. That the Abbot was alſo in great favour with the Queen-mother of England, whom he did not long ſurvive (*); but that a little before his death there was a report that he was elected Archbiſhop of —— in Guienne. He was buried in the church of the hoſpital of Incurables at Paris. That he was of a moſt generous and noble ſpirit, and of great piety, ſpending all he could get in publick and pious uſes (59). Before he left the church of England, he wrote the Shepherd's Paradiſe, printed at London in 1629, 8vo. And after he had left it, Miſcellanea Spiritualia; or Devout Eſſays, in two parts. The firſt of which was printed in 1648, the other in 1654, both at London in 4to. But the ſmall tract, intituled Mancheſter al mondo; Contemplations on death and immortality, ſometimes

Sir Toby Matthews was a character equally if not of a more abnormous caſt than his equally ſuſpected coadjutor. He was the eldeſt ſon (60) of Dr Toby Matthews, Archbiſhop of York, and was born at Saliſbury (61) Oct. 3, 1577, was matriculated as a member of Chriſt-church college in Oxford in the beginning of March, 1589, at eleven years of age, and had a ſtudent's place there conferred on him the following year. By the advantage of a good Tutor and pregnant parts he became a noted Orator and Diſputant, and taking the degrees in arts, he afterwards travelled into various countries beyond-ſea. At his return, being eſteemed a good accompliſhed gentleman, and well verſed in the affairs of other nations, he was taken into the acquaintance of that profound ſcholar Sir Francis Bacon (afterwards Lord Verulam) then of Gray's Inn, who honoured him with a frequent literary correſpondence (62). At length, leaving the church of England, by the perſuaſions of Parſons the Jeſuit, to the great grief of his father, he entered himſelf into the ſociety of Jeſus. Afterwards, growing famous for his eminent ſkill in politicks, he came into England, upon invitation, in January, 1621, it was ſaid, to give his aſſiſtance to King James I. in certain matters of ſtate. On the 10th of October, 1623, he received the honour of Knighthood from his Majeſty at Royſton, for his great zeal in carrying on the propoſed Spaniſh match with Prince Charles, at which time not only the King, but the chief of the nobility, particularly the Duke of Buckingham (63), and others at court, had a high value for him, and ſo continued for ſeveral years after. Among the reſt, the Earl of Strafford had ſo great an opinion of his abilities, that he was taken by his Lordſhip into Ireland, as a friend whoſe advice and counſel might be of uſe to him. But from the above-cited letter of Lord Conway to the Deputy, his reſidence in Ireland ſeems not to have been very long; and his connection with that ſtateſman, and alſo with Dr Laud, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, unavoidably brought him into the odium of the puritanical party; which was greatly inflamed by the character which one Andrew ab Habernfield gave of him in a pretended diſcovery of a treaſonable plot againſt the King, ſent in a letter to Sir William Boſwell, his Majeſty's agent at the Hague, to Dr Laud, in October, 1640, which runs thus: 'Sir Tob. Matthews, a Jeſuited Prieſt (64) of the order 'of politicians, a moſt vigilant man of the chief heads, 'to whom a bed was never ſo dear, that he would reſt 'his head thereon, refreſhing his body with ſleep in a 'chair for an hour or two: neither day nor night ſpared 'he his machinations, a man principally noxious, and 'himſelf the plague of the King and kingdom of Eng-'land; a moſt impudent man, who flies to all banquets 'and feaſts, called or not called, never quiet, always 'in action and perpetual motion, thruſting himſelf into 'all converſations of ſuperiors, he urgeth conferences 'familiarly, that he may fiſh out the minds of men. 'Whatever he obſerveth thence, which may bring any 'commodity or diſcommodity to the part of the con-'ſpirators, he communicates to the Pope's Legate, and 'the more ſecret things he himſelf writes to the Pope, 'or to Cardinal Barberino. In ſum, he adjoins himſelf 'to any man's company, no word can be ſpoken that 'he will not lay hold on, and communicate to his party. 'In the mean time whatever he hath fiſhed out he re-'duceth into a catalogue, and every ſummer carries it 'to the general conſiſtory of the politician Jeſuits, 'which ſecretly meet together in Wales, where he is 'an acceptable gueſt, &c. (65).' This was publiſhed in 1643 by the famous William Prynne (66), who ſpared not to ſay that Sir Toby was ſent into England by the Pope (Urban VIII. with whom he was in great eſteem) to reconcile England to the church of Rome, to which end he received a penſion alſo from Cardinal Barberino, protector of the Engliſh nation. Mr Wood however gives little credit to theſe (which he calls) bare reports, and ſays, that 'he had all his father's name, and many 'of his natural parts; was alſo one of conſiderable 'learning, good memory, and ſharp wit, mixed with 'a pleaſant affability in behaviour, and a ſeeming ſweet-'neſs of mind, though ſometimes, according to the 'company he was in, pragmatical, and a little too 'forward (67). This character is a remarkable inſtance 'of the truth of that obſervation, that the Antiquary 'has been favourable in general (68) to the memory 'of the Papiſts.' The preſent character is notoriouſly copied in that diſpoſition from the ſketch given of Sir Toby by Dr Fuller (69), That having all his father's name, and many of his natural parts, he had few of his moral vertues, and fewer of his ſpiritual graces. His father was in reality a Divine of ſuch eminent worth, as ought not to be paſſed over in ſilence. He was deſcended from an ancient family of the Williams, of Flint, in the principality of North-Wales, of which family John Williams, Eſq; Receiver of Flintſhire, 10 Edw. IV, marrying the daughter and heir of Edmund Matthews, Eſq; his ſon, Sir George, aſſumed the name of Matthews, and had iſſue Richard Matthews of Flint, the father of John Matthews of Briſtol, merchant, where this his ſon Toby was born in 1546 (70). From the ſchool at Wells he was ſent to Oxford at thirteen years of age, and ſoon after became a Student of Chriſt-church there. Having taken his degrees in arts, he received holy orders from the famous Dr Jewel, Biſhop of Saliſbury, being then much reſpected for his great learning, eloquence, ſweet converſation, friendly diſpoſition, and ſharpneſs of his wit. In 1569 he was unanimouſly elected public Orator of the Univerſity, which office, though but twenty-three years of age, he executed with great applauſe to himſelf and honour to the public (71). At the ſame time he was a moſt celebrated preacher, when Oxford ſeems to have been but indifferently ſtocked with ſuch. Afterwards preferments came thick upon him. In 1570 he was made Canon of Chriſt-church and Archdeacon of Bath, in 1572 Prebendary of Sarum and Preſident of St John's college in Oxford, when, being famous for his preaching, he was made Queen's Chaplain, and ſoon after proceeding in divinity (72), he was made Dean of Chriſt-church in 1576. In 1579 he bore the office of Vicechancellor of that Univerſity, and in 1583 he was made Præcentor of the church of Saliſbury in June, but being inſtalled Dean of Durham in Auguſt following, he reſigned the Præcentorſhip in February the ſame year; as he alſo did the Deanery of Chriſt-church in the beginning of the next year, 1584. It is not certain what was his motive for leaving the Univerſity, where he had ſo many ingenious friends and admirers, quit preferments of more profit than this deanery, and go further from the Court, the fountain of preferment; but there ſeems to be ſomething in it of the ſpirit which prevailed at that time and before among many Divines (73), and which was called an apoſtolical preaching of the goſpel, by travelling from town to town about the country for that purpoſe, in places where inſtruction was moſt wanted, as was particularly the caſe of thoſe northern parts. The Dean's uncommon diligence in that practice ſtrongly favours this opinion, there being ſcarce any town in the county but had him in their pulpit, and ſome places very often, while he held the deanery; nor did his aſſiduity in this courſe at all remit upon his promotion to the biſhoprick of that dioceſe in 1595, nor even after his advancement to the archiepiſcopal ſee of York (74) in 1606 (75), in which he ſat with great honour and reputation to the time of his death, which happened May 29, 1628, at Cawood caſtle, whence his remains were carried, and interred in our Lady's chapel, at the Eaſt end of York Minſter (76), where ſtands a ſumptuous monument of black and white marble, adorned with gold, repreſenting his effigies incumbent in full proportion, in his archiepiſcopal robes, and an inſcription in Latin, celebrating his hoſpitality, and particularly his powerful preaching (77), a talent which he never ſuffered to lie idle, but put out to uſe with indefatigable diligence to the laſt. Whence that challenge of Alexander Cook, Vicar of Leedes in Yorkſhire, againſt the Papiſts, 'That 'Tobye Matthews, the moſt reverend Archbiſhop of 'York, though almoſt eighty years of age, preacheth 'more ſermons in a year, than you can prove has been 'preached by all your Popes from Gregory the Great his 'days (78).' Even Edmund Campian, the Jeſuit, mentioning his name on another occaſion, has theſe words: 'He that now rules in your pulpits, Qui nunc dominatur 'in concionibus;' adding, 'whom for his good learning 'and ſeeds of vitue we loved, Quem propter bonas artes 'et virtutis ſemina dileximus (79).' He preached with in the year 1639, highly provoked the Lord Deputy Wentworth (z): Whereupon, to avert the danger that was apprehended from his reſentment, the Dutcheſs addreſſed to him the letter, a copy of which is inſerted below [P], where it well deſerves a place, both becauſe it the moſt ardent fervour, and his ſermons, eſpecially thoſe on extraordinary occaſions, made ſuch impreſſions upon himſelf, that he gave thanks for the divine aſſiſtance in them. At the ſame time all his pains in preaching did not make him neglect the proper epiſcopal duties of viſitation, confirmation, ordination, &c. confirming ſometimes 500, ſometimes 1000, at a time, yea ſo many, that he has been forced to betake himſelf to his bed for refreſhment (80). He may juſtly be ranked among the eminent Divines of this nation, conſidered either in the ſchools or the epiſcopal chair. Camden ſtiles him, Theologus præſtantiſſimus, in quo doctrina cum pietate, ars cum natura, certant (81); and his great reading and tenacious memory are taken notice of by the Oxford hiſtorian, as follows: Infinitæ propemodum lectionis vir librum pene nullum, quem vel ſcriptoris fama vel ipſum operis argumentum commendaret, intactum prætermiſit, memoriam quoque tam tenacem habuit ut legenti ſeſe pauciſſima obtulerint, quæ non, ſi quando uſus flagitaret, confeſtim proferret (82). It is a little ſurprizing, that we find none of the Archbiſhop's ſermons in print except his Concio Apologetica contra Campianum in Deuteron. XXXII. v. 7. firſt printed in 1581, and again in 1638, at Oxford, in 8vo. After his death a large letter, penned by him in the name of the Convocation about Archbiſhop Grindal's ſuſpenſion, was publiſhed by Dr Fuller (83). Our Archbiſhop Matthews had a very great opinion of Grindal, and was a zealous promoter of the exerciſes, ſince called lectures, which were countenanced and encouraged by him (84). Another letter of his Grace to Archbiſhop Uſher is exhibited by Dr Parr (85); and a third has been printed by Dr Smith (86). Theſe are all that are genuine (87), ſave that remarkable letter of his concerning the Hampton-court conference in 1603, publiſhed by Mr Strype in Archbiſhop Whitgift's life (88), from the original in Muſ. Thoreſbeian. His Grace's manuſcript notes upon all the ancient Fathers are mentioned by Dr Favour, who had read them, and ſays they are very judicious (89). Theſe are probably lodged in the archives of York minſter, to which church his whole library was bequeathed by his relict, a lady of diſtinguiſhed beauty, and of exemplary wiſdom, gravity, piety, and indeed all other virtues, not only above her ſex, but the times. One thing is very ſingular in her ſtory, that, as ſhe was daughter of Biſhop Barlow, ſo, her firſt huſband was Matthew Parker, ſon to Matthew Parker, Archbiſhop of Canterbury. She had four ſiſters, married to four Biſhops, one to William Wickham, Biſhop of Wincheſter; another to Overton, Biſhop of Coventry and Litchfield; a third to Weſtphaling, Biſhop of Hereford; and a fourth to Day, that ſucceeded Wickham in Wincheſter (90): ſo that a Biſhop was her father, an Archbiſhop her father-in-law; ſhe had four Biſhops her brethren, and an Archbiſhop her huſband. She died at the age of ſeventy-eight, on the 10th of May, 1629, and was interred near her laſt huſband, under a monument, with an inſcription to her memory. By her laſt will ſhe gave to Peter-houſe in Cambridge, where her beloved ſon Samuel was a ſcholar and died, 200l. for two ſcholarſhips; and to her ſon, Sir Toby Matthews, a gold ring, ſet with eleven diamonds, which King Charles I. gave her: the Archbiſhop had bequeathed him a piece of plate, with a note that he had in his life-time given him above 14000l. Sir Toby, after acting a moſt heteroclite part upon the ſtage of life, was taken off it Oct. 13, 1655, in the houſe of the third probation of the Engliſh college of Jeſuits at Gaunt in Flanders, and was buried in a vault under the church belonging to them, without any kind of funeral pomp or ſplendor, according to his will. So much fluency of wit as his genius was impregnated with, could not be reſtrained from ſhewing ſome ſpecimens in print. Beſides ſome tranſlations, we have ſeveral original pieces of his writing: Among which are, 1ſt, A rich cabinet of precious jewels, printed about 1623, 2d, A Collection of Letters, with his picture prefixed; to which is added, Letters to ſeveral perſons, and the character of the moſt excellent Lady Lucy, Counteſs of Carliſle. She was the Goddeſs of his heart, and he expreſſed his adorations to her in ſuch peculiar ſtrains (*), as procured him a place in Sir John Suckling's Seſſion of Poets: Thus:

(*) Mr Walpole has given us ſome pleaſant ſtrictures upon this character in his Anecdotes of painting, Vol. II. under Sir Toby's article.

Toby Matthews (pox on him (||) ! what made him there)
Was whiſpering nothing in ſomebody's ear,
When he had the honour to be named in court,
But Sir you may thank my Lady Carliſle for't.

(||) This was a common bye-word with him.

This Lady was daughter of Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland; ſhe died without iſſue in November, 1660, and was buried by her anceſtors in the church at Petworth in Suſſex. 3d, Some letters printed in the Cabala, or myſteries of ſtate, in 1654, and in the Cabala, or Scrinia Sacra, printed at London in 1663, both which are perhaps inſerted in the laſt mentioned collection of letters. 4th, Sir Toby alſo wrote a book to ſhew the benefit that proceeds from waſhing the head every morning in cold water; and he had likewiſe made a large progreſs in the hiſtory of the late times, but, being left imperfect, it never ſaw the light. As to his tranſlations, beſides that of Bacon's Eſſays already mentioned, Sir Toby publiſhed an Engliſh verſion of St Auſtin's confeſſions (91), printed in 1624, 8vo; as alſo the Life of St Tereſa, printed about 1623, 8vo; and The Penitent Bandito; or The hiſtory of the converſion and death of the moſt illuſtrious Lord Signor Troilo Savelli, a Baron of Rome, printed about the ſame time; and a ſecond edition came out in 1663, 8vo.—To conclude, Mr Walpole, who having well obſerved that Sir Toby had ſome wit, and pretended to be a politician, has given him a place among the Engliſh painters, as being intitled thereto upon the authority of Mr Vertue the engraver, who ſays Sir Toby had ſome ſkill in limning; and that he ſometimes diverted himſelf in handling the pencil, appears from a letter of the Dutcheſs of Buckingham to the Duke in Spain, wherein ſhe tells him, that ſhe had not yet ſeen the picture of the Infanta drawn by Toby Matthews (92).

[P] A letter, which is inſerted below.] The letter runs thus:

'My Lord,

'I was in hope, till very lately, that all your diſ-'pleaſure taken againſt my Lord had been paſt; but, 'in letters ſent me out of England, I was aſſuredly in-'formed your Lordſhip was much diſguſted ſtill with 'him; which news hath very much troubled me. I 'cannot be ſatisfied without ſending theſe expreſsly to 'you: And I beſeech you that, whatever you do 'conceive, you will deal clearly with me, and let me 'know it, and withal direct me how I may remove it. 'I muſt neceſſarily be included in your Lordſhip's anger 'to him, for any misfortune to my Lord muſt be mine, 'and it will prove a great misfortune to me to live 'under your frowns. Out of your goodneſs you will 'not, I hope, make me a ſufferer, who have never 'deſerved from you but as

The noble ſpirit which prompted and dictated this addreſs ſhews, that her Grace knew exactly how to hit that nice and delicate point of condeſcending with a dignity ſuitable to her birth and quality: And the Lord Deputy's anſwer is animated with a no leſs nobly ſpirited politeneſs, in theſe terms:

'Madam,

'What relations your Ladyſhip hath had forth of 'England concerning me, I know not; but if I under-'ſtood the parties that writ them, I ſhould be better 'able to judge of them: For a ſort of perſons there are 'in that kingdom, who as they are of all others leaſt 'privy with my inclinations, ſo are they moſt apt to 'form and publiſh every untruth that may be faſhioned 'or enforced to my prejudice.

'Your Ladyſhip deſires me to deal clearly with you, 'and otherwiſe I never practiſed with any. And as for 'my Lord of Antrim, your Ladyſhip might do well to 'adviſe him to the like manner of proceeding; For I 'muſt needs confeſs myſelf not ſatisfied, finding, in the

it is the chief production we have of her Grace's pen [2], and (which is directly to the purpose of these memoirs) it opens a view into a very engaging part of her character, by exhibiting a specimen of her admirable talent in that most useful species of writing.

'late proceedings here with this state, his Lordship returned me artificial for my simple and ingenuous dealing; and that himself and his man Stewart endeavoured to turn the improbability, indeed impossibility, of that design upon me as a fault whereon to excuse himself, which methought was not so fair, to make me accountable for that in the conclusion, wherein I had no hand or privity at all originally.

'But let these things be as they may, your Ladyship, I know, is so just as to allow me to preserve myself, which I shall do without hurt, I trust, to any other: and then I shall be very ready, without reflecting upon any matter which concerns myself, as formerly, to do your Ladyship's person and affairs all the service I shall be able, and persuade myself you will not find any, which may succeed me in this place, more careful and glad to express himself

[2] The chief production of her Grace's pen.] There are some other letters of hers, written to the Duke, preserved among the Harleian manuscripts, one of which has been already mentioned. In another, written also to her Lord while he was in Spain, she desires him to get his picture drawn. I pray you, says she, if you have any idle time, sit to Gerbier for your picture, that I may have it well done in little. This painter, who became afterwards Sir Balthazar Gerbier d'Ouvilly, was born at Antwerp in 1592 (95), but came young into England, and was in the Duke's retinue so early as the year 1613. He was in high favour with his Grace, and, attending him into Spain, was employed in the treaty of the Prince's [Charles] marriage, though ostensibly acting only in the character of a painter (96). Bishop Tanner has a manuscript catalogue of the Duke's collection of pictures, statues, &c. drawn up by Gerbier, who was employed by his Grace in several of his purchases, by whose interest he had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him in 1628, at Hampton-court, by the King [Charles I.] (97) who, it is said, employed him, upon his Grace's recommendation, as a man of a good understanding in the character of his agent at Brussels, where he resided several years (98). These anecdotes are furnished by Mr Walpole, who has given another, which confirms and elucidates a characteristic mark of the Duke's temper and singular turn of mind before noted. It is taken from a manuscript of the late Mr Vertue, which though a little imperfect, and thereby somewhat obscure, is yet sufficiently clear for our purpose, as follows: 'King James I. ill and dying, the Duke 'of Buckingham was desired to apply a plaister to his 'stomach, which he did with proper advice of Doctors, 'Physicians to the King: but the King dying, the 'Duke was blamed. One Eglesham printed a scurrilous 'libel, and flew away into Flanders. I was told by 'Gerbier, (though his testimony be odious to any man) 'that Eglesham dealt with him in Flanders for a peece 'of money (not more than 400 gilders to defray the 'charges) to print his recantation. Of which the Duke 'bid Gerbier join knavery together, and spit their venom 'till they split, and he would pay for printing that 'also (99).'

VILLIERS [GEORGE], eldest surviving son of the preceding, was born Jan. 30, 1627, at Wallingford-house, in the parish of St Martin in the fields, within the liberty of Westminster (a). His father's cruel fate leaving him an infant-orphan, the King [Charles I.] in his first visit after it to the Dutchess his mother, promised to be a husband to her, and a father to her children, and he performed his promise. The Dutchess was then great with child, and the King said he would be Godfather, in which relation he stood, together with Francis Earl of Rutland, the child's grandfather. After some compliments who should give the name, the King named him Francis, and the grandfather gave him his benediction, 7000l. a year (b). The Duke and his brother were bred up by the King with his own children, under the same Tutors and Governors: Both the brothers were sent young to Trinity-college in Cambridge, and their names entered in the College book the same year with Prince Charles (c). Here the Duke became acquainted with the celebrated Mr Abraham Cowley and Mr Martin Clifford, whom he loved ever after, and they as faithfully and effectually served him. From the University both the brothers went to travel abroad, under the care of William Aylesbury, Esq; son of Sir William Aylesbury, Bart. appointed to that office by the King (d). They continued abroad till after the breaking out of the civil wars, and upon their return were conducted by their Governor to his Majesty, then at Oxford (e), where they laid their lives and fortunes at the King's feet, as a testimony of their loyalty and gratitude, worthy to be imprinted in the memory of the royal family. Young as they were, they immediately engaged in that cause, and chusing Prince Rupert and the Lord Gerard for Tutors to enter them in the war, they went with those noblemen into very sharp service, viz. the storming of the close at Litchfield (f) in Staffordshire [A]. For this the parliament seized on their estates; but, by a rare example of their compassion, restored them again in consideration of their nonage. However, these loyal youths kept those no longer than till they came of age to forfeit them again. It was about this time that their mother married the Marquis of Antrim, and thereby ruining herself and offending the King, they were now committed to the care of the Earl of Northumberland, and sent to travel in France and Italy, where they lived in as great state [B] as some of those sovereign Princes. Their return to England was in so critical a time, as if, it should seem, they had

now choſen the laſt opportunity, as they had done the firſt, of venturing all in the King's ſervice. It was in the year 1648, when the King was a priſoner in the Iſle of Wight, and his friends in ſeveral parts of England deſigning to renew the war: Duke Hamilton in Scotland, the Earl of Holland and others in Surrey, Goring in Kent, and many in London and Eſſex, appeared in arms. Theſe were the laſt efforts of the dying cauſe, and the Duke and his brother, in the heat of their courage, engaged with the Earl of Holland, and were the firſt that took the field about Ryegate in Surrey. The parliament, with their old army, knew all theſe deſigns, and deſpiſed them, till they grew ſo numerous in Kent, that the General [Fairfax] himſelf was ſent to ſuppreſs them, who found ſharp ſervice in ſtorming of Maidſtone and taking of Colcheſter (g). Some troops of horſe were ſent, under the command of Colonel Gibbons, to ſuppreſs them in Surrey, and they drove my Lord of Holland before them to Kingſton, but engaged his party before he got thither near Nonſuch, and defeated them. My Lord Francis at the head of his troop, having his horſe ſlain under him, got to an oak-tree in the high-way, about two miles from Kingſton, where he ſtood with his back againſt it, defending himſelf, ſcorning to aſk quarter, and they barbarouſly refuſing to give it, till with nine wounds in his face and body he was ſlain [C]. The Duke, after the loſs of his brother, hardly eſcaped with his life to St Neots in Huntingdonſhire, whither alſo came the Earl of Holland, who was there taken, and ſoon after beheaded. The Duke next morning finding the houſe where he lay ſurrounded, and a troop of horſe drawn up before the gate, had time with his ſervants to get to horſe, and then, cauſing the gate to be opened, he charged the enemy, and killed the officer at the head of them, and made his eſcape to the ſea-ſide, and thence to Prince Charles, who was in the Downs with thoſe ſhips that had deſerted the Earl of Warwick. And now again the parliament gave him forty days to return to England; but he refuſed, and choſe rather to ſtay with the Prince: So, at the expiration of the time, his eſtate was ſeized, being then the greateſt of any ſubject in England, having now his brother's eſtate fallen to him (h). All that he had to ſupport him beyond-ſea was the money he got at Antwerp for his pictures, which were part of that coſtly and curious collection of his father, procured from Italy by the help of Sir Henry Wotton (i) and others, which adorned York houſe to the admiration of all men of judgment in pictures [D]. Theſe were ſecured, and ſent to him by his old truſty ſervant Mr

A few days before 'his death, when he left London, he ordered his Stew-'ard Mr John May to bring him in a liſt of his debts, 'and he ſo charged his eſtate with them, that the par-'liament, who ſeized on his eſtate, paid them. His 'body was brought from Kingſton by water to York-'houſe in the Strand, and, being there embalmed, 'was afterwards depoſited in his father's vault in 'Henry VIIth's chapel, Weſtminſter-abbey, with this 'inſcription, which it is pity ſhould be buried with 'him:

[D] Part of his father's collection of pictures.] This collection had been purchaſed at great prices by his father. He gave 10000l. for what had been collected by Sir Peter Paul Rubens; and Sir Henry Wotton, when Ambaſſador at Venice, purchaſed many other capital pieces for his Grace. After his aſſaſſination ſome had been purchaſed by the King, the Earl of Northamberland, and Abbot Montague. One may however form a judgment in ſome meaſure how valuable the intire collection muſt have been, by the liſt of what remained; where we find no leſs than nineteen by Titian, ſeventeen by Tintoret, twenty-one by Baſſan, two by Julio Romano, two by Georgioni, thirteen by Paul Veroneſe, eight by Palma, three by Guido, thirteen by Rubens, three by Leonardo da Vinci, two by Correggio, and three by Raphael d'Urbin, beſides ſeveral by other eſteemed maſters, whoſe pieces are ſcarce (5). Mr Duart of Antwerp bought ſome of them; but the greateſt part were purchaſed by the Archduke Leopold, and added to his noble collection in the caſtle of Prague. He bought the chief picture, the Ecce homo by Titian, in which are introduced the portraits of the Pope, the Emperor Charles V. and Solyman the magnificent: It is eight feet in length, and twelve feet in breadth. Mr Fairfax ſays it was valued at 5000l. but from a note of the late Mr George Vertue, the Engraver, on that place in the manuſcript, it appears, that Thomas Earl of Arundel offered the Duke's father the value of 70001. in land or money, for this ſingle piece (*).

(5) This was printed in the catalogue of the curious collection, &c. ubi ſupra, from p. 1 to p. 22, containing 230 pictures, beſides 14 models in metal, marble, joory, or alabaſter. After which are mentioned 12 boxes of agates, and other precious ſtones, chaſed in gold, and all antiques, as expreſſed in the Engliſh inventory of the Duke of Buckingham's collection in 1635.

(*) There is a curious copy of it in Northumberland houſe.

The Duke was alſo poſſeſſed of another great curioſity in painting, which, being likewiſe ſold by his ſon, has lately been the ſubject of much diſcourſe, and not only given birth to various pamphlets, &c. but has likewiſe, by the uſe that has been made of it, occaſioned a conteſt at law. The Reader is doubtleſs beforehand with me in pointing out the ſtained window now ſtanding at the Eaſt end of St Margaret's church, Weſtminſter, of which is given the following account: The magiſtrates of Dort in Holland, being deſirous of preſenting Henry VII. with ſomething worthy to adorn his magnificent chapel, then building at Weſtminſter, directed this window to be made, which was five years in finiſhing; King Henry and his Queen ſending their pictures to Dort, from whence their portraits in the window are delineated.

King Henry dying before the window was compleated, it fell into the hands of an Abbot of Waltham, who placed it in his abbey church, where it remained till the diſſolution of that abbey by Henry VIII, A. D. 1540. To preſerve it from being deſtroyed, it was removed by Robert Fuller, the laſt abbot of Waltham, to a private chapel at New-hall, an ancient ſeat belonging to the Butlers Earls of Ormond in Wiltſhire; which afterwards came into the hands of Thomas Bollein, father of Ann Bollein, Henry VIIIth's Queen.

In Queen Elizabeth's reign New-hall is found to have been the ſeat of Thomas Ratcliff, Earl of Suſſex; from his family George Villiers Duke of Buckingham bought it; his ſon ſold it to General Monk, who to preſerve it, or to guard it againſt imputations from his party, cauſed it to be buried under ground during the civil wars and uſurpations; in which times many beautiful glaſs windows, to the amount of above 800, were deſtroyed by the rage of puritanical zealots. After the Reſtoration, General Monk cauſed this window to be replaced in his chapel of New-hall. In 1688 died his ſon and heir Chriſtopher

Mr John Traylman, who lived in York houſe. The King reſolving to go into Scotland, Chriſtopher Duke of Albemarle, by whoſe death this noble ſeat devolved to his Dutcheſs; but ſhe not reſiding there, it became ruinous and decayed. The preſent poſſeſſor of New-hall is John Olmius, Eſq; who it is preſumed purchaſed it of the heirs of the Monk's family. Within theſe few years he hath demoliſhed great part of the ancient ſtructure, and the fine chapel; but the window he preſerved, hoping that it might at length be purchaſed for ſome church. It lay ſome time caſed up in boxes, till Mr Conyers, coming to the knowledge of it, purchaſed it for his chapel at Copthall near Epping, and paid Mr Price, a great artiſt in that way (6), a large ſum of money for repairing it. There it remained till his ſon John, building a new houſe at ſome diſtance from the old ſeat, had no further uſe for the window, and ſold it to the Committee appointed for the repairing and beautifying St Margaret's, A. D. 1758, for the ſum of 400 guineas; part of the 4000l. granted by Parliament for repairing and beautifying that church (7).

The progreſſive changes this window hath undergone are ſomewhat remarkable, and particularly in its being now fixed near the abbey-church of Weſtminſter, in the chapel belonging to which it was originally deſigned to be placed.

The antiquity of it, by the foregoing account, I preſume cannot be leſs than 250 years, being probably begun ſoon after the founding of Henry VIIth's chapel, and before the death of that King, which is evident by ſeveral figures introduced into it.

However, ſoon after it was ſet up in St Margaret's church, ſeveral articles were exhibited in the Commiſſary's court againſt the Churchwardens, William Ruſted and Samuel Pierſon, for ſetting up a piece of painting there, wherein was delineated ſeveral ſuperſtitious pictures or images, and that without a licence or faculty from the Ordinary of the place (8). Hereupon there came out, in vindication of the Churchwardens, in 1761, a piece in 4to, entitled, Ornaments of Churches conſidered, &c. to which is added in the appendix, a deſcription of the window, as follows:

'This Eaſtern window, ſays the anonymous writer of the defence, conſiſts of one entire hiſtory of the crucifixion of our bleſſed Saviour between two thieves, the portraiture of whoſe perſons is ſo extremely well done, that there may be ſeen the muſcles of each limb, occaſioned by the different ways they are expanded on the croſſes. Round the croſs where our Saviour is crucified are the Roman officers and ſoldiers attending the execution, with ſome of the chief rulers of the Jews. At the foot of the croſs are Mary Magdalen, and Mary the wife of Cleophas, and ſiſter to the bleſſed Virgin Mary, who ſtands in the front (9), repreſenting as fainting away, ſo drawn in moſt pictures. On the right hand of the croſs is the Roman Centurion on horſeback, who with a launce pierces our Saviour's ſide, from which are repreſented iſſuing blood and water. The horſe whereon the Centurion ſits is finely executed, with full ſpirit and vigour. Behind the croſs, a little to the left, is a ſmall perſpective view of the city of Jeruſalem. On the right is the Penitent, and on the left the Thief which reviled our Saviour.

'The firſt capital figure on the right hand, ſtanding in a niche, curiouſly delineated, is that of St George of Cappadocia, the reputed Patriot Saint of England, ſtanding compleatly armed at all points, holding in his hand a banner partly unfurled, charged with a red croſs, and behind him lies at his feet a red dragon (10). He was a Tribune under the Emperor Dioclefian, and beheaded by him for embracing the Chriſtian religion A. D. 290. The banner he holds is a ſymbol of his dying in defence of the croſs, and the red dragon under his feet alludes to his conqueſt over that red dragon the Devil, who burneth with fury, and is red with the blood of the faithful. Rev. ch. xii. v. 3.

'The third figure on the right hand, under St George, is Henry VII. at his devotion in his royal robes, crowned with a diadem, and kneeling under a canopy of ſtate in a ſmall oratory, with a book before him.

'Oppoſite to the King, on the left hand, under St Catharine, is the fourth figure, repreſenting Elizabeth his royal conſort at her devotions, and kneeling alſo under a canopy of ſtate, with a book before her, and in her countenance is lively expreſſed the devotion of her heart.

'Above all is a row of ſix ſmall panes, in which are the repreſentations of angels attendant on the crucifixion. On the left hand, in a ſmall pane, is the moon, and on the oppoſite ſide the ſun, alluding to the preternatural manner of the darkneſs (the ſun not being eclipſed, as the moon was at full) at our Saviour's crucifixion.

'On the left of theſe figures, and over the moon, is placed a white roſe within a red one, to ſignify the uniting of the houſes of York and Lancaſter in the perſons of Henry and Elizabeth. On the oppoſite ſide, and over the ſun, is placed a Pomegranate, to ſignify the deſcent of the two mentioned houſes from the royal houſe of Spain, as John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, married Conſtance, the eldeſt daughter and coheir of Peter King of Caſtile and Leon; and his brother Edmund of Langley, Duke of York, (great great grandfather of Elizabeth, wife of Henry VII.) married Iſabel, the youngeſt daughter of the aforeſaid King. The pomegranate Vert in a field Or are the arms of the kingdom of Granada in Spain, which kingdom was added to that of Caſtile by Ferdinand V. A. D. 1478, who united Spain into one monarchy, having married Iſabel, Queen of Caſtile and Leon.

'On each ſide of the altar-piece, within ſtoco panels, are copper-plates, finely enamelled with the texts of Scripture explaining the crucifixion as painted in the glaſs, and the ſupper at Emaus in baſs relievo, carved by Alkin of St Anne's, Weſtminſter, from a painting of Titian.'

Upon the whole it is obſervable, that this writer has paſſed over in ſilence the figures of four angels, each with a cup or chalice in his hands, catching the blood which iſſues in unbroken ſtreams from our Saviour's ſide and the wounds in his hands and feet (*). As alſo the figures of other angels conducting the ſoul of the penitent thief on one ſide to heaven; and the Devil on the other ſide tranſporting that of the reviling thief to hell; the ſouls of each thief being repreſented in a ſmall bodily ſhape, fixed to ſuitable croſſes.

The proſecution againſt the Churchwardens was begun in the Commiſſary's court, from whence an appeal being made to the court of Delegates, the cauſe is ſtill depending there.

This cauſe naturally brings to mind another, as being an exact contraſt to it, I mean the caſe of Mr Sherfield, Recorder of Saliſbury, who was proſecuted in the Starchamber, and fined 500l. for contemptuouſly breaking ſome panes of painted glaſs, repreſenting the creation of the world by God the Father, in a window of St Edmond's church in that city (†). The fine it is allowed was very ſevere, according to the temper of that too arbitrary court (‡); but it may perhaps be eſteemed an inſtance of the Divine Nemeſis upon the man; of whom we have the following account, in a letter from Mr Garrard to the Lord Wentworth, Lord Deputy of Ireland. 'About this time [viz. in March, 1633 (§)] died Sherfield the glaſs-window breaker, ſome thouſands in debt, and moſt wickedly cheated thoſe that dealt with him for that little land he had in a manor near Marlborough. When, as your Lordſhip knows, he was fined 500l. in the Starchamber, he then mortgaged his manor to one Ayres, a Bencher in Lincoln's Inn (‖), who lent him upon it 2500l. Upon his death, Ayres challenging it, Audley, of the court of Wards, ſhews a former mortgage to him; Sir Thomas Jarvis one more ancient than that; his wife, before him, challengeth it as her jointure: His eldeſt brother ſhews a conveyance before all theſe. In concluſion, on his death-bed he commands a ſervant of his to carry a letter, with a key ſealed up in it, to Mr Noy [the famous Attorney-general] where was aſſigned in what box in his ſtudy at Lincoln's Inn lay the conveyance of his eſtate; there it was found, and by a deed, bearing date before all theſe formerly mentioned, he had given all his eſtate to pious uſes. Sic finita eſt fabula of Mr Shirfield (11).'

(6) An account of this painter may be ſeen in Anecdotes of painting in England, &c. in 2 Vols 4to, Vol. II. 1762, by Mr Horace Walpole, who has alſo ſhewn, by an uninterrupted ſeries of maſters in this kind of painting, that it was never loſt, as has been commonly ſuppoſed.

(7) This church being uſed by the Houſe of Commons to aſſemble in, they ſeem to have taken upon themſelves to repair and beautify it. In 1735 the tower was rebuilt, and the church finely cieled, by the ſum of 5500l. granted by parliament in the 8th and 12th years of Geo II. And by a grant of 4000l. in 1757, the church had a thorough repair, the whole pavement was taken up, and new vaulted, the Eaſt end rebuilt, and the pews all made new: All being finiſhed before the end of the year 1758.

the Duke attended him (k); and now again the parliament offered to compound for his eſtate at 20000l. which was leſs than a year's value; but he chuſing to run the King's fortune in Scotland, worſe than exile, came with him out of Scotland into England, and at Worceſter his eſcape was almoſt as miraculous as the King's in the royal oak [E]. He eſcaped again into France, and went a volunteer into the French army, where he was much regarded by all the French officers, ſignalizing his courage at the ſiege of Arras and Valenciennes (l). When he came to the Engliſh court, which was but ſeldom, the King was always glad to ſee him: He loved his perſon and his company; though his court was not well diſpoſed to him (m). There now happened a great turn in the courſe of his life. My Lord Fairfax, not approving the war with Scotland, had laid down his commiſſion of General of the parliament's forces in 1650, but had part of the Duke's eſtate, about 5000l. a year, allotted him by the parliament toward the payment of his arrears, and he remitted more than would have purchaſed a greater eſtate. They gave him the manor of Helmeſley, the ſeat of the Rutland family in Yorkſhire, as a ſalve for the wound he received there, being ſhot through the body. They gave him alſo York houſe in London. The Duke heard how kind and generous Lord Fairfax was to the Counteſs of Derby, in paying all the rents of the Iſle of Man, which the parliament had alſo aſſigned to him for his arrears, into her own hands, and which ſhe confeſſed was more than all her ſervants before had done. The Duke had reaſon to hope my Lord had the ſame inclinations as to this eſtate of his, which his Lordſhip never accounted his own, and the Duke wanted it as much as the Counteſs. He was not deceived in his hopes; for my Lord Fairfax wiſhed only for an opportunity of doing it. He lived in York houſe, where every chamber was adorned with the arms of Villiers and Manors, Lions and Peacocks. He was deſcended from the ſame anceſtors, Earls of Rutland [F], Sir Guy Fairfax's two ſons having married two of the daughters of the Earl of Rutland, which he took frequent occaſion to remember. The Duke reſolved to try his fortune, which had hitherto been adverſe enough (n). Over he came into England, to make love to my Lord's only daughter, a moſt virtuous and amiable Lady. He found a friend to propoſe the match (o); the parents conſented, and the young Lady could not reſiſt his charms, being the moſt graceful and beautiful perſon that any court in Europe ever ſaw. All his trouble in wooing was, He came, ſaw, and conquered. When he came into England he was not ſure either of life or liberty. He was an outlaw, and had

[E] His eſcape after the battle of Worceſter.] When the King was preparing to march into England, he granted a commiſſion to the Duke to raiſe a regiment of horſe, and one of foot, out of the Engliſh that ſhould repair to him. And after their march to Worceſter, perceiving that very few of quality or diſtinction repaired to his Majeſty, he remonſtrated to the King, that it would be more for his intereſt to remove the Scottiſh General; alledging it would not conſiſt with the honour of any peer of England to receive his orders; and thereupon aſked his Majeſty to confer that honour on himſelf; which the King refuſing, the Duke was ſo diſcontented, that he came no more to the Council, ſcarce ſpoke to the King, neglected every body elſe, and himſelf, inſomuch as for many days he ſcarce put on clean linnen, nor converſed with any body, nor did he recover this ill humour while the army ſtaid at Worceſter. Nevertheleſs, in the engagement there, he was at the King's right hand, and behaved with exemplary valour. On the loſs of the day he retired northward with his Majeſty, who had then an intent of going into Scotland; but, on conſultation with the Duke, the Earl of Derby, the Lord Wilmot, &c. it was thought more convenient to conceal himſelf in Boſcobel-houſe. Whereupon the Duke, the Earl of Derby, and others, in all about ſixty horſe, marched thither with the King, and having left his Majeſty there, as they hoped, in ſecurity, the Duke, with the Earl of Derby, &c. went northward, to overtake General Leſly with the main body of Scotch horſe. But being met by the rebels, the Earl of Derby, and the Earl of Lauderdale, with moſt of them, were taken priſoners. While the rebels were plundering thoſe noble perſons, the Duke, with the Lord Leviſton, Colonel Blague, Mr Marmaduke Darcy, and Mr Hugh May, forſook the road firſt, and ſoon after their horſes, and betook themſelves to a by-way, and got into Bloore-Park, near Cheſwardine, about five miles from Newport, where they received ſome refreſhment at a little obſcure houſe of Mr George Barlow: and afterwards met with two honeſt labourers in an adjoining wood, to whom they communicated the diſtreſs to which the fortune of war had reduced them; and finding them like to prove faithful, the Duke thought fit to imitate his royal maſter, delivered his George, which was given him by the Queen of England, to Mr May (12), (who preſerved it through all difficulties, and after reſtored it to his Grace in Holland) and changed habit with one of the workmen. In this diſguiſe, by the aſſiſtance of Mr Barlow and his wife, he was after ſome days conveyed by one Nicholas Matthews, a carpenter, to the houſe of Mr Hawley, a hearty cavalier at Bilſtrop in Nottinghamſhire, from thence to the Lady Villiers's houſe at Brokeſby in Leiceſterſhire, and, after many hardſhips and encounters, his Grace got ſecure to London, and thence had the good fortune to eſcape a ſecond time into Holland; where, on his arrival, he was taken for the King; and it was thought good policy to publiſh that his Majeſty was arrived. However, the King ſoon after eſcaping into France, the Duke went to him there (13).

[F] He was deſcended from the houſe of Rutland.] This appears from a pedigree of this ancient family, curiouſly drawn by Mr R. Thoreſby, the famous Antiquary of Leeds in Yorkſhire (14), who having obſerved that the name Fairfax is Saxon, and preſumed to be in England about the time that they expelled the Romans, and confined the Britons before the coming of the Danes, and ſo, long before the Norman conqueſt, proceeds to inform us, that the records of this family before King John's time are not ſo well preſerved: but ſince that there are very good evidences in the hands of the then Lord Viſcount Fairfax, that they have ſucceeded lineally Lords of the manor of Walton for nineteen or twenty generations, near five hundred years, anno 1660. Accordingly the pedigree begins with Richard Fairfax, from whom deſcended William Fairfax, who lived in the time of King John and Henry III, whoſe deſcendant, after nine generations, was another Richard Fairfax, father to Sir Guy Fairfax, his third ſon, Knt. Judge of the King's bench, who died anno 1495, leaving a ſon, William Fairfax, a Judge, who died 6 Henry VIII. having married Elizabeth, ſiſter to the firſt Earl of Rutland (15). Beſides William the eldeſt, Sir Guy had other ſons, viz. Thomas, a Serjeant at Law, as alſo Guy and Nicholas; but no mention is made of any of their marriages in this pedigree, a defect which muſt be ſupplied from Mr Brian Fairfax in the text above. This William's grandſon, Sir Thomas Fairfax of Denton, was father to the Lord Fairfax, Baron of Cameron, whoſe ſon Ferdinand, Lord Fairfax, was father to the General (16), who leaving no male iſſue, the title came to his paternal uncle Henry, whoſe grandſon Thomas, Lord Fairfax, was living and unmarried in 1712; in which year alſo was living and unmarried, Brian Fairfax, Eſq; ſon to Brian Fairfax, Eſq; the writer of the Memoirs of the Duke of Buckingham, who was ſecond ſon to the General's paternal uncle Henry, Lord Fairfax. He died in 1711.

(15) Her mother was Dutcheſs of Exeter, ſiſter to Edward IV.

(16) The General was ſprung from a younger branch of his family, the deſcendant of the elder branch being Thomas Lord Viſcount Fairfax of Emely, whoſe great grandſon dying an infant, this title came to Thomas's ſecond ſon, and upon his death, without male iſſue, the title came to the grandſon of Thomas's third ſon, Charles Viſcount Fairfax, who died in 1719.

not made his peace with Cromwell, who would have forbid the banns if he had known of his coming over. Cromwell had a greater ſhare of his eſtate (‖), had daughters to marry, and would not have liked ſuch a conjunction of Mars and Mercury as was in this alliance. They were married Sept. 7, 1657 (p), at Nun-Appleton, ſix miles from York, a new and noble houſe built by Lord Fairfax, and where he kept as noble hoſpitality (q). When Cromwell heard of it, he reſted not till he had him in the Tower, and would have brought him to Tower-hill had he lived a fortnight longer. The Duke had liberty given him to be at York houſe with his Lady; but going to Cobham to ſee his ſiſter (r), he was taken and ſent to the Tower on the 24th of Auguſt, 1658. This ſo angred Lord Fairfax, that he went to Whitehall to the Protector, and expoſtulated the caſe ſo as it put him into a great paſſion, turning abruptly from him in the gallery at Whitehall, cocking his hat and throwing his cloak under his arm, as he uſed to do when he was angry [G]. After the death of Oliver, the Duke had leave to be a priſoner in Windſor-caſtle, where his friend Mr Abraham Cowley was his conſtant companion. He continued till the 29th of July, 1659, when Richard Cromwell having abdicated, the Duke's liberty came of courſe, on his giving ſecurity to be faithful to the government. This was the happieſt time of all his Grace's life, when he went to his father-in-law's houſe at Appleton, and there lived orderly and decently with his own wife, where he neither wanted, nor ſo abounded as to be tempted to any ſort of extravagance (s), as he was after, when he came into the poſſeſſion of his whole eſtate. Lord Fairfax was much pleaſed with his company, and eſpecially to ſee him ſo conformable to the order and good government of the family. If they had any plots together, they were to the beſt purpoſes, the reſtoration of the royal family [H]. The Duke had given ſufficient proofs of his loyalty, and Lord Fairfax of his affection, and deſire to ſee that happy event, and now was the time of compaſſing it. General Monk in Scotland declared againſt Lambert, who marched againſt him with a ſtrong body of horſe. Lord Fairfax, and the Duke with him, declared for Monk in Yorkſhire; but the Duke was obliged to withdraw, becauſe his preſence gave a jealouſy of the deſign to bring in the King (t), which it was too ſoon yet to avow [I]. His Majeſty's reſtoration reſtored the Duke to his eſtate (u), but to ſuch a train of expence with it, as brought him acquainted with bankers and ſcriveners, that infeſted it with the gangrene of uſury, from which it never recovered. At the King's reſtoration no ſubject appeared in greater ſplendor. None kept greater hoſpitality than he did at Wallingford houſe [K], eſpecially for the French nobility that came over, that engaged him in play, which had he continued, his eſtate had not laſted ſo long as it did; but he reſolved to give it over, and kept his reſolution ever afterwards. He was moderate in all his expences, his ſtable, table, laboratory: but all the King's favours to him were occaſions of great expence (w). He was made one of the Lords of the Bedchamber, and ſworn of the Privy Council preſently after the Reſtoration (x). Theſe were followed

(17) Memoirs, P. 30.

[H] The reſtoration of the royal family.] It was a maxim of my Lord Fairfax in politics, that the old veteran army, which he had commanded, was not to be beaten by any new raiſed force in England, and that the King's friends ſhewed more affection than diſcretion in their plots to reſtore him, while they were united (18); and that this old army would never be beaten but by itſelf, as the event ſhewed, when Lambert and Monk divided them. But the moſt fatal influence of this opinion in my Lord Fairfax was the night before the 30th of January, when ſome of his friends propoſed to him to attempt the next day to reſcue the King, telling him, that twenty thouſand men were ready to join him: he ſaid he was ready to venture his own life, but not the lives of others, againſt the army now united againſt them.

(18) This was confirmed by the inſurrection of Sir George Booth, which Lambert, with a brigade of this old army, did ſo eaſily ſuppreſs, the ſucceſs whereof inſpired him with the ambition of imitating Cromwell in diſſolving the parliament, and making himſelf Protector. Gen. Hiſtory of England.

[I] It was too ſoon to own the deſign.] The matter was concerted between Fairfax and Monk before the latter marched out of Scotland, whither Dr Brian Fairfax (afterwards Secretary to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury) was diſpatched to him from Lord Fairfax the General, and there concluded that great tranſaction about the reſtoration of our liberties, with ſuch privacy, that Mr Fairfax never ſaw Scotland, though the matter was tranſacted there. This curious anecdote is preſerved in the Diary of Mr Ralph Thoreſby, the eminent Antiquary of Leeds, whoſe father, upon Fairfax's declaration for a free parliament, joined him, among others, with a large body of men at Marſton Moor, for which, as he had been in the parliament ſervice under the General before, he was cenſured by ſome perſons as acting now inconſiſtently. Whereupon, by way of defence, he made the following Dodecaſtick:

If to be modeſt in all revolutions,
And to refuſe to act in our confuſions;
If to condole the ſad fate of the nation,
And help towards the King's reſtoration;
If ſwearing the allegiance chearfully,
And daily appearing for his Majeſty;
If wiſhing all the forces good ſucceſs
Againſt all ſorts of foes: And to expreſs
Much joy for victory all appointed times:
If theſe, I ſay, ſhall be accounted crimes,
Then let me bear the blame; if otherwiſe,
Let hanging be the falſe informer's prize (19).

Upon this appearance of Fairfax at Marſton Moor, he was joined by Lambert's forces at Newcaſtle, who deſerted him. Whereupon Fairfax took poſſeſſion of York, and kept a correſpondence with Monk. What was the iſſue is well known (20), and was remembered by our Duke, who, in an expoſtulatory letter to King Charles ſome years after, has theſe words: 'As to 'your Majeſty's return to England, I may juſtly pretend 'to ſome ſhare, ſince, without my Lord Fairfax's en'gaging in Yorkſhire, Lambert's army had never quit'ted him, nor the Duke of Albemarle marched out of 'Scotland (21).'

(20) The General preſented a fine horſe of his own breeding to the King, on which his Majeſty rode at his coronation. He alſo made ſome verſes upon the occaſion, which will be inſerted under the additions to his article in the Appendix.

[K] He lived at Wallingford houſe.] When he firſt began to ſettle his family, he deſired his old friends, Cowley and Clifford, to recommend to him a domeſtic Chaplain. They knew how hard it was to pleaſe him; he muſt be a man of learning, wit, good nature, good manners, a graceful perſon, and decent behaviour. They found one to their own mind and to his (22), whom he valued as a friend and loved as a companion, who lived to be an ornament to the age among thoſe of the higheſt order. He brought the Duke acquainted with another excellent perſon, whoſe friendſhip and converſation he much coveted if he could have more of it, who afterwards attained to the higheſt dignity in the church; and likewiſe with a Lawyer, as eminent in his profeſſion. So that his father was not more happy in the choice of a few friends, than he was if he had followed their advice. He ſaw and approved the beſt; but too often did deteriora ſequi, follow the worſt (23).

firſt by the Lord-Lieutenancy of Yorkſhire, and then by the place of Maſter of Horſe to his Majeſty (y); the firſt of which coſt him more than it did all that ſucceeded him, and the laſt coſt him 20000l. to the Duke of Albemarle (z). This is not mentioned as any excuſe for his ingratitude to his Royal Maſter, which indeed will admit of none. Who would have then thought that his Grace was ſecretly engaged in rebellious deſigns againſt the King [L] ſo early as the year 1662? Yet it is notorious, that he ſuffered himſelf to be led away by the ſame ſpirit of faction ſo far, that in 1666 he found it neceſſary to abſcond, in order to avoid a moſt juſt proſecution. He was removed from all his places on the 25th of February that year, and a Serjeant at Arms was ſent, by expreſs order from his Majeſty, to take him up; but this proving ineffectual (aa), a proclamation was iſſued out on the 8th of March, requiring his appearance, and ſurrender of himſelf by a certain day. In compliance to this proclamation he ſurrendered himſelf, made his ſubmiſſion, and, through an almoſt unparalleled inſtance of kindneſs, he was received into favour by the good-natured Charles, who reſtored him alſo to his place in the Bed-chamber, and even to his ſeat at the Council-board, Sept. 23 the following year, 1667; and the ſame year he found himſelf ſufficiently able to overſet and ruin his great rival in the Monarch's affections, the Earl of Clarendon (bb). After this, no wonder that we find him at the head of the Cabinet Council, conſtituted in 1670, which was generally nicknamed the Cabal (cc), and inveſted with all the power of a prime miniſter. In Auguſt this year he went Ambaſſador to France, in order to break the famous triple alliance [M], which had been the boaſt of [L] He abſconded on account of ſome ſeditious practices.] The King's happy reſtoration may juſtly be ſtiled the æra of the Duke's unhappineſs, ſince from that period commenced the ruin both of his fame and fortune. It appears that he had joined with Peter Talbot, Confeſſor to her Majeſty, in inflaming the minds of the Diſſenters as early as the year 1662, and had ſome time before engaged in an acquaintance with one Dr Heydon, a noted impoſtor, and reputed Conjurer among the people. This man, juſt before the receſs of the parliament in 1666, being taken up for treaſonable practices, for ſowing ſedition in the navy, and engaging perſons in a conſpiracy to ſeize the Tower, an information was made againſt the Duke by ſome perſons to whom the conjurer unboſomed himſelf, and who had been employed by him to carry letters to the Duke. Heydon pretended to have been in all the Duke's ſecrets for near four years paſt, and ſaid that he had been all that time deſigning againſt the King and his government. That his Grace thought the preſent ſeaſon favourable for the execution of his deſign, and had his agents at work in the navy and in the kingdom, to ripen the general diſcontents of the people, and diſpoſe them to action; that, ſince the Duke came out of the Tower (24), he had been importuned by him to head the firſt party he could get together, and engage in an inſurrection, the Duke declaring his readineſs to appear, and join in the undertaking as ſoon as the affair was begun. This Doctor pretended to great ſkill in Aſtrology; but had loſt much of his fame by a prediction of the hanging of Oliver, made to his ſon Richard and Thurloe, who came to him for the calculation of nativities, diſguiſed in the garb of diſtreſſed cavaliers. He was for that impriſoned and confined ſixteen months, whilſt Cromwell outlived the prediction near four years. However, the Duke, who had imbibed an opinion of the art (25), as well to gratify his own humour as to flatter the Aſtrologer, put him upon caſting the King's nativity, which was condemned by a ſtatute. The Duke had employed this fellow, among others, to incite the ſeamen to mutiny; and had given money to other rogues to go about the country in ſailors jackets begging, and exclaiming for want of pay, whilſt the people, oppreſſed with taxes, were cheated of their money by the great officers of the Crown. The King was highly incenſed at him for his conduct in the late ſeſſions, and infuſing the ſpirit into the Commons which had been ſo much to the detriment of the public ſervice: He could not forbear expreſſing himſelf with more bitterneſs againſt the Duke than ever dropped from him upon ſcarcely any other occaſion. When he was ſollicited in his behalf, he frankly ſaid, that the Duke had been the cauſe of the continuance of the war; for the Dutch would have made an early and very low ſubmiſſion, had the parliament purſued their firſt vigorous vote of ſupplying him; but the Duke's cabals had leſſened his intereſt both abroad and at home with regard to the ſupport of the war (26). What it was that provoked the Duke to carry his reſentment to ſuch a pitch as is utterly inexcuſable is not certainly known. Mr Carte thinks it probable the ill humour might be firſt engendered by his being denied the poſt of Preſident of the North; which, if true, is certainly an aggravation of his fault, ſince that poſt and court had been very juſtly aboliſhed in the time of King Charles I. ſo that the revival of it would undoubtedly have created a general uneaſineſs, and muſt have been particularly oppoſed by the Earl of Clarendon, who had ſo great a hand in procuring the abolition (27). Let me therefore add further, that as the diſappointment muſt more than probably have been imputed to the Earl by his Grace, ſo it was a further incentive to revenge it upon that miniſter. Accordingly, preſently after his Grace was taken into his Majeſty's favour, we find him engaged in perſecuting the Earl with ſuch inveterate malice, as drove him to ſeek his refuge in baniſhment.

(24) He pretended to have been put there for ſpeaking in parliament for the pay of the fleet, and for eaſing the people in their taxes.

(25) This art, as vain as it is, was in great vogue in France, when the Duke paſſed ſome years of his life there before the Reſtoration. See the Hiſtory of that Kingdom.

[M] He went Ambaſſador to France.] Mr Wood tells us (28) that the French monarch liked his perſon and errand ſo well, that he entertained him very nobly for ſeveral days together, and in concluſion gave a ſword and belt ſet with diamonds to the value of forty thouſand piſtoles; and Monſ. de Verville aſſures us, 'the Moſt 'Chriſtian King ſhewed him a greater reſpect than ever 'any foreign Ambaſſador was known to receive. As he 'knew him, continues the Frenchman, to be un homme 'de plaiſir, he entertained him accordingly. Nothing 'could be ſo welcome to the court of Verſailles as the 'meſſage he came about; for which reaſon a regale 'was prepared for him, that might have befitted the 'magnificence of the Roman Emperors, when Rome 'flouriſhed in its utmoſt grandeur (29).' This account is likewiſe confirmed by the Duke himſelf in the following letter to the Lord Arlington, then principal Secretary of State, dated St Germains, Auguſt 15, 1670.

Whatever expence the Grand Monarque might be at in preſents and entertainments to our Ambaſſador, his friend Mr Fairfax intimates, that theſe were turned into

In 1671 he was inſtalled, on the 7th of June, Chancellor of the Univerſity of Cambridge, and he entertained that learned body nobly at York-houſe, where his father had done it on the ſame occaſion forty years before (ee). into ſo many occaſions of an almoſt equal expence to the Duke (30), who was now in the higheſt ſpirits, as appears from the next letter to Lord Arlington, which furniſhes a glaring inſtance of that foible of vanity, which has been deſervedly laid to his charge. It is dated Auguſt 17, from the ſame place as the preceding, and runs in theſe terms:

'My Lord,

'I have nothing to add to what I wrote laſt, but that I am every day convinced of the happy conjuncture we have at preſent in our hands of any conditions from this court that we can in reaſon demand (31). The King of France is ſo mightily taken with the diſcourſes I make to him of his greatneſs by land, that he talks to me twenty times a day; all the Courtiers here wonder at it, and I am very glad of it, and am very much,

'My Lord,

'Your Lordſhip's moſt humble

'And moſt faithful Servant,

'Buckingham (32).'

But notwithſtanding theſe vaunting letters, that he could obtain any thing from the French King, it is certain the Grand Monarque, by tickling his vanity, obtained every thing that he propoſed, and the Ambaſſador conſented to the French fleets coming into our ſeas and harbours, which afterwards improved their mariners, and learnt them the way of fighting at ſea.

[N] The principal author of the aſſault upon the Duke of Ormond.] Mr Carte, having taken notice of the general opinion, that Blood was put upon this attempt by the Duke, to which he joins the Dutcheſs of Cleveland. They both, continues he, hated the Duke of Ormond mortally, and were powerful advocates to ſollicit Blood's pardon (33). The reaſon aſſigned by the criminal for his attempt was conſidered as a meer excuſe (34); for his Grace had done nothing particularly againſt him more than againſt others concerned with him in the ſame conſpiracy, and put into the ſame proclamation. If Blood's eſtate at Sarſley was forfeited for his treaſon, and, upon his attainder, granted by his Majeſty to Captain Toby Barnes; or if his accomplices were executed after a full conviction; all this was done in the courſe of government, and muſt have been done by any other Lord Lieutenant as well as the Duke of Ormond. Blood knew very well his own guilt, and had no reaſon to reſent any thing in this proceeding of his Grace; nor do acts, merely miniſterial, uſe to produce, in any, ſuch reſentments as cannot be ſatisfied without the aſſaſſination of a miniſter, who, in the diſcharge of his duty, and the truſt repoſed in him by his Prince, could not have ſpared his own father in the like caſe (35). Mr Carte then proceeds to give the direct reaſons for laying the deſign upon the Duke, which are, firſt, that it ſuited him better than any other perſon, as being the moſt profligate man of the age, and capable of any iniquity, however mean or enormous. That all the arts or ſuggeſtions, which he or his inſtruments could uſe, had not worked his Grace ſo much out of the King's good opinion and favour, but that his Majeſty ſtill gave him, upon occaſion, marks of his eſteem and confidence. The Duke had not, by the reſentment which diſgraced miniſters are apt to ſhew in their conduct, given the finiſhing ſtroke to his credit with the King, which they had begun by removing him from the government of Ireland. He might be again employed to defeat the meaſures of Buckingham and his cabal, to which he was in the mean time a conſiderable reſtraint. It was undoubtedly Buckingham's intereſt to have Ormond diſpatched out of the way. That it was not long before this attempt of Blood, that Buckingham and ſome of his friends had given out, that the Earls of Clarendon and Oſſory had ſet on two perſons to murder him (36); that theſe two perſons were poiſoned, and before their death owned the ſubornation. It would be impertinent to offer to vindicate thoſe two honourable noblemen from a charge which no man on earth could poſſibly believe: but to what purpoſe could ſuch a calumny be invented and ſpread, unleſs to prepare the world to receive an apology for another aſſaſſination (in caſe the true author ſhould be diſcovered) as if it were perpetrated purely in revenge for the like intended againſt himſelf, or made neceſſary for his own defence. No body does odious things but for ſome end or other of a piece with the means which they make uſe of to bring it about. The Duke of Buckingham was not ſo ſenſeleſs a mortal, or knew men ſo little, as to believe this ſtory, which he took care to have publiſhed; or if he did, as mankind judge of others by themſelves, he could not ſuſpect theſe men of virtue and honour of ſuch a deſign, without being capable of it himſelf (37). Here we ſee this writer has accumulated no leſs than nine reaſons to induce a belief of the Duke's guilt; yet they are all of them manifeſtly too general to fix the charge abſolutely upon him; which indeed is ſuggeſted by the accuſer himſelf, where he ſays, it is not eaſy to find any other perſon to whoſe character the deſign ſo well ſuited, or who could be under a temptation to it; not denying, that ſuch a perſon might be found, though not without ſome difficulty. But whatever defects may appear in the preceding reaſons, when conſidered ſeparately, they will queſtionleſs be allowed to be ſufficiently made up by the ſanction given to them in the tenth and laſt, where he tells us from good authority, that the Earl of Oſſory, not long after the affair, boldly charged it upon the Duke to his face, and that too before the King himſelf, with whom his Grace was then in high favour (38). At the ſame time this noble ſpirited ſon vowed, that if his father ſhould come to a violent end, he would piſtol his Grace as the author of it. All which, for any thing that appears, was quietly pocketed by the Duke, who had ſeveral other tranſactions with Blood afterwards, an account of which may be ſeen under Blood's article.

[O] The Rehearſal was firſt brought upon the ſtage in 1671.] It was firſt acted on the 7th of December this year, and ſeveral times printed in quarto; but the plays expoſed in it ſhew, that it was begun before the end of the year 1663, and finiſhed before the end of 1664; ſince it had been ſeveral times rehearſed, the players were perfect in their parts, and all things in readineſs for its acting, before the plague in 1665; which then prevented it, and ſo proved an occaſion of new modelling it. In the firſt form he called his Poet Bilboa, meaning Sir Robert Howard. But many plays coming out in heroic rhyme, which grew ſtill into greater vogue after Mr Dryden became Laureat in 1669, this put the Duke upon changing Bilboa for Bays. Mr Dryden, in revenge for the ridicule thrown upon him in this piece, expoſed the Duke under the name of Zimri, in his Abſalom and Achitophel. The lines are too well known to be tranſcribed here, though well worth the reader's peruſal: They are very ſevere; yet the Duke is thought to have expoſed Dryden ten times more ſeverely. Dryden, ſays Mr Walpole (39), is an admirable portrait, but Bayes an original creation. Dryden ſatirized Buckingham, Villiers in the Rehearſal made Dryden ſatirize himſelf. The ſame author obſerves it as an inſtance of aſtoniſhing quickneſs, that the Duke being preſent at one of theſe plays by Dryden, where a Lover ſays,

My wound is great, becauſe it is ſo ſmall:

His Grace cried out,

Then 'twould be greater, were it none at all.

And it may be further remarked, that had the Duke lived long enough, he would have had a like occaſion for diſplaying his wit in behalf of his friend Mr Cowley, in celebrating whoſe praiſes Mr Addiſon has this aſtoniſhing line:

He more had pleaſed us, had he pleaſed us leſs (40).

The Duke alſo wrote a poem of ſome conſiderable length, called Reflections upon Abſalom and Achitophel; all in verſe: And a Key to the Rehearſal.

[Q] He defended himſelf before the Houſe of Commons.] He ſpoke twice before the Houſe on this occaſion. On the firſt day, in anſwer to the charge of entering into the French meaſures, he avowed, that, if the triple league had any advantage in it, he had as great a hand therein as any man. This he repeated the next day, and then proceeds thus: That when, upon the inſtance of the French Ambaſſador, he was ſent into France afterwards to condole the death of the Dutcheſs of Orleans, he urged for the ſervice of the King, that the French ought not to endeavour to make themſelves conſiderable at ſea, of whom we had reaſon to be more jealous than of the Dutch, becauſe, ſays he, the French then would have power to conquer us. When I returned, I found all demonſtrations that the French had no ſuch thoughts, but that the King of England ſhould be maſter at ſea. At this time, continues he, Lord Shaftſbury and myſelf adviſed not to begin a war without the advice of the parliament. But this was not Lord Arlington's opinion. My next advice was, not to make uſe of French ſhips; half their value in money would have been more ſerviceable. I alledged they would be of no uſe to us, by reaſon of their want of experience in our ſeas, and there would be great danger in their learning the uſe of them; which advice my Lord Arlington oppoſed, notwithſtanding the King was ſo deſirous of avoiding a breach with France, that he ſent me to Dunkirk, and my Lord Arlington to Utrecht, where I ſtill endeavoured to get money inſtead of ſhips. At my firſt audience the King of France was willing to comply; but after ſome returns and letters from hence he was altered: but I make no reflections upon perſons, but barely ſtate matters of fact. He afterwards declares it was the advice of my Lord Shaftſbury, as well as his own, ſo to order the war, that the French ſhould deliver us ſome towns of their conqueſts into our hands, a uſeful precaution in former times; Lord Arlington would have no towns at all for one year. And here is the cauſe of the condition of our affairs. We ſet out a fleet, with intention to land men, in order to the taking of towns. The French army go on conquering and get all, and we get nothing, nor agree for any. 'Pray conſider who it was that was ſo often locked up with the French Ambaſſador. My ſpirit moves me to tell you, that, when we were to conſider what to do, we were to adviſe with the French Ambaſſador. I will not trouble you with reports; but pray look not upon me as a peer, but an honeſt Engliſh gentleman, who has ſuffered much for my love to my country. I had a regiment given me, which was Sir Edward Scot's; I gave him 1600l. for it. There is no Papiſt officer in it, nor Iriſhman. I ſhall ſay nothing of my extraordinary gains; I am ſure I have loſt as much eſtate as ſome men have gotten (and that is a big word;) I am honeſt; and when I appear otherwiſe, I deſire to die. I am not the man that has gotten by all this; yet after all this, if I am a grievance, I am the cheapeſt grievance this houſe ever had; and ſo I humbly aſk the pardon of this Houſe for the trouble I have given. The Speaker then proceeded to aſk him ſeveral queſtions, in his anſwer to which he ſuggeſts, that Lord Arlington had declared to him ſome advices againſt the liberties and privileges of the Houſe of Commons, and to alter the government. That if the Duke of Ormond had got, as appeared upon record, about 500000l. though Lord Arlington had not got ſo much, yet he had got a great deal. That the army was raiſed and Scomberg made General by Lord Arlington, and that the army was brought up to awe the debates and reſolutions of the Houſe of Commons by the ſame Lord's advice. He acknowledged that he joined with that Lord in making the French league, and that he himſelf made the firſt treaty with France, by which the triple alliance was broken. He alſo confeſſed, that he adviſed the declaration for indulging the Diſſenters, and that he joined Lord Arlington in making the ſecond treaty of Utrecht: But that he was utterly againſt attacking the Dutch Smyrna fleet before the war was proclaimed, that ſtep being taken purely by Lord Arlington's advice. And laſtly, that both himſelf and Lord Shaftſbury were for adviſing with the Parliament before the [Dutch] war begun, and averſe to the prorogation which followed it (42).

(42) By this defence the Duke eſcaped any further proſecution. The Earl of Arlington, who was examined by the Houſe on the ſame occaſion, was impeached by them. Salmon's Chron. Hiſt. under this year 1673. The ſpeech is printed in his Grace's works, Vol. I, Edit. 1704.

[R] He oppoſed the bill to prevent the danger that may ariſe from perſons diſaffected to the government.] In this bill was inſerted the Teſt, by which, beſides the oaths required of Magiſtrates in corporations, viz. I A. B. do declare, that it is not lawful, upon any pretence whatſoever, to take up arms againſt the King, there was added the following, I A. B. do ſwear, that I will not endeavour an alteration of the Proteſtant religion eſtabliſhed by law in the church of England, nor will I endeavour any alteration in the government of the kingdom in church or ſtate as it is by law eſtabliſhed. This was propoſed to be taken by all who enjoyed any beneficial offices, eccleſiaſtical, civil, or military, and by all Privy Counſellors, Juſtices of the peace, and both houſes of parliament. The Court party eſpouſed the bill very vehemently, and it was oppoſed as vehemently by the Country party, who looked upon it as a project to divide the Proteſtants, and to ſtrengthen the Popiſh party. It was debated in paragraphs for ſeventeen days ſucceſſively, the Lords that oppoſed it alledging, that it was inconſiſtent with itſelf and hurtful to the conſtitution of the kingdom. The chief ſpeakers for it were the Lord Treaſurer Danby and the Lord Keeper Finch, with the Biſhops Morley and Ward. Thoſe on the other ſide were the Lords Halifax and Holles, the Earls of Saliſbury and Shaftſbury, and the Duke of Buckingham; theſe with the Marquis of Wincheſter, nine Earls and ſeven Barons, entered their proteſt againſt it, 'conceiving, that any 'bill which impoſeth an oath upon the peers, with a 'penalty, as this doth, that upon refuſal of that oath 'they ſhall be made incapable of ſitting and voting in 'their houſe, as it is a thing unprecedented in former 'times, ſo it is, in their opinion, the higheſt invaſion 'of the liberties and privileges of the peerage that 'poſſibly may be, and moſt deſtructive of the freedom 'which they ought to enjoy as members of parliament: 'becauſe the privileges of ſitting and voting in parliament is an honour they have by birth, and a right ſo 'inherent in them, as that nothing can take away but 'what following he brought a bill into the House of Lords for tolerating the Dissenters (ii), and was appointed one of the managers in a conference between the two Houses of Parliament upon the point of the jurisdiction of the upper house (kk). In order to check the heat and animosities occasioned by this dispute, his Majesty, in November this year, prorogued the parliament till Feb. 15, 1676-7, which being upwards of a year, the Duke made a speech on that day, to shew, that, in this prorogation, his Majesty had exceeded the bounds of the prerogative [S]; and persisting in defence of this assertion, the next day he was committed to the Tower by the House of Lords (ll): but, upon a petition to the King, he was discharged thence in May following. After this he joined in opposition to the court upon the breaking out of the Popish plot, and was warm in prosecuting all those who were concerned therein. In 1680, having sold Wallingford house, he purchased a house at Dowgate, and resided there, joining with the Earl of Shaftsbury in raising tumults and disturbances in the city against the administration (mm). 'what by the law of the land must withal take away 'their lives, and corrupt their blood.' And when the bill was committed, they got in this proviso, That it should be no hindrance to their free speaking and voting in parliament (43). Whatever patriotism there might be in opposing this bill by others, it is too notorious that Villiers had no title to any share of that merit. He seems indeed in this, as in other parts of his political conduct at this time, to have acted the mean part of a second to Shaftsbury (44). Yet so much may be alledged in his behalf, that this opposition was of a piece, and consistent with his avowed espousal of the Dissenters, and indeed a consequence of it; a part of his conduct surely somewhat more than excusable, on account of the respect and gratitude which he owed to the memory of his father-in-law Fairfax, and which he always preserved, and had given a noble testimony of it in a Pindaric ode on his death a few years before (45).

[S] His speech to prove the parliament dissolved.] As this is an essential point in the constitution, it will be worth while to see the Duke's way of arguing thereupon. His proofs are drawn from two statutes of Edward III. (46): The words of the first being, Item, It is accorded, that a parliament shall be holden every year once, and more often, if need be, which is explained and confirmed in the other. Item, For maintenance of these articles and statutes, and the redress of divers mischiefs and grievances which daily happen, a parliament shall be holden every year, as at other time was ordained by another statute. He then proceeds to observe, that these statutes were not repealed by either of the bills for a triennial parliament, which passed in this and the preceding reign; 'Whence, continues he, the whole matter is reduced 'to this short dilemma; either the Kings of England 'are bound by the acts abovementioned of Edward III. 'or else the whole government of England by parliaments and by the law above is absolutely at an end. 'For a power to invalidate, by an order of the King, 'an act made for the maintenance of Magna Charta, 'implies a power, by a like order, to invalidate Magna 'Charta itself; and then the King is absolute, and may 'do what he pleases with our estates, lives, and liberties. And yet this power must be allowed him, or 'else we that sit here this day cannot act as a parliament. 'For as to the proclamation, pray, my Lords, is that 'of more force than a prorogation; or if a thing that 'hath been ordered the first time be not valid, doth the 'ordering it a second time make it good in law; I have 'heard indeed that two negatives make an affirmative, 'but I never heard before that two nothings ever made 'any thing.—The laws have reposed so great a trust 'and so great a power in the hands of a parliament, 'that every circumstance relating to the manner of their 'electing, meeting, and proceeding, is looked after 'with the nicest circumspection imaginable. For this 'reason the King's writs about the summons of parliament are to be issued out verbatim according to the 'form prescribed by the law, or else that parliament is 'void and null: For the same reason, if a parliament, 'summoned by the King's writ, do not meet the very 'same day that it is summoned to meet upon, that parliament is void and null: And, by the same reason, 'if parliaments be not legally adjourned de die in diem, 'those parliaments must be also void and null. He then 'proceeds to answer the objections, wherein he observes, 'that though the King's power of prorogation is not 'taken away by the statute of Edward III yet it is certainly limited to be within a year.' In answer to the argument, that if that prorogation be null and void, then things are just as they were before, and therefore the parliament is still in being. 'My Lords, says he, 'I confess there would be some weight in this but for 'one thing, which is, that not one word of it is true. 'For if, when the King had prorogued us, we had 'taken no notice of the prorogation, but had gone on 'like a parliament, and had adjourned ourselves de die 'in diem, then I confess things had been just as they 'were before; but since upon the prorogation we went 'away, and took no care of ourselves for our meeting 'again, if we cannot meet and act by virtue of that 'prorogation, there is an impossibility of our meeting 'and acting any other way. One may as properly say, 'that a man who is killed by assault is still alive, because 'he is killed unlawfully, as that the parliament is still 'alive, because the prorogation is unlawful. The next 'argument that those are reduced to, who would maintain this to be yet a parliament, is, that the parliament 'is prorogued sine die, and therefore the King may call 'them again by proclamation. In the first part of this 'proposition I shall not only agree with them, but also 'do them the favour to prove that it is so in the eye of 'the law, which I never heard they have yet done. 'For the statutes say, that a parliament shall be holden 'once within a year, and the prorogation having put 'them off till a day without the year, and consequently 'excepted against by the law, that day in the eye of 'the law is no day at all, that is, sine die: And the 'prorogation might as well have put them off till so 'many months after Doom's day; and then I think no 'body would have doubted but that would have been 'a very sufficient dissolution. In confirmation of this 'he observes, that the usual way of dissolving parliaments formerly was, the King desired them to go home 'till he sent for them again, which is a dismission sine 'die.' Lastly, in answer to the Precedent in Queen Elizabeth's time, when the parliament was once prorogued three days beyond a year, he observes it was done in a hurry, in the time of a very great plague; the mistake was not attended to then, nor taken notice of afterwards, otherwise than that Queen Elizabeth would have given a lawful remedy. But this supposition of the Duke's is a little too hard to be digested. It is certainly much more probable, that, in this prorogation, the necessity of the occasion [the plague] was considered, which put the case properly within the prerogative. And it is well known, that Queen Elizabeth exerted the prerogative oftener than any of her successors, but without giving any offence or raising any jealousies, for this reason, because in every instance the equity and justice of the proceeding was notoriously evident. Whence our Duke's conclusion seems to be too hasty, in saying, that we must either allow the statutes made in that particular session in Queen Elizabeth's time to be void, or lay it down for a maxim, that the Kings of England, by a particular order of theirs, have power to break all the laws of England when they please. He concludes with observing, that it is no disrespect to his Majesty to say he is bound up by the laws; that, if nothing of all he had urged were true, they should not find any honourable excuse for acting again with the House of Commons; and that nothing could be more dangerous than the making laws by an assembly whose power is doubtful, and therefore, says he, it would be in us inexcusable if we should overlook this danger, since there is for it so easy a remedy, which the law requires, and which all the nation longs for, that is, The calling of a new parliament (47).

(46) Having called them the ancient statutes of the realm, he observes by the way, that statutes are not like women, for they are not one jot the worse for being old.

(47) This speech is also printed in his works, as before.

To this there coming out preſently, in 4to, A ſhort anſwer to the Duke of Buckingham his Grace's paper concerning religion, toleration, and liberty of conſcience, the Duke wrote a reply in 4to, entitled, The Duke of Buckingham his Grace's letter to the unknown author of the paper, entitled, A ſhort anſwer. Immediately after which there was publiſhed, A reply to his Grace the Duke of Buckingham's letter to the Author of a paper, entitled, A ſhort anſwer to his Grace's diſcourſe concerning religion, in folio. At the death of King Charles, falling into an ill ſtate of health (oo), he went into the country to his own manor of Helmeſley in Yorkſhire. King Charles was his beſt friend; he loved him, and excuſed his faults; he was not ſo ſure of his ſucceſſor, whoſe emiſſary father Fitzgerald, ſent to convert him in his ſickneſs, he had ſo ſhamefully foiled by an inimitable turn of wit (pp). During this retirement he wrote a piece, which was publiſhed in 1687, entitled, A Demonſtration of the Deity. In the country he generally paſſed his time in hunting and entertaining his friends, which he did a fortnight before his death as pleaſantly and hoſpitably as ever he did in his life. But one day, after fox-hunting, he took cold by ſitting on the cold ground, which threw him into an ague and fever that carried him off, after three days ſickneſs, at a tenant's houſe, Kirkby-moor-ſide, a lordſhip of his own near Helmeſley, April 16, 1688, ætat. 60 (qq). The day before his death he ſent to his old ſervant Mr Brian Fairfax, to deſire him to provide him a bed at his houſe at Biſhop-hill in York; but the next morning the ſame man returned with the news that his life was deſpaired of. Mr Fairfax went poſt, but before he got to him he was ſpeechleſs. The Earl of Arran, ſon to Duke Hamilton, was with him; who, hearing he was ſick, viſited him in his way to Scotland. When Mr Fairfax came, the Duke knew him, looked earneſtly at him, but could not ſpeak. Mr Fairfax aſked a gentleman there preſent, a Juſtice of peace, and a worthy diſcreet man in the neighbourhood, what he had ſaid or done before he became ſpeechleſs; who told him that ſome queſtions had been aſked him about his eſtate; to which he gave no anſwer. Then he was admoniſhed of the danger he was in, which he ſeemed not to apprehend: he was aſked if he would have the miniſter of the pariſh ſent for to pray with him; to which he gave no anſwer; which made another queſtion be aſked, if he would have a Popiſh Prieſt; to which he anſwered with great vehemence, no, no! repeating the words he would have nothing to do with them. Then the aforeſaid gentleman, Mr Gibſon, aſked him again if he would have the miniſter ſent for; and he calmly anſwered, yes, pray ſend for him. This was in common way, againſt the eternity of the world from its mutability, the author of the ſhort anſwer obſerves, that, had he been to treat with Atheiſts, he would have urged to them, that it is impoſſible this world ſhould be eternal, becauſe then it muſt alſo be inviſible. To which the Duke replies thus (48): 'My nameleſs, angry, harmleſs humble Servant, I have twice read over, 'with a great deal of patience, a paper of yours, 'which you call An Anſwer to A Diſcourſe of mine: 'And to my confuſion muſt own, that I am not able 'to comprehend what part of my diſcourſe it is you 'do anſwer, nor in all yours what it is you mean. 'Having this confeſſion, you ought not to be offended 'at me if I cannot remember it neither. And yet 'there is one paſſage in it which I ſhall never forget, 'becauſe it does in a moſt extraordinary manner delight 'me: It is this ſhrewd convincing argument of yours, 'which you ſay, had you been to treat with Atheiſts, '&c. It is, I ſwear, a refined quaint kind of notion, 'which, to do you juſtice, I do verily believe is intirely 'your own. Yet, for all this, I cannot be abſolutely 'convinced, that I am now the ſame George Duke of 'Buckingham that I was forty years ago: And, to ſhew 'you I am in earneſt, I do here promiſe you, that if 'you do for me a favour leſs difficult, which is to make 'me the ſame George Duke of Buckingham I was but 'twenty years ago, I will (as poor a man as I am) give 'you a thouſand guineas for your pains, and that is 'ſomewhat more, I am afraid, than you will ever get 'by your writings.' Which the aforeſaid anonymous replier returns in theſe terms: 'But, not to be wholly 'contradictory to his Grace's opinion, as his Grace is 'pleaſed to expreſs his great difficulty of believing 'himſelf the ſame George Duke of B——— which 'he was twenty years ago, there indeed I muſt join 'with him, it being too apparently true, that his Grace 'has not been the ſame five years ago that he was 'twenty-five, which all men that have had the honour 'of knowing his Grace at Whitehall in 60, and at 'Dowgate, will juſtify for me.' In 1686 there came out A defence of the Duke, intitled A letter from Nevill Payne to a domeſtick of the Duke of Buckingham, upon occaſion of his Grace's diſcourſe concerning Toleration, which is exactly in the Duke's vein. He begins with declaring himſelf enraged to ſee ſo great a peer treated with ſo little reſpect, eſpecially in a public good, that may compoſe animoſities and prevent diſtractions. Entering then into the merits of the argument, he ſhews the anſwerer's falſe conceit, that Toleration is admitted no where but in commonwealths; and having obſerved that Caviniſts, Lutherans, &c. ſubſiſt in Poland and Germany together with Catholics, he enquires why the church of England will not admit competitors. The cauſe, ſays he, is viſible, The church of England is only a Court Invention, and their Miniſters are a ſort of eccleſiaſtical guard to the Prince. When Henry VIII. was firſt poſſeſſed by his ſcruples, like Numa conſulting with his goddeſs, he aſked advice of their oracle, which he knew would ſuit with his own opinion; and this made them acceptable, eſpecially when ſacrilege, that was no little game with our courtiers and gentry, countenanced the innovation. He then obſerves, that this turn produced a deluge of wild conceits in religion. While the Diſſenter contemns all forms of prayer as inſipid, and without edification; the Churchman, in anſwer, produceth authority and antiquity from Catholic authors. But when the Papiſt returns his own arguments againſt his novelty, then he turns fanatic, and believes no more than reaſon and ſenſe; which in different terms is the Quaker's light within, or the Preſbyterian's divine impulſe or illumination. Conſidering then that ſhe [the church of England] cannot ſubſiſt but by a regal power and aſſiſtance, ſhe cannot admit a Toleration, whereby her ſpecious pretences would be diſcovered. On the other hand he further obſerves, that a Prince, who will be engaged for her cauſe, muſt diſoblige the greateſt part of the nation. And therefore it cannot be for the ſecurity of the King to uphold a Court religion, becauſe his ſubjects will be always jealous of them both, ſince theſe are ready for their own intereſt and lucre to preach the Prince's will for Goſpel; as in my hearing, before Charles I. Dr Sheldon, the late Archbiſhop, upon the text of Samuel, Hoc eſt Domini regis—proved that Kings might take away any man's poſſeſſions. Beſides, it is impoſſible that any ſecurity can be to a Proteſtant King, becauſe the Diſſenters, being more numerous, will be always plotting his deſtruction, as they did to Charles I. and were near accompliſhing that of Charles II. How much better is it that things purely ſo be committed to them that are truly Eccleſiaſtics; wherein the Prince is freed from the vain ſcruples and pretenſions of his ſubjects in religion. This was perfectly a-la-mode de Cour, when an univerſal Toleration as is here recommended was then actually granted, and the King [James] had delivered himſelf up abſolutely to theſe true Eccleſiaſtics. Mr Nevill Payne therefore concludes with the following Eloge upon that Monarch: When the King gives the beſt example of piety, and the greateſt devotion, he ſhews us how much need we have of God's grace and mercy (49).

(48) Mr Walpole juſtly gives this the character of a ludicrous and very good anſwer. Catalogue of royal and noble authors, ubi ſupra.

the morning, and he died that night. The miniſter came and did the office enjoined by the church; the Duke devoutly attending it, and receiving the ſacrament, an hour after which he became ſpeechleſs; but appearing ſenſible, the prayers of the church were repeated by his bed-ſide, recommending him to the mercy of God through the merits of Jeſus Chriſt. Thus he died quietly in his bed, the fate of few of his predeceſſors in the title of Buckingham. His body was embalmed, and brought to Weſtminſter-abbey, and there laid in the vault, with his father and brothers, in Henry VIIth's chapel (rr). The world has been ſevere in cenſuring his faults and foibles [U], but not ſo juſt in noting his good qualities. This is well remarked by Mr Fairfax (ss), who has therefore thought proper to do him that juſtice. For his perſon, ſays this faithful friend, he was the glory of the age and of any court wherever he came; of a moſt graceful and charming mien and behaviour, a ſtrong, tall, and active body, all which gave a luſtre to the ornaments of his mind; of an admirable wit and excellent judgment; and had all other qualities of a gentleman. He was courteous and affable to all; of a compaſſionate nature, ready to forgive and forget injuries. What was ſaid of a great man in the court of Queen Elizabeth, that he uſed to vent his diſcontents at court by retiring from company and writing ſonnets, may be ſaid of him; but when he was provoked

[U] The world has been ſevere in cenſuring his faults and foibles.] In 1679 there came out a piece, intitled, The Litany of the Duke of B———, expoſing the moſt flagrant faults and follies in the courſe of his life. This moſt virulent foul-mouthed ſatire, containing ſeveral facts in the Duke's life, being very ſcarce, we ſhall preſent the Reader with it, relying upon his candor for the ſame apology as is conſtantly made for the Roman ſatiriſt Juvenal in the like caſe. It runs thus:

From a ſenſual, proud, atheiſtical life,
From arming our lacquies with piſtol and knife,
From murthering the huſband, and whoring the wife,
Libera nos Domine.

From going Ambaſſador only as Panders,
From rekilling dead Kings with monſtrous ſlanders,
From betraying the living in Scotland and Flanders,
Libera nos &c.

From a wild rambling no-where abode,
Without day or night, nor at home nor abroad,
From a Prince to unhorſe us in Dover road,
Libera nos &c.

From crowning the herſe of our babe of adultery,
By an infamous ſervant to a Lord of the prelacy,
Whom we got caſhiered for carnal arſery,
Libera nos &c.

From ſelling land of twice ten thouſand a year,
All ſpent no mortal can tell how or where,
And then reform kingdoms as a ſanctified Peer,
Libera nos &c.

From monſtrous ſucking till both tongues have bliſters,
From making our boaſts of giving three gliſters,
By giving of claps to three cheated ſiſters,
Libera nos &c.

From tranſpoſing of nature upon the Bum Gers,
On Keniſon acting both Venus and Mars,
From owning twenty other men's farce,
Libera nos &c.

From wretched paſquils on Shadwell and Dryden,
From caſting nativities with learned Heydon,
And caſting of dollars at Antwerp and Leyden,
Libera nos &c.

From trembling at ſea when not a gun roar'd,
And then ſteal aſhore by breaking our word,
With damm me if ever you catch me aboard,
Libera nos &c.

From being ſtill cheated by the ſame Undertakers,
By Levellers, Bawds, Saints, Chymiſts, and Quakers,
Who make us gold-finders, and themſelves gold-makers,
Libera nos &c.

From damning whatever we don't underſtand,
From purchaſing at Dowgate, and ſelling in the Strand,
Calling ſtreets by our name, when we have ſold the land (50), Libera nos &c.

From barring our own houſe to treat Scholars ill,
And then be unchancellor'd againſt our will,
Nought left of a College but our own College-hill,
Libera nos &c.

From judging of Judges in a ſenſeleſs ſpeech,
From following S—, that regaling leech,
Becauſe, being twins, both ſuck'd the ſame bitch,
Libera nos &c.

From mortally hating all thoſe that love us,
From mimical acting all thoſe above us,
Till the maſter at laſt is forc'd to remove us,
Libera nos &c.

From cringing to thoſe we ſcorn to condemn,
In hopes to be made the Citizens gem,
Who now ſcorn us more than e'er we did them,
Libera nos &c.

From ſneaking 'twixt Caſtle-yard and Vandeput,
From telling of tales when we have been at Rut,
And ramming three candles into one Lady's ſcut,
Libera nos &c.

From beginning an execrable traiterous health,
To deſtroy the parliament, King, and himſelf,
To be made Ducal Peer of a new Commonwealth,
Libera nos &c.

From changing old Friends for raſcally new ones,
From taking Wildman and Marvel for true ones,
From wearing green Ribbons 'gainſt him that gave blue ones, Libera nos &c.

From lodging at Court before we are ſent for,
For ſelling ſix palaces for leſs than they rent for,
And buying three hillocks (51) for three Kings of Brentford, Libera nos &c.

From learning new morals from Bedlam Sir Peyton,
Or truth and modeſty from Elwys Leyton,
From making our heirs to be Morris and Clayton,
Libera nos &c.

A late elegant writer obſerves, that the Duke's portrait has been drawn by four maſterly hands. Burnet has hewn it out with his rough chiſſel, Count Hamilton touched it with a ſlight delicacy, that finiſhes while it ſeems but to ſketch. Dryden catched the living likeneſs. Pope completed the hiſtorical reſemblance (52). But, however unſparingly cruel theſe may be in the deſign, they are all exceeded by this writer himſelf in the cruelty of the execution. 'When this extraordinary man, 'ſays he, with the figure and genius of Alcibiades, 'could equally charm the Preſbyterian Fairfax and diſſolute Charles, when he alike ridiculed that witty 'King and his ſolemn Chancellor; when he plotted 'the ruin of his country with a Cabal of bad miniſters, 'and, equally unprincipled, ſupported its cauſe with 'bad patriots, one laments that ſuch parts ſhould have 'been devoid of every virtue. But, when Alcibiades 'turns chymiſt, when he is a real bubble and a viſionary 'miſer, when ambition is but a frolic, when the worſt 'deſigns are for the vileſt ends, contempt extinguiſhes 'all reflection on his character (53).' This laſt thruſt is aimed to give his memory ſuch a mortal ſtab, as had been given to his father's life by Felton, upon whom we have a commendatory epitaph, aſcribed to the ſon, which though the Editor thinks (54), in favour of the Duke, could not be written by him, yet Mr Walpole declares he knows no principle the Duke had to prevent his being the author. Indeed, ſays he, it is more bombaſt than offenſive.

by the malice of ſome, and ingratitude of others, he might ſhew, that a good-natured man might have an ill-natured muſe. His charitable diſpoſition he ſeemed to inherit from his grandfather, Francis Earl of Rutland, who uſed every quarter-day at London to ſend his ſteward with bags of money to ſeveral priſons, to relieve priſoners and pay their debts, bidding them thank God, and pray for their benefactor, but not telling them who he was. The Duke, continues this writer, was a man of great courage. One inſtance of which was, that when a melancholy mad ſervant aſſaulted him with a drawn ſword in his hand, while he was at ſupper, he with a knife diſarmed him. The character which Sir Henry Wotton gives of his father might be ſaid of him: 'Among all the favourites which mine eyes have 'ſeen in diverſe courts and times, I never ſaw before a ſtrong heart and eminent condition, 'ſo clearly void of all pride and ſhocking arrogance, either in his face or in his faſhion.' It is to be wiſhed the reſt of his father's character had been as true of him; his diligence and application to buſineſs, and that he had left his few honeſt ſervants in as good fortune as reputation, who never wronged him in his eſtate, nor flattered him in his faults, and thought they eſcaped well in not being oppreſſed under the ruins of his fortune. His father had two crimes objected againſt him, which he was not guilty of; plurality of offices, and preferring his relations. The faults objected to him were, that he loved women and ſpent his eſtate. His eſtate was his own: He had often loſt it for the King, and might now be allowed to enjoy it himſelf. If he was ſui profuſus, he never was alieni appetens. If he was extravagant in ſpending, he was juſt in paying his debts, and at his death charged them on his eſtate, leaving much more than enough to pay them [W]. 'If he was a 'grievance, as he told the Houſe of Commons (tt), he was the cheapeſt to the public that 'ever was complained of.' He had no children by his Dutcheſs, nor heirs capable of inheriting his eſtate or title. His amours were too notorious to be concealed, and too ſcandalous to be juſtified by ſaying he was bred in the latitude of foreign climates, and now lived in a vicious age and court, where his accuſers of this crime were as guilty as himſelf. He lay under ſo ill a name for this, that whenever he was ſhut up in his chamber, as he loved to be neſcio quid meditans nugarum, or in his laboratory over the fumes of charcoal, it was ſaid to be with women; when a dirty chymiſt (*), a fox-hunter, a pretender to poetry or politicks, a rehearſal, ſhould entertain him, while a meſſenger to ſummon him to Council could not be admitted. This is true of him, that, of all the noiſe made of his loving women, he never had ſo much as a baſtard laid to his charge that he or any body elſe believed to be his own. Some pretended to love his perſon, but it was his eſtate which ſmarted for it. It is hard to tell by his expence (uu) which was his favourite pleaſure: I think his chymiſtry at home, and fox-hunting abroad. I will conclude his character with ſaying, that if human frailty will not excuſe theſe faults, let Chriſtian charity oblige us to hope, that as God gave him time, he gave him alſo the grace of true repentance. His wife Mary, Dutcheſs of Buckingham, was a moſt virtuous and pious Lady in a vicious age and court: If ſhe had any of the vanities, ſhe had certainly none of the vices of it. The Duke and ſhe lived lovingly and decently together; ſhe patiently bearing with thoſe faults in him which ſhe could not remedy. She ſurvived him many years, and died near St James's at Weſtminſter, and was buried in the vault of the family of the Villiers in Henry VIIth's chapel, anno 1705, ætat. 66 (ww). Moſt of the productions of the Duke's pen were collected and publiſhed, not many years after his deceaſe, in two volumes 8vo; the ſecond edition of which came out in 1704; and the third in 1715 [X]: And there is another edition now [1762] in the preſs.

(*) In 1673 his chymiſt was one Robert Bathurſt, an Iriſhman, a kinſman of Dr Ralph Bathurſt, ſome time Preſident of Trinity-college in Oxford. See the Doctor's article in the Appendix.

(tt) See remark [Z].

(uu) Among other unaccountable extravagancies, he fell into a new way of expence, in building in that ſort of architecture which Cicero calls infame ſubſtructiones; and himſelf, when his friends diſſuaded him from it, called it his Folly. Fairfax, p. 35.

(ww) Id. p. 39.

In the worſt Inn's worſt room, with mat half hung,
The floors of plaiſter, and the walls of dung;
On once a flock-bed, but repaired with ſtraw,
With tape-tied curtains never meant to draw;
The George and Garter dangling from that bed,
Where tawdry yellow ſtrove with dirty red,
Great VILLIERS lies—alaſs, how chang'd from him,
That life of pleaſure, and that ſoul of whim!
Gallant and gay in Cliveden's proud alcove,
The bower of wanton Shrewſbury, and love;
Or juſt as gay at Council, in a ring
Of mimick'd ſtateſmen and their merry King.
No wit to flatter left of all his ſtore!
No fool to laugh at, which he valued more.
There, victor of his health, of fortune, friends,
And fame, this Lord of uſeleſs thouſands ends.
His Grace's fate ſage Cutler could foreſee,
And well (he thought) adviſ'd him, Live like me.
As well his Grace replied, Like you Sir John!
That I can do when all I have is gone.
Reſolve me, Reaſon, which of theſe is worſe,
Want with a full or with an empty purſe (55).

We have already obſerved, that this excellent Poet frequently over-ſeaſoned his ſatires with gall (56). Whether in this inſtance it does not ſink into a libel waits the deciſion of Biſhop Warburton, the undertaker of this Poet's honeſt fame.

(56) Pope's article, rem. [AA].

[X] His works.] Theſe volumes are a Bookſeller's Miſcellany, containing various ſpeeches, poems, &c. The chief of thoſe which belong to his Grace have been mentioned in the courſe of this memoir, except An eſſay on human reaſon, addreſſed to Martin Clifford, Eſq; Five letters on election affairs, Ten little burleſque and ſatirical palms: In the ſecond volume. And in the firſt, Four poems by the Duke and Lord Rocheſter; upon nothing, a Seſſion of the Poets, a Satire on the follies of the men of the age, Timon, a ſatire on ſome new plays, and a poem, entitled, The loſt miſtreſs, a complaint againſt the Counteſs of ——, 1675. This was probably the Counteſs of Shrewſbury, whoſe Lord he killed in a duel on her account, and who is ſaid to have held the Duke's horſe, diſguiſed like a page, during the combat; to reward his proweſs in which, ſhe went to bed to him in the ſhirt ſtained with her huſband's blood. We have alſo, of the Duke's writing, A demonſtration of the Deity: As alſo Verſes on two lines of Mr Edward Howard, printed in the third part of Miſcellanies in 1693: And a Letter to Sir Thomas Oſborn. All mentioned by the Catalogue of royal and noble Authors. In the Gazetteer for Feb. 24, 1759, was inſerted the following challenge, ſaid to be ſent by his Grace ſometimes (57) to a young Lady on Valentine's day:

Brimfull of anger, not of love,
The Champion ſends his Foe One glove:

(57) In the London Magazine for that month the verſes are aſcribed to the late Dr B——y.

But I, that have a double ſhare
Of ſofter paſſion, ſend a pair.
Nor think it, deareſt Delia, cruel,
That I invite you to a duel;
Ready to meet you, face to face,
At any time, in any place;

Nor ſhall I leave you in the lurch,
Though you ſhould dare to fix the Church:
There come equipt with all your charms,
A ring and licence are my arms;
I will th'unequal conteſt try,
Reſolv'd to fight, though ſure to die.

P

USHER [JAMES], the pious and learned Archbiſhop of Armagh in Ireland, was born on the 4th of January, 1580, in the pariſh of St Nicholas in the city of Dublin, where his father, Mr Arnold Uſher, was one of the ſix Clerks in Chancery, a gentleman of a good eſtate and reputation, and deſcended of a very ancient family, which in England bore the name of Nevil, till the reign of Henry II, when it was changed by one of his anceſtors, who about the year 1185, paſſing with Prince [afterwards King] John in quality of Uſher into Ireland, ſettled there by the name of his office (a), and his deſcendents ſpreading into ſeveral branches, filled the moſt conſiderable poſts in and about Dublin for many ages (b), to the time of our Author, whoſe perſonal merit will appear in the ſequel to have reflected an honour upon his deſcent. He had excellent natural endowments, with a moſt tractable temper. The firſt ſteps of his education were diſtinguiſhed by ſome remarkable incidents. Having learned to read from two of his maternal aunts (c), who were both blind from their cradle. He had the good fortune to be prepared at the age of eight years, to be taken into a very good ſchool, opened at that time by two eminent ſcholars [A], ſent by James I, then King of Scotland, to keep up a correſpondence with the nobility and gentry about Dublin, in order to ſecure his intereſt in that country, in the view of his eventual ſucceſſion to the Crown of England. Under theſe maſters our young genius advanced ſo quick in the rudiments of claſſical learning, that the College of Dublin being compleated in 1593, he was found qualified to be then admitted, at the age of thirteen, the firſt ſcholar upon that foundation (d); the charter of which had been obtained from Queen Elizabeth by an uncle of his own name, and his predeceſſor in the ſee of Armagh [B]; and Mr James Hamilton, one

(a) This was a practice much uſed in thoſe early ages, to which no doubt the ambition of founding a family was the great motive.

(d) There were three admitted; but Uſher's name is ſtill ſtanding at the head of all in the College-Regiſter. Letter 240 in Parr's Collection. Sir James Ware ſays, they were admitted in this order, Walſh, Uſher, Lee.

[A] Two eminent ſcholars.] Their names were James Fullerton and James Hamilton, both young Scotch gentlemen. This employment was made uſe of for a colour; good ſchoolmaſters being then much wanted in Ireland. They were afterwards both knighted by King James; and the firſt being appointed of the bedchamber to his Majeſty, the other was at length created, by that King, Viſcount Chandebois. The Archbiſhop always recounted this as a remarkable inſtance of God's providence towards him (1).

[B] An uncle of his name, and his predeceſſor in the ſee of Armagh.] His name was Henry Uſher, he had been bred at Cambridge, from whence he went to Paris to compleat his education. And was at that time Archdeacon of Dublin, having been deputed before to Queen Elizabeth, upon an affair relating to St Patrick's church (2), which he managed with the ſame ſucceſs as he afterwards met with in this of the college. Henry Fitz-Simons (of whom hereafter) tells a ſtory, which muſt reſt upon his authority (3), that, when the Archbiſhop had ſpent a conſiderable time in writing a work againſt Cardinal Bellarmin, all his papers were forced away by his wife, who threw them into the fire, alledging, that the match was unequal between a man who, having a great family of children, was continually interrupted by his domeſtic affairs, and one who was entirely free from all earthly cares. Mr Bayle (4) has ſpent a long note to ſhew, that this Lady's argument, though plauſible in the theory, was not well grounded in fact and experience. This, I believe, would be thought meer trifling at this time of day, at leaſt in England, ſince it is nothing elſe than giving a liſt of all the beſt Proteſtant writers of our church, ſome of whom (as Hooker) have been as much exerciſed by their wives as Socrates. But Bayle (as is well known) frequently launches out into ſuch reaſonings chiefly for the ſake of ſome piece of wit, as here he concludes with obſerving, that Bellarmin had not ſo much leiſure as the Archbiſhop's lady imagined. 'Here 'follows, continues he, a paſſage I met with in a piece, 'publiſhed in 1625 (5). Cardinal Bellarmin, of pious 'memory, ſaid often to the moſt illuſtrious Cardinal 'Rochefoucault, 'I aſſure you, my Lord, that I am 'oppreſſed with people and viſits, and muſt needs con'feſs there are too many Chriſtians in the world. 'Monſignore veramente ci ſono troppo Chriſtiani al mondo.' But to return to the proper buſineſs of this remark, the foundation of Dublin-college; to ſollicit which our Archdeacon went to England in 1590, and returned to Dublin with the charter, dated March 30, 1592. He was promoted immediately from the archdeaconry, by a rare example, to the primacy in Auguſt, 1595, and died April 2, 1613, leaving a ſon, Robert Uſher, who being bred at Dublin-college, was firſt choſen Fellow, and afterwards, by the intereſt of his couſin James, unanimouſly elected Provoſt of the ſociety in 1629, whence he was advanced to the biſhoprick of Derry in 1634. But in the Iriſh rebellion, in 1641, retiring to England, he died there towards the latter end of the next year, at Bridgenorth in Shropſhire (6). This is related by Dr Thomas Smith, who likewiſe obſerves, that the Dublin-college was firſt founded by Alexander Bicknor, Archbiſhop of Dublin, in 1320, and that this foundation being intirely demoliſhed, the firſt motion in parliament for reſtoring it was made in 1569, by Dr James Uſher's father-in-law, James Stanyhurſt, Eſq; (7), who died at Dublin, Dec. 27, 1575, aged fifty-one years (8). So that our Archbiſhop had a double title to the favour mentioned in the text. His father-in-law had a ſon, named Richard, who, being a man of diſtinguiſhed learning, and much reſpected on that account by his nephew, our Archbiſhop, who held a correſpondence with him, deſerves ſome notice to be taken of him here. He was born in Dublin in 1547; and having been bred at ſchool under the famous Peter White (9), became a Commoner of Univerſity-college, Oxon. in 1563, where he wrote Commentaries on Porphyry at two years ſtanding. After taking the degree of A. B. he left the college, retired to London, became firſt a Student in Furnival's Inn, and afterwards in that of Lincoln, where ſpending ſome time in the ſtudy of the common law, he then returned to Ireland. But reſolving to change his religion, he went into the Low-countries, France, and elſewhere, being then a married man. Upon the death of his wife, he was made Chaplain to the Archduke of Auſtria, who gave him a handſome ſalary. He died at Bruſſels in 1618, with the character of an excellent Theologiſt, Grecian, Philoſopher, Hiſtorian, and Orator (10). He is the Author of the following pieces: 1ſt, Harmonia, ſive catena Dialectica in Porphyrianas conſtitutiones (11), Lond. 1570, fol. 2d, De rebus in Hibernia geſtis (12), lib. 4. one of his ſchoolmaſters, being at the ſame time made Senior Fellow of the Society, and a Profeſſor of Philoſophy, was appointed his tutor (e). In the beginning of his ſtudies he was particularly fond of poetry, and loſt too much time in diverſions (f); but was reclaimed by a paſſage he luckily met with in Cicero (g), which putting him upon the peruſal of Sleidan de quatuor Monarchiis: this gave him a ſtrong inclination to the ſtudy of hiſtory, which he proſecuted with an almoſt unexampled vigour. In this purſuit, beginning at fourteen years of age to make extracts from all the hiſtorical books he could meet with, he placed the facts in a chronological order for the aſſiſtance of his memory [C]. In the mean time, he did not neglect the neceſſary academical ſciences, and having made a ſuitable progreſs in logick and the Ariſtotelian philoſophy, he took the degree of A.B. in 1586 (b), and immediately applied himſelf to the ſtudy of divinity, chiefly upon the controverted points between the Roman Catholic and Reformed Churches, his country being then moſtly inclined to Popery. However, in 1598, he held the part of Reſpondent with great applauſe in the philoſophy act, that was performed in compliment to the Earl of Eſſex, upon his firſt coming over Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (i), and Chancellor of the Univerſity of Dublin. Our ſtudent the ſame year, upon the death of his father, who had deſigned him for his own profeſſion, the Common Law (k), diſcovered an uncommon degree of reſolution and firmneſs of mind. The paternal eſtate, which deſcended to him as eldeſt ſon and heir, he reſigned, though of conſiderable value, to his younger brother [D]: and reſerving only ſo much of it as was neceſſary to ſupport him in a ſtudious life at the college, he followed his own inclination in devoting himſelf to the profeſſion of divinity, and being thereby qualified by the ſtatutes (E), he was admitted Fellow of the Society. The proficiency he made in this ſtudy, was anſwerable to his reſolution. At the age of eighteen, our ſtripling entered the liſts with Henry Fitz-Simons, a learned Jeſuit, then priſoner in the caſtle of Dublin, who had given a general challenge to defend Bellarmin's principles againſt any oppoſer [F]. [C] For the aſſiſtance of his memory.] Dr Parr informs us (15), that, between the age of fifteen and ſixteen, he had drawn up, in Latin, an exact chronicle of the Bible as far as to the book of Kings, not much different from the method of his annals, only in the enlargement by ſome more accurate obſervations and ſynchroniſms of heathen annals.

[D] He reſigned the paternal eſtate to his younger brother.] Dr Parr is ſtill our informer, who intimates, that this ſtep was not taken out of an inconſiderate juvenile raſhneſs, but was the effect of a mature deliberation, upon viewing the condition of the eſtate, which he found greatly incumbered with law-ſuits, beſides being loaded with ſiſters portions. That he wrote out a complete terrier of all the eſtate and leaſes, and, to obviate the cenſure of doing any thing raſhly and with precipitation, he drew up an exact ſtate of all the law-ſuits and incumbrances that lay upon it, with directions what to do in them, tranſmitting it to his uncle as guardian for his brother and ſiſters, to be managed for their advantage, which was performed ſo well, that moſt of his ſiſters (of whom he had no leſs than ſeven) were afterwards very well married, and ſome of them to perſons that proved eminently conſiderable in church and ſtate (16). Add to this, that our Author, beſides ſomething for his ſupport at the college, reſerved a ſum to purchaſe books ſufficient to carry on his ſtudies. His younger brother, named Ambroſe, was alſo a very deſerving youth, and, being bred at Cambridge, early attained a great ſkill and perfection in the oriental tongues, and rendered a great part of the Old Teſtament from the original Hebrew into Engliſh before King James's tranſlation was made (17), the manuſcript of which Dr Parr had ſeen, being then lodged in the hands of his nephew, Sir Theophilus Jong, Knt. one of his Majeſty's privy council in Ireland. Mr Uſher alſo tranſlated, out of Latin into Engliſh, his brother's treatiſe De Chriſtiana in eccleſiam ſucceſſione et ſtatu, the manuſcript of which was then extant. We have a Latin letter to the Archbiſhop, written April 9, 1607, by one William Eyre, Fellow of Emanuel college in Cambridge, a good judge of oriental learning, wherein Ambroſe's ſkill in the Arabic tongue is ſtrongly intimated, as follows: Interea vero loci, agnoſco me valde obæratum eſſe et tibi, et doctiſſimo fratri tuo Ambroſio, qui peritiſſima manu ſua quædam in uſum meum ex Alcorano Arabice exſcripſit (18). Theſe early productions gave room to expect many others, had not he been prevented by his death, which cut him off in his youth (19).

(17) Dr Smith mentions a Latin tranſlation of Surata Cavernæ from the Alcoran, ſome Hebrew and Arabic collections, and an Arabic lexicon, beſides ſome tracts upon various points of Theology of his writing, which are extant in the archives of Dublin-college library. Vita Uſſerii, p. 9.

[E] Qualified by the ſtatutes.] By the firſt draught of the ſtatutes all the fellowſhips were appropriated to Divinity, which was afterwards altered by the directions of Dr Bedel, the ſecond Provoſt (after Mr Temple (20).) 'I ſuppoſe, ſays that Provoſt in a letter to our Archbiſhop, it hath been an error all this while to neglect the faculties of law and phyſic, and attend only to the ordering of one poor college of Divines. I did communicate the plan of the four faculties (21) to my Lord of Canterbury—who ſeemed not to diſlike it, but required it ſhould be maturely thought of by your Grace and the Univerſity, in which caſe he promiſed his aſſiſtance, if it was judged fit. At that time I left with him the ſtatutes of our College, which I had this winter written out with mine own hand, and cauſed to be fair bound (22).'

[F] He held a diſpute with Henry Fitz-Symonds &c.] This challenge by Fitz-Symonds is in the dedication of a piece already quoted (23), where he declares he offered to maintain ſuch particulars as were thought by the Proteſtants to be the weakeſt in the Romiſh doctrine, and to attack all thoſe points which they thought to be the ſtrongeſt in their doctrine. 'Donec ego (ſays he) cauſæ bonitate ſuffultus defendere quicquid inter nos infirmiſſimum, vel impugnare quicquid inter ipſos tutiſſimum reputant, in me reciperem. The Jeſuit then proceeds to give an account of his diſpute in theſe terms: Sed neque in ſpecula eminentem videre, neque in caſtris, clauſiſque Stentoria ut agnoſcunt voce provocantem, exaudire voluerunt. Prodiit quidem ſemel in ſumma vocis vultuſque trepidatione octodenarius præcocis ſapientiæ (non tamen malæ ut videbatur indolis) Juvenis, neſcio an auræ popularis cupidior, ſaltem de abſtruſiſſimis rebus Theologicis, cum adhuc philoſophica ſtudia non eſſet emenſus, nec Ephebis egreſſus, diſputandi avidus &c. Hunc autem Juſſi ſuorum calculos aſſervere, quibus pugil ſeu agoniſta idoneus renunciaretur, et vel cum ipſo diſputationem me initurum. Sed ſicut Ipſi eum minime tanto honore dignati ſunt, ita me vicliſſim ſua deinceps præſentia dignatus ipſe non fuit (24).' But no body would hear me, though I called with a voice as loud as Stentor to the conteſt. Only there once came to me a youth of about eighteen, very forward in his underſtanding, who ſhewed a very ſtrong deſire of diſputing upon the moſt abſtruſe points of Divinity, though he had not yet completed his courſe of philoſophy, nor arrived to manhood. But when I aſked him if he had leave from his Superiors, promiſing in that caſe to enter the liſts with him, the young man, not being honoured with any ſuch commiſſion, had nothing to ſhew, and returned no more. Thus the Jeſuit; but the matter is related by another author, as follows: Henry Fitz-Simon, the Jeſuit, challenging his adverſaries to meet him in the caſtle of Dublin, this beardleſs youth combated ſo bravely and frequently that veteran in the main article of his cauſe, viz. Antichriſt, that he repented his having challenged him, and met with opponents ſufficient in this one youth, who was but eighteen years old. Cum Henrico Simonde Jeſuita

'I was not purpoſed, Mr Fitz-Simonds, to write unto 'you, before you had firſt written unto me, concerning 'ſome chief points of your religion, as at our laſt 'meeting you promiſed. But, ſeeing you have deferred the ſame (for reaſons beſt known to yourſelf) 'I thought it not amiſs to enquire further of your 'mind concerning the continuation of the conference 'begun betwixt us. And to this I am the rather moved, 'becauſe I am credibly informed of certain reports, 'which I could hardly be perſuaded ſhould proceed 'from him, who in my preſence pretended ſo great 'love and affection to me. If I am a boy (as it hath 'pleaſed you very contemptuouſly to name me) I give 'thanks to the Lord, that my carriage towards you hath 'been ſuch as could miniſter no juſt occaſion to deſpiſe 'my youth. Thus intreating you in a few 'lines to make known unto me your purpoſe in this 'behalf, I end; praying the Lord that both this and 'all other enterprizes that we take in hand may be ſo 'ordered, as may moſt make for the advancement of 'his own glory and the kingdom of his ſon Jeſus Chriſt.

'Tuas ad aras uſque,

'James Uſher.'

Dr Parr obſerves, with the Author of Collectio Bateſiana, that the ſame Jeſuit, living to underſtand our Author better, ſtiles him Acatholicorum Doctiſſimus (29). And to form a judgment of the value of this teſtimony of our Author's literary merit, it will be neceſſary to enquire into the worth and credit of the witneſs. Henry Fitz-Simon was the moſt noted Jeſuit in his time, if we may believe the Oxford Antiquary, who informs us, that he was an Iriſhman born, and the ſon of a merchant in Dublin, that he was matriculated at Oxford as a member of Hart-hall [now Hertford-college] April 26, 1583, and in that of his age, fourteen. That in December following it ſeems probable that he was elected Student of Chriſt-church (30): But that he did not ſtay long at the Univerſity, which he left without taking any degree, being come to a reſolution to change the church of England for that of Rome. In which diſpoſition he croſſed the ſea, and entered himſelf in the Society of Jeſus at Louvain, where putting himſelf under the inſtructions of the famous Leonard Leſſius (31), he made ſuch a quick proficiency, that he became eminent enough, in a ſhort time, to be himſelf a Teacher, eſpecially in Philoſophy, which he taught publickly for ſeveral years. At length, returning to his native country of Ireland, he made it his buſineſs, as a miſſionary, to gain proſelytes to his religion. To which end he had both private conferences and public diſputes with Proteſtant miniſters. In this work he perſiſted for two years without diſturbance, being eſteemed the chief diſputant among thoſe of his party, and ſo ready and quick, that few or none would undertake to deal with him. In fine, being apprehended for a dangerous perſon, he was committed to ſafe cuſtody in Dublin caſtle in 1599, where he continued about five years. Though confinement hindered him from proceeding to ſpread his principles, yet did it not break his reſolution, or damp his courage and good-will for the cauſe. On the contrary, he was no ſooner fixed in a priſon, than he ſaid, that, being a priſoner, he was like a bear tied to a ſtake, and wanted ſome to bait him; which expreſſion being looked on as a challenge, was taken up by our Author, then Mr James Uſher. Afterwards, at the end of the five years, being ſet at liberty, on his promiſe to behave quietly, and give no diſturbance to the King and kingdom, he went forthwith into voluntary exile into the Low-countries, where he ſpent his time in performing offices requiſite to his function, and in writing books, particularly, A catholic confutation of Mr John Rider's claim of antiquities, and a calming comfort againſt his caveat, with a reply to Mr Rider's poſtſcripts, and a diſcovery of Puritan partiality in his behalf. To which is annexed, An anſwer to certain complaintive letters of afflicted Catholics for religion. All printed together in quarto, at Rohan, in 1608, in which year he went, according to ſummons, to Rome, where being appointed for the miſſion of Ireland, he publiſhed his profeſſion of the four vows; and then, being ſent back to the Low-countries, he went again into Ireland, where he ſpent many years, in confirming the Roman catholics in their religion, and in making new proſelytes. At length, having been a great encourager and abetter of the rebellion which broke out there in 1641, he was, after the rebels began to be ſubdued, forced to fly for ſhelter into woods and on mountains, and to creep and ſkulk into every place, for fear of being taken and hanged by the Engliſh ſoldiers. In the beginning of the year 1643 he was forced to change his place, and retire for ſafety into a mooriſh and boggy ground, where ſheltering himſelf under a ſhepherd's cot, no better than a hovel, which did not keep out the wind and rain, he lived there in a very ſorry condition, and had for his bedding a pad of ſtraw, which would be often wet by the riſing and coming in of the water. Notwithſtanding all this miſery he ſeemed to be very cheerful, and was ready to inſtruct the young ones about him, and comfort others. But being in a manner ſpent, and his age not able to bear ſuch miſery long, he was with great difficulty taken away, and being conveyed by ſome of the brethren into a better place, he expired among them on the calends of February the ſame year 1643-4. By his death, concludes this writer, the Roman catholics loſt a pillar of their church, being eſteemed, in the better part of his life, a great ornament among them, and the greateſt defender of their religion in his time (32). Beſides the pieces already mentioned, he wrote A Juſtification and Expoſition of the Sacrifice of the Maſs, in two books, or more, printed in 1611, 4to. And Britannomachia miniſtrorum in plerisque & fidei fundamentis & fidei articulis diſſidentium. Duac. 1614, 4to. As alſo a third piece, which was A Catalogue of the Iriſh Saints.

[G] He was put upon reading the Fathers by Stapleton's Fortreſs.] That the Archbiſhop ſhould be particularly moved to enter into ſo long and laborious a ſtudy by Stapleton's book, is eaſily accounted for from the great reputation

reputation of the Author, who was eſteemed the moſt learned Roman catholic of all his time. He was ſon of William Stapleton, and born in 1535, of a genteel family at Henfield in Suſſex. He received the firſt part of his education under one John Twine, a noted ſchoolmaſter at Canterbury, and being removed thence to Wykeham's ſchool at Winchester, he went in the ordinary courſe to New-college in Oxford, of which he was admitted perpetual Fellow in 1594, and made Prebendary or Canon of Chicheſter a little before the death of Queen Mary, being then only Batchelor of Arts. But, upon the acceſſion of Queen Elizabeth to the crown, religion beginning to put on another face, the Canon, as well as his father and family, left the kingdom, and went to Louvain, where being ſettled, he applied himſelf with great zeal to the ſtudy of Theology, and in a ſhort time making great proficiency therein, he went to Paris to compleat his knowledge in the ſacred tongues. Afterwards he took a journey to Rome, from a motive of devotion, ſays my Author; however, he made no long ſtay there, but returning to Louvain, he ſet about writing an anſwer to Biſhop Jewel, and tranſlating Bede's church hiſtory into Engliſh, to the end that Queen Elizabeth, to whom he dedicated it, might ſee and underſtand the ancient faith and religion of our anceſtors, &c. This ſervice to his church being finiſhed, he left Louvain, and removed to Doway, which Univerſity had been erected a little before. Thither he haſtened at the requeſt of Dr William Allen, Preſident of the Engliſh college there, and for a time performed the office of Catechiſt Reader at Anchine, near that place. Afterwards he took the degrees of Batchelor, Licentiate, and Doctor of Divinity, under Matthew Gallen, Provoſt of the church of St Amoure, and Chancellor of the Univerſity of Doway, who collated him to a canonry in that church; and he was alſo made Regius Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity. However, he reſigned both theſe preferments ſome time after, and entered into the Society of Jeſus at Doway: but, upon a long and diligent probation, finding that order not to agree with his temper and courſe of life, he quitted it, and returned to his former way of teaching, (to the great joy of many) and became a Canon once more of the church of St Amoure. At length, being called to Louvain, he was made King's Profeſſor of Divinity, and Canon of the church of St Peter there, and writing ſeveral things, particularly againſt Mr Whitaker of Cambridge, his fame ſpread over all thoſe parts, and he grew into great eſteem with the King of Spain, ſo that he had the deanery of Hilverbeck in Kampenland in Brabant conferred upon him: [Little enough, God wot, for ſuch a rare and moſt learned clerk as he was] ſays Mr Wood, who repeats it again, that in all kind of literature he obtained ſuch perfection, that he was numbered among the moſt learned men of that age. And it was generally thought, continues our Antiquary, that he deſerved a Cardinal's cap before Allen; but ſo it was, that his ability being eclipſed by the activity of the other, he did not riſe higher than a Dean. In the poſſeſſion of this dignity, and his profeſſorſhip and canonry at Louvain, having lived to the age of ſixty-three years, he expired there, greatly lamented by all learned Roman catholics, on the 12th of October, 1598, and was interred in the church of St Peter in the ſame city, where ſoon after a monument was erected to his memory, with a large inſcription thereon, containing the ſucceſſion of his employments in the univerſities and church, as well in England as beyond-ſea. He wrote and tranſlated many things, moſt of which were printed in four large volumes in folio, at Paris, in 1620. The titles of them are in the firſt volume. 1. De principiis fidei doctrinalibus, lib. 12. Paris, 1579 and 1582, &c. 2. Defenſio ſucceſſionis eccleſiaſticæ, lib. 1. 3. Refectio principiorum fidei doctrinalium, Antw. 1592. 4. Defenſio authoritatis eccleſiaſticæ, contra Gul. Whittakerum, Anglo-Calviniſtam. 5. Triplicatio pro eccleſiæ authoritate, adverſus eundem Whittakerum. The ſecond volume contains, 1. De univerſæ juſtificationis doctrina hodie controverſ. lib. 12. 2. Speculum pravitatis hereticæ per orationes quaſi ad oculum demonſtratæ, Duac. 1580. 3. Orationes Funebres, Antw. 1577. 4. Orationes academicæ miſcellaneæ; ſome of which were publiſhed in 1602. 5. Orationes Catecheticæ, five manuale peccatorum de ſeptem peccatis capitalibus, Antw. 1598. 6. De magnitudine Romanæ eccleſiæ, lib. 2. Antw. 1599, in 4to. 7. A Fortreſs of Faith, firſt planted among us Engliſhmen, and continued hitherto in the univerſal church of Chriſt, the faith of which times the Proteſtants call Papiſtry, Antw. 1565, 4to. This learned treatiſe the Author, as before intimated, wrote upon occaſion of his tranſlating Bede's church hiſtory into Engliſh, wherein he endeavours to ſhew, that the ſame faith was profeſſed in the primitive times as in his. This being read over ſeveral times by Archbiſhop Uſher, then Bachelor of Arts, ſome miſtruſt of the quotations of ancient authors therein put him upon reading the Fathers. 8. The Horn-blaſt: or A Reply to the anſwer of Robert Horne, the falſe Biſhop of Winchester, in four books, Lovain, 1567. 9. A diſcourſe of Proteſtancy and the firſt Authors of it. In volume the third are, 1. Antidota Evangelica in Matthæum, Marcum, Lucam, Johannem, Antw. 1595. 2. Antidota Apoſtolica in Acta Apoſtol. Tom. I. Antw. 1595. 3. In Epiſt. Pauli ad Romanos, Tom. II. Ibid. 1595. 4. In duas Epiſt. ad Corinthios, Tom III. Ibid. 1598 and 1600. The fourth volume is filled with, 1. Promptuarium in Evangelia Dominicalia; pars hyemalis, Antw. 1591, pars æſtualis, Venet. 1594. 2. Promptuarium Catholicum in Evangelia Dominicalia totius anni, Col. 1592 et 1602. 3. Promptuarium Catholicum ſupra Evangelia Ferialia totius quadrages. 4. Promptuarium Catholicum ſuper Evangelia in feſtis S. S. totius anni. 5. Tres Thomæ, ſeu res geſtæ S. Thomæ Apoſt. S. Tho. [a Becket] Archiepiſcop. Cantuarienſis, et Thomæ Mori Angliæ Cancellarii, Duac. 1588.

Beſides the pieces contained in theſe four volumes, our Author wrote A Treatiſe de Juſtificatione, printed at Paris in 1582. As alſo A Return of untruths, againſt Mr Jewel, Antw. 1566. His tranſlation from the Latin into Engliſh of Venerable Bede's hiſtory of the church of England beforementioned was printed at Antwerp in 1565. This tranſlation, to which he added ſome marginal notes, was cenſured by the learned Selden (33) as not altogether true. Stapleton alſo tranſlated Frederic Staphyle's large volume De diſſidiis Hæreticorum, printed at Antwerp in 1565. It is remarked, to the honour of his works, that Pope Clement VIII. was ſo much delighted with them, that he commanded them to be read daily at times of his refection, or mealtimes, and invited him to Rome, with a deſign to confer upon him the place of Apoſtolical Prothonotary, or, as ſome ſaid, to make him a Cardinal. Among which high order the famous Cardinal Perron, who was well read in the controverſies of his time, was wont to poſtpone all controverſial writers in compariſon with Stapleton, whom he eſteemed to be the beſt of his time and before. To conclude, paſſing by all the commendations given him by thoſe of his own faith and perſuaſion, it is ſufficient for his fame to mention thoſe of his antagoniſt Whitaker, who ſays in Latin, Stapletonus hanc cauſam (de traditionibus) omnium acutiſſime ac accuratiſſime tractavit, &c. (34). And elſewhere, ſpeaking of the opinion, as well of Papiſts as Proteſtants, in divers matters, he ſaith modeſtly of himſelf, that he differed as much from Stapleton as Troilus from Achilles.

[H] He ſpent eighteen years in reading the Fathers.] In proſecuting this ſtudy, his method was to make notes and obſervations upon their writings, taking them in order, and marking the paſſages, which were genuine, and which ſpurious and forged. In this compaſs of time he not only read the Greek and Latin Fathers, but moſt of the conſiderable Schoolmen and Divines from the firſt to the thirteenth century. He intended to have publiſhed theſe collections under the title of Bibliotheca Theologica, after a book of that title publiſhed by one Johannes Molanus, Profeſſor of Divinity at Louvain (35). This appears from his Epiſtle to the Reader, prefixed to his anſwer to the challenge of Malone the Jeſuit (36), where, having given an account of the chronological catalogue annexed to the end of that treatiſe, apparently drawn from this ſtore, he proceeds thus: 'The 'exact diſcuſſion, as well of the Authors times as of 'the cenſure of their works, I refer to my Theological 'Bibliotheque, if God hereafter ſhall lend me life and 'leiſure to make up that work for the uſe of thoſe that 'mean to give themſelves to that noble ſtudy of the 'doctrines and rites of the ancient church.' And how much he deſired it might be done appears from hence, that, being aſked upon his death-bed what his will was concerning

(36) This anſwer was printed at London in 1625, in 4to, and again in 1631. Malone publiſhed a reply about 1629, which was ſtuffed with ſo many falſe citations from the Fathers, or elſe out of ſuppoſititious authors, and alſo forged miracles and lying legends, that the Archbiſhop diſdained to take any notice of it; but an anſwer was wrote by Dr Hoyle, Dr Sing, and Mr Puttock. ſionally in ſearching into, and collecting the antiquities of his country [I]. In 1601, he entered into holy orders (n), and was in a little time appointed Afternoon Preacher on Sundays before the State at Chriſt-Church in Dublin. In the courſe of this duty, he preached a remarkable Sermon againſt granting a toleration to the Papiſts [K]. In 1603, a collection of eighteen hundred pounds being made to buy books for his college-library, he was pitched upon, with Dr Chaloner, to execute that truſt [L]. This brought him into England, where he became acquainted with Sir Thomas Bodley, who being then upon the like employ for his new erected library at Oxford, they mutually aſſiſted each other (o). In 1606, the like buſineſs of purchaſing books and manuſcripts relating to the Engliſh hiſtory (in which ſtudy our Author was then engaged) brought him again into England [M]. And the following year, he proceeded Batchelor of Divinity, and was choſen Profeſſor of that faculty in his college (p). He was alſo promoted to the Chancellorſhip of the cathedral of St Patrick the ſame year [N]. In 1609, he wrote his treatiſe about Hermage and Corban lands [O], not only in Ireland, but in England, whither he came a third time this year to buy books, and conſult MSS. upon the ſubject of hiſtory and antiquities. In which ſearch, he viſited, among others, the libraries in both the Univerſities, and contracted an acquaintance with moſt of the Literati in that way [P] here. In the ſame manner he continued

Smith, p. 23, who tells us he had preached before the State for ſome time without orders.

(o) Dr Smith obſerves, that Sir Thomas muſt have been very ſerviceable on this occaſion to our Author, who was then only twenty-three years of age. Vita Uſſerii, P. 28.

(p) He held this place thirteen years, and read lectures weekly, but they are all loſt. They were written chiefly upon the points in diſpute with the Papiſts. Parr, p. 10, 11.

concerning thoſe collections, he anſwered to this effect, That he deſired they might be committed to his dear friend Dr Langbaine, Provoſt of Queen's college, Oxford, the only man on whoſe learning as well as friendſhip he could rely, to caſt them into ſuch a form as might render them fit for the preſs. They were accordingly put into the hands of that learned Doctor, who in order thereto had them tranſcribed (37), and then ſet himſelf to fill up the breaches in the original, the quotations in the margin being much defaced with rats. But the Doctor, ſtudying in ſevere cold weather in the public library, contracted a cold, which put an end to his life in 1657, while he was upon this taſk; and Dean Fell afterwards endeavoured to get it finiſhed, but in vain.

(37) The tranſcript of Dr Langbaine is in the Bodleian library; and the original, in our Author's handwriting, was once in the poſſeſſion of Dr Edward Stillingfleet, Dean of St Paul's in 1686. Parr, p. 12, 13.

[I] He ſpent ſome time in collecting the antiquities of his country.] In his letter to his uncle Stanyhurſt afore-cited he writes thus: 'Beſides my main ſtudies, I have 'deſtined, as a kind of recreation, to ſpend ſome time 'in gathering together the ſcattered antiquities of our 'nation, whereof I doubt not but many relicks are 'come into your hands, which I would very willingly 'hear of:' And then, running over ſeveral, he particularly inſiſts upon a copy of the life of St Patrick (which he obſerves is in manuſcript in the Jeſuit's college at Louvain) not only becauſe the Author ſeemed to be of ſome antiquity, but as he alledged ſeveral ſentences out of St Patrick's own writings. 'If any of our countrymen, 'continues he, ſtudious of ſuch matters, will be pleaſed 'to communicate either that or any other antiquities 'of like nature, I do promiſe that I will take as much 'pains for him, and make full recompenſe of courteſie 'in the ſame kind.'

[K] Sermon againſt granting a toleration to the Papiſts.] The text was from Ezechiel, c. iv. v. 6. And thou ſhalt bear the iniquity of the houſe of Judah forty days: I have appointed thee each day for a year, which he applied to Ireland. From this year, ſays he, I reckon forty years, and then theſe whom you now embrace ſhall be your ruin, and you ſhall bear their iniquity. This conjecture at that time ſeemed to be the preſent thoughts of a young man who was no friend to Popery; but when the Iriſh rebellion broke out in 1641, and ſo many thouſand Proteſtants were killed, and the whole nation haraſſed by a bloody war, ſome perſons then alive, who heard this ſermon, began to think the preacher a young prophet. Our Author was particularly lucky in ſome other ſuch predictions, inſomuch that there is a treatiſe extant de prædictionibus Uſſerii. Dr Smith (38) has thought proper (how judiciouſly I refer to others) to cenſure theſe ſurmiſes of our Author as proceeding from a vain humour to dive into the myſtical ſenſe of Scripture, and an idle pretence of being endued with a prophetic ſpirit. But ſuch kind of predictions being only a judicious conjecture and foreſight, it ſeems more to the purpoſe of his character, that, in this paſſage of his ſermon, he put the non-toleration of Popery upon the intolerant perſecuting ſpirit of that religion, diſſuading a toleration thereof upon reaſons of danger to the ſtate, and not ſolely upon its idolatry. The uſe of this will appear preſently.

[L] He was appointed with Dr Chaloner to that truſt.] The money was raiſed by the Engliſh army, after having defeated the Spaniards that had come to the aſſiſtance of the Iriſh at Kingſale: And it was reſolved by the benefactors that theſe two ſhould be employed to buy the books. They diſcharged the truſt to the ſatisfaction of the donors and the whole college (39). Our Author always teſtified the greateſt regard for the benefit of the college in every point, as is evident from many of his letters. He was Vice-chancellor ſeveral years, and frequently correſponded with Abbot and Laud, the two ſucceeding Chancellors. But it ſeems to have been during his abſence upon this occaſion that his mother was reconciled to the Romiſh religion, a misfortune which gave him the moſt afflicting concern, and the more as ſhe continued obſtinate therein to the laſt, dying at Drogheda in the communion of that church (40). The ſame writer obſerves (41), that her father, the Recorder, though outwardly a conformiſt to the new religion, after its eſtabliſhment by Queen Elizabeth, yet ſtill retained his old affection for Popery, as appears from his ſupporting firſt in his own houſe Edmund Campian, afterwards the famous Jeſuit, then a refugee from England, and in the next place recommending him to a friend in the country, where he might be ſecure from the danger of being ſeized (42) and brought to juſtice for treaſonable practices, in drawing her Majeſty's ſubjects from their allegiance. The Recorder took care however to manage ſo prudently, as to give no umbrage to the government, and by that means continued unmoleſted in his poſt.

[M] The ſame buſineſs brought him again to England.] He now contracted an intimate acquaintance and friendſhip with ſeveral learned men, and among others, Sir Robert Cotton, Thomas Allen of Oxford, and Mr Camden (43), which laſt deſigning a new edition of his Britannia, conſulted with him about publiſhing Ninias, St Patrick, and Congal, and other things relating to the ancient ſtate of Ireland and the city of Dublin (44), a great part of the anſwers to which were inſerted in the edition of the Britannia publiſhed in 1607, with this elogy of our Author: For many of theſe things concerning Dublin I acknowledge myſelf indebted to the diligence and labour of James Uſher, Chancellor of the church of St Patrick, who in various learning and judgment far exceeds his years (45).

[N] Chancellor of St Patrick's.] This place was conferred upon him by Dr Adam Loftus, then Archbiſhop of Dublin. It was his firſt eccleſiaſtical preferment; he had no other till his promotion to the biſhoprick of Meath. Dr Parr obſerves, that though he had no particular obligation by this poſt to preach, yet he would not omit it in the place whence he received the profits, viz. Finlaſs, not far from Dublin, which he endowed with a vicarage, and preached there every Sunday, unleſs hindered by very extraordinary occaſions.

[O] His treatiſe about Hermage and Corban lands.] Theſe were lands anciently received by the Chorepiſcopi (46). Archbiſhop Bancroft, to whom this treatiſe was addreſſed, preſented it to King James. The manuſcript is ſtill extant in the library at Lambeth, but the ſubſtance of it was tranſlated into Latin, and publiſhed at the end of his diſſertation de Corbis, &c. in the firſt part of his gloſſary, by Sir Henry Spelman, who gives our Author the character of Literarum inſignis Pharus.

(46) Theſe lands were free from all taxes and ſecular juriſdiction, but liable to ſervices and penſions to the Biſhops, which not being performed, they ceded from their right. Dr Smith ſays they were firſt called Termon-lands, either as belonging to the monks, or as being ſeparated from lay lands by boundaries, called Termini. Vita Uſſerii, p. 34.

[P] He became acquainted with moſt of the Literati here.] Among theſe were Henry Bourchier, afterwards Earl of Bath, Sir Henry Saville, Henry Briggs, John Selden, John Davenant, afterwards Biſhop of Saliſbury, Samuel Ward, afterwards Maſter of Sidney-college in Cambridge, and laſtly Thomas Lydiat, famous for his chronological writings againſt Joſeph Scaliger, and being now much reduced in his fortune, the Archbiſhop carried him to Ireland, tinued ever after to make once in three or four years a viſit to London, paſſing one month of his ſtay in the ſummer at Oxford, and another at Cambridge. Thus eager in the

Ireland, where he afterwards married his Grace's ſiſter (47). He was the ſon of Chriſtian Lydiat, Lord of the manor of Aulkrynton (48), commonly called Okerton, near Banbury in Oxfordſhire, and citizen of London. Thomas was born at Okerton, in the beginning of the year 1572, and diſcovering pregnant parts from his infancy, was, by the application of his father, elected at about thirteen years of age one of the children of Wykeham's college near Wincheſter, whence, according to the ſtatutes of the two foundations, he was removed to New-college in Oxford, and choſen Probationer-fellow in 1691: At which time being under the tuition of Dr (afterwards Sir) Henry Marten, he made great proficiency in Logick, and two years afterwards was admitted Verus Socius. After he had taken the degrees in arts (49), he applied himſelf to Aſtronomy, Mathematics, the learned languages, and Divinity; the laſt of which he was very deſirous to have made his principal ſtudy, and took holy orders, as the ſtatutes of the college required; but, finding a great defect in his memory and utterance, of which he often complained, particularly to Dr Bancroft, Biſhop of Oxford, his Dioceſan (50), he reſolved to reſign his fellowſhip, as he did in 1603, and retiring to his patrimony at Okerton, and contenting himſelf with the revenues thereof, though but ſmall, he proſecuted his ſtudies with indefatigable diligence, and ſpent ſeven years in finiſhing and publiſhing ſuch books as he had begun in the college. He was thus employed, when his merit coming to the knowledge of Prince Henry, his royal highneſs appointed him his Chronographer and Coſmographer. He was poſſeſſed of theſe honours in 1609, when publiſhing his capital book De emendatione temporum, he dedicated it to that Prince, who, agreeably to his excellent good-nature, accepted it very graciouſly, and, had he lived, would have proved a truly royal patron to him; but all our Author's towering hopes from this quarter were buried in the grave of that moſt amiable Prince, who died in the flower of his youth a year after. In the interim, his Grace the Primate of Ireland being in London this year, 1604, found out our Chronologer, and, taking him into Ireland, provided him a chamber in the college of Dublin, where he continued two years; at the end of which, purpoſing to return home, he obtained a promiſe from the Lord Deputy and Chancellor of Ireland of a competent maintenance (51) whenever he ſhould come back to that kingdom. But, on his arrival in England, the rectory of Okerton, his native place, becoming vacant, though when he was Fellow of New-college he had refuſed the offer of it by his Father, who was Patron, yet he did now, after ſeveral demurs, and not without much reluctancy of mind, accept of it in the year 1612. Thus ſettled, he entered into a marriage with his friend our Primate's ſiſter, and ſat down to his ſtudies more cloſely than ever. Beſides going over the harmony of the Goſpels, and making ſix hundred ſermons thereon, he wrote and intirely finiſhed ſeveral books, and laid the foundation of others in the twelve enſuing years. All theſe pieces he deſigned to publiſh, but was prevented by having unadviſedly engaged for the debts of a near relation, upon which bond he was arreſted, and not being able to pay for the preſent (having ſpent his ſmall patrimony in printing his books) he was thrown into a priſon called Bocardo, in Oxford, where he remained, and in the King's bench and elſewhere, till Sir William Boſwell, a great encourager of deſerving men, Dr Robert Pink, Warden of New-college, and Primate Uſher, laid down the money, and releaſed him. As ſoon as he had obtained his liberty (in procuring which Archbiſhop Laud, at the requeſt of Sir Henry Marten, gave his aſſiſtance) he preſented a petition to King Charles I. for leave to travel into foreign parts, viz. Turkey, Ethiopia, or the Abaſſinian empire, in the ſearch after manuſcripts, eſpecially relating to civil and eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, in order to publiſh them in print, or whatſoever copies might tend to the propagation or increaſe of good learning. And further alſo, as his Majeſty had Leiger Ambaſſadors and Agents, with his confederates, Emperors, Kings, and Princes, of other countries, they might in his Majeſty's name, in behalf of Mr Lydiat and his aſſignes, move their Highneſſes to grant the like privileges to him and his aſſignes &c. What effect this petition had does not appear, probably not ſuch a one as was agreeable to the ardor of his wiſhes. However that be, it is an inconteſtible evidence of his noble intentions and public ſpirit for the advancement of letters. Neither did his diſappointment in it leſſen his reſpect for the King, in whoſe cauſe he ſhewed himſelf a firm and zealous loyaliſt on the breaking out of the civil wars, in which he was a great ſufferer at his rectory of Okerton by the Parliament party. In a letter written by him to Sir William Compton, Knt. Governor of Banbury-caſtle, dated Dec. 7, 1644, he complains of having been four times pillaged by the Parliament's forces of Compton-houſe (commonly called Compton in the hole) in Warwickſhire, to the value of at leaſt 70l. and was forced, for a quarter of a year together, to borrow a ſhirt to change his linnen; that he had alſo been twice forced from his houſe, and carried once to Warwick, and another time to Banbury. To the firſt of which places he was hurried away on a raſcally jade of a horſe, and was infamouſly abuſed by the ſoldiers there, and ſo ſorely hurt, that at the writing of the ſaid letter he was not perfectly reſtored, and doubted he ſcarce ever ſhould be. The cauſe of all which ill uſage was for that he had denied them money, and had defended his books and papers, and afterwards, while a Priſoner in Warwick-caſtle, he had ſpoken boldly in behalf of the King and Biſhops. At length, after he had lived at Okerton ſeveral years in great poverty and obſcurity, he was taken out of this world on the third of April, 1646, and was buried the day following in the chancel of the church at Okerton, which he had rebuilt ſome time before. In 1669 a ſtone, with an inſcription, was laid over his grave, at the expence of the Warden and Fellows of New-college in Oxford, and an honorary monument, with an inſcription, was erected by the ſame ſociety in the cloyſter of their college. Mr Wood obſerves, that though he was a perſon of ſmall ſtature, yet was he of great parts, and of a public ſoul, and though a poor and contemptible prieſt to look upon (for ſo he was held by the vulgar) yet he not only puzzled Chriſtopher Clavius, and the whole college of Mathematicians, but alſo that Goliah of literature, Joſeph Scaliger, who, when he was worſted by our Author's writings (as was maintained by great men, and particularly Archbiſhop Uſher) inſtead of acknowledging the ſuperiority of his antagoniſt, meanly betook himſelf to abuſive language, calling Lydiat, in the moſt ſcornful manner, a beggarly, beardleſs, and gelt prieſt. That as he was much eſteemed by learned men at home, among whom, beſides our Primate, were Sir Adam Newton, Secretary, and Sir Thomas Chaloner, Chamberlain to Prince Henry, Dr John Bainbridge, Mr Henry Briggs, Dr Peter Turner, &c. who were his great acquaintance, ſo was he by the Virtuoſi beyond-ſea, who even did not ſcruple to rank him with the Lord Bacon of Verulam and Mr Joſeph Mede. And when they heard that Lydiat and Mede were very poorly preferred, they declared that the Engliſh were unworthy of ſuch brave ſcholars, ſince they ſhewed no more regard for them. This character of Mr Lydiat was apparently drawn from a peruſal of his works, of which therefore we ſhall give a liſt, as follows: 1. Tractatus de variis annorum formis, Lond. 1605, 8vo. 2. Prælectio Aſtronomica de natura cæli et conditionibus elementorum. 3. Diſquiſitio Philologica de origine fontium. Returning home a little before Midſummer, he married Phœbe, the only daughter of Dr Luke Chaloner [R] abovementioned. In 1615, he drew up articles of religion for the Church of Ireland; which being intirely Calviniſtical in reſpect to the doctrine of abſolute predeſtination and reprobation, a handle was made of this ſtep to endeavour the ruin of his intereſt in King James, by repreſenting him as inclined to Puritaniſm: but the impotent malice turned (as is not unuſual in ſuch caſes) greatly to his advantage [S]. liſhed by Humphrey Prideaux. In this piece Mr Lydiat had animadverted upon the edition of the Marmora Arundeliana by Mr Selden, whom, inſtead of a moſt judicious, he has ſtiled only an induſtrious Author; which coming to the ears of that learned gentleman, was ſo much reſented by him, that, though otherwiſe in general a friend and ſupporter of learned men under difficulties, yet, when deſired and importuned to contribute towards Lydiat's releaſe from priſon, he abſolutely refuſed. Theſe are all the pieces of our Author's extant in print. He alſo left behind him a great number of manuſcripts, moſt of which are: 1. Annotations upon that part of Mr Edward Brerewood's treatiſe of the Sabbath, wherein he denies the Chriſtian ſabbath on the Lord's day, or the firſt day of the week, to be eſtabliſhed jure divino, by God's commandment. The beginning of this manuſcript there was brought to me, being priſoner in the King's bench, on Friday evening, Dec. 3, 1630 &c. which is mentioned, as it ſhews the time of his confinement in that priſon. 2. Annotations upon ſome controverted points of the Chronical Canons. 3. A few annotations upon ſome places or paſſages of the ſecond and third chapters of the book, intitled Altare Chriſtianum. 4. A treatiſe touching the ſetting up of altars in Chriſtian churches, and bowing in reverence to them or common tables, and bowing the knee or uncovering the head at the name or naming of Jeſus, occaſionally made in 1633, written upon the requeſt of ſome London miniſters, to declare his judgment therein, and dedicated to Archbiſhop Laud in gratitude for his releaſing him out of priſon, [which ſhews that he was not a priſoner in 1633, though probably diſcharged not long before]. In a poſtſcript to this diſcourſe about bowing at the name of Jeſus, he endeavours to anſwer the four arguments of Biſhop Andrews in his ſermon on Philip. ii. 10, 11. 5. An anſwer to Mr Joſeph Mede's treatiſe of the name of altar, or Θυσιαστήριον, anciently given to the holy table; written in February, 1637. 6. An anſwer to the defence of the coal from the altar. 7. Evangelium contractum ex quatuor Evangeliis &c. written in Hebrew. 8. Annales Eccleſiæ Chriſti inchoati ſecundum methodum Baronii: This is written in Latin, but is imperfect. 9. Chronicon Regum Judæorum methodo magis perſpicua, written in Hebrew. 10. Meſolabium geometricum. 11. Chronicon mundi emendatum. 12. Divina ſphæra humanorum eventuum, dedicated to the King in 1632. 13. Problema Aſtronomicum de Solis eccentricitate. 14. Diatribæ, et Animadverſiones aſtronomicæ ternæ. 15. Circuli dimenſio Lydiatea, Archimedea. All which manuſcripts, with others, treating of Divinity, Mathematics, and Aſtronomy, amounting to the number of thirty-eight at leaſt, were bound up in twenty-two volumes, and reſerved as rarities in the hands of the forementioned Dr John Lamphire, Principal of Hart-hall, now Hertford-college.

[2] His treatiſe De Eccleſiarum Chriſtianarum Succeſſione et Statu.] This piece is a continuation of Biſhop Jewel's Apology, written in anſwer to that captious queſtion of the Papiſts, where was your [Proteſtant] religion before Luther? The deſign therefore is to prove that the proteſtant tenets are the ſame with thoſe of the primitive church, in executing which Jewel ſhews, that there alſo were ſome viſible members of this church down to the 6th century, which is here extended to the 13th by our Author, who further proves that there were ſome perſons in the Weſtern churches, during the darkeſt times of ignorance, not tainted with the errors of the Romiſh faith. It is divided into three parts. The firſt reaches to the tenth century, when Gregory VII. was raiſed to the popedom. The ſecond was to have reached from that period to the year 1370. And the third was planned to bring it to the Reformation. How far he had brought it in this edition is ſeen in the following extract of a letter written to his brother-in-law, Thomas Lydiat, dated at Dublin, Auguſt 16, 1619. 'You have rightly obſerved, 'ſays he, that in my diſcourſe, De Chriſtianarum Eccleſiarum Succeſſione et Statu, there is wanting, for the accompliſhment of the ſecond part, an hundred years [from 1240 to 1370, viz. the laſt chapter of this part] which default in the continuation of the work is by me ſupplied. I purpoſe to publiſh the whole work together, much augmented, but do firſt expect the publication of my uncle Stanyhurſt's anſwer to the former, which, I hear, ſince his death (52), is ſent to Paris to be there printed. I am advertiſed alſo, that even now there is one at Antwerp who hath printed a treatiſe of my countryman De ſacro Boſco, De veræ Eccleſiæ inveſtigatione, wherein he hath ſome dealing with me: Both theſe I would willingly ſee, before I ſet about reprinting my book, meaning, that if they have juſtly found fault with any thing, I may amend it; if unjuſtly, I may defend it (53).' We have already ſhewn what reaſon he had to expect the anſwer here mentioned from his uncle; but that was never publiſhed, nor did our Author publiſh any other edition of his work, as he here purpoſed. Probably prevented by the diſtraction of the times (54). It was reprinted at Hanover in 1658, 8vo, without any amendments. In the laſt edition of 1687, containing likewiſe his Antiquity of the Britiſh churches, are theſe words in the title-page: Opus integrum ab Auctore auctum et recognitum, which Dr Smith obſerves was a meer puff of the Bookſeller.

[R] He married Dr Chaloner's daughter.] This gentleman was deſcended from the ancient family of the Chaloners in Yorkſhire. He was one of the four firſt Fellows of the college of Dublin (55), and had been a great aſſiſter and benefactor to it, having been appointed Overſeer of the building, and Treaſurer for the money raiſed for that purpoſe, and was both a learned and pious man. In all theſe reſpects Dr Uſher muſt needs be very agreeable to him, and we are aſſured that he courted this alliance, intending, had he lived, to have given this friend his only daughter, with a conſiderable eſtate in land and money (56). But dying before it was concluded (57), he charged her upon his death-bed, that, if Dr Uſher would marry her, ſhe ſhould think of no other perſon for a huſband; which command of her dying father ſhe punctually obeyed, and continued his wife forty years, and was always treated by him with great tenderneſs to her death, which preceded his about a year and a half.

(57) He died at Dublin on the 27th of April, 1612.

[S] Turned in the end to his advantage.] Among thoſe articles, which amount to the number of 104, beſides aſſerting the doctrine of predeſtination and reprobation in the ſtrongeſt terms (58), one of them profeſſes that there is but one catholic church, out of which there is no ſalvation; and another maintains that the ſabbath-day ought to be kept holy (59). Upon theſe accounts, Dr Heylin called the paſſing of theſe articles an abſolute plot of the Sabbatarians and Calviniſts in England, to make themſelves ſo ſtrong a party in Ireland as to obtain what they pleaſed in this convocation (60). Our Author was well known to be a ſtrong aſſerter of the predeſtinarian principles, and being beſides of opinion, that epiſcopacy was not a diſtinct order, but only a different degree from that of Preſbyters, he lay obnoxious enough to the charge of Puritaniſm. However, as he always warmly aſſerted the King's ſupremacy, and the epiſcopal form of church government eſtabliſhed, and all the diſcipline of it, it is evident all the objections to him, as inclined to Puritaniſm, were the effect of party, the church beginning about this time to be divided between the Calviniſtic and Arminian principles upon the quinquarticular controverſy. Dr Parr tells us his enemies were of no great repute for learning and worth, and that our Author, hearing of their attempts to rivet him out of his Majeſty's favour, procured the following letter from the Lord Deputy and Council of Ireland to the Privy-Council in England.

(58) From the IXth to the XVIIth inclusive.

(59) They were ſigned by Archbiſhop Jones, then Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and the Speaker of the Houſe of Biſhops in convocation, and Prolocutor of the clergy, and likewiſe by the Lord Deputy Chicheſter in King James's name, and by his Majeſty's order.

as his cuſtom was, to England in the latter end of the year 1619, he brought a letter to the Privy-Council to clear him of that charge, and he afterwards gave the King in diſcourſe ſuch intire ſatisfaction in the point, that the Biſhopric of Meath (u) being then vacant, his Majeſty of his own accord nominated him thereto in 1620 [T]; ſoon after which, he preached before the Houſe of Commons [U], on February 20 (w) that year, and printed his Sermon at their requeſt (x). He was conſecrated to his ſee on his return home the following year. In 1622, he publiſhed, at Dublin, his treatiſe concerning The Religion of the ancient Iriſh and Britons (y). And in October the ſame year, upon Lord Falkland's receiving the ſword as Lord Deputy of Ireland, our Prelate preached a Sermon before him which gave great offence [W]: but at the cenſuring ſome officers on the 22d of November for refuſing to take the oath of ſupremacy, he made a ſpeech in the caſtle of Dublin in defence of that ſupremacy, for which he received a letter of thanks from his Majeſty (z) [X]. 'May it pleaſe your Lordſhips,

'The extraordinary merit of this bearer, Mr Doctor 'Uſher, prevailed with us to offer that favour (which 'we deny to many that move us) to be recommended 'to your Lordſhips; and we do it the rather, becauſe 'we are deſirous to ſet him right in his Majeſty's opi'nion, who it ſeemeth hath been informed, that he is 'ſomewhat tranſported with ſingularities, and unapt'neſs to be conformable to the rules and orders of 'the church. We are ſo far from ſuſpecting him in 'that kind, that we may be bold to recommend him 'to your Lordſhips as a man orthodox, and wor'thy to govern in the church, when occaſion ſhall be 'preſented, and his Majeſty may be pleaſed to advance 'him. He being one that hath preached before the 'ſtate here for eighteen years, and hath been his 'Majeſty's Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity thir'teen years, and a man who has given himſelf over to 'his profeſſion. An excellent and painful preacher, 'a modeſt man, abounding in goodneſs, and his life 'and doctrine ſo agreeable, as thoſe who agree not with 'him are yet conſtrained to love and admire him. And 'for ſuch a one we beſeech your Lordſhips to under'ſtand him, and accordingly to ſpeak to his Majeſty. 'And thus, with remembrance of our humble duties, 'we take leave of your Lordſhips, moſt humbly at 'command. From Dublin the laſt of September, 1619. 'Adam Loftus, Chancellor; Henry Docwra; William 'Metherwold; John King; Dudley Norton; Oliver St 'John; William Tuamenſis; Francis Axingiers.'

Upon this letter the King ſent for him, and, after much converſation upon the ſubject, declared his ſatisfaction in the Doctor, by ſaying, that the Knave Puritan was a bad man, but the Knave's Puritan was an honeſt man (61).

[T] The King nominated him Biſhop of Meath.] Upon this occaſion he received the following letter from the Lord Deputy of Ireland:

'My Lord,

'I thank God for your preferment to the biſhopric 'of Meath. His Majeſty therein hath done egregious 'favour to his poor church here. There is none here 'but are exceeding glad that you are called thereunto: 'Even ſome Popiſh gentlemen themſelves have largely 'teſtified their gladneſs of it. Dublin, Feb. 3, 1620. 'Oliver Grandiſone (62).'

[U] He preached before the Houſe of Commons.] Upon his appointment to preach on the 7th of February, the Prebendaries of Weſtminſter-abbey claimed the privilege of their church, and their exemption from epiſcopal juriſdiction for many years, and offered their ſervice (63); whereupon the Houſe being diſpleaſed, appointed the place to be at the Temple, and he was ordered a ſecond time to preach before them. And Secretary Calvert, by the appointment of the Houſe, ſpoke to the King that the choice of their Preacher might ſtand. The King ſaid it was well done. Feb. 13 the Biſhop was at court, kiſſed the King's hand, and had a conference with him upon his ſermon: when his Majeſty told him he had an unruly flock to look after next Sunday, obſerved that the Houſe were in no proper temper for receiving the Sacrament, that after the late contentions many might eat their own condemnation. He bid the Biſhop tell them he hoped they were prepared, but wiſhed they might be better; to exhort them to unity and concord; to love God firſt, and then their Prince and Country; to look to the urgent neceſſity of the times, and the miſerable ſtate of Chriſtendom; concluding with his dat qui cito dat. Feb. 27 the Houſe ſent Sir James Perrot and Mr Drake to give him thanks, and deſire him to publiſh his ſermon, which was done accordingly (64).

(63) Dr Laud, afterwards Abp of Canterbury, was inſtalled a Prebendary a few weeks before. See his article.

(64) In this ſermon he ſtates the doctrine of Chriſt's preſence in the Sacrament againſt the real preſence. In which view he refers to it in his treatiſe againſt Malone the Jeſuit, ch. iii. in initio, and gives the ſubſtance of it.

[W] A ſermon which gave great offence.] We have an account of this by himſelf in a letter to Lord Grandiſone from Dublin, Oct. 16, 1622, wherein he acquaints that nobleman (late Lord Deputy) that, taking his text in Rom. xiii. He beareth not the ſword in vain, he expreſſed his wiſhes, that if his Majeſty were pleaſed to extend his clemency towards his ſubjects, that were Recuſants, ſome order notwithſtanding might be taken with them, that they ſhould not give us public affronts, and take poſſeſſion of our churches before our faces. 'I alſo intreated, continues he, that, whatever con'nivance were uſed to others, the laws might be ſtrictly 'executed againſt ſuch as had revolted from us (65).' Upon this a report was raiſed that he had ſaid, the ſword had reſted too long in the ſheath. But the reaſon of this addreſs to Lord Grandiſone was what ſome gave out, that he had taxed his Lordſhip with being too remiſs in proſecuting the Papiſts during his government, which he here expreſly denies. However that be, it is certain he fell under the diſpleaſure of his Metropolitan, Dr Hampton, Archbiſhop of Armagh, who wrote him the following letter.

(65) Letter 53 in Parr's collection.

'My Lord,

'In the exceptions taken by the Recuſants againſt 'your ſermon, I cannot be affected as Gallo was at the 'beating of Softhenes, to take nothing for them. I am 'ſenſible of that which my brethren ſuffer: and, if my 'advice had been required, I ſhould have counſelled 'your Lordſhip to give lenitives of your own accord 'for all which was conceived over-harſh or ſharp. The 'Inquiſition, whether an offence were given or taken, 'may add to the flame already kindled, and provoke 'further diſpleaſure; it is not like to pacify anger. 'But let your caſe be as good as Peter's was, when 'the brethren charged him injuriouſly with preaching 'to the uncircumciſed, the great Apoſtle was content 'to give them a public ſatisfaction, Acts ii. and it 'wrought good effects; for the text, ſays his auditors, 'quieverunt & glorificaverunt Deum, it brought peace 'to the congregation and glory to God.

'My noble Lord Deputy hath propounded a way of 'pacification, that your Lordſhip ſhould ſatisfy ſuch of 'the Lords as could be preſent, wherein my poor en'deavours ſhall not be wanting. Howbeit (to ſay in'genuouſly as I think) that is not likely to have ſucceſs; 'for my Lord of Kilkenny and your other friends, try'ing their ſtrength in that kind at Trim, prevailed not, 'but can tell your Lordſhip what is expected. And 'if my wiſhes can take place, ſeeing ſo many men 'having ſomething againſt you, tarry not till they com'plain, but prevent it by a voluntary retractation, and 'milder interpretation of the points offenſive, eſpecially 'of drawing the ſword, of which ſpirit we are not, nor 'ought to be; our weapons are not carnal, but ſpiritual. 'Withal it will not be amiſs, in mine opinion, for your 'Lordſhip to withdraw yourſelf from theſe parts, and 'to ſpend more time in your own dioceſe, that ſuch as 'will not hear your doctrine may be drawn to love and 'reverence your Lordſhip for your hoſpitality and con'verſation (66).'

1623, he was conſtituted a Privy-Counſellor of Ireland (aa), and went not long after to England, by his Majeſty's ſpecial command, in order to carry on a work, which he had begun ſome time before, concerning the antiquity of the Britiſh Churches (bb). This buſineſs keeping him here till the death of Dr Chriſtopher Hampton, Archbiſhop of Armagh, in January 1624, made way for his advancement to that ſee, upon which occaſion he prepared to return to Ireland; but being ſeized with a quartan ague, which held him nine months, it was Auguſt 1626, when he arrived there (cc). Before he left England, he had a diſputation (dd) with a Popiſh Prieſt at Drayton in Northamptonſhire, the ſeat of Lord Mordaunt, afterwards Earl of Peterborough, who thereby became a convert to the Proteſtant religion [Y]. King James granted him the temporalities of the Archbiſhopric, notwithſtanding his abſence, and he was ordered four hundred pounds ſterling out of the revenues of Ireland, by King Charles I, not long after his acceſſion to the throne (ee). Being now at the head of the Iriſh Church, he omitted nothing which might either reform the abuſes, or relieve the wants of it, both in regard to doctrine and diſcipline [Z], keeping a watchful eye to defeat the reſtleſs endeavours of its neareſt and moſt dangerous enemies the Papiſts. In this ſpirit, he oppoſed vigorouſly a deſign which was ſet on foot by them in the winter after his arrival for granting a more full toleration to them [AA]. At the ſame time obſerving the daily an effect, that diverſe of the offenders being ſatisfied they might lawfully take the oath of ſupremacy, did thereby avoid the ſentence of Præmunire, then ready to be pronounced againſt them. It muſt be obſerved, that there had been a ſynodical meeting (as it is called) of the popiſh clergy, together with ſome common lawyers, and Monks of the Ciſtertian, Franciſcan, and Jeſuits order, wherein a decree was made, declaring the abſolute unlawfulneſs of taking this oath of ſupremacy (68).

[Y] He diſputed with a Jeſuit, and converted Lord Mordaunt to the proteſtant religion.] He was ſcarce recovered from his ague, when Lord Mordaunt, a zealous Roman catholic, being greatly deſirous to bring his Lady into the pale of that church, concluded, that there could be no better or more certain way of bringing it about, than to procure a diſputation to be held between two learned and principal perſons, one of each ſide, at which his Lady ſhould be preſent. In that reſolution he choſe, for the champion of his own cauſe, the Jeſuit Beaumont, whoſe true name was Rookwood, being brother to that Rookwood who was executed for the gunpowder treaſon. Againſt this antagoniſt Lady Peterborough choſe our Primate, who, notwithſtanding his health was not ſufficiently confirmed to engage in ſuch a taſk, yet from the ardent zeal for the reformed doctrine, with which he was conſtantly animated, and to ſave a ſoul from falling into the wiles of an artful Jeſuit, he did not refuſe to comply with her Ladyſhip's requeſt. The place appointed for holding the diſputation was my Lord's ſeat at Drayton in Northamptonſhire, a place very proper for the buſineſs, as being furniſhed with a moſt copious library of the writings of all the ancient fathers of the church, which were ready at hand, if it ſhould happen (which is ordinarily the caſe) that any of them ſhould be referred to in the engagement. The heads of the diſpute were agreed to be upon Tranſubſtantiation; the Invocation of Saints; of Images; and the Perpetual Viſibility of the Church. After it had been held for three days, five hours each day, in which our Primate ſuſtained the part of Reſpondent, that office for the fourth day lay upon Beaumont, according to the regulation ſettled by himſelf. But no Jeſuit then appeared. On the contrary, he ſent a letter to the Baron, with an excuſe for the default, alledging, that all the arguments which he had formed had ſlipt out of his memory, nor was he able by any effort to recollect them, imputing the cauſe of the misfortune to a juſt judgment of God upon him, for undertaking of his own accord, without the licence of his Superiors, to engage in a diſpute with a perſon of ſo great eminence and learning as the Primate (*). Such a ſhameful tergiverſation ſunk deeply into the mind of Lord Mordaunt, ſo that, after ſome conferences with the Primate, he renounced popery, and continued in the profeſſion of the proteſtant faith to the end of his life. This account is given in the life of our Archbiſhop by Dr Nicholas Bernard, who ſays he had it from an eye and ear witneſs. And it is in a great meaſure confirmed by the reproach thrown upon Beaumont by Chaloner, a ſecular prieſt, who in a piece wrote againſt the Jeſuit, admoniſhes him to beware of Drayton-houſe, leſt he ſhould there chance to light upon another Uſher, and be again put to flight, to the great diſgrace both of himſelf and his profeſſion (69). As to the Primate, the eminent ſervice done by this diſputation to Lady Peterborough could not but be very ſenſibly felt by her; and that it was ſo, ſhe gave his Grace ſufficient proofs in that extraordinary kindneſs and reſpect which ſhe ſhewed to him all his life after.

(*) To the ſame purpoſe it is ſaid that Sir John Savile once brought our Archbiſhop, under the notion of a country parſon, to diſpute with a learned Jeſuit, who, upon trial, ſaid, that country Vicar had more learning than all the Biſhops in England. Ducat. Leod. p. 626.

[Z] He reformed the doctrine and diſcipline of the Iriſh church.] For that purpoſe he made frequent perſonal viſitations, admoniſhing thoſe of the clergy whom he found faulty, and giving excellent advice and directions to the reſt, charging them to uſe the liturgy of the church in all public adminiſtrations, and to preach and catechiſe diligently in their reſpective cures, and to make the Holy Scripture the rule as well as the ſubject of their doctrine and ſermons. He alſo endeavoured to reform the Proctors, Apparitors, and other officers of the Eccleſiaſtical courts, where there were many great complaints of abuſes and exactions in his Predeceſſor's time (70).

(70) Parr, p. 27, 28.

[AA] He oppoſed a full toleration to the Papiſts.] The propoſitions to which the Papiſts offered to conſent, in caſe of a more full toleration, were to pay their quota towards maintaining 500 horſe and 5000 foot-ſoldiers: Upon which occaſion a general aſſembly of the nation, both Proteſtants and Papiſts, was called by the then Lord Deputy Falkland in the hall of the caſtle of Dublin. The Biſhops, by the Lord Primate's invitation, met firſt at his houſe, where a proteſtation was drawn up in form, importing, that the popiſh religion being ſuperſtitious and idolatrous, a full toleration of it would be ſinful, and moreover a matter of moſt dangerous conſequence. This paper was ſigned by our Archbiſhop at the head of eleven Prelates, one of whom [the Biſhop of Derry] at the next meeting of the aſſembly, April 23, 1627, publiſhed it at Chriſt-church before the Lord Deputy and Council in the middle of his ſermon, wherein he declared warmly againſt the toleration; in which he was ſeconded by the Primate in a ſermon preached the Sunday following before the ſame auditory (71). Hereupon other reſolutions were taken. Mr Bayle (72) having tranſcribed Bates's account (73) of this proceeding of the Biſhops, makes the following remark: 'I am to obſerve, that our Archbiſhop and 'his Suffragans acted according to the principles of thoſe 'who are the moſt rigid enemies to toleration, they not 'grounding their declaration upon political reaſons, 'like moderate men of that party, but only on the 'nature of the worſhip in the popiſh communion, without 'once mentioning its perſecuting ſpirit, which is the only 'reaſon why even ſuch as favour toleration ſuppoſe that it 'ought not to be tolerated.' To paſs by this Critic's rath aſſertion, that the favourers of toleration ground their opinion of exempting Popery only upon account of its perſecuting ſpirit, the contrary of which is notoriouſly evident in our famous Poet Milton, who gives the very ſame reaſon for denying a Toleration to Popery with our Archbiſhop, viz. its idolatry (74). It will be ſufficient to repreſent the true ſtate of the caſe with reſpect to the Primate's conduct, which probably was unknown to Bayle. The Papiſts here underſtood by the Iriſh Biſhops proteſtation were ſuch as either deſcended of the race of the ancient Engliſh, or ſuch as held their eſtates from the crown, who being generally loyal ſubjects to his Majeſty, thereupon took this occaſion to propoſe the ſuſpenſion of the laws againſt Recuſants. This raiſed a murmur among ſeveral of the Proteſtants, for whoſe ſatisfaction it might be very neceſſary for the Biſhops to make the mentioned declaration. But that the Primate had no ſuch ſpirit of Intolerancy as is here intimated by his Accuſer, is evident from what followed, which was, That the Proteſtants, refuſing to contribute their quota to the ſupport of a ſtanding army, were aſſured that the laws againſt Recuſants ſhould remain in full force, and that if the Papiſts, on the other hand, would daily growth and increaſe of Arminianiſm, which was looked on by him as a very dangerous doctrine, he employed ſome time in ſearching into the original of the Prædeſtinarian Controverſy, and meeting with a curioſity upon that ſubject, he publiſhed it in 1631, at Dublin (ff) in 4to [BB]; as he did alſo another in 1632 (gg), Concerning the ancient Iriſh Church [CC]. This year he was likewiſe employed in recovering ſeveral lands belonging to his own dioceſe, in which he was aſſiſted by Archbiſhop Laud (hh). From the time that Lord Wentworth Earl of Stafford held the poſt of Lord Deputy of Ireland, the Archbiſhop left no means untried to improve the revenues of that Church in general [DD], having would give nothing without ſuch a ſuſpenſion, they might perhaps agree that the condition of the kingdom required ſome ſtanding forces. It was reſolved therefore, by the Lord Deputy and Council, that the Primate ſhould, in regard of his great eſteem with all parties, declare, in a ſpeech to the whole aſſembly, the true ſtate of the kingdom, and the neceſſity of a ſtanding army for the defence thereof againſt any foreign invaſions or inteſtine commotions; and conſequently, that a competent ſupply was needful for that purpoſe, and to be raiſed, without any condition whatſoever, as well by the Roman catholic as Proteſtant ſubjects. The ſpeech is too long to be inſerted here, though it is an exquiſite proof of his Lordſhip's abilities in matters of ſtate, and being tranſmitted by the deſire of the Lord Deputy to the King, was well approved by him. The following paſſage in it is apparently a full vindication of the Archbiſhop againſt Bayle's accuſation of a perſecuting ſpirit. 'Where the burden is born, ſays he, in common, and 'the aid required to be given to the Prince by his ſubjects 'of different judgments in religion, it ſtands not with 'the ground of common reaſon, that ſuch a condition 'ſhould be annexed unto the gift as muſt of neceſſity 'deter the one party from giving at all upon ſuch terms 'as are repugnant to their conſciences: as therefore 'on the one hand, if we deſire that the Recuſants 'ſhould join with us in granting a common aid, we 'ſhould not put in the condition of executing the ſtatute, 'which we are ſure they would not yield unto; ſo on 'the other hand, if they would have us to join with 'them in the ſame contribution, they ſhould not require 'the condition of ſuſpending the ſtatute to be added, 'which we in conſcience cannot yield unto. The way 'will be then freely to grant unto his Majeſty, without 'all manner of conditions that may ſeem unequal unto 'any ſide, and to refer unto his own ſacred breaſt how 'far he will be pleaſed to extend or abridge his favour; 'of whoſe lenity, in forbearing to execute the ſtatute, 'our Recuſants have found ſuch experience, that they 'cannot expect a greater liberty, by giving any thing 'that is demanded, than now already they do freely 'enjoy.' The inference from this argument is obvious; That though it could not conſiſt with a conſcientious regard for the ſafety of the true religion, to conſent that Popery, as being idolatrous, ſhould have the ſanction of a law to warrant the exerciſe of it, yet he expreſsly approves his Majeſty's lenity in forbearing to reſtrain that exerciſe, except where the ſafety of the public, and thence of the eſtabliſhed religion therewith, makes it neceſſary. In ſhort, he is for keeping the rod in his hand, but to uſe it ſparingly againſt them. Is not this the principle which is univerſally maintained at this day by the favourers of Toleration?

[BB] He publiſhed a curioſity upon the Predeſtinarian controverſy.] It is entitled, Goteſchalci & predeſtinarianæ Controverſiæ ab Eo motæ hiſtoria (75). Our Author had begun twelve years before to make collections for a hiſtory of Predeſtinarianiſm; but, upon the coming out of that hiſtory by Voſſius (76), he dropt his deſign of publiſhing any thing of it except theſe written by Goteſchalc himſelf, which were not mentioned by Voſſius, and had never been printed. He had procured them out of Corbey abbey in France. Thus he writes to Dr Ward (76), who had aſſiſted him about the ſame time with ſome obſervations touching the nickname of the Predeſtinarians, impoſed by the Semipelagians on the followers of St Auſtin. Hereby it is ſeen how much reaſon we have, at this time of day, to lament the great waſte of time and labour which was thrown away upon this abſurd doctrine by perſons whoſe abilities might have been of ſo much more ſervice to religion and learning upon better ſubjects. The only uſe ſuch productions ſeem to be capable of being turned to at preſent is, to look upon them as ſo many ſea-marks, to avoid falling into the like futilities.

(76) Letter 149 ibid. dated Decemb. 10, 1630, where he writes that it was then finiſhed.

[CC] Another concerning the ancient Iriſh church.] The title of this piece is, Veterum Epiſtolarum Hibernicarum Sylloge, containing a choice collection of letters out of ſeveral ancient manuſcripts, and other Authors, to and from Iriſh Biſhops and Monks, from anno 592 to 1180, concerning the affairs of the Iriſh church; which ſhew the great eſteem, as well for learning as piety, in which the Biſhops and Clergy of that church were held both at Rome, France, England, and elſewhere: with ſeveral matters relating to the great controverſies of thoſe times about the keeping of Eaſter, and alſo every thing relating to the eccleſiaſtical diſcipline and juriſdiction of the church of that kingdom.

[DD] He left no means untried for improving the revenues of the Iriſh church.] A remarkable inſtance of this appears in the warmth with which he oppoſed a patent granted to Sir John Bathe of 300l. per annum, at this time to be paid out of the impropriations. The Primate having given orders to ſtop his patent, received a letter from the Lords Juſtices, deſiring him to declare his motives for it. In anſwer to which he expreſſes himſelf in theſe very warm terms: 'I cannot nor need not 'produce any other reaſon than that which I have done, 'and for the maintenance of the ſufficiency whereof 'I will adventure all I am worth, namely, that, for 'the particular grant now in queſtion, Sir John Bathe's 'letter hath been gotten from his Majeſty by meer ſur'reption, and therefore no patent ought to be paſſed 'thereupon. For though I eaſily grant, that my Lord 'Treaſurer and the Chancellor of the Exchequer might 'certify unto his Majeſty, that there was no other thing 'to be paſſed here but impropriations, though Sir John 'Bathe, I think, hath found already ſomewhat elſe to 'be paſſed in his books, and may do more, if he will 'not be too haſty, but take time to enquire; yet how 'does it appear, that either of theſe two noble gentle'men did as much as know that his Majeſty had taken 'a former order for the ſettlement of theſe things upon 'the church, to which reſolution had they been privy, 'I do ſo preſume of their nobleneſs, and care of the 'publick good, that the remittal of a matter of 2000l. 'would not induce them to divert his Majeſty from 'making good that precious donation, which, by the 'example of his father of never dying memory, he had 'ſolemnly devoted to God and his church; ſuch an 'eximious act of piety as is not to be countervailed 'with 2000l. or 20000l. of any earthly treaſure. 'But whatſoever they knew, or knew not, of his 'Majeſty's own pious reſolution, and conſtant purpoſe 'never to revoke that which he hath once given unto 'God, I reſt ſo confident, as I dare pawn my life upon 'it, that, when he did ſign thoſe letters of Sir John 'Bathe's, he had not the leaſt intimation given unto 'him, that this did any way croſs that former gift, 'which he made unto the church upon ſo great and 'mature deliberation; as being grounded upon the 'advice firſt of the Commiſſioners ſent into Ireland, 'then of the Lords of the Council upon their report 'in England, thirdly of King James that ever bleſſed 'Father of the church, and laſtly of the Commiſſioners 'for Iriſh affairs, unto whom, for the laſt concluſion 'and debating of this buſineſs, I was by his now 'Majeſty referred myſelf at my being in England (77).' But it appears, by Biſhop Laud's anſwer, that the ſeal was put to Sir John Bathe's grant in April before, of which doctrine, ſays that Prelate, you may make this uſe, what cloſe conveyance and carriage there may be when the church is to be ſpoiled (78). Sir John Bathe, to procure this grant, had repreſented that the clergy had a third part of Ireland in their hands: To ſet that matter right, our Author had been at the pains of procuring a rental of all the revenues of the biſhoprics and deaneries, which he ſent to Biſhop Laud. It appears alſo, by a letter of Uſher to Laud (79), that the former was made by his Majeſty Guardian of ſpiritualties for the Iriſh church; and in the ſame letter, recommending his nephew Mr Uſher to the provoſtſhip of Trinity-college, he has this expreſſion, 'I would 'rather loſe my life than not to anſwer the truſt repoſed 'in me by my Sovereign.' Upon the whole it appears, by theſe letters, that he perfectly concurred with Laud in ing for the uſe of it ſome years before obtained a grant from his Majeſty of ſuch impropriations belonging to the crown as were then leaſed out, as ſoon as they ſhould fall (ii). In 1634, a little before the meeting of the Parliament, he preſerved the right of his ſee to the primacy againſt the attempts of the Archbiſhop of Dublin, who challenged it (kk), in conſequence of which his precedency to the Lord Chancellor was obtained at the ſame time. The Convocation meeting together with the Parliament, he had the principal hand in compoſing and eſtabliſhing the Iriſh Canons, in which the liberties of that Church were maintained by him againſt Dr Bramhall, then Biſhop of London-Derry [EE]. All this while he kept a correſpondence in all countries for the advancement of learning [FF], whereby, among in promoting the honour, power, wealth, and revenues of the hierarchy; ſo far was he from giving way to a ſpirit of Puritaniſm.

[EE] He drew up and defended the canons of the Iriſh church.] Biſhop Bramhall propoſed to have the canons of the church of England eſtabliſhed for that of Ireland, without any alteration whatſoever. This was thought ſomething prejudicial to the liberties of the Iriſh church; whereupon it was concluded that the church of Ireland ſhould not be tied to that book, but that ſuch canons ſhould be ſelected out of the ſame, and ſuch others added, as the preſent convocation ſhould think fit, which was accordingly done, as appears from the view of each. It is more than probable that Biſhop Bramhall was influenced by Archbiſhop Laud, who, upon paſſing theſe canons, wrote thus to Uſher: 'For your canons, 'to ſpeak truth, and with liberty and freedom, though 'I cannot but think the Engliſh canons intire (eſpecially 'with ſome amendments) would have done better, yet 'ſince you and that church have thought otherwiſe, 'I do very eaſily ſubmit to it.' His Grace afterwards writes thus: 'As for the particular about ſubſcription, 'I think you have couched that very well, ſince, as it 'ſeems, there was ſome neceſſity to carry that article 'cloſely; and God forbid you ſhould upon any occaſion 'roll back upon your former controverſy about the 'articles (80).' To explain his Lordſhip's meaning, it muſt be obſerved, that in thoſe canons the thirty-nine articles of the church of England were received, and declared to be the confeſſion of the faith of the church of Ireland, to which every clergyman was obliged to ſubſcribe. Upon which Dr Heylin aſſerted, that the Iriſh articles of 1615 abovementioned were now repealed (81). But he recalled this error when he found (the truth) that the Iriſh articles were ſtill retained and confirmed in theſe very canons. The Doctor indeed obſerved, that the inconſiſtency of the ſeveral articles proved the virtual repeal of the Iriſh ones: yet it is plain that this was not ſo underſtood at that time, nor for ſeveral years after, ſince both the Primate and all the reſt of the Iriſh Biſhops, at all ordinations, took the ſubſcription of the party ordained to both ſetts of articles, till the Iriſh rebellion put a ſtop to all ordinations. However, ſince the Reſtoration of King Charles II, a ſubſcription only to the thirty-nine articles of the church of England is required.

[FF] He kept a correſpondence in all parts for the advancement of learning.] We have before, in the courſe of this work (82), mentioned his procuring a Latin tranſlation of the Chronicon Samaritanum by Henry Hottinger, Profeſſor of Hebrew at Zurich in Switzerland; and having alſo referred hither for an account of another of his correſpondents (83), the preſent remark ſhall be employed in diſcharging that promiſe. The perſon was the famous Chriſtian Ravis, Rave, or Ravius. He was born in Berlin, the capital city of the marquiſate, as it then was, of Brandenburg in Germany, anno 1613, and after he had ſpent about eight years in ſome foreign academies, became a ſojourner in Oxford in 1638; much about which time he addreſſed a letter to our Primate, who thereby perceiving his merit, gave him an invitation to come to Dublin, with a proffer of very honourable terms. In the mean time his merit coming to the knowledge of the famous Hugo Grotius, that excellently learned man, unawares to the Primate, commended and afterwards conveyed him with him to Cardinal Richlieu, then Arbiter of France, who, after diſcourſing him in a proper manner, offered to employ him as his Agent in the Eaſtern parts of the world; but Ravius modeſtly declined accepting the propoſal, alledging his obligations to the Engliſh nation, and eſpecially to our Primate, whereupon the Cardinal diſmiſſed him with an honourable donative, ſays my Author, in the preſence of that renowned Ambaſſador Grotius, with whoſe ſon (when a courtier in the court of the King of Sweden, anno 1636) (84), he had acquaintance at Stockholm. It was therefore by the encouragement and munificence of our Primate that Ravius began his travels into the Eaſt. In theſe travels, being at Conſtantinople in 1639, our Primate wrote him a Latin letter, containing a promiſe to allow him 24*l.* a year towards his ſupport, giving him inſtructions to procure, if poſſible, ſome manuſcripts which he mentions to him (85). Here he became acquainted with Dr Pococke, then in that city upon the ſame deſign with Ravius, who, bringing with him ample teſtimonials of his worth, was kindly received by the Engliſh Ambaſſador there, as he was alſo by the Engliſh Conſul of Smyrna, Mr Edward Stringer, a worthy and learned gentleman, who, for Dr Uſher's ſake, was never weary of ſhewing him all the favour he could. After his return into England, (bringing with him a choice treaſure of Oriental manuſcripts) the Primate's bounty was diſpenſed to him with ſo liberal and large a hand, that he confeſſed himſelf to have had all along an exceeding rich ſupply from that learned and religious perſon: and therefore, upon the conſideration of ſo much generoſity, and eſpecially done to a ſtranger, only at the motion of the learned Dr Elielman, he was enjoined by John Gerhard Voſſius, and Lud. de Dieu, as an indiſpenſible duty, to make a ſuitable acknowledgment for the ſame. Ravis was now ſettled in England, and in 1642 reſided at Greſham-college, and afterwards at London-houſe, in both which places he taught the Eaſtern languages, being then ſubſervient to the prevailing party here. Afterwards he took another ramble to Holland, and viſited the principal towns of Amſterdam, the Hague, Utrecht, &c. In the beginning of the year 1648 we find him again in England, whither the hopes of being preferred by the Parliament had brought him.. Accordingly, having taken the Covenant, he was made, by the parliamentary viſitors, Fellow of Magdalen-college in Oxford; but finding few perſons, either in that college or any other, inclined to the ſtudy of the Eaſtern tongues, wherein his excellency lay, he continued there not above a year. He had been encouraged a long time by the parliament committee to expect their favour, in ſucceeding his friend Mr Pococke as Arabic Profeſſor in that Univerſity, a promotion which was much againſt the mind of our Primate, who uſed all his influence to diſſuade him from purſuing his views of it. How far he was wrought upon by this great Patron is not known; but it is certain the deſign miſcarried, and that he afterwards travelled into Sweden, became Profeſſor of the Eaſtern languages in the Univerſity of Upſal there, and that, having married a Swediſh woman, by whom he had a family of children, he was in a ſhort time reduced to great poverty, all the revenues of the profeſſorſhips in that Univerſity being applied to defray the expences of the war in which the Swede was engaged againſt the Dane about 1657. Hereupon he ſettled at Kiel, in the dutchy of Holſatia in Germany, and lived there in a comfortable condition till his death, which happened in 1677 (86). We have the following pieces of his writing: 1. Panegyricæ orationes duæ de linguis Orientalibus, Ultr. 1643-44, 4to. 2. Diſſertatio de ſcribendo Lexico Arabico, Ibid. 1644, 4to. 3. Obteſtatio ad univerſam Europam pro diſcendis rebus et linguis Orientalibus ac conjuganda Africæ atque Aſiæ eruditione, Ibid. 1644, in eight ſheets folio: This was written at Conſtantinople four years before. 4. And notwithſtanding the aforementioned neceſſary avocations in the diſcharge of his epiſcopal office, he proſecuted his ſtudies with indefatigable diligence, the fruits of which appeared in 1638, when he publiſhed at Dublin, in 4to, his Emanuel, or a Treatiſe on the Incarnation of the Son of God (ll), which was followed by his Britannicarum Eccleſiarum [HH] Antiquitates (mm) in the enſuing year. In the beginning of 1640, he came into England with his family, intending (as before) to return in a year or two at fartheſt. Soon after his arrival he went to Oxford (nn) for the more convenience of purſuing his ſtudies: but theſe were unhappily interrupted by the urgent neceſſity of the times which put him upon writing ſome pieces that were publiſhed at Oxford in 1641, upon the ſubject of epiſcopacy [II]: It was about this time alſo, that he drew up his remarkable treatiſe concerning the Power of the Prince, and Obedience of the Subject [KK], and the ſame year being Theſe epiſtles were written to Ravis by ſeveral learned men: Among others there is one of Mr (afterwards Dr) Edward Pococke, dated at Oxford, July 16, 1647, which begins thus: 'Clariſſ. et doctiſſ. Vir, Binas a Te literas accepi, unaque Libellos genuinam ingenii Raviani fœtum, et affectus ſingularis indicium.' And a little after are theſe words: 'Concordantiarum compendium a Te elaboratum avide expectamus, opus haud dubie uſus ſingularis omnibus φιλεβραίοις futurum &c.' 9. Epiſtolæ variæ ad doctiſſimos Viros; beſides other things, as his Catena Magnetica, his Fons Zionis, his Chronologia Biblica, &c.

Our Ravius had a brother, called John Ravius, who was Profeſſor of Eloquence in the Univerſity of Roſtock, who publiſhed an edition of Cornelius Nepos in 1636; as alſo, Tractatus de propoſitionibus modalibus contra Scharfium, 1637, and Logica Noviſſima &c. 1638.

[GG] A very curious copy of the Samaritan Pentateuch, &c.] It was one of the firſt of thoſe Pentateuchs that ever were brought into theſe Weſtern parts of Europe, as Mr Selden (86) and Dr Walton (87) acknowledge; and the Syriac Teſtament was much more perfect than had hitherto been ſeen in theſe parts. The other manuſcripts were procured by the means of one Mr Davits, then a merchant at Aleppo. The Archbiſhop collated the Samaritan with the Hebrew, and marked the differences, after which he intended it for the library of Sir Robert Cotton (88). But this, as well as the other manuſcripts, being borrowed of him by Dr Walton, and made uſe of by him in the edition of the Polyglot Bible, were not recovered out of the hands of that Biſhop's executors till the year 1686, and are now in the Bodleyan library at Oxford.

[HH] Britan. Eccleſ. Antiquitates.] This hiſtory contains a moſt exact account of the Britiſh church, from the firſt planting of Chriſtianity in twenty years after our Saviour's crucifixion. He brings it down, both in Britain and Ireland, to the end of the VIIth century. The piece was of great ſervice, particularly to Dr Lloyd (89) and Biſhop Stillingfleet (90), his followers upon the ſame ſubject. And a good uſe has been made of it by Mr Thoreſby in an imperfect treatiſe, firſt printed in this work (91).

[II] Some pieces upon the ſubject of Epiſcopacy.] Theſe were: 1. The judgment of Dr Reynolds concerning the original of Epiſcopacy defended. 2. The Original of Biſhops, or a chorographical and hiſtorical diſquiſition touching the Lydian or Proconſular Aſia, and the ſeven metropolitical churches contained therein. The deſign of this treatiſe is to prove, from Acts xix. 17. ſupported by Rev. ii. 1. and confirmed by Eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, that Biſhops and Metropolitans were inſtituted by the Apoſtles; meaning only with regard to their ſuperiority in degree; for he did not hold Epiſcopacy to be a ſuperior order to Preſbytery. He alſo endeavours to prove, that the Biſhop of Epheſus was not only the Metropolitan of the Proconſular Aſia, but the Primate or Exarch of all the provinces that were comprehended within the compaſs of the whole Aſian dioceſe; and that he acted ſuitably to the patriarchal juriſdiction, which was in effect conferred upon him. In the proſecution of the argument he ſhews: 1. That the Stars deſcribed in the Revelations are the Angels of the ſeven churches. 2. That theſe Angels were the ſeveral Biſhops of thoſe churches, and not the whole college of Preſbyters. 3. That each of theſe ſeven churches was at that time a metropolis. 4. That theſe Biſhops were ordained by the Apoſtles as conſtant permanent officers in the church, and ſo in a ſort Jure Divino, not to be diſpenſed with except in caſes of neceſſity. Theſe tracts were printed with others upon the ſame ſubject under the following title: Certain briefe treatiſes, written by diverſe learned men, concerning the ancient and moderne government of the church, wherein both the primitive inſtitution of epiſcopacy is maintained, and the lawfulneſs of the ordination of Proteſtant Miniſters beyond the ſeas likewiſe defended, Oxford, 1641, 4to. Some of his Grace's arguments in this learned tract have been generally thought too high-ſtrained even by the orthodox part of Divines. No wonder therefore that Milton's ſpirit was raiſed to the height of exultation upon it. Nor is it more a wonder to find the fiery malevolence of that antiepiſcopal ſpirit falling upon the Archbiſhop in his ſtrongeſt fort, and where he is fairly defenſible againſt any attack whatſoever. His Grace obſerves, that the ground of epiſcopacy is fetched partly from the pattern preſcribed in the Old Teſtament, and partly by the imitation thereof brought in by the Apoſtles. The champion for a Preſbyterian parity takes this poſition to taſk, and, having poured forth a redundancy of wit, void of ſolid reaſoning, to prove the divine inſtitution in the Goſpel of the Preſbyterian form of church government, he concludes in theſe words, which are produced as an exact ſample of all that goes before: 'We may remember then, ſays he, that Prelaty neither hath nor can have foundation in the law, nor yet in the goſpel; which aſſertion, as being for the plainneſs thereof a matter of eyeſight rather than of diſquiſition, I voluntarily admit, not forgetting to ſpecify this note again, that the earneſt deſire which the Prelates have to build their hierarchy upon the ſandy bottom of the law, gives us abundantly to ſee the little aſſurance which they find to rear up their high roofs by the authority of the goſpel; repulſed as it were from the writings of the Apoſtles, and driven to take ſanctuary among the Jews. Hence that open confeſſion of the Primate beforementioned, Epiſcopacy is fetched partly from the pattern of the Old Teſtament, and partly from the New as an imitation of the Old; though nothing can be more rotten in divinity than ſuch a poſition as this, and is all one as to ſay, Epiſcopacy is partly of divine inſtitution, and partly of man's own carving. For who gave the authority to fetch more from the pattern of the law than what the Apoſtles had already fetched, if they fetched any thing at all, as hath been proved they did not. So was Jeroboam's epiſcopacy, partly from the pattern of the law, and partly from the pattern of his own carnality; a party-coloured and a party-membered Epiſcopacy; and what can this be leſs than monſtrous (91)?

[KK] His piece upon the power of the Prince, &c.] This tract was not printed till after the Reſtoration, when it came out with a remarkable preface by Biſhop Sanderſon. It is too well known to need any comment here. We ſhall only take notice, that Dr Parr ſeems to have had this book in his eye (92), where he tells us, 'that, after the ſitting of the long parliament, the Primate made it his buſineſs, as well by preaching as writing, to exhort them to loyalty and obedience to their ing conſulted by the King in the Earl of Strafford's affair, he gave his opinion againſt his Majeſty's ſigning the bill [LL] for attainting that nobleman. In the rebellion which broke out

'their Prince, endeavouring, to the utmoſt of his power, 'to heal up thoſe breaches, and reconcile thoſe differ- 'ences, that were ready to break out both in church 'and ſtate. The book was wrote by the King's com- 'mand, but forborn then to be publiſhed becauſe of the 'increaſing violence of the times.' And, if we may believe the aforementioned writer of the Archbiſhop's life, the reaſon of his not doing it during the time of the Uſurper was, an apprehenſion that either his adherents or others might interpret it to his advantage. It was publiſhed by his Grace's grandſon, James Tyrrel, Eſq; in 1661. Biſhop Sanderſon obſerves (93), that in it every thing may be found which can be met with either in the Holy Scriptures, fathers, philoſophers, common reaſon, and the laws and ſtatutes of the realm, to prove it altogether unlawful for a ſubject to take up arms againſt his ſovereign Prince, and is alſo there made uſe of to the greateſt advantage. Dr Parr has given his Grace's anſwers to ſeveral queries propoſed to him while he was at Oxford concerning this matter, in one of which (94) he gives the following rule for obeying extrajudicial precepts of his Majeſty: "If they be ſuch, ſays he, as command me to be active in doing that which is unjuſt by the known law of the land, he yields true obedience that denies to fulfil ſuch a command: Only this muſt not be generally pronounced as a rule in time of war, where neceſſity will be in many things a ſtronger law than that which is fixed for a peaceable government. But if they be any of ſuch commands as make me only paſſive in requiring ſome of my eſtate by a loan or tax, I may not haſtily ſquare with my Sovereign by denial and ſtanding out: For any man, as he may recede from his right, and that which is his own, ſo ought he not to conteſt with his Sovereign upon matters of no very great moment. As for the infringing of the liberties of the Subject, ſuch taxes or loans, or any other extrajudicial commands, muſt be general, extending to all or moſt ſubjects; and cuſtomary, being often impoſed before they can be judged ſo immediately to infringe the Subject's liberties, as to make a ſubject think he is bound to deny." Hence it appears, that the Archbiſhop knew how to diſtinguiſh between unlimited paſſive obedience and legal reſiſtance. He held every means for defending and maintaining the liberties of the Subject lawful except that of taking up arms againſt him: But all attempts of that kind, either by open violence or ſecret machinations, he abſolutely condemned, as built apparently upon popiſh principles, which he took all proper occaſions to expoſe. In that ſpirit we find him preaching a remarkable ſermon in St Mary's church at Oxford, before the Univerſity, on the fifth of November this ſame year 1640 (95). One Ralph Buckland, a popiſt prieſt, had publiſhed two tracts in 12mo, intitled: 1. Seven Sparks of the enkindled Soul. 2. Four Lamentations, which, compoſed in the hard times of Queen Elizabeth, may be uſed at all times when the church happeneth to be extreamly perſecuted: Drawn out of the Holy Scriptures, after the form of pſalms. To theſe was ſubjoined a Jeſus pſalter. Where or when theſe were printed is not mentioned in the title-page. However, that it was after the acceſſion of King James I. to the crown of England appears in the firſt pſalm, p. 12. thus: By the hand of thy great Servant James ſhake off our yoake, that we may find him an honorable Comforter— Beautify him with a name more precious than his crown; by the true name of a good King, &c. Our Primate having procured a copy of theſe pious pieces, took occaſion in the ſermon juſt mentioned to obſerve, that the ſaid tracts having been printed at Rome in 1603, or thereabouts, the Gunpowder-treaſon, which was not diſcovered till 1605 in England, was known two years before at Rome, where theſe two tracts were printed in 1603, or thereabouts; and that prayers were ſent up there at the ſame time for the proſperous ſucceſs of the ſaid treaſonable plot, which was evident from ſeveral paſſages in theſe tracts, which he read before his audience, as follows: Pſ. ii. p. 25. Confirm their hearts in hope; for the redemption is not far off. The year of viſitation draweth to an end: and Jubilation is at hand.—— Pſ. ii. p. 32. But the memory of Novelties ſhall periſh with a crack: as a ruinous houſe falling to the ground.——Ibid. p. 33. He will come as a flame that burneth out beyond the furnace, &c. His fury ſhall fly forth as thunder—— Pſ. iv. p. 54. The crack was heard into all lands; and made Nations quake for fear.——Ibid. p. 66. In a moment canſt thou cruſh her bones, &c. But we muſt not omit the remarks made hereupon by Mr Wood, who, having informed us, that all theſe paſſages delivered from the pulpit by our learned and godly Archbiſhop were then generally believed, proceeds thus: 'I muſt make bold 'to tell the Reader, being an eager purſuer of truth, 'that, by the ſeveral copies of the ſaid books which 'I have ſeen, it doth not appear at all that they were 'printed at Rome (96), or where elſe: and if it may really 'be gueſſed by the make or mould of the letter where- 'with they were printed, I ſhould rather take them '(as one or more Doctors of the Univerſity do the like) 'to have been printed either at Rheims or Doway, or 'not unlikely at Antwerp: For at Rome there were 'ſeldom before that time, then or ſince, ſuch fine or 'clear letters uſed, as by multitudes of books which 'I have ſeen, that were printed at that place, appears; 'nor indeed ever were or are any Engliſh books printed 'there (97).' This moſt diligently inquiſitive writer furniſhes us, purſuant to the plan of his work, with an account of the author, Ralph Buckland, who, he ſays, was 'an Eſquire's ſon, born and deſcended from an 'ancient genteel family of his name at Weſt Harptree in 'Somerſetſhire, became a Commoner of Magdalen- 'college, Oxford, in Michaelmas term, 1579, aged 'fifteen, or thereabouts; but, before he took a degree, 'went to London, and ſtudied the Common law. At 'length, being inflamed with a love to the Roman 'catholic religion, he left his parents, country, and 'the proſpect of a fair inheritance (for he was the firſt 'heir to his father) and went forthwith (by the inſtiga- 'tion, without doubt, of ſome prieſt) to the Engliſh 'college at Rheims; in which place and at Rome he 'ſpent about ſeven years, in the eager obtaining of 'knowledge in philoſophy and divinity. Afterwards 'being made prieſt, and ſent into the miſſion of Eng- 'land, lived chiefly, I preſume, in his own country, 'and ſpent above twenty years in doing offices belong- 'ing to his profeſſion.' Then follows an account of his writings, beginning with the two tracts abovementioned, which he calls, Two little things that contain ejaculations very full of moſt fervent devotion for the reconcile- ment of England and Scotland to the Romiſh church. The next piece is, An Embaſſage from Heaven, wherein our Lord Chriſt giveth to underſtand his indignation againſt all ſuch as, being catholicly minded, dare yield their preſence to the rites and public prayers of the malignant church, in 8vo, without date of time or place. He alſo tranſlated, from Latin into Engliſh, a book, intitled, De perſecutione Vandelica, lib. 3. written in Latin by Victor, Biſhop of Biſerte or Benſerte in Africa. Alſo the ſix tomes of Laur. Surius, De vitis Sanctorum. After this the concluſion follows in theſe terms: "What elſe our zealous Author hath written and tranſlated I find not as yet, nor any thing elſe of him only that he, dying in 1611, was buried, I preſume, in his own country, near to the graves of his anceſtors, who were all zealous Roman catholics, but ſince not. He left behind him, among the Brethren, the character of a moſt pious and ſeraphical perſon, a perſon who went beyond all of his time for fervent devotion (98)." We have tranſcribed this article of Buckland, in Mr Wood's own words, becauſe it is a remarkable inſtance of the truth of Biſhop Burnet's charge againſt the Antiquary for his partiality to the Roman catholics (99).

[LL] He gave his opinion againſt his Majeſty's ſigning that bill.] His Grace having been miſrepreſented in this matter, we ſhall give a juſt account of it; and firſt from Dr Nicholas Bernard's funeral ſermon, in the preface to which he declares he had the account from the Primate himſelf in writing, as follows: 'That Sunday morn- 'ing wherein the King conſulted with the four Biſhops '(of London, Durham, Lincoln, and Carliſle) the 'Archbiſhop of Armagh was not preſent, being then 'preaching (as he then accuſtomed every Sunday to do) 'in the church of Covent-garden; where a meſſage 'coming unto him from his Majeſty, he deſcended 'from the pulpit, and told him that brought it, he was 'then, as he ſaw, employed about God's buſineſs; 'which as ſoon as he had done, he would attend upon 'the King to underſtand his pleaſure. But the King 'ſpending the whole afternoon in the ſerious debate 'of the Lord Strafford's caſe with the Lords of the 'Council and the Judges of the land, he could not 'before evening be admitted into his Majeſty's preſence.

out this year in Ireland, the Popiſh party made ſpoil of all the effects of the Primate, except ſome furniture in his houſe at Drogheda, and his library there, which were conveyed thence to Cheſter. Thus deprived and plundered, he never more ſaw his native country, and had the Biſhoprick of Carliſle, lately vacant by the death of Dr Potter, given him by the King to hold in commendam; but the revenues of it were much impaired by the quartering of the Scotch and Engliſh armies upon it: neither did he above once or twice receive the annual penſion of four hundred pounds voted to be given him by the Parliament, upon their ſeizing the Biſhop's lands [MM]. In 1642, he returned to Oxford, where beſides his cloſe

'There the queſtion was again agitated, whether the 'King in juſtice might paſs the bill of attainder againſt 'the Earl of Strafford; for that he might ſhew mercy 'to him was no queſtion at all, no man doubting but 'that the King, without any ſcruple of conſcience, 'might have granted him a pardon, if other reaſons 'of ſtate, in which the Biſhops were made neither 'Judges nor Adviſers, did not hinder him. The whole 'reſult therefore of the determination of the Biſhops 'was to this effect, that therein the matter of fact and 'matter of law were to be diſtinguiſhed. That of mat-'ter of fact he himſelf might make a judgment; having 'been preſent at all the proceedings againſt the Earl, 'where, if, upon hearing the allegations on either ſide, 'he did not conceive him guilty of the crimes where-'with he was charged, he could not in juſtice condemn 'him. But for matter of law, what was reaſon, and 'what was not, he was to reſt in the opinion of the 'Judges, whoſe office it was to declare the law, and 'who were ſworn therein to carry themſelves indiffer-'ently between him and his ſubjects, which gave his 'Majeſty occaſion to complain of the dealing of the 'Judges with him not long before; that, having ear-'neſtly preſſed them to declare in particular, what point 'of the Lord Strafford's charge they judged to be trea-'ſonable, (foraſmuch as, upon hearing of the proofs 'produced, he might in his conſcience perhaps find him 'guiltleſs of the fact) he could not by any means draw 'them to nominate any in particular, but that, upon 'the whole matter, treaſon might juſtly be charged 'upon him. And in this ſecond meeting it was ob-'ſerved, that the Biſhop of London ſpake nothing at 'all; but the Biſhop of Lincoln not only ſpake, but 'put a writing alſo into the King's hand, wherein what
(100) Parr, p. 46. 'was contained the reſt of his brethren knew not (100).'
This account is certainly ſufficient to any candid Enquirer. But it having been laid to the Primate's charge, that he perſuaded the King to ſign this bill out of revenge, becauſe the Earl, when Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, had outwitted him, and made him the inſtrument, before he was aware, of abrogating the Iriſh articles of religion, that pretence has been invalidated, as we have already ſeen, by Dr Parr, who expoſes it ſmartly enough, obſerving, that if the Primate had any private grudge againſt the Earl upon this ſcore, he carried it very ſlily, inſomuch that neither the Earl himſelf nor any of his friends were ſenſible of it. For, ſays he, whilſt the Earl continued in Ireland, there never was any diſpute or unkindneſs between them, but they parted good friends. The Earl wrote to him after this buſineſs, and not long before his going for England, full of kindneſs and reſpect. And after the Earl's commitment to the black rod, as alſo when he was a priſoner in the Tower, the Primate frequently viſited him, and the Earl was pleaſed to conſult with him in divers matters relating to his defence at his trial. Now certainly, had the Earl believed that the Primate bore any malice towards him, much more had adviſed the King to put him to death (which could not have been well concealed from him) though we may ſuppoſe the Earl had ſo much Chriſtian charity as to forgive ſo great an injury, yet, it is not very likely that he ſhould exerciſe ſuch a piece of mortification as to chuſe him, whom he believed to be the promoter of his death, to prepare him for it, and to be the man to whom he addreſſed his ſpeech upon the ſcaffold, and whoſe aſſiſtance he deſired in that his laſt extremity. Dr Parr likewiſe
(101) Page 61. aſſures us (101), that, in the Primate's extreme illneſs at St Donate's caſtle in Wales, he aſked his Grace whether he had adviſed the King to paſs the bill againſt the Earl of Strafford. To which the Primate anſwered: I know there is ſuch a thing moſt wrongfully laid to my charge; for I neither gave nor approved of any ſuch advice, as that the King ſhould aſſent to the bill againſt the Earl; but, on the contrary, told his Majeſty, that, if he was ſatisfied, by what he had heard at his trial, that the Earl was not guilty of treaſon, his Majeſty ought not in conſcience to conſent to his condemnation. And this the King knows well enough; and can clear me, if he pleaſes. Nor was the Primate, continues Dr Parr, miſtaken in this: For when, not long after, it was told his Majeſty at Oxford, that the Archbiſhop of Armagh was dead, he ſpoke to Colonel William Legg and Mr Kirk, then of the Bedchamber, to this effect, 'that he was very ſorry for his death,' together with high expreſſions of his piety and merits. And when one there preſent replied, 'that he believed 'he might be ſo, were it not for his perſuading your 'Majeſty to conſent to the Earl of Strafford's execution.' To which the King in a great paſſion returned, that it was falſe; 'for, ſaid he, after the bill was paſt, the 'Archbiſhop came to me, ſaying, with tears in his eyes, 'Oh Sir! what have you done? I fear that this act may 'prove a great trouble to your conſcience, and pray God 'that your Majeſty may never ſuffer by the ſigning of this 'bill;' or words to that effect (102). Moreover it is certain, that his Majeſty, the next day after he had ſigned the bill, and the day before the Earl's execution, pitched upon the Primate as the fitteſt perſon to be entruſted with a meſſage of the moſt intereſting nature, to be delivered privately to the Earl. We have a letter, written by Mr Radcliff to William Earl of Strafford (ſon to the former Earl) the contents of which are as follows:

(102) Of this Dr Parr had an affidavit, ſigned by the perſons here named.

'My Lord,

May 11, 1641.

The King wiſheth me to deliver unto my Lord Strafforde tomorrow,

1. That if the King's life only were hazarded thereby, he would never have given paſſage unto his death.
2. That the execution, without extreme danger, could not be deferred.
3. That he was moved by the Lords for his wife and children, and intended to diſpoſe his entire eſtate upon them.
4. That if his ſon be capable, he will take eſpecial notice of him for his employment and preferment (which I muſt tell none but him).
5. That for Lord Chancellor Lowther and Derry, he ſtops the proceedings, until they give good reaſon for their authority.
6. Lord Dillon's ability above all the Natives.
7. Earl of Ormond will be Knight of the Garter in his place.
8. Carpenter to be at liberty to look to his eſtate, or any one whom he ſhall appoint to have care of his children (103).

[MM] He was plundered upon ſeizing of the Biſhop's lands.] Dr Bernard, in his funeral ſermon, tells us, that about this time Cardinal Richelieu invited him into France, with a promiſe of a very noble penſion, beſides freedom of his religion: And Dr Parr obſerves this is not unlikely (though he never heard his Lordſhip ſpeak of it) from an inſtance of the honour that Cardinal ſhewed him, upon receiving a preſent of his treatiſe of the antiquity of the Britiſh churches, by a letter full of kindneſs and reſpect, accompanied with a gold medal of conſiderable value, with his own effigies ſtampt upon it, which, ſays Dr Bernard, is ſtill preſerved. close application to study, he preached every Sunday at some of the churches [NN]. The following year he was nominated one of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, but was so far from complying to it, that he even spoke against their authority in some of his sermons, upon which he was not only voted out again, but his library seized by the Parliament; yet he met with some friends who redeemed it [OO]. In 1644, he published (oo) at Oxford Polycarpi et Ignatii Epistolæ, &c. (pp). Quibus præfixa est non de Ignatii solum et Polycarpi Scriptis sed etiam de Apostolicis Constitutionibus et Canonibus Clementi Romano Attributis Dissertatio: Upon the decline of the King's affairs, Oxford being threatened with a siege, he left that city, and retired to Caerdiffe in Wales to the house of Sir Timothy Tyrrel, who had married his only daughter, and was then Governor of that garrison, and General of the Ordnance. Having brought many chests of books with him, he prosecuted his studies here undisturbed for six months, and made a good progress in the first part of his Annals: Till this garrison was same writer also says, that the University of Leyden offered at this time to chuse him their honorary Professor, with an increase of the stipend. It is true, these facts are somewhat questioned by Dr Smith (104), who however does not omit mentioning, that the Primate was invited ten years afterwards by Anne of Austria to that kingdom (105), but upon what terms he could not tell.

[NN] He preached every Sunday at one or other of the churches in Oxford.] He had generally a crowded audience, and, as he preached frequently at the church of All-hallows, joining to Lincoln-college (106), Thomas Marshall, then a young Student of that college, constantly attended his Grace's sermons there, which so exceedingly wrought upon his affections, that he resolved from thenceforth to make him the pattern of all the religious and learned studies and conduct of his life, and therefore could never after endure those that should, in their common discourse and writings, reflect in the least on our sacred Prelate. This Dr Marshall became afterwards an exemplary Divine, and an eminent Critic in the Gothic and Saxon languages, and on that account challenges some further notice to be taken of him in these memoirs. He was the son of a father of both his names, was born at Barkebey in Leicestershire, educated there in grammar-learning under Francis Foe, Vicar of that town, entered a Batchelor in Lincoln-college in Michaelmas term, 1640, aged nineteen years, and on the 31st of July the following year he was elected one of Robert Trapp's scholars in that house, about which time it was that he became a constant auditor of Archbishop Usher at All-hallows church, the advowson whereof is in that college. Soon after Oxford being garrisoned upon the breaking out of the rebellion, he bore arms therein for his Majesty in the regiment of Henry Earl of Dover at his own proper costs and charges, and therefore in 1645, when he stood candidate for the degree of Batchelor of Arts, he was admitted thereto without paying fees. But, upon the approach of the parliamentary visitation, he left the University, crossed the seas, and became Preacher to the English merchants at Rotterdam and Dort, in the place of Henry Tozer, deceased (a). In 1661 he was admitted Batchelor of Divinity, and four years after, publishing Observations on the Evangelists, did thereby revive the memory of himself so much in his college, that the Society chose him Fellow thereof without his knowledge or seeking, Dec. 17, 1668. In the year following he proceeded Doctor in his faculty, and upon the promotion of Dr Crew to the see of Oxford (*), he succeeded that munificent benefactor in the rectory of his college, and was afterwards appointed Chaplain in ordinary to his Majesty. In the month of May, 1680, he became Rector of Bladon near Woodstock in Oxfordshire; and, upon the promotion of Doctor Frampton to the see of Gloucester, he was nominated Dean of that church in January, 1680; in which deanery being installed on the 30th of April, 1681, he resigned the rectory of Bladon in February, 1682. Neither did he live to enjoy the Deanery many years, his death happening suddenly at his lodgings at Lincoln-college, early in the morning of the 19th of April, 1685. He was buried in that chancel commonly called the college-chancel of the church of All-hallows, or All-saints aforementioned. By his last will and testament he gave to the public library of the University of Oxford all such of his books, whether manuscripts or printed, that were not then in the said library, except only such as were in his said will otherwise disposed of: and the remaining part to Lincoln-college library, that is, such as were not already there at that time. Also he gave to the said college the money that should be raised by the sale of his estate: This amounted to the sum of 600l. and upwards, with which was purchased 14l. per annum, a fee-farm-rent issuing out of the manor of little Dean in Gloucestershire, and 12l. per annum, a rent-charge out of some lands in Brill in Bucks: Which benefaction is now enjoyed by three scholars of the society. Upon the whole, the Oxford Antiquary does him no more than strict justice, when he records him as a person very well versed in books, a noted Critic, especially in the Gothic and English Saxon tongues, a painful preacher, a good man, and a good Governor, and one every way worthy of his station in the church. He hath written: 1. Observationes in Evangeliorum versiones perantiquas duas Gothica scil. et Anglo-Saxonica &c. Dordrecht, 1665, in a thick large 4to. 2. The Catechism set forth in the book of Common-prayer, briefly explained by short notes, grounded upon Holy Scripture. Oxford, 1679, 8vo. The short notes were drawn up and composed by our Author at the desire and motion of Dr Fell, Bishop of Oxford, to be used by the ministers of his diocese in catechizing the children of their respective parishes. In other editions, that followed soon after, was added, An Essay of Questions and Answers framed out of the same notes, for the exercise of youth, by the same hand: Which catechism, with the notes and essay, was translated into Welsh by John Williams, a Cambridge scholar, but Tutor to a nobleman of Jesus-college in Oxford, printed at Oxford, 1682, 8vo. 3. An Epistle for the English reader, prefixed to Dr Thomas Hyde's translation, into the Malayan language, Of the four gospels of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the Acts of the Apostles, Oxford, 1677, 4to, in a sheet and a half. Dr Marshall did also take a great deal of pains in compleating the life of Primate Usher, published by Dr Richard Parr, but died before it saw the light (107).

(106) This church has been since rebuilt, and situated in the High-street, at some small distance from the college.

[OO] He met with friends who redeemed it.] It was seized by the Committee of Delinquents estates, and would have been sold by them, had not Dr Fealty, who was then in some favour with them (108), made interest, by the means of Mr Selden, to obtain them for his own use, either as a gift, or by laying down some money for them; and so got them into his hands, and secured them for the Primate. But several were either embezzled or stolen whilst in their custody. Among others, diverse papers and collections of his own writing, with all his letters, either to or from his learned friends, which he had left behind him, were then plundered.

(108) He sat in the Assembly of Divines, though otherwise orthodox and loyal. He had been Chaplain to Abp Abbot. Some of his letters to our Author are in Parr's Collection.

(a) There is something singular in the character of this Divine, who was a Devonshire man, born in 1602, elected Fellow of Exeter-college in 1623, and, taking holy orders, became a useful person in the society, by moderating, reading to Novices, and lecturing in the chapel. He afterwards proceeded B. D. and became an able and painful Preacher, had much of the primitive religion in his sermons, and seemed to be a most precise Puritan in his looks and life, on which account his preachings and expoundings in the churches of St Gyles and St Martin in Oxford were much frequented by the puritannical party. But being elected one of the Assembly of Divines in 1643, he refused to sit among them. In 1646, a little before the garrison of Oxford was surrendered to the Parliament, he was one of those Divines who, having either preached at Christ-church before his Majesty, or at St Mary's before the Parliament, were nominated by the Chancellor of the University for the degree of D. D. but this also he, as others, refused. In 1647 and 1648 he behaved himself as a stout champion against the unreasonable proceedings of the parliamentary visitors: For which being posted up by them for an expelled scholar, they revoked the sentence so far, that by an order, dated Nov. 2, 1648, they empowered him to use his chamber in Exeter-college, and also ordered that he should enjoy a traveller's allowance for three years: Upon which he went to Holland, and became Minister to the English merchants at Rotterdam, where he died in 1650, and was buried in the English church there, appointed to the said merchants. He published Directions for a Godly life, especially for communicating at the Lord's table, Oxon. 1628, 8vo. and then again the tenth time in 1680, 8vo 2. Dicta & facta Christi, ex quatuor Evangelistis collecta, et in ordine disposita, Oxford, 8vo. Besides several sermons; as, 1. A Christian amendment. 2. Christian wisdom &c. 3. A sermon on John xvii. 3. printed respectively at Oxford in 1633, 1639, and 1646 (*).

unfurniſhed for the King's ſervice, and his ſon-in-law obliged to give up his poſt, and quit the place. In this exigence, he very gladly accepted of an invitation from Lady Dowager Stradling to come to the caſtle at St Donate. But in paſſing thither, he unluckily fell into the hands of the Mountaineers, who ſtript him of all his books and papers, which yet were afterwards in a great meaſure recovered by the kindneſs of the Clergy, and Gentlemen of that country [PP]; and he met with an excellent library at St Donate, which he did not neglect to make uſe of while he was able; but within a month after his arrival, he was ſeized with a fit of ſickneſs, which reduced him to the laſt extremity (qq). After his recovery, he went to London by the invitation of the Counteſs of Peterborough [QQ], at whoſe houſe he arrived in June, 1646(*); and in the beginning of the next year was choſen Preacher to the Society of Lincoln's-Inn [RR]. This year he publiſhed his treatiſe De Romanæ Eccleſiæ Symbolo (rr), which following by his Diſſertatio de Macedonum et Aſianorum anno ſolari in the beginning of 1648, 8vo (ss) [SS]. About this time he was ſent for to the Iſle of Wight by his Majeſty, to aſſiſt him in treating with the Parliament upon the point of epiſcopacy; when he propoſed an expedient, which he called Preſbyterian and Epiſcopal Government conjoined (tt) [TT], which the King approved as the likelieſt means of reconciling the [PP] He was robbed by &c.] The Mountaineers, juſt as he was ready to go, got up, to the number of ten thouſand, in arms, in a tumultuous manner, and, chuſing officers, formed themſelves into a body, as was pretended, for the King: but they would neither be governed by Engliſh commanders, nor ſuffer any Engliſh garriſons in the country. To avoid theſe men, who lay between Caerdiffe and Donate, ſome perſons in Caerdiffe, at the requeſt of the Governor, undertook to convey him through by-ways; but they unluckily fell into the hands of a ſtraggling party that was ſcouting thereabouts, who, carrying them to the main body, immediately broke open the Primate's cheſt of books, &c. and ranſacking his manuſcripts, and papers of his own writing, theſe were quickly diſperſed into a thouſand hands; nor ſo content, they pulled the Primate and his daughter, and other ladies, from their horſes; all which he bore with his uſual patience and a ſeeming unconcernedneſs; when ſome of their officers (who were gentlemen of the country) coming in, ſeemed very much aſhamed of this barbarous treatment, and cauſed their horſes and other things to be reſtored: but the books and papers could not then be retrieved. They afterwards conducted him back to Sir John Aubery's houſe, not far off, where he was very civilly received, and lodged that night. When he came thither, and had retired himſelf, 'I muſt confeſs,' ſays Dr Parr, that I never ſaw him 'ſo much troubled in my life; and thoſe that were with him before myſelf ſaid, that he ſeemed not more 'ſenſibly concerned for all his loſſes in Ireland than for 'this; ſaying to his daughter and thoſe that endeavoured to comfort him; I know that it is God's hand, 'and that I muſt endeavour to bear it patiently; though I 'have too much human frailty not to be extremely concerned; 'for I am touched in a very tender place; and he has thought 'fit to take from me at once all that I have been gathering 'together above theſe twenty years, for the advancement 'of learning and the good of the church.' Divers of the neighbouring gentry and clergy came to viſit him next day, and, condoling his loſs, promiſed to do their utmoſt to retrieve his books and papers, if not torn and burnt, and civilly attended him to St Donate, and by publiſhing in the churches every where in thoſe parts, that all who had any ſuch books or papers ſhould bring them to their maſters or landlords, there was brought, within two or three months, almoſt all his books and papers; ſo that we found not many wanting (110).

(110) Parr, p. 59, 60. The moſt remarkable were two MSS. mentioned in remark [Q]. As alſo another MS. catalogue of the Perſian Kings, communicated by Eliæmannus; and one Vol. of MS. variæ lectiones of N. T.: and of printed books, only Tully's works, and ſome others. The variæ lectiones were ſuch as were collected at Oxford: thoſe done out of the Cambridge copies were ſaved, and ſeveral years after conſulted by Dr Hammond in preparing his notes upon the N. T.

[QQ] He went to London &c.] Before he left Wales, his finances being much reduced by an expenſive ſickneſs, as well as by removals, the year paſt, ſeveral gentlemen of the country ſent him, unknown to each other, divers conſiderable ſums; ſo that in a few weeks he had enough to ſupply all his preſent occaſions, and alſo to defray the expences of his journey to England. This was conſidered by him as a particular Providence, for which he was very thankful. It is certain the ſupply was very ſeaſonable: For it now began not to be ſafe for him to ſtay at St Donate. Wherefore Oxford being like to be taken, and not caring willingly to truſt himſelf at London, he reaſſumed his former thoughts of paſſing beyond-ſea; and, having provided a veſſel, had procured a paſs for that purpoſe from the Earl of Warwick, then Admiral. But, as they were preparing to go, there came into the road before Caerdiffe a ſquadron of ſhips under the command of one Moulton, Vice-admiral for the Parliament. Whereupon the Primate ſent his Chaplain to him, then on ſhore at Caerdiffe, to know if he would ſuffer him to go, ſhewing the paſs; which Moulton not only refuſed to comply with, but ſaid, if he could get the Primate into his hands, he would carry him to the Parliament, and threatened to ſend the Chaplain immediately to his ſhip. So that this invitation from Lady Peterborough was exceedingly welcome to the Primate; and, having procured paſſes, he left St Donate's, after almoſt a year's reſidence there (111).

(111) Parr, p. 63.

[RR] He was choſen Preacher at Lincoln's-Inn.] The Society ordered him handſome lodgings, ready furniſhed, and divers rooms for his library, which was about this time brought up from Cheſter, being almoſt all the remains of his ſubſtance that had eſcaped the rebels. Mr (afterwards Lord Chief Juſtice) Hale was then a Bencher of the Society, and probably had the chief hand in procuring him this place; and it happened that the Society was well rewarded for it by that treaſure lodged in this library by the Lord Chief Juſtice in four volumes, which were extracted from the Primate's MSS (112); of which Dr Parr has ſubjoined to his life of the Primate a Catalogue, conſiſting of thirty-three very curious books. Here the Primate conſtantly preached all the Term time for almoſt eight years, till at laſt, his eyeſight and teeth beginning to fail him, he could not well be heard in ſo large a congregation, and was forced to quit this place about a year and a half before his death, to the great regret of that Society (113).

(112) In the catalogue of the Chief Juſtice's MSS. which he left them, they are called, Chronological Remembrances, extracted out of the notes of Bp Uſher.

[SS] De Aſianorum anno ſolari.] In this tract, beſides fixing the exact time of St Polycarp's martyrdom, he hath compared the Grecian and Macedonian months with the Julian and other nations, and, having laid down the method and diſpoſition of the Macedonian and Aſiatic year, he adds rules for finding out the cycles of the Sun and Moon, and Eaſter for ever, with ſeveral curious accounts of the celeſtial motions according to the ancient Greek Aſtronomers, Melon, Calippus, Eudoxus, and others. To which is annexed an Ephemeris, or intire Greek and Roman Calendar for the whole year, with the riſing and ſetting of the ſtars in that climate.

[TT] Preſbyterian and Epiſcopal government conjoined.] Soon after his arrival, the King having conſented, though unwillingly, to the ſuſpenſion of Epiſcopacy for three years, would by no means agree to the abſolute abolition of it, which was obſtinately inſiſted on by the Preſbyterians: wherefore, to put a ſtop to the preſent career of the preſbyterian diſcipline, this expedient was deviſed by the Primate (114), which, not long after his coming thither, he delivered to his Majeſty, who had before, in his laſt meſſage to the Parliament, conſented to the reducing of Epiſcopal Government into a much narrower compaſs, viz. not only to the Apoſtolical Inſtitution, but to the taking away of Archbiſhops, Deans, and Chapters, &c. and ſettling preſbyterian government for three years, as has been ſaid. This was more than was propoſed by the Primate's plan, which ſuppoſes the Archbiſhops or Primates ought to be continued, appointing them Moderators of the Provincial Synods of Suffragans and Paſtors. It is true, he mentions Biſhops as to be only Preſidents of the Dioceſan Synods; yet he no where denies them a negative voice in that Aſſembly. And though in the beginning he ſays, that the Biſhops in the primitive times were wont to do nothing of moment without the advice of a ſynod of their clergy, as he proves from divers quotations out of the Fathers and ancient Councils; yet he does not aſſert this practice as a thing of divine and unalterable right (as the Scotch kirk does) but only as the cuſtom and practice of the church in thoſe times, which, being

(114) It had been drawn up long before by him, if we may believe Dr Bernard, who publiſhed it in 1658, with this title, The Reduction of Epiſcopacy to the form of the Synodical government in the ancient church. Written in 1641 by that reverend and learned Father of the church, James Uſher, Abp of Armagh, Primate of all Ireland. Dr Bernard alſo, in his Clavi Trabales, inſerted two letters of the Primate's upon church government. the then differences. But no propoſals, how moderate ſoever, were able to ſatisfy the Preſbyterians, till his Majeſty was taken out of their hands by the army, and brought to the ſcaffold, the ſight of which ſtruck our Primate with the utmoſt horror [UU]. In 1650, he publiſhed the firſt part of his Annals of the Old Teſtament (uu). In 1652 came out his Epiſtola ad Ludovicum Capellum de variantibus Textus Hebraici Lectionibus, at London, 4to. In 1654, Cromwell now raiſed to the Supreme Dignity with more than Kingly Power, under the title of Protector, thought it would become that character to put on the air and manner of a gracious Sovereign, equally regarding all his ſubjects with a paternal care, without diſtinction of parties or profeſſions. In this diſpoſition he began to ſhew favour to ſome of the orthodox Clergy of the Church of England: Among theſe was Dr Nicholas Bernard, who had been the Lord Primate's Chaplain in Ireland, and was afterwards Dean of Kilmore. Cromwell having ſaved his life at the taking of Drogheda, had now made him his Chaplain, when his Highneſs in the ſame humour ſending for the Primate, received him with great kindneſs and civility [WW], and the following year gave him a promiſe to grant liberty of conſcience to the epiſcopal Clergy [XX], which being evaded by the Uſurper, occaſioned the Primate thereupon to predict the King's Reſtoration [YY]. The only prudential, may be altered according to the exigency or circumſtances of affairs. And though, in Sect. II. of this expedient, he propoſes the making of as many Suffragans in each dioceſe as there are rural deaneries in the ſame, and who ſhould aſſemble a ſynod of all the Rectors or Miniſters of their precinct; yet their power was only to be according to the ſtatute of 26 Henry VIII. whereby they are expreſsly forbid to act in any matters, but by the authority of, and in ſubordination to, their dioceſan Biſhops. Nor does he extend their power farther than to be Moderators of this leſſer ſynod, where matters of diſcipline and excommunication only were to be determined, ſtill reſerving power of ordination to the Dioceſan, which was no where given from him in this expedient. Neither was this power of excommunication left abſolutely to this leſſer ſynod, without an appeal to the dioceſan ſynod of the Suffragans and the reſt of the Paſtors, wherein the Biſhop was to preſide. Thus much I ſhall ſay, continues Dr Parr, that it was not the Primate's deſign or intention to rob the Biſhops of any of thoſe juſt rights which are eſſentially neceſſary to their order and conſtitution, and without debaſing Epiſcopacy into Preſbytery, or ſtripping the church of its lands and revenues, both which he always abhorred. However, as his Majeſty's propoſal was voted unſatisfactory before this ſcheme was delivered to him, there was no room to offer it; the Preſbyterians, as Dr Parr obſerves, being bent to aboliſh the very order of Biſhops (115), that no propoſals of his Majeſty, though ever ſo moderate, would content them; till at laſt, when they had wrangled ſo long as to ſee the King's perſon ſeized by the army, and that the power was likely to be taken out of their hands, then they grew wiſer, and would have agreed to his propoſals when it was too late; and ſo, continues the Doctor, the Preſbyterian party ſaw themſelves within a few days after forcibly excluded, and turned out of doors by that very army which they themſelves had raiſed, and hired to fight againſt their Prince; which, as it was the cauſe of his Majeſty's deſtruction, ſo it proved their own ruin (116).

(115) Thus it happened, as in the famous Interim many years before in Germany, that neither ſide were pleaſed with this expedient: In which Dr Smith complains, that the Biſhops, being ſtript of their peculiar power, both of order and juriſdiction, were left a meer empty name and ſhadow. [UU] The King's execution ſtruck him with horror.] The Counteſs of Peterborough's houſe, where the Primate then lived, being exactly oppoſite to Charing-Croſs, ſeveral of the family, at the time of the King's execution, went up to the leads of the houſe, which commanded a full view of Whitehall; and, as ſoon as his Majeſty came upon the ſcaffold, ſome of them went down and told the Primate, aſking him if he would not ſee the King once more before he was put to death. Though unwilling at firſt, yet he was perſuaded at length to go up, as well out of a deſire to ſee the King once again as curioſity, ſince he could ſcarce believe what they told him unleſs he ſaw it. When he came upon the leads, his Majeſty was in his ſpeech: The Primate ſtood ſtill, and ſaid nothing, but ſighed, and, lifting his hands and eyes full of tears towards heaven, ſeemed to pray earneſtly. But when the King had done ſpeaking, and had taken off his cloaths and doublet, and ſtood ſtript in his waiſtcoat, and the executioners in vizards began to put up his hair, the Primate grew pale, and began to faint; ſo that, if he had not been obſerved by his own ſervant, and ſome others who ſtood near, and thereupon ſupported him, he had ſwooned away. Upon this, they preſently carried him down, and laid him on his bed, where he made uſe both of tears and prayers; tears that ſo horrid a ſin ſhould be committed, and prayers that God would give his Prince patience and conſtancy to undergo thoſe cruel ſufferings, and that he would not, for the vindication of his own honour, permit ſo great a wickedneſs to paſs unpuniſhed (117). And he kept the 30th of January a private faſt as long as he lived.

(117) Id. p. 72. who tells us he had this from the Primate's grandſon, who heard it from his ſervant, that lived with him till his death.

[WW] Cromwell received him very kindly.] The converſation might not improbably (as Dr Parr was informed) turn chiefly about advancing the Proteſtant intereſt, as well at home as abroad, to which Cromwell made great pretences. And it was ſaid that, either now or ſome other time, he gave the Primate a penſion for life (118); the truth of which is much queſtioned by Dr Parr, who however tells us he remembered the Primate's ſaying that Oliver had promiſed to make him a leaſe of the lands belonging to the archbiſhopric of Armagh for twenty-one years, which he thought it no harm to accept, conſidering it was but his own, and which he had been deprived of above half that time, eſpecially in conſideration of his daughter, and many grandchildren, for whom he had as yet been able to do nothing. And if the church ſhould happen to be reſtored before that time, it could loſe nothing by this grant; and if not, he thought his children might as well reap the benefit of it as others. But though Dr Bernard, in his Epiſtle to the Reader, prefixed to the life of the Primate, was made (by Cromwell's Secretary who then had the copy in his power) to publiſh as if this grant had been really paſſed, yet the Uſurper was craftier than ſo; and as he delayed paſſing it as long as the Primate lived, ſo, after his death, he made a pretence (by imputing malignancy to the Primate's ſon-in-law and daughter) to free himſelf from that promiſe (119).

(118) This is aſſerted in the Primate's life, prefixed to a then late edition of the Body of Divinity.

(119) Parr, p. 73.

[XX] A promiſe of liberty of conſcience to the Epiſcopal clergy.] It was by the particular deſire of the Epiſcopal clergy in and about London, that the application had been made for this favour to Cromwell, who promiſed him they ſhould not be moleſted, provided they meddled not with any matters relating to his government. But when he went again, to get this promiſe ratified and put in writing, he found the Protector under the hands of his ſurgeon, who was dreſſing a great boil that he had then upon his breaſt. So he begged the Primate to ſit down, ſaying he would ſpeak with him when the dreſſing was over. Whilſt it was doing, he ſaid to the Primate, if this core (pointing to the boil) were once out, I ſhould quickly be well. To which the Primate replied, I doubt the core lies deeper; there is a core at the heart that muſt be taken out, or elſe it will not be well. Ah! replied Cromwell (ſeemingly unconcerned) ſo there is indeed, and ſighed. But, when the Primate began to ſpeak of the buſineſs he came about, he anſwered to this effect, that he had ſince better conſidered it, having adviſed with his council; who thought it not ſafe for him to grant libery of conſcience to thoſe ſort of men, who are reſtleſs, and implacable enemies to him and his government. And ſo took his leave with good words and outward civility (120).

(120) Id. p. 75.

[YY] He predicted the King's Reſtoration.] We have already obſerved (121), that ſuch kind of predictions were uſual with the Primate in expreſſing his reſentments of any great and violent wickedneſs. Upon the preſent occaſion, when he found it in vain to urge the matter any further, he returned to his lodgings very much troubled and concerned; and, when he was in his chamber, ſaid to ſome of his relations, and Dr Parr that came to viſit him, 'This falſe man hath broken his word with me, and refuſes to perform what he promiſed. Well, he will have

The ſame year, 1655, his Grace publiſhed his laſt piece, De Græca Septuaginta Interpretum verum Septagma, to which was ſubjoined, De Cainane in vulgata LXX editione ſuperaddita ex ejuſdem Chronologia Sacra nondum edita Diſſertatio, una cum ejuſdem edita ad Lud. have little cauſe to glory in his wickedneſs; for he will not continue long. The King will return: Though I ſhall not live to ſee it, you may. The government both in church and ſtate is in confuſion. The Papiſts are advancing their projects, and making ſuch advantages as will hardly be prevented (122).' Upon the whole it cannot be denied, that the Primate's rebuke of his Highneſs, mentioned in the preceding remark, was not only very uncourtly, but extremely unſeaſonable at a time when he was come to petition a favour. With regard to his predicting the Reſtoration from the wickedneſs of the times and the prevalence of Popery, we ſhall preſent the Reader with the following particular account from a manuſcript in the Muſæum Thoreſbianum, intitled, The predictions of that learned and holy man Biſhop Uſher.

That year wherein he died, being aſked by a gentleman 'what his preſent apprehenſions were of a very great perſecution that would fall upon the church of Chriſt in theſe nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, (concerning which he had ever confidently ſpoken many years paſt, when we were in the fulleſt peace and ſettlement) whether he did not believe theſe ſad times to be paſſed, or whether yet to come?' He told me they were yet to come, and that he did as confidently expect them as ever he had done. That they would fall upon ourſelves the Proteſtant churches in Europe. I anſwered, I hoped they might have been paſt as to this nation, ſince that I thought, though we in them had been puniſhed leſs than our ſins deſerved, and that the wars had left much leſs devaſtation than by that means had been brought upon other countries, yet many a houſe, fair and great, had been left without inhabitants, many a family had been impoveriſhed, and many thouſand lives loſt in that war; that Ireland and Scotland had drunk deep of the cup of God's anger, to the overthrow of government, and almoſt utter deſtruction of a great part of thoſe nations.

He turning to me, and fixing his eyes with that ireful look which he uſed to have when he ſpake God's words, and not his own, and the power of God upon him to conſtrain him ſo to do, Fool not yourſelf with ſuch hopes; for I tell you all that you have yet ſeen have been but the beginning of ſorrows to what is yet to come upon the proteſtant churches of Chriſt; which ſhall, e'er long, fall under ſharper perſecutions than ever yet hath been upon them. And therefore, ſaid he to me, look you be not found in the outer court, but a worſhipper in the temple before the altar; for Chriſt will meaſure all that profeſs his name, and call themſelves his people, and the outward worſhippers he will leave to be trodden down by the Gentiles.

The outward court (ſaid he) is the formal Chriſtians, whoſe religion ſtands in performing the outſide duties of Chriſtianity, without having an inward life and power of faith and love uniting them to Chriſt; theſe God will leave to be trodden down and ſwept away by the Gentiles. But the worſhippers within the temple and before the altar are thoſe who worſhip God in ſpirit and truth, whoſe ſouls are made his temples, where he is honoured and adored in the moſt inward thoughts they have, and who ſacrifice their luſts and foul affections in their own wills to him. God will hide them in the hollow of his hand and under the ſhadow of his wings. And that will be one great difference between theſe laſt and all other preceding perſecutions: In them the moſt eminent and ſpiritual miniſters were, firſt or laſt, violently fallen upon; but, in this laſt, theſe will be preſerved by God, as a ſeed of that glory that ſhall immediately fall to the church as ſoon as theſe ſtorms are over; for as they will be the ſharpeſt, ſo they will be but ſhort, and ſhall take away but the groſs hypocrites and formaliſts, while the true ſpiritual believers ſhall be preſerved till the calamity be paſt.

I then aſked him by what inſtruments this great trial would be brought on. He anſwered, by the Papiſts. I replied, that ſeemed to me very improbable, ſince they were leſs countenanced, and leſs in number in theſe nations, and the hearts of the people were more ſet againſt them, than ever ſince the Reformation. He anſwered that it would be by their hands, and in the way of a ſudden maſſacre, and that the now Pope would be the inſtrument of it. And theſe things he ſpoke with the aſſurance and ireful look that I have obſerved him to ſpeak with, when I have heard him myſelf predict things very unlikely, in human appearance, to come, which I myſelf had then lived to ſee happen according to his predictions; which made me give the more attention to what he uttered.

And he then added, that the Papiſts were, in his opinion, the Gentiles ſpoken of in Rev. ii. to whom the outward court ſhould be left, that they may tread it under foot, they having received the gentile worſhip in their adoring images and ſaints departed, and taken to themſelves many mediators. And this (ſaid he) is now deſigning among them, and therefore look you be ready.

This was the ſubſtance, and, for the greateſt part (I think) the words themſelves, which that holy man ſpake to me at the time beforementioned, which I ſet down, that ſo great a prediction may not be loſt to myſelf or others.

The ſame holy man repeated the ſame predictions to his only daughter the Lady Tyrrel, and that, with many others, much about the ſame time he had explained himſelf to me, as ſhe herſelf aſſured me with her own mouth. That, after ſhe had been at the door of his chamber, ſhe found him with his eyes lift up to heaven, and tears running down apace, in a kind of extaſy, wherein he continued after ſhe came into the room, without taking any notice of her, for about half an hour. And then he told her his thoughts had been taken up about the miſeries and perſecutions that were coming upon the church of Chriſt, that would be ſo ſharp and bitter, that they had forced thoſe tears from his eyes; but he hoped he ſhould not live to ſee it; but poſſibly ſhe might, for they were even at the door: Therefore take heed you be not found ſleeping.

The ſame he after repeated to Mrs Biſs, the chief Baron of Ireland's wife that now is, with this difference in circumſtances, that if (ſaid he) they bring back the King, they may be a little longer delayed; but they will ſurely come, and therefore look ye be not unprepared for it.

The Lady Tyrrel's anſwer to a friend's letter about the truth of theſe predictions.

'Sir,

'I cannot ſpeak ſo punctually to the particulars of 'your paper, but much of it I have heard him ſpeak 'with great aſſurance in the beginning of the ſummer 'before the rebellion in Ireland. Sir Thomas Barrington's 'Lady was enquiring his opinion of the Interpreters of 'the Revelations and of the prophecies of Daniel: She 'was deſirous to know whether the laſt bitter dregs 'ſhould be poured out upon the world. I can never 'forget with what trouble he expreſſed his anſwer, viz. 'That he could not ſee but that God intended them on 'the Northern parts. And, ſaid he, I beſought God in 'mercy to divert a ſhare of the time from our dominions, 'and that they may not begin with poor Ireland: But 'we muſt all (ſaid he) taſte of them, I am certain. 'Mrs Barrington, who is yet living, was preſent at 'this diſcourſe as well as myſelf, when my father, 'among other admonitions, was pleaſed to give me his 'commands to be prepared for times of perſecution; 'for he feared wicked people would for a time prevail, 'and that the perſecution would be ſharp, but ſhould 'not laſt long. The laſt day that I ſaw my dear Father 'he told me, that I ſhould ſee, in a ſhort time, London 'burnt; at which when I was troubled; Yes, ſays he, 'it will be burnt to a cinder (that was his expreſſion): 'How can we expect other than jugdment upon the 'ſeat of rebellion and ſin, and miſeries that have pro-'ceeded from thence. He was alſo confident of his 'Majeſty's reſtoration within five years, or leſs. He 'ſaid it will be in a ſhort time; You will live to ſee it, 'but I ſhall not: And ſaid my thoughts and dreams 'are often troubled by being carried by violence into a 'great church. Theſe were his laſt diſcourſes to her, 'who is

Jacobum,

(ww) Vid. rem. [D].

Jacobum, anno 1607 data Epiſtola (ww). Our Author did not long ſurvive this publication; for going ſhortly after to the Lady Peterborough's houſe at Ryegate in Surrey, he was taken [ZZ] on the 20th of March, 1655-6, with an illneſs which carried him off the next day, in the ſeventy-ſixth year of his age. His friends intended to bury him at Ryegate, in the vault of the Howard family (xx); but they were forbid by Cromwell [AAA], at whoſe order the corps being firſt removed to Somerſet-houſe in the Strand, was conveyed thence with great magnificence to Weſtminſter-Abbey, where it was interred in Eraſmus's Chapel, the funeral ſervice being performed according to the liturgy of the Church of England, by Dr Nicholas Bernard. who preached a ſermon upon the occaſion, which was afterwards printed. As to the Archbiſhop's character: His genius, in every particular, has been ſufficiently marked in the courſe of this memoir; we ſhall therefore only give ſome deſcription of his perſon and temper. He was of the taller ſort of middle-ſized men, and well-ſhaped. He walked upright to the laſt. His hair was naturally brown when young, and his complexion ſanguine. His countenance expreſſed gravity and good-nature. He had a preſence that commanded both reſpect and reverence. The air of his face was ſo difficult to hit, that though many pictures were drawn of him, yet, ſays Dr Parr, I never ſaw any that was like him but one, which was done by Mr (afterwards Sir Peter) Lely. His conſtitution was ſtrong and healthy, nor was he ever troubled with the head-ache, gout, or ſtone; but bred blood ſo faſt, that it often burſt out of the veins on one ſide of his tongue; and this was ſomething ſingular, that he never felt his heart beat in the greateſt exerciſe. He was eaſy, affable, and chearful in converſation, and extremely charitable (yy). He was of ſo ſweet a temper, continues Dr Parr, that I never heard he did an ill office to any one man, or revenged any of thoſe that had been done to him. He envyed no man's happineſs, or vilified their perſons or parts, nor was he apt to cenſure, or condemn any man upon bare reports. Though he could rebuke ſharply in the cauſe of virtue and religion, yet he was not eaſily provoked to paſſion. He left his library, being the chief part of his ſubſtance, as a portion to his only daughter, who had been the mother of a numerous offſpring. It was firſt bought by the officers and ſoldiers of Cromwell's army in Ireland, and lodged in Dublin Caſtle, where it lay, though not without being much pillaged, till the Reſtoration, which bringing it into the poſſeſſion of King Charles II, he gave it, according to the Primate's firſt intention, to Dublin College, where it now remains [BBB]. From the Primate's manuſcripts we have ſeveral poſthumous pieces in print, ſome of which have been occaſionally mentioned in the courſe of this memoir. The titles of the reſt are, 1. Chronologia Sacra ſeu Annorum πρωτοτοκίας Patriarcharum πρωτοκλίας Iſraelitarum in Ægypto; Annorum etiam Judicum, Regum Judæ Iſraelis ἀπόδειξις Chronologica. Oxford 1660, in 4to, publiſhed by Dr Thomas Barlow, Keeper of the Bodleian Library, and afterwards Biſhop of Lincoln, and was reprinted with the Annals of the Old and New Teſtament, at Geneva, 1722, in fol. But this chronology is imperfect, the Author dying while he was engaged in it (zz). 2. A collection of Pieces, under the title of The Judgment of the late Archbiſhop, &c. publiſhed by

(zz) Dr Smith ſays, he propoſed to have joined to it a tract, De primitivo et vero Hebræorum Kalendario. Smith in Vita Uſſerii, p. 117.

[ZZ] He was taken ill.] He firſt complained of his hip, thinking it was a touch of the Sciatica, which he had been afflicted with many years before. But next morning he complained of a great pain in his ſide, which could not be removed by the phyſician, and he departed about one o'clock in the afternoon. His laſt words were, O Lord forgive me eſpecially my ſins of omiſſion. Upon opening his body, there was obſerved a thick membrane lined with fat, ſuppoſed by the ſurgeons to be a continuation of the Omentum or caul, which extended itſelf quite over the ſtomach, and was faſtened above to the Peritonæum, ſomewhat below the diaphragm. The Primate had been often heard to ſay, he never felt his heart beat in the moſt violent exerciſes. He uſed frequently to have evacuations of blood from the veins on one ſide of his tongue, but more uſually in ſome lower parts of his body; which ſtopping for ſome time before his death, was thought to be the cauſe of it, as he had a quick digeſtion, and bred blood faſt (123).

(123) Id. p. 77.

[AAA] They were forbid by Cromwell &c.] A more conſpicuous inſtance of the Primate's great reputation among all orders and degrees of men could not be given than in this action of the Protector, who was plainly led thereto from the popularity of it. His relations durſt not diſobey the command, though it was much againſt their wills, perceiving well enough, ſays Dr Parr, the Uſurper's deſign, that (as it was intended ſo) it would make more for his own honour than that of the deceaſed, and withal perceiving (what accordingly happened) that he would never defray half the expence of ſuch a ſolemn funeral, which therefore would bring the greateſt part upon them, though they were leaſt able to bear it; and yet he would reap all the glory of it. I ſhould not, proceeds the Doctor, have ſaid ſo much on this ſubject, had it not been to ſhew the world the intriguing ſubtlety of this Uſurper even in this ſmall affair; and that, for the expence of about 200l. out of the Deodands in his Almoner's hands, (which was nothing at all to him) he was able to put thoſe he accounted his enemies to treble that charge (124).

(124) Parr, p. 78.

[BBB] Where it now remains.] This was according to the Primate's firſt intention; but, upon the loſs of every thing elſe except his books, it is no wonder he left theſe in the manner abovementioned; his daughter having before had nothing from him except ſome pieces of gold preſented to him by Mr Selden's executors and other perſons of quality. The library conſiſted of ten thouſand volumes, printed and manuſcript, and coſt the Primate many thouſand pounds. Both the King of Denmark and Cardinal Mazarine offered a good price for it by their agents here; but the executors were forbidden, by an order from Oliver and his council, to ſell it to any one without his conſent; ſo it was at laſt bought by the ſoldiers and officers of the then army in Ireland, who, out of emulation to the former noble action of Queen Elizabeth's army, were incited by ſome men of public ſpirits to the like performance, and they had it for much leſs than the real worth, or what had been offered for it before by the agents abovementioned. They had alſo with it all the manuſcripts which were not of his own hand-writing: as alſo a choice though not numerous collection of ancient coins. But, when this library was carried over into Ireland, the Uſurper and his ſon, who then commanded in chief there, would not beſtow it upon the college, leſt perhaps the gift ſhould not appear ſo conſiderable there as it would do by itſelf; and therefore they gave out that they intended it for a new College or Hall, which they ſaid they intended to build and endow. But it proved that, as theſe were not times, ſo, they were not perſons capable of any ſuch noble or pious work; ſo that this library lay in the caſtle of Dublin, unbeſtowed and unemployed, till Cromwell's death; and, during that anarchy and confuſion that followed, the rooms where this treaſure was kept being left open, many of the books, and moſt of the beſt manuſcripts, were ſtolen away, or elſe embezzled by thoſe that were intruſted with them (125).

[CCC] His Life written by Dr Parr.] This worthy Divine, Dr Parr, who had ſo great a ſhare in the Primate's friendſhip, was the younger ſon of Richard Parr of Devonſhire, who, being ſent into Ireland by King James I. to be a Miniſter there after Tyrone's rebellion, fixed himſelf in the town of Fermoy in the county of Cork, where this ſon Richard was born in 1617, his mother being then fifty-five years of age. Afterwards the Father, removing to Caſtle-Lyons in the ſame county, put his ſon to ſchool to an Iriſh Roman catholic Prieſt, who, with others of the ſame church, were the only ſchoolmaſters in Ireland at that time for the Latin tongue. In 1635 our Author was ſent to England, and, in Michaelmas term the ſame year, was entered a poor ſcholar or ſervitor of Exeter-college, at which time being recommended to the care of Dr John Prideaux, the Rector, for his towardlineſs and great ingenuity, he was, by the Rector's intereſt, choſen, while Batchelor of Arts (126), Chaplain-Fellow of that college anno 1641. In 1643, Primate Uſher being driven, in the civil wars, to take ſanctuary at Oxford, became a lodger in the ſame college, and taking notice of Mr Parr, then a junior Maſter (127), and a frequent Preacher in Oxford, he made him his Chaplain, and took him in his retinue that year to Cardiff and St Donate in Glamorganſhire; at which places continuing in the Primate's ſervice till the ſaid wars were terminated, he attended him then to London, and ſoon after became Vicar of Ryegate in Surrey by the preſentation of one Roger James, Gent. whoſe ſiſter he married, being a widow of a plentiful fortune. In a pamphlet that came out in 1647, containing the contents of the Covenant, and the names of the Miniſters of Surrey that ſet their hands in teſtimony of the lawfulneſs of it, Mr Parr's name appears among the reſt: Yet his friends and intimate acquaintance averred that he never took the ſaid Covenant, though much preſſed thereto by the Committee of Goldſmith's hall in London. In 1649 he reſigned his fellowſhip of Exeter-college, but continued Chaplain to the Primate till his Grace's death. Afterwards he became Vicar of Camberwell in the ſaid county of Surrey, Rector of St Mary Magdalen in Southwark for a time, and after his Majeſty's reſtoration he was created D. D. (128), and was about the ſame time offered the Deanery of Armagh, and ſoon after a Biſhoprick in Ireland; but, refuſing both, he contented himſelf with only a canonry of Armagh. He was ſo conſtant and ready a Preacher at Camberwell, and ſo generally liked, that thereby he broke two conventicles in his neighbourhood: For, outvying both the Preſbyterians and Independents in his extemporaneous preaching, their auditors left them, and flocked to Mr Parr. In this courſe of conſtant preaching at Camberwell he continued near thirty-eight years; during all which time he was eſteemed a perſon of great piety, and of ſo regular and unblemiſhed a converſation, that even the Nonconformiſt party could not pick up any thing to object againſt him on that account; but generally looked on him as a moderate perſon, chiefly, perhaps, becauſe he was a Calviniſt (129). He died at Camberwell, Nov. 2, 1691, and, according to his deſire, was buried together with his wife in that church-yard. Soon after a ſtone was laid over his grave, with an epitaph inſcribed thereon, teſtifying that he was in preaching conſtant, in life exemplary, in piety and charity moſt eminent, a lover of peace and hoſpitality, and, in fine, a true diſciple of Jeſus Chriſt. To which may be added, that he was a perſon of a generous, genteel temper, exceeding good-natured and charitable to all ſorts of people, inſomuch that thoſe of his own nation, though of a different profeſſion in religion, were often relieved by him (130) &c.
